It is quite surprising how much of the imagery and thought of Joel appears in other books of Scripture. If the date is early, later writers lie under very special obligations to the author of this short book. The most striking part of the imagery is that connected with the locusts, which appear as agents in divine judgments from the time of the exodus from Egypt down to the close of the present dispensation (cf. Ex 10[4ff.], Rev 9[3ff.]). For the phenomena connected with the day of the Lord, the speedy approach of which is supposed to be indicated by the locust invasion, cf. Ex 10[21ff.], Is 13[9f.], Ezk 32[7f.], Am 8[9], Mt 24[29], Mk 13[24f.], Lk 21[25f.], Rev 6[12ff.]. In ch. 3 [Heb. 4] [13] two figures occur which appear elsewhere, especially in the Bk. of Rev. The first is that of the harvest (cf. Hos 6[11], Jer 51[33], Mt 13[39], Rev 14[15f.]). The second is that of the wine-press (cf. Is 63[3], La 1[15], Rev 14[19f.]). Noteworthy also is the figure of the fountain proceeding from the house of J″, when His people are restored to His favour, and watering the dry acacia-wady (ch. 3 [He 4] [18]; cf. Ezk 47[1ff.], Zec 13[1] 14[8], Rev 22[1]). In the promise of the outpouring of the Spirit, Joel seems to have given expression to a glimpse into NT times, with which he was specially favoured. His words have been taken up by the NT Church, and will be used, to the end of our NT dispensation, to express the sum of blessing bestowed by God on His true people (cf. Nu 11[26-29], Zec 12[10], Ac 2[16ff.], Jn 16[7ff.]).

Not less important are the two closely allied truths regarding the remnant and the called (2[32]) [Heb. 3[5]]. For the former, cf. Ob [17] (where the language is the same as in Jl), Is 6[13] (and various other passages), Mic 5[3. 7. 8] [Heb. [2. 6. 7]], Jer 31[7ff.], Ro 11 5[ff.]. For the latter, cf. Ro 9[7ff.]. It is worthy of note that, in this OT book, the truth is distinctly laid down that (as Ewald puts it) 'no man may boast of a right to redemption' (Prophets of OT, Eng. tr. i. 137).

This investigation might be pushed further, but enough has been stated to show that the Bk. of Jl and other books of Scripture have a great deal in common.*

The style of Joel is clear and of a high order, and the language comparatively pure. One of his words for the locusts (גָּזָם) occurs elsewhere only in Am 4^{9}. This, partly, led Bleek to the conclusion that the locust invasion described in Jl was the same as that referred to in Am, and that the two prophets belonged to the same period—Joel being the earlier. If this view is accepted, the perplexing expression הַצְּפוֹנִי (the northern, 2^{20}) admits of a comparatively easy explanation. A north wind is all that is required to bring the locusts from the northern kingdom into Judah.

* Is 13[6] (cf. Jl 1[15]), Am 1[2] (cf. Jl 3 [Heb. 4] [16]), Am 9[13] (cf. Jl 3 [Heb. 4] [18]), raise directly the question of quotations. This point has not been discussed, because, in the case of such a book as the OT, an argument founded on quotations is extremely precarious. That quotations occur in the passages just mentioned is scarcely doubtful. The question is, 'Who quotes?' The words of Jl 3[16] occur quite naturally in a highly poetic passage. The same words in Am 1[2] seem to be chosen as a sort of text for the prophet's discourse. And the reasonable view is that, in this case, Jl is the original source.

JOGBEHAH (יָגְבְּהָה; LXX in Nu καὶ ὕψωσαν αὐτάς, in Jg Ἰεγεβάλ, B).—A town of Gad in Gilead, Nu 32^{35}, named also in connexion with Gideon's pursuit of the Midianites, Jg 8^{11}. It is the present ruin Jubeihah (or Ajbeihât), N.W. from Rabbath-ammon, and about midway between that place and es-Salt. There are remains of a considerable Roman town, and the position is suitable for the line of Gideon's pursuit, from Succoth to Penuel and thence S.E. to Jogbehah. There are three groups of ruins, hence the plur. Ajbeihât.

JOHANAN (יוֹחָנָן; LXX Ἰωνά, Ἰωανάν, Ἰωνάν, Ἰωαννάν, Ἰωάννας).—1. 2 K 25^{23}, Jer 40^{8}–43^{5} (see AZARIAH, No. 23, and GEDALIAH), the son of Kareah, chief of 'the captains of the forces,' who after the fall of Jerusalem joined Gedaliah at Mizpah. Johanan seems to have been a shrewd man; and, foreseeing the calamities which would certainly ensue if Ishmael's plot were successful, he not only joined the other captains in warning Gedaliah, but in a secret interview pressed in vain to be himself permitted to assassinate Ishmael. When the murder of Gedaliah became known, J. pursued after Ishmael, who was carrying captive the remnant of the Jews. The murderer escaped with the loss of two men (Jer $41^{1.\,15}$); but J. recovered the captives, and brought them to a khan (?) near Bethlehem, Geruth-chimham (see 2 S 19^{38}, Lk 2^{7}), whence they might start for Egypt. The politic J. foresaw that the captains would be held responsible by the Chaldæan authorities for the murder of Gedaliah and the escape of the assassin. Having thus determined, J. and all the people consulted Jeremiah, earnestly affirming their resolve to follow at all risks the revealed will of the Lord; but the answer being strongly adverse to their leaving their own land, they accused Jeremiah of being a false prophet, under the malign influence of Baruch, and carried off to Egypt both the prophet and his scribe. 2. 1 Ch 3^{15} eldest son of Josiah, not the same as Jehoahaz; for (α) Jehoahaz was not the eldest son (see 2 K $23^{31.\,36}$); and (β) he is mentioned in this verse as Shallum. Johanan possibly predeceased his father. 3. 1 Ch 3^{24} a post-exilic prince of the line of David. 4. 1 Ch $6^{9.\,10}$ a high priest, perhaps under Rehoboam, father of Azariah, No. 5. 5. 6. 1 Ch $12^{4.\,12}$ two warriors who came to David to Ziklag, a Benjamite and a Gadite respectively. 7. Ezr 8^{12} (JOANNES, 1 Es 8^{38}) one of those who returned with Ezra. 8. 2 Ch 28^{12} an Ephraimite, father of AZARIAH, No. 17. The Heb. is יְהוֹחָנָן, Jehohanan. 9. See JONATHAN, No. 6, and JEHOHANAN, No. 3.

JOHN (Ἰωάννης).—Five persons of this name are mentioned in the Apocr. 1. The father of Mattathias, and grandfather of the five Maccabæan brothers (1 Mac 2^{1}). 2. J., surnamed Caddis or (RV) Gaddis (wh. see), the eldest son of Mattathias (1 Mac 2^{2}, where inferior MSS read Ἰωαννάν; Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1). In B.C. 161 he was slain by the 'sons of Jambri' [JAMBRI] (1 Mac 9^{35-42}; Jos. Ant. XIII. i. 2–4). In 2 Mac 8^{22}, and perhaps again 10^{19}, he is by mistake called Joseph. 3. The father of Eupolemus (1 Mac 8^{17}, 2 Mac 4^{11}, Jos. Ant. XII. x. 6), who was sent by Judas Maccabæus as an ambassador to Rome. The passage in 2 Mac speaks of certain royal privileges obtained for the Jews by this J., but disregarded by Epiphanes. The privileges referred to are probably those granted by Antiochus the Great (Jos. Ant. XII. iii. 3), among which was the right of being governed according to their own laws. 4. An envoy, who together with another named ABSALOM (which see) was sent by the Jews to treat with Lysias (2 Mac 11^{17}). 5. One of the elder sons of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16^{2}), commonly known as J. Hyrcanus (cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 4), and described as 'a (valiant) man' (1 Mac 13^{53}), was appointed by his father commander of the forces, and stationed at Gazara. In conjunction with his brother Judas he defeated CENDEBÆUS (1 Mac 16^{1-10}, cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3). When his father and brothers had been murdered by Ptolemy at Dok near Jericho, J., who was then at Gazara, received warning of their fate, and, having put to death the men sent to assassinate him, secured the position of high priest, which had been made hereditary in the family of Simon B.C. 135 (1 Mac 16^{11-24}, cf. 14^{46}). See MACCABEES.

JOHN (Ac 4^{6}).—A meeting of the Sanhedrin is mentioned, at which there are said to have been gathered together 'the rulers, the elders, and the scribes, with Annas the high priest, and Caiaphas, and John, and Alexander, and all who were of the high priestly family.' Nothing further is known of either John or Alexander (wh. see), and the attempts made to connect the names with other historical characters (such as Johanan ben-Sakkai) are more than improbable. A. C. HEADLAM.

JOHN, FATHER OF SIMON PETER.—In Jn 1^{42} the true reading is Σίμων ὁ υἱὸς Ἰωάνου, in $21^{15.\,16.\,17}$ Σίμων Ἰωάνου. The Vetus Interpretatio Latina of Origen (in Matth. tom. xv. 14, Migne, Pat. Gr. xiii. 1295) quotes a passage from the Gospel according to the Hebrews in which the words occur, 'Simon, fili Joanne, facilius est camelum intrare per foramen acus quam divitem in regnum cælorum' (cf. Hilgenfeld, Evang. secundum Hebræos, pp. 16, 25), a passage, however, which has no place in the Greek text. Further, a cursive MS (Matt. Mk.) of the 9th century (Tisch. Not. Cod. Sin. p. 58) has four marginal glosses, in which τὸ ἰουδαϊκόν [sc. εὐαγγέλιον] is referred to. One of these agrees with a fragment quoted by Jerome from the Gospel according to the Hebrews, so that it appears that these scholia reproduce matter from that Gospel. On Mt 16^{17} (Βαριωνᾶ) there is the note: τὸ ἰουδαικὸν υἱὲ Ἰωάννου (see Handmann, Das Hebräerevang., 'Texte u. Untersuch.,' v. pp. 65, 85). There is sufficient evidence, therefore, that John was found in the Gospel according to the Hebrews as the name of the apostle's father.

In Mt 16^{17} the father's name is given as Jonas—Σίμων Βαριωνᾶ.* In the LXX we find that not only is יוֹנָן represented in B by Ἰωνά in 2 K 25^{23} and by Ἰωνάν in Jer 47 $(40)^{8}$, but even יְהוֹחָנָן (1 Ch 26^{3}) is represented in B by Ἰωνᾶς, in A by Ἰωνάν; cf. 1 Ch 12^{12} (Ἰωάν), Ezr 8^{12}, Neh 6^{18}, 1 Es 9^{1}, Jer 43 $(50)^{4}$ (א*). There is ground, therefore, for the conclusion in the case in question that Ἰωνᾶς is a contraction of Ἰωάνης (so Keim, Geschichte Jesu von Nazara, ii. p. 213 [iii. p. 261, Eng. tr.]; see esp. Lightfoot, On a Fresh Revision, p. 159 n.).

It is possible, however, that we have here an instance of a double name. Such double names were not uncommon; see Zunz, 'Namen der Juden,' in his Gesammelte Schriften, ii. p. 15, who among instances of double Hebrew or Aramaic names adduces Jochanan-Joseph (Gittin, f. 34*b*). More common were the cases in which to a Hebrew or Aramaic name was added a Greek or Roman name—the latter being often chosen so as to make an assonance with the former. Familiar instances are Saul-Paulus (see Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 181 ff.), Joseph-Justus (Ac 1^{23}). It seems therefore not impossible that the name of St. Peter's father was Jona-Jochanan or Jona-Johannes. The latter name was so common (see e.g. the Index to Josephus, or Pape, Wörterbuch) that it must have been familiar to Gentiles (cf. inscription at Ancyra, CIG 4045), and in intercourse with them would have something of the convenience of a Greek or Roman name.

A curious specimen of the harmonizing expedient is found in a note of the Paris MSS. Reg. 1789, 1026, Πέτρος καὶ Ἀνδρέας ἀδελφοί, ἐκ πατρὸς Ἰωνᾶ, μητρὸς Ἰωαννᾶ, or (as it is otherwise read) ἐκ πατρὸς Ἰωάννου, μητρὸς Ἰωνᾶς (see Lightfoot, ubi supra).

JOHN THE BAPTIST (Ἰωάννης ὁ Βαπτιστής).—

i. Sources of Information.
ii. The Facts of John's Life and Ministry.
iii. John's Work and Teaching.
iv. John's Relation to Christ.

i. SOURCES.—In regard to John the Baptist we have practically no sources of first-hand information outside the NT besides the passage in Josephus (Ant. XVIII. v. 2), referred to by Eus. (HE i. 11). The fullest account is that of St. Luke, with which that of St. Matthew agrees closely, so far as the time after the beginning of his public ministry is concerned. St. Mark's notices are very brief. The Fourth Gospel seems to differ from the others in recording only the 'witness' of John the Baptist after our Lord's baptism, while Mt and Lk give his prophetic teaching before that event. The relation of the Fourth Gospel to the others, in this connexion, has been made the subject of special monographs, such as that of Boissonas, mentioned at the end of this article.

ii. LIFE AND MINISTRY.—John the Baptist was the son of Zacharias and Elisabeth. The latter was 'of the daughters of Aaron' (Lk 1^{5}), while Zacharias belonged to the course of Abiah (wh. see), one of the sons of Eleazar, who gave his name to the eighth of the twenty-four courses into which the priests were divided. His priestly descent on both sides brings into stronger contrast the prophetic character of his work. We cannot determine exactly either the time or the place of his birth. Dates varying from B.C. 6 to B.C. 3 have been assigned to it, and Lk 1^{36} would lead us to infer that it was three months before that of our Lord. In regard to the place, it is argued that Zacharias must have lived in one of the priestly towns; but it is possible to prove that priests often lived elsewhere. It is still more arbitrary to pick out one of the priestly towns and fix on Hebron (Othon, Lex. Rabbin. 324). Nor is there sufficient evidence for reading Juttah in Lk 1^{39}, though this place, which lay a little S. of Hebron, is mentioned (Jos 15^{55} 21^{16}) as a priestly town. A tradition, resting on the evidence of the Russian abbot Daniel (c. A.D. 1113), who quotes as his authority a monk of St. Sabas (Didon, Life of Christ, Eng. tr. App. D), fixes the residence of Zacharias at 'Ain Karim, a village to the N.W. of Bethlehem. We cannot go behind the vague statement of St. Luke, who mentions (1^{39}) 'a city of Judah in the hill country.' Of John's early life and training St. Luke, our sole authority, tells us very little. It is summed up in the two verses which state that 'the hand of the Lord was with him' (1^{66}), and that 'the child grew and waxed strong in spirit, and was in the deserts till the day of his showing unto Israel' (1^{80}). To these may be added the words of the angel Gabriel (Lk 1^{15}), 'He shall drink no wine nor strong drink, and he shall be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mother's womb.'

With these few details we have to pass over a period of about thirty years which preceded his ἀνάδειξις (cf. Lk 10^{1}, Ac 1^{24}), and can only speculate on the question (which is of some interest in reference to Jn 1^{31}) whether our Lord was personally known to him (as their relationship would seem to necessitate) or not. There can be little doubt that the elaborate accumulation of dates given by St. Luke ($3^{1.2}$), combined with the expression (unique in the NT) 'the word of God came,' is meant to mark the beginning of John's ministry, and to emphasize its prophetic character. If (see CHRONOLOGY OF THE NT, vol. i. p. 405) we may assign the fifteenth year of Tiberius to A.D. 25–26, then this is the date of the beginning of John's ministry. We cannot determine how long after this beginning the incident of our Lord's baptism occurred, and the arguments used to show that this interval was long (Didon, l.c.) or short (Weiss) are not decisive. The only definite fact to notice is that the first passover of our Lord's ministry (see CHRONOLOGY OF NT, p. 405) is that of A.D. 27, and therefore the baptism must be fixed before that time. To the period following Christ's baptism is to be assigned the carefully defined record of Jn 1^{19-42}, while the Synoptic account belongs to the period which precedes that event.

How long an interval elapsed between Christ's baptism and John's imprisonment is the next point to consider. Here it may be noticed (1) that Lk $3^{19.20}$ mentions the imprisonment before our Lord's baptism, evidently with the intention of completing the references to John before passing to our Lord's ministry; (2) that Mt 4^{12} and Mk 1^{14} connect our Lord's first journey into Galilee with the imprisonment, and make it follow that event in time; (3) that St. John mentions a short stay in Galilee and a visit to Jerusalem for the passover, and then makes the definite statement that 'John was not yet cast into prison' (3^{24}). We must either assume, therefore, that Jn is at variance with Mt and Mk, or that the visit to Galilee which he records preceded our Lord's public ministry there. The latter is the more probable explanation, and in that case the visit of Mt 4^{12} and Mk 1^{14} may be identified with that of Jn 4^{2}. At any rate, for determining the date of the imprisonment, Jn's statements are more important, for that event must have been subsequent to the passover of A.D. 27; further, if we may press the allusion in Jn 4^{35}—τετράμηνός ἐστιν καὶ ὁ θερισμὸς ἔρχεται—our Lord's journey into Galilee will have taken place not very long after the passover, and if we may also use the statements of Mt and Mk which assign the imprisonment as the reason of our Lord's going into Galilee, then we may fix the imprisonment early in A.D. 27. One incident is related during that imprisonment (Mt 11^{2}, Lk 7^{18}), viz. the message sent by John through his disciples to ask our Lord whether He was the Messiah. This is definitely connected, in St. Matthew's account, with the plucking of the ears of corn; in St. Luke it seems to be the result of the report of Christ's ministry in Galilee, and especially of the Raising of the Widow's Son. If, therefore, we follow Mt, this incident would be some time between April and June of the same year; nor would the latter month allow too little time for the completion of the Galilæan tour required by St. Luke's narrative.

* In the LXX of Jonah the name is declined—Ἰωνᾶς, Ἰωνᾶν, Ἰωνᾷ (4^{6}).

The last event to which we have to try and assign a date is the death of John the Baptist, recorded Mt 14$^{3ff.}$, Mk 6$^{14ff.}$. Little weight can be attached to the almost universal commemoration of this event on Aug. 29 (Nilles, Kalend. Utr. Eccles.), though it certainly represents a comparatively early usage. We cannot base any argument on the context in Mt and Mk, for in both the account is inserted parenthetically to explain Herod's statement that John was 'risen from the dead'; but it may be noticed that the news of his death in Mt 14^{13} leads on at once to the miracle of the Feeding of the Five Thousand. Nor can we fix the date of John's death by its coincidence with the γενέσια of Herod Antipas. Herod's reluctance (Mt 14^{5}) to put John to death may, but need not, imply a considerable interval between his imprisonment and death; thus Renan (Vie de Jésus, ch. vii.) puts the arrest in the summer of 29, and the death on the birthday of Herod Antipas in 30.[*] We may perhaps safely argue that his death had taken place before the unnamed feast of Jn 5^{1}, for during our Lord's visit to Jerusalem on that occasion he refers to John's witness as past (Jn 5^{35} ἦν); and though it is possible to argue that his witness was closed by his imprisonment, it is more natural to refer the expression to his death. John's death therefore took place before the feast of Jn 5^{1}, that is, certainly before the second passover of our Lord's ministry, but how long before must depend on the interpretation given to Jn 5^{1}. It cannot be placed later than the beginning of A.D. 28. According to tradition (Theodt. HE iii. 3), John was buried at Samaria.

The scene of John's ministry will be placed partly in the desert of Judæa (Mt 3^{1}), in which it began, and partly in the Jordan Valley, and more definitely near the fords (Bethabara [which see]= 'place of crossing over'), either those in the neighbourhood of Bethshean or those in the neighbourhood of Jericho. Two places are mentioned in connexion with his 'baptism,' viz. Bethany or Bethabara (Jn 1^{28}), and Ænon near to Salim (Jn 3^{23}), probably in the neighbourhood of Bethshean. From Jn 3^{26}, and also from the fact of his coming under the jurisdiction of Herod Antipas, we infer that he probably spent some time in Peræa.

iii. JOHN'S WORK AND TEACHING.—(a) The name ὁ βαπτιστής or ὁ βαπτίζων (whether given to him to distinguish him from others of the same name or not) indicates the feature of his work which attracted special attention. It was used of him during his lifetime by his disciples (Lk 7^{20}), and that the term is not due to the evangelist is clear from Lk 3^{2} 7^{18} etc., where John is by him called son of Zacharias, or simply John. The term is used of him also during his lifetime by our Lord (Mt 11^{11}), who, however, also uses the name John simply (e.g. Mt 11^{13}), by Herodias (Mt 14^{8}), by Herod after John's death (Mt 14^{2}), and by the evangelists Mt and Mk but not Lk and Jn. In regard to his baptism, we gather that his right to perform the ceremony was questioned, inasmuch as (Jn 1^{25}) it was connected, according to Jewish ideas, only with the Messiah (cf. Ezk 36^{25}, Zec 13^{1} etc.), with Elias as His forerunner, and with 'the prophet' (i.e. of Dt 18^{15}). John speaks of himself as having received a special commission from God to baptize (Jn 1^{33}), though this is not spoken of in the angel's message to Zacharias, and he seems (Jn 3^{27}) to defend our Lord's baptism (Jn 3^{26}, but cf. 4^{2}) by basing it on a similar divine commission. The import of the rite was early a question of discussion (Jn 3^{25}), nor does the language of the evangelists make clear what was understood by it; for while Mk 1^{4} Lk 3^{3} define it as 'a baptism of repentance for remission of sins,' Mt 3^{11} speaks of it as a baptism εἰς (τὴν) μετάνοιαν; but μετάνοια can hardly have been the object of the rite, for it was preceded (Mt, Mk) by a confession of sin. The submission of a Jew to the rite was, so far, an act involving μετάνοια, in that it implied that he put himself in the same position towards the coming βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν which the proselyte took up towards the old Jewish dispensation; it implied that he rested no longer on his privileged position as a Jew, but realized his individual responsibility in regard to sin. This comes near to Sabatier's explanation (see Lit. below) of the rite as 'consecrating a new Israel,' and would perhaps best explain the meaning of our Lord's words, in regard to Himself, that a submission to John's baptism was (Mt 3^{15}) a fulfilment, i.e. a complete realization, of what was meant by δικαιοσύνη, as something which consisted not merely in external rites, but involved moral claims. Our Lord implies that John's baptism was from heaven (Mk 11^{30}); and the refusal of the Pharisees and lawyers to receive it is in itself a virtual rejection of God's purpose, while the acceptance of it by the publicans and the people showed a truer recognition on their part of what the righteousness of God really meant (Lk 7$^{29.\,30}$ ἐδικαίωσαν τὸν θεόν). We may notice, too (Mt 21^{32}), that our Lord regards John as coming ἐν ὁδῷ δικαιοσύνης. So that we may regard John's baptism as emphasizing the true nature of δικαιοσύνη.

(β) We pass from his baptism to (1) his position as a teacher; (2) the language in which that teaching was conveyed; (3) its underlying ideas.

(1) The angel Gabriel connects with him (Lk 1^{17}) the prophecy of Malachi (4$^{5.\,6}$), but precludes the idea that Elias would return in person as many expected (see Geux, l.c. p. 73 ff.), by saying that John should come in 'the spirit and power' of Elias. That he was Elias come in the flesh John himself (Jn 1^{21}) denied, while Christ affirmed that John the Baptist was really the Elias who was to precede the Messiah's coming (Mt 11^{14} 17$^{11-13}$). The other prophecy which was applied to John the Baptist by himself (Jn 1^{23}) and also by the evangelists (Mt 3^{3}, Mk 1^{2}) is that of Is 40^{3}. He was then 'more than a prophet,' as himself the subject of prophecy. But he was also essentially a prophet, and as such St. Luke introduces him in the unique expression already noticed, as such Zacharias refers to him (Lk 1^{76} προφήτης Ὑψίστου κληθήσῃ), as such Christ regarded him (Mt 11^{11}), and the people as a rule (but cf. Mt 11^{18}) accepted him as a prophet (Mt 14^{5} 21^{26}). In regard to his special mission we must refer also to the words used of him in Jn 1^{6} 3^{28}

[*] These dates are, of course, later than those in the article on CHRONOLOGY OF NT, which is here followed.

(ἀπεσταλμένος) and Mt 11^{11} (ἐγήγερται). It is then as 'the last of the prophets' and as such closing the dispensation of 'the law and the prophets' (Mt 11^{14}, Lk 16^{16}) that we specially think of John the Baptist.

(2) When we pass to the language in which his teaching was conveyed, we find that it is largely based on that used by OT prophecy, especially by Isaiah. His metaphors of the burning chaff, the fan, the barren tree, are all to be found in OT. Some of the expressions are difficult to trace, and not easy to explain. Thus various interpretations have been assigned to the phrase γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν (Mt 3^{7} etc., Lk 3^{7}), which is not to be found in the OT, but is one of several expressions common to our Lord and John the Baptist; another expression of which the meaning is not quite clear is the baptism 'with fire' (Mt 3^{11}).

(3) In regard to the substance of his teaching, it must be remembered (a) that even in the fullest account of it given by St. Luke we have only an abstract (cf. 3^{7} imperfect ἔλεγεν, and 3^{18} πολλὰ καὶ ἕτερα); (b) that St. Luke regards the character of his teaching as a consequence (3^{7} οὖν) of his carrying out the preparatory work spoken of in Is 40^{3}. We may amplify the abstract by noticing the words which are used to describe it. They are κηρύσσω (Mk 1^{4} etc.), εὐαγγελίζω (Lk 3^{18}), παρακαλέω (Lk 3^{18}), and in the case of Herod ἐλέγχω; and these imply that he announced good tidings, and also the preparation necessary for it; and in both these his prophetic character appears. The 'good tidings' he announced was the near approach of 'the kingdom.' The nature of this kingdom he does not define, nor does he state how the kingdom is to be established, nor who its members are to be. Probably, in accordance with ancient Jewish belief, he expected a visible kingdom; but he advances on that in so far as consciously or unconsciously to imply that it was spiritual, and to prepare the way for the realization that it was not to be merely Jewish but universal. These points can be seen from his insistence on the moral preparation for it. Repentance is a necessity, for all national privileges are useless, and the fitting mode of life requires that ordinary pursuits should be followed, but in a new spirit. Thus an individual and universal responsibility is insisted on, and an individual and universal judgment is proclaimed as imminent. Limits of space prevent an examination in detail of this teaching, but it will repay careful study. We can only summarize. It was addressed (Lk 3^{10}; cf. Mk 1^{5}, Mt 3^{5}) to the ὄχλοι, who came out to him in large numbers, and included in their ranks (Mt 3^{7}) many Pharisees and Sadducees. The points insisted on by John are (1) confession of sins, and repentance, which had been already enforced by the OT prophets (e.g. Hos 6^{1}, Jl 2^{12} etc.); (2) the uselessness of reposing on their national privileges as 'children of Abraham' is indicated, and possibly the outburst γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν may have been provoked by the thought that many of his hearers were relying on his baptism as of value per se, and teaching others to do the same (Boissonas, l.c. p. 40); (3) a judgment is imminent (ἤδη), which is universal (πᾶν δένδρον), and determined by the character of the individual. This judgment involves a manifestation of divine ὀργή, not only towards the political enemies of Israel (as in OT), but towards the Jews. This ὀργή is frequently mentioned in OT and NT, and a resulting purification or separation, διακαθαριεῖ, probably implies not, as Godet, the universal character of the purification, but its thoroughness; (4) St. Luke alone records the answers given to different classes who realized the need of action of some kind. John's answers show the changed requirements—not outward observances or a leaving of their ordinary duties, but a new attitude towards them; (5) finally, John removes the doubts of some as to whether he was the Messiah, by asserting the inferiority of his own person and work. His teaching as recorded in St. John will be best considered under the next heading; but it will be interesting for students to try and trace whether there is any difference between St. John's teaching before and after his baptism of our Lord.

It remains under this head to say a word as to the effect of his teaching. It is clear that very large numbers came to him, and he was generally accepted as a prophet; and of the lower classes many accepted his teaching (Lk 7^{30}), though the upper classes refused to accept his baptism, and some said of him, as of our Lord, δαιμόνιον ἔχει (Mt 11^{18}). Besides the effect of his work and teaching on the people at large, we read also of μαθηταί who fasted (Mk 2^{18} etc.), who attended him in prison (Mt 11^{2} 14^{12}), and to whom he taught special forms of prayer (Lk 5^{33} 11^{1}), some of whom left him to follow Christ (Jn 1^{37}). Their number is given in Clem. Hom. ii. 23 as thirty. In the Acts (18^{25} 19^{3}) we hear of Christians at Ephesus who accepted John's baptism. Their mention shows 'how profoundly the effect of John's preaching was felt in districts as remote as proconsular Asia, even after a lapse of a quarter of a century' (Lightfoot, Colossians, p. 402). Later on (and Lightfoot finds a trace of this in the argument of St. John's Gospel) the Hemerobaptists connected their beliefs and practices with John the Baptist, and Christians called after him, the Sabæans or Mandæans, are still, though in diminishing numbers, to be found in the marshy districts near the confluence of the Tigris and Euphrates (see Lightfoot, l.c., and literature quoted by him p. 405; and also Renan, who finds evidence of Babylonian ideas).

iv. JOHN'S RELATION TO CHRIST.—From the narrative of St. Luke (chs. 1 and 2), and from Mt 3^{14}, we should infer that John knew our Lord, and realized the nature of His Person; but the words of Jn 1$^{31.33}$ 'I knew him not,' imply that at any rate till the sign was given at our Lord's baptism John did not recognize Him as the Messiah; and this view is taken by Strauss, Godet, and Weiss. It is quite probable that the Synoptic narrative gives John's teaching before the baptism, and that the Fourth Gospel gives the special μαρτυρία which it was John's function, in the Divine Providence (Jn 1^{7}), to bear, so soon as he realized by the sign at the baptism what our Lord's real personality was. This does not require that our Lord's divinity did not begin till His baptism and the descent of the Holy Ghost there, as held by various Gnostic and Humanitarian sects.* To the time of John's baptism of our Lord is to be assigned that 'anointing' with the Holy Spirit (Ac 4^{37} 10^{38}) which was His consecration to His ministry. We assume here that the Synoptic narrative does refer to the time before our Lord's baptism, and the Fourth Gospel to the period which follows. In the former his references to our Lord's person are only relative to himself: He is ὁ ἰσχυρότερος—He is the master, while John is the servant who bears (Mt) or looses (Mk, Lk) the master's sandals. The unwillingness to baptize our Lord (Mt 3^{14}) does, however, require that John had some definite grasp of who it was that came to him. John speaks of the work of Him for whom he was preparing as consisting in a baptism 'with the Holy Ghost and with fire.' The baptism with fire must refer either to the fire of judgment (as Keim, Neander, Meyer, etc.), or to the Holy Spirit (as Godet), and its effect is either that of devouring (Dt 4^{24}) or purifying (Zec 13^{9}, Mal 3^{2} etc.). In the Fourth Gospel, though we probably must not understand the twice-repeated (Jn $1^{15.\ 30}$) 'who was before me' as a statement of belief in the pre-existence of Christ, yet the language in which John the Baptist speaks of Christ as 'the Son of God' (1^{34}) and the 'Lamb of God' implies a much higher and more definite conception of the person of Christ than any words used by John the Baptist in the Synoptic Gospels, and is best explained by the vision referred to in these Gospels, which would account for the clearer grasp. We cannot be sure that the Baptist understood completely the term 'Lamb of God' which he applied to our Lord, but he must have had in his mind some thought of Is 53. In the other passage in which he speaks of Christ as the Bridegroom, he is using language by which the relation of Jehovah to His people is frequently described in the OT (Is 54^{5} 61^{10}, Hos 2^{20}). It is an interesting point of coincidence between the Synoptic narrative and that of St. John that our Lord uses this same expression of Himself when disciples of John were present, Mt $9^{14ff.}$.

* Cf. Conybeare, Key of Truth, pp. xii, xiii, for the teaching of Gregory the Illuminator, esp. 'John gave priesthood, and unction, and prophecy, and kingship to our Saviour Christ, and Christ gave it to the apostles, and the apostles to the clergy of the Church.'

To complete our notice of John's relation to Christ, it is necessary just to refer to the message which he sent to our Lord from the prison (Mt 11): we can hardly believe, after the terms applied by him to Christ in St. John, that his own faith wavered, and must suppose that he wished some confirmation of Christ's Messiahship to be given for the sake of his disciples.

Before we leave this heading of the subject, it is worth while to notice how many of our Lord's expressions resemble those found in John the Baptist's mouth. Besides the reference to the Bridegroom just mentioned, we find a connexion in the command to repent with which our Lord begins His ministry in the language about the tree and its fruits (Mt 7^{16} 12^{33}), in the expression γεννήματα ἐχιδνῶν (Mt 3^{7}) used twice by our Lord (Mt 12^{34} 23^{33}), and nowhere else except by John the Baptist. We must also briefly notice here the testimony borne by our Lord to John, as the greatest born of women, as closing the older dispensation of the law and the prophets, and yet as less than the least in the kingdom of heaven, because he preceded its advent (Mt 11^{11}).

It hardly falls within the scope of this Dictionary to follow the many references connected with the name of John the Baptist in art, in liturgical use, in the dedication of churches, etc. etc.—for these reference may be made to the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities, articles 'John the Baptist' and 'Baptisteries,' to the index of Nilles' Kalendarium Utriusque Ecclesiæ, to Paciandi, Antiquitates Christianæ, vol. iii. I. THE LIFE OF ST. JOHN.—The fragmentary character of the literature relating to the earliest days of the Christian Church has deprived us of any very full or certain knowledge of the lives of the apostles. And it has happened, in the case of St. Peter and St. John conspicuously, that the discussion of the traditions of their later history has been involved in controversy. It will tend to clearness if the ordinary traditional account of St. John's life is first set out, and then the range of the controversy indicated.

(a) There are but few scenes in the Gospel story in which St. John takes a prominent place; but enough is said to produce a strong impression of the apostle's character. He appears first, according to a very natural inference, in the opening chapter of the Gospel that bears his name. Two disciples of the Baptist, hearing the witness borne by their master to Jesus, follow the new Prophet. One is named by the author—it was Andrew, the brother of Simon Peter (Jn 1^{40}). The other is not named, but it has seemed obvious to infer that it was St. John. His call to be an apostle is told in the Synoptic tradition, by St. Luke, with the greatest fulness of detail (Lk $5^{8\text{-}11}$, Mt $4^{21.\ 22}$, Mk $1^{19.\ 20}$). It is from this source we learn that he was son of Zebedee (for John's possible relationship to Jesus see art. SALOME), and that he and his father were fishermen and Galilæans. It has often been pointed out that the presence of hired servants in the ship (Mk 1^{20}) with Zebedee implies a position of some degree of wealth. During the course of our Lord's ministry St. John appears only rarely in a position distinct from that of the other apostles. He is clearly one of the most prominent of the group of our Lord's followers. He, with Peter and James, is admitted to witness the raising of Jairus' daughter (Mk 5^{37}, Lk 8^{51}); the same three are chosen to be present at the Transfiguration (Mt 17^{1}, Mk 9^{2}, Lk 9^{28}), and are nearest to the Lord at the agony in Gethsemane (Mk 14^{33} and parallels). Once these three, with Andrew, are described as inquiring when our Lord's last prophecies would receive fulfilment (Mk 13^{3}). Besides these instances, the two brothers, James and John, appear (Lk 9^{54}) independently, as wishing to call down fire on the Samaritan village that refused them shelter; and are brought to the Lord by their mother with a request for a special place of dignity in the kingdom (Mk 10^{35}). John is once connected with St. Peter alone; according to St. Luke, these two apostles were sent to prepare the passover (Lk 22^{8}). Once John is described as acting alone; it is he who asks our Lord what is to be done with the man whom they had found casting out devils in Jesus' name (Mk 9^{38}, Lk 9^{49}). These notices, though scattered and fragmentary, definitely suggest a particular character—the character indicated by the name given to John and his brother by our Lord: Boanerges (wh. see), 'sons of thunder' (Mk 3^{17}). They were fiery in their zeal and severe in temperament; yet, for all this, they were among the closest of our Lord's chosen band. Though He rebukes their vehemence, He sees in them a character such as an apostle needs.

When we turn to the Fourth Gospel, we find that the name of John, son of Zebedee, is never once named. But there are in the account of the Passion and Resurrection certain references to an unnamed apostle whom universal tradition has identified with St. John. At the Last Supper we read of a disciple whom Jesus loved, who was reclining at the table in a place of special nearness to our Lord. It seems from the language used (ch. 13) that the three, our Lord, St. Peter, and this unnamed apostle, occupied one triclinium. They reclined, according to custom, on the left side, obliquely across the couch. Our Lord was in the centre, St. Peter in the place second in dignity to this, parallel to the position occupied by the Lord and behind Him; St. John in the third place, parallel also but before Him. When the prophecy of the betrayal is made, St. Peter from behind beckons to St. John in front to ask who it is. St. John, leaning back upon the breast of Jesus as he lay (13^{25} ἀναπεσὼν ἐκεῖνος οὕτως ἐπὶ τὸ στῆθος τοῦ Ἰησοῦ), asks the question and receives the (probably whispered) communication. This same apostle is apparently he who was known to the high priest (18^{16}), and used his acquaintance to admit St. Peter to the court of the high priest. The disciple whom Jesus loved is at the foot of the cross, and there receives the commission to take care of the Virgin-mother after the Lord's death (19^{26}). He is again in close connexion with St. Peter on the day of the resurrection. The news is brought to Simon Peter and the disciple whom Jesus loved (20^{2}), and the two together make a visit to the tomb. In the last chapter of all, for the only time in this Gospel 'the sons of Zebedee' are mentioned (21^{2}), and in the scene which follows, St. Peter and the disciple whom Jesus loved are the prominent agents. It is the latter who is first to recognize the Lord. The chapter is indeed inserted in order to correct an impression that this disciple is to await the coming of the Lord without dying. And then, in words which are closely parallel to the claim (19^{35}) to have been eye-witness of the scene upon the cross, it is distinctly asserted that the disciple whom Jesus loved is he that testifieth these things and that wrote these things (21^{24}).

(b) In the Acts, St. John appears in two important scenes in company with St. Peter; the connexion of these two apostles (noted in Lk 22^{8} and closely in agreement with the Fourth Gospel, if the beloved disciple is indeed St. John) is carried out in these chapters of the Acts. These are the two who heal the lame man at the Beautiful Gate of the temple, and are brought before the Sanhedrin (Ac 3. 4). These, again, are the two who go down to Samaria to bestow the gift of the Holy Ghost on those whom Philip had converted and baptized (8^{15}). Once more the name of John is mentioned, again in connexion with St. Peter, as having been seen at Jerusalem by St. Paul when he went up by revelation (Gal 2^{1}) and saw those who seemed to be pillars (Gal 2^{9}). After this, except in the Revelation, the name of John disappears from the New Testament.

(c) When we pass beyond the New Testament, we find ourselves in the region of somewhat fragmentary tradition. We learn that at some period undefined St. John left Jerusalem and took up his residence at Ephesus. Of the intervening period between the departure from Jerusalem and the residence at Ephesus we know nothing, except that Tertullian (de Præsc. Hær. 36) affirms that St. John came to Rome, and was there by way of suffering martyrdom. He was placed in a cauldron of boiling oil, but was miraculously preserved from death. No date is fixed for this by Tertullian, but St. John is said to have been banished after his escape to an island ('relegatur ad insulam'). Eusebius, however, definitely connects this banishment with the persecution of Domitian (HE III. xviii.), and quotes in support of his view the statement of Irenæus that St. John saw the Revelation πρὸς τῷ τέλει τῆς Δομετιανοῦ ἀρχῆς (Iren. adv. Hær. V. xxx. 3). Eusebius then affirms (on the basis of ὁ τῶν παρ' ἡμῖν ἀρχαίων λόγος, HE III. xx.) that, on the accession of Nerva, St. John removed from Patmos to Ephesus. Here he organized the Churches in Asia, and survived till the time of Trajan (Eus. HE III. xxiii., quoting Iren. adv. Hær. II. xxii. 5, III. iii. 4).

It is to this period that most of the remaining anecdotes of St. John are assigned. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, in a letter to Victor of Rome, says that John was priest here, and wore the πέταλον or high-priestly headdress; that he died, and was buried there (Eus. V. xxiv.). On the authority of Apollonius, St. John is said to have raised a man from the dead at Ephesus (Eus. V. xviii.). It was in illustration of his exercise of the episcopal office with characteristic love that Clement of Alexandria tells the story of his journey into the forest to reclaim a convert who had fallen into bad ways and joined a band of robbers (Clem. Alex. Quis Div. Salv. ch. 42). While at Ephesus he combats fiercely the heresy of Cerinthus, refusing even to be under the same roof with the heretic (Iren. adv. Hær. III. iii. 4), and being persuaded to write his Gospel, specially to confute such heretics as this (ib. III. xi.). The Muratorian Fragment contains a story of the origin of the Gospel somewhat akin to this. It describes a discussion in which Andrew took part, in which St. John was pressed to write down his teaching about our Lord. After deliberation, and a special intimation from the Holy Spirit, he acts upon the advice. There are two stories of his extreme old age preserved, the one by Cassian, the other by Jerome. Cassian tells how he used to play with a tame partridge, and when censured for such frivolity used the phrase, 'the bow cannot be always bent' (Coll. xxiv. 21). And Jerome describes him at a time when he had to be carried into church, and was too old to speak for any length of time; he used then, in addressing the Church, to use simply the old commandment, 'Little children, love one another.' His disciples, weary of the continual repetition, asked why he always said this: his answer was, 'Quia præceptum Domini est, et, si solum fiat, sufficit' (Jer. Comm. in Gal. vi. 10). The last chapter of the Gospel did not prevent the growth of a legend that the apostle was not really dead, but only asleep. And it was confidently affirmed that the ground where he lay rose and fell with his breathing, and that the dust was moved by his breath. St. Augustine mentions this (Tract. in Joh. cxxiv. 2), but does not altogether accept it ('Viderint . . . qui locum sciunt, utrum hoc ibi faciat vel patiatur terra, quod dicitur: quia et revera non a levibus hominibus id audivimus' *).

These are the fragmentary materials out of which is built the idea of the beloved apostle prevalent throughout the Church. They form a consistent picture, of a character that is vehement and tenacious, but has been moulded in its later days by the spirit of love. The story of the journey after the robber is quite consistent with that of the refusal to be under the same roof with Cerinthus the heretic. And both are parallel to scenes in the Gospels and Acts ascribed to St. John.

(d) The difficulties that have been raised about the whole question of St. John's sojourn at Ephesus do not arise from any inconsistency in the story itself, but from considerations of a different order altogether. They are part of the whole question of the authorship of the writings ascribed to St. John. If the authorities upon which the Ephesian tradition depends are accepted as trustworthy, it will be difficult to explain why and how the account of the origin of the Gospel which seems to have been part of the Ephesian tradition can be set aside. It is not part of our subject to consider the question of the authorship of the Gospel, further than is necessary in order to estimate the evidence for the tradition, but the points now to be raised would be scarcely intelligible apart from this explanation. See, further, next article.

The real point at issue is comparatively small. Irenæus, who became bishop of Lyons in South Gaul after the persecution of A.D. 177, writes a letter to Florinus, a presbyter of the church of Rome who has fallen into heresy. A fragment of this letter is preserved by Eusebius (HE v. xx.). In it Irenæus appeals to Florinus to contrast the doctrines he has accepted with those which he once learnt at the feet of Polycarp, who himself claimed to be the pupil of the Apostle John. Irenæus refers to a former time when he, as a boy (παῖς ἔτι ὤν), saw Florinus, then in distinguished position at court (λαμπρῶς πράττοντα ἐν τῇ βασιλικῇ αὐλῇ), with Polycarp. Now Polycarp was martyred, at the age of eighty-six (Mart. Polyc. § 8), on Feb. 23, 155.[†] Thus he must have been born (unless the phrase in Mart. Polyc. refers to his conversion and not his birth) in A.D. 69. If St. John really lived till the time of Trajan, i.e. till about A.D. 100, there is no reason why Polycarp should not have known him.

This tradition has been assailed on various grounds. It has been asserted that there is no real indication of Johannine influence in the writers who date from Ephesus and its neighbourhood; more especially that Ignatius when writing to the Ephesians in the year 115 makes no allusion to St. John's presence there, though he does mention St. Paul (Ign. Eph. ch. xii.), and shows signs of the influence of the letter 'to the Ephesians.' This argument is used by Keim (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. vol. i. p. 211 ff.), but its value is greatly impaired by the authority of subsequent critics. The researches of Paul Ewald (Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage), of H. Wendt (Lehre Jesu), and especially of von der Goltz ('Ignatius von Antiochien,' in Texte und Untersuchungen, xii. 3), tend to show the presence in the region required, and in the Ignatian Epistles in particular, of that type of teaching which is associated with St. John's name. This line of argument may therefore be left out of account.

Another and much more impressive method of criticism is that pursued by Harnack in his Chronologie der Altchristlichen Literatur bis Eusebius, Bd. i. pp. 320–340, 656–680. It will have been noticed already that the hinge of the whole case is the relation of Irenæus and Polycarp. If it seemed likely that this relation was less close than is generally supposed, no doubt the evidence of Polycarp to the presence of St. John in Ephesus might be seriously weakened. This is the central point of Harnack's argument. He lays emphasis on the youth of Irenæus (παῖς ἔτι ὤν), and the casual character of his relation with Polycarp. There is no evidence, he maintains, that Irenæus was in any strict sense a pupil of Polycarp; he merely heard him preach, like any other member of his congregation. It is, therefore, not improbable that he confused the Apostle John with the John quoted by Polycarp, this other John being really the Presbyter John—a person whose existence is affirmed by Papias. To this Presbyter John, Harnack assigns the Fourth Gospel. It is difficult to avoid the conviction that Harnack is greatly minimizing the significance of the passage from the letter of Irenæus to Florinus. It is true that we do not know exactly the age of Irenæus at the beginning of his episcopate, and that the year of his birth cannot be fixed within very narrow limits. It is true that we cannot be certain of the date of the scene ἐν τῇ κάτω Ἀσίᾳ to which Irenæus refers. It is true that παῖς ἔτι ὤν suggests that Irenæus refers to a time when he was from 12–17 or 18 years old.[*] But (1) the tone of the letter, especially the reference to the psychology of memory, seems to imply an advanced age; it is usually between 60 and 70 or later that the memory begins to fail for more recent events; and (2) Harnack greatly underrates the fulness of the knowledge which Irenæus claims. If it be true that the words do not imply any direct and personal relation with Polycarp, they do seem to imply a careful and continuous observation of Polycarp's habits both in act and word.[†] Indeed it is difficult to know what words would convey an account of a continued and carefully treasured experience, if these do not. And it is hardly conceivable that an experience such as is described should have passed, and yet that Irenæus, with all his keenness of observation, should have failed to discover whether Polycarp was talking of John the Apostle or not. Again, the Twelve were a perfectly recognizable and distinct body from a very early time in the Church, and Polycarp's discourses must have been more than usually confused if they left his intelligent hearers uncertain on a fundamental point such as this. It is an even more extravagant hypothesis that Polycarp himself was confused. People will always estimate such a question as this somewhat differently, so that it will be impossible to claim that the significance of Irenæus' words is certain beyond all possibility of discussion. At the same time, the interpretation here given seems the most natural, and it would require very considerable positive evidence to overthrow it.

[*] The tradition which has so profoundly influenced art, that St. John drank poison without being affected by it, occurs in Isidore of Seville, De ortu et obitu Sanctorum, ch. lxxii.; and in Acta Johannis, c. 9, ed. Bousset, 1898. It is also alluded to in the Soliloquies, falsely ascribed to Augustine, ch. xxii. The present writer has failed to trace the origin of the tradition, if it be a tradition, which Browning has followed in A Death in the Desert.

[†] This seems to be the most likely date: an alternative is Feb. 22, 156. See Lightfoot, Ignatius and Polycarp, i. pp. 626–722; C. H. Turner, 'On the day and year of St. Polycarp's Martyrdom,' in Studia Biblica, Oxford, vol. ii. pp. 105–155; and Harnack, Chronologie, Bd. i. pp. 334–350, and reff.

[*] Though Lightfoot, Ign. and Polyc.^{1} vol. i. p. 432, quotes passages showing the extreme looseness with which such words as παις were used.

[†] Μᾶλλον γὰρ τὰ τότε διαμνημονεύω τῶν ἔναγχος γινομένων· αἱ γὰρ ἐκ παίδων μαθήσεις συναύξουσαι τῇ ψυχῇ ἑνοῦνται αὐτῇ ὥστε με δύνασθαι εἰπεῖν καὶ τὸν τόπον ἐν ᾧ καθεζόμενος διελέγετο ὁ μακάριος Πολύκαρπος, καὶ τὰς προόδους αὐτοῦ καὶ τὰς εἰσόδους καὶ τὸν χαρακτῆρα τοῦ βίου καὶ τὴν τοῦ σώματος εἰδέαν καὶ τὰς διαλέξεις ἃς ἐποιεῖτο πρὸς τὸ πλῆθος καὶ τὴν μετὰ Ἰωάννου συναναστροφὴν ὡς ἀπήγγελλε καὶ τὴν μετὰ τῶν λοιπῶν τῶν ἑωρακότων τὸν Κύριον καὶ ὡς ἀπεμνημόνευε τοὺς λόγους αὐτῶν καὶ περὶ τοῦ κυρίου τίνα ἦν ἃ παρ' ἐκείνων ἀκηκόει, καὶ περὶ τῶν δυναμέων αὐτοῦ καὶ περὶ τῆς διδασκαλίας ὡς παρὰ τῶν αὐτοπτῶν τῆς ζωῆς τοῦ λόγου παρειληφὼς ὁ Πολύκαρπος ἀπήγγελλε πάντα σύμφωνα ταῖς γραφαῖς.

Such evidence is not forthcoming. The two fragments which bear on the question are less convincing than the passage from Irenæus, but their natural meaning is consistent with the above interpretation of Irenæus. Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, writing to Victor of Rome about A.D. 180, mentions various distinguished persons in the early history of the Church who are buried in Asia Minor. Amongst these he names the Apostle Philip, John the Apostle, and Polycarp. He is a person of importance, a bishop himself, belonging to a family which has given 7 bishops to the church, and he describes himself (probably) as 65 years old (ἑξήκοντα πέντε ἔτη γεγονὼς ἐν κυρίῳ). This would bring his birth to the year A.D. 115. He describes the work of the apostle at Ephesus in the words ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορηκώς. If the evidence of Irenæus is invalid, doubtless the probability is increased that Polycrates has made a similar confusion, and has mistaken John the Presbyter for John the Apostle. If, however, Irenæus may be trusted in his account of Polycarp's teaching, then Polycrates becomes an independent witness to the state of things described by Polycarp, and a witness of some importance. He bears testimony to the existence of this tradition in the ecclesiastical circles at Ephesus, and he had probably extremely good opportunities of knowing what these were.[*]

Lastly, we come to Papias. It is to a fragment of this author that we owe our knowledge of the existence of the Presbyter John. In a passage from the Prologue to his lost work, Expositions of the Oracles of the Lord, which Eusebius quotes (HE III. xxxix.), Papias explains his method. He has not paid attention to those who have much to say (τοῖς τὰ πολλὰ λέγουσιν), but to those who teach the truth. He has collected and examined the sayings of those who followed the elders (εἴ που καὶ παρακολουθηκώς τις τοῖς πρεσβυτέροις): endeavouring to ascertain 'what Andrew, or Peter said, or what Philip, or Thomas or James; or what John or Matthew or any of the disciples of the Lord: and what Aristion and the Presbyter John the disciples of the Lord say.' Papias is not so good a witness as the others. Eusebius describes him as σμικρὸς τὸν νοῦν, and he certainly seems to have made statements on the authority of John and the elders which are in themselves ridiculous, and can never have come from any one who knew the Lord. The passage mentioned above does not prove that Papias was a disciple of the Apostle John; and Papias shows himself capable of serious confusion in regard to St. John's doctrine. But, in the light of the passage in the letter to Florinus, Papias' statement that he endeavoured to ascertain in Asia Minor what John and other apostles had taught, may at least stand as an additional ground for believing that St. John had dwelt at Ephesus.

We are, fortunately, not concerned with the further and more complicated question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel, but only with the residence of St. John at Ephesus. The evidence alleged is fragmentary. Even with the addition of the Muratorian Fragment, which confirms what has been already produced, it is less than we could wish. But in a case like this the important point is not so much the extent as the character of the evidence that is to hand. And it is to be noticed that all the three authors we have named are men who would have had the best opportunities of knowing about this matter. We have only fragments of their works, but they were not fragmentary. They cover a century between them — a century of vigorous and active Christian life; and they all of them held office in their several churches. We have not pressed the evidence of the Muratorian Fragment, because of the uncertainty of its origin, and the comparative lack of a true context in which to place it. But these difficulties do not attach to the evidence of Irenæus, Polycrates, and Papias. Their relation to the age in which they lived can be denied only at the expense of the surrender of the largest portion of 2nd cent. history.[*]

II. THE THEOLOGY OF ST. JOHN.

A. THE GOSPEL AND EPISTLES.—In the writings ascribed to St. John there is more of a complete and reasoned theology than is to be found in any of the other NT writers. It is therefore a comparatively simple task to indicate the lines of the author's theological thought. It must, however, always be remembered that in the Gospel the theological positions are placed in close relation with the history. So that, in some sense, a historical evolution is traceable in the doctrine described. The prologue to the Gospel (1^{1-18}) may be regarded as summing up the doctrine of the book; and, in like manner, many of the statements in the Epistles are of the nature of inferential doctrinal affirmations. It seems best, therefore, to describe as shortly as possible the progress in doctrine in relation to the history, and then to discuss the conclusions which result.

(1) The Gospel professes to be a selection of anecdotes, out of a large number not recorded, describing the signs which Jesus did before His disciples. By signs are meant acts which convey a certain teaching, indicate a particular truth or reality. These particular signs are recorded in order to produce a particular belief—'that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ the Son of God' ($20^{30.31}$). The main part of the Gospel describes the growth of this idea in the minds of the apostles, and, at the same time, the growth of hostility on the part of the Jews. The mode in which the conviction is brought home to the minds of Christ's followers is called witness (μαρτυρία), and is characterized in various ways. The first stage in the process is the witness of John the

[*] The authority of Polycrates has been assailed on another ground. It is said that, when he speaks of Philip the Apostle as being at Hierapolis, he has confused him with Philip the Evangelist; hence that he might easily have confused John the Apostle with John the Presbyter. The question turns on the allusion to Philip's daughters. Luke (Ac $21^{8.9}$) says definitely that Philip the Evangelist, 'one of the seven,' had four daughters παρθένοι προφητεύουσαι. Polycrates affirms that Philip the Apostle had three daughters, two of whom grew old as virgins, and the other ἐν ἁγίῳ πνεύματι πολιτευσαμένη died and was buried at Ephesus. Clem. Alex. (Eus. HE iii. 30) quotes Philip as one of the apostles who did not forbid marriage, as he τὰς θυγατέρας ἀνδράσιν ἐξέδωκεν. Papias (Eus. HE III. xxxix.) speaks of Philip the Apostle among his authorities. The Dialogue between Caius and Proclus (Eus. HE iii. 31) represents Philip Evang. with four daughters—as having lived at Hierapolis. The authority of the Dialogue is by some adduced to prove the confusion in Polycrates' letter. This seems unnecessary. The Dialogue is later in time, and remote in its origin (Italy as against Ephesus), and is manifestly under the influence of the Acts. The statement of Polycrates is precise, and not identical with that in the Acts. We know there were two Philips, and it is not impossible that one had three daughters, and the other four. Cf. Lightfoot, Colossians, pp. 45, 46.

[*] It is not quite clear what is meant by Polycrates' phrase ἐγενήθη ἱερεὺς τὸ πέταλον πεφορηκώς. Πέταλον is the word used for the high-priestly mitre; and therefore the adoption of it by St. John must have meant either that he claimed that the old exclusive high priesthood was at an end, or, more probably, that he asserted its fulfilment in the Christian priesthood. Delff (Gesch. der Rabbi Jesus v. Nazareth, p. 71) asserts that the phrase means that St. John was of the family of the high priest, and had actually performed high-priestly functions in Jerusalem, wearing the mitre for the purpose. This interpretation of the words of Polycrates is only part of a complicated theory as to the authorship of the Fourth Gospel with which we have nothing to do. But it should be observed (1) that this is not the natural interpretation of the passage; (2) that it assumes a degree of ignorance and confusion on the part of Polycrates which is unjustifiable. St. James is also said to have worn the πέταλον (Epiph. Hær. lxxiii. c. 14, where he follows the language of Hegesippus closely; but this particular statement is absent from the passage of Hegesippus quoted in Eus. HE II. xxiii.).

Baptist. He first denies to the deputation of priests and Levites that he is the Christ, and then points definitely to Jesus as the Lamb of God, the person on whom the Spirit descended and abode. In consequence of the repetition of this witness on the following day, two of the disciples of John—Andrew and, probably, John himself—are detached from the Baptist and follow Jesus. The result of a day's colloquy is that Andrew announces to his brother Simon, We have found the Messiah. In like manner Nathanael is attracted by the same promise, though he seems to have had a stronger and loftier view of the personality of the Messiah than we usually find (1^{49}). The newly-won disciples begin, therefore, with a conviction that Jesus is Messiah. The 'sign' at Cana of Galilee gives them new thoughts. John had done no sign (10^{41}), but in this scene at Cana the disciples perceived what St. John, in the reflective language of his later life, calls the manifestation of the glory of Christ (2^{11}). This phrase seems to mean the specially Divine powers and characteristics which the Lord displayed upon earth; and therefore the importance of the passage consists in this, that St. John marks the occasion when the previous belief in the Messiahship of Jesus began to be affected by a deeper notion of His Divine nature. Looking back upon it in later life, he sees that at that moment the thought that He was Divine was dawning in them.

This event at Cana is also described (2^{11}) as the 'beginning of signs.' It is the opening incident of a particular line of witness—the witness of the works (cf. 5^{36} 10^{38} 15^{24}). This is continued at Jerusalem at the Passover, and produces a number of adherents (2^{23}). And here, again, St. John notices an impression created by Jesus upon His apostles: they found that He exercised considerable reserve in His treatment of those who professed belief, in virtue of an insight into them which he possessed.[*] After this we come to the account of the Ministry and Preaching of our Lord. As in the Synoptic Gospels, He begins by preaching (to Nicodemus) the Kingdom of God, with this difference, that He declares the necessity of new birth as the condition of entry. It is after the record of this preaching that the witness of John is finally completed and closed, in words which imply that his preparatory mission is over (3^{30}). It is noticeable that in this passage Nicodemus is attracted to the new prophet by signs (3^{2}), and that the Lord, when He is challenged to explain the new birth, refers to the witness of an experience already growing up around Him (ὃ οἴδαμεν λαλοῦμεν, καὶ ὃ ἑωράκαμεν μαρτυροῦμεν, 3^{11}). In like manner the conversation with the woman at Sychar leads to the unequivocal declaration of Messiahship on the part of the Lord (4^{26}), and an affirmation of the greatest importance as to the nature of God (4^{24}, see below, p. 689). The impression created by these two scenes on the minds of the apostles is not marked in the same way as before (2^{11} and ^{23}). But it is obvious that their view of His character is changing and developing rapidly. They have as yet no precise and clear view as to His nature, but they are careful as to commenting on, or asking questions about, what He does. This is expressed in a marked way when the apostles return and find Him talking with a woman. They are surprised, but no one said, 'What seekest thou, or Why talkest thou with her?' (4^{27}). So again, when He says, 'I have meat to eat which ye know not,' they do not ask Him what He means, but talk among themselves (4^{33}). A feeling of reserve and reverence is growing up, which completely prevents all curious questions. Their conception is developing as their experience widens.

We now come to the period at which hostility, continually increasing in fierceness, is caused by the acts and words of the Lord. The first scene is at an unnamed feast at Jerusalem, probably occurring some time before the second Passover of our Lord's ministry. The controversy arises over the law of the Sabbath. A man who had been crippled with a disease for 38 years is cured, and told by our Lord to take up the bed on which he is lying, and carry it away. This was, of course, a breach of the Sabbath law, and it seems, from the expression used (5^{16} ταῦτα ἐποίει ἐν σαββάτῳ), to have been somewhat typical of our Lord's action. In answer to the Jews, the Lord develops at length the relation between Himself and the Father; His answer, in fact, amounts to a claim to stand in the same supreme position as the Father in regard to the law in question. 'My Father worketh up till now, and I work' (5^{17}).

The discourse which follows is of great importance for our present purpose. In it the Lord, speaking first of Himself under the title of 'the Son,' affirms the absolute and indissoluble unity of the will of the Father and the Son. The Son certainly has derived Being; but the Father has given Him to have life in Himself (5^{26}); in what He does He fulfils the Father's commission, which includes the power of giving life even to the dead, and the prerogative of judgment ($5^{21.\ 22.\ 26.\ 27}$). This unity of action is based on love (5^{20}), and carries with it the right on the part of the Son to honour co-ordinate with that of the Father (5^{23}). It is obvious that this claim, if substantiated, completely meets the charge of independent and self-willed defiance of a law imposed by the Father. In 5^{30} the Lord identifies Himself with the Son, and proceeds to deal with the question of evidence. Here He uses the idea characteristic of this Gospel—witness. This teaching, He says, is not a bare assertion of His own; He has evidence, consentient witness to establish it (5^{32}), besides the inner certainty of His own knowledge. There is first the witness of John (5^{33-35}) temporary and limited, but bearing on the truth. Secondly, there is the witness of the works, done in pursuance of the Father's commission (5^{36}). Thirdly, there is the witness of the Father (5^{37}, see below, p. 686), and, lastly, the witness of the Scriptures. From them will come the really damning charges against the Jews; they have disbelieved the writings of Moses, how can they believe Christ's words? ($5^{39.\ 46.\ 47}$).

St. John does not chronicle the effect of this discourse, either upon the Jews or upon the apostles, important as it obviously is. The next scene does lead to a decisive and significant result. Here, again, it is important to recall the circumstances under which the scene took place. It occurred immediately after the miracle of the Feeding of the Five Thousand. The persons thus fed seem to have been a body of Galilæan pilgrims going up to, or returning from, the Passover (cf. 6^{4}). The result of the miracle is that the pilgrims conceive the plan of seizing Jesus and making Him a king; that is, they see in Him the fulfilment of their very uninstructed Messianic hopes. The following day the fact emerges in a dialogue with the Lord that they have compared His act with that of Moses, who fed the people in the wilderness, and that their allegiance will depend on Christ's rivalling this (6^{31}). From this point the discourse takes its start. With increasing clearness our Lord points to Himself as the fulfilment of the acted prophecy of Moses. The Jews (who appear at v.^{40}) protest against the claim implied in this; but this protest only leads the Lord to the still more startling assertions, that life in any true sense depends upon connexion with Himself, and that this connexion is established by eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood. And He ends by definitely connecting this with the type of the manna in the wilderness (6^{58}, cf. 6^{49}). The result of this discourse was to separate the Twelve sharply from other followers: these are puzzled, and walk no more with Him; the apostles, by the mouth of St. Peter, confess Him as the Holy One of God (6^{69}).

[*] The phrase used, διὰ τὸ αὐτὸν γινώσκειν πάντας, does not necessarily imply supernatural knowledge; but it records the strong impression which the Master's way of dealing with men had made upon His disciples.

After this scene, the development of the hostility is comparatively rapid; there are practically only three more occasions described. The first occurs at the Feast of Tabernacles. In his account of this feast St. John has shown us a perfect turmoil of conflicting ideas and surmises as to the new prophet, with a background of firm hostility on the part of the ruling class among the Jews. With the various problems and difficulties which were raised by the various parties, we have nothing to do; the decisive utterance from which the discourse or dialogue follows is the phrase, 'I am the Light of the world' (8^{12}). The subsequent passage is of great difficulty. Emphasis is laid again upon the witness of the Father ($8^{15.\ 16}$) and the coincidence of the works with the will and commission of the Father ($8^{28.\ 29}$); and the result was that many believed on Him (8^{30}). But an attempt made by the Lord to offer true freedom to those who had believed Him, rouses their national feelings, so that when Christ, after an agitated argument, makes a claim which they understand as coequality with God, they take up stones to cast at Him as a blasphemer.* In the second of the scenes in question, at the feast of Dedication (reading ἐγένετο τότε in 10^{22}), a similar discussion is presented to us arising out of a miracle performed upon a Sabbath-day, and involving by its method a breach of the law. The Jews definitely challenge Jesus with the question of His nature (10^{24}). He refuses to answer directly, but refers again to the works (10^{25}) and to the Father's will, ending with the strongest assertion yet made of His union with the Father, ἐγὼ καὶ ὁ πατὴρ ἕν ἐσμεν (10^{30}). In consequence of this He has to withdraw from Jerusalem; but St. John notes that many believed, seeing how He fulfilled the prophecy of the Baptist (10^{40-42}). The last scene is that of the raising of Lazarus and its immediate consequences. A miracle such as this could not have failed to produce an effect; and St. John notes that it is the decisive event which leads the authorities to determine on the death of Jesus, and produces the enthusiasm among the crowds which is expressed in the Triumphal Entry (cf. $11^{47.\ 48}$ 12^{17-19}). At the end of ch. 12 St. John solemnly sums up the result of the mission of Christ; the evidence of signs had largely failed (12^{37}); there were many even of the rulers who really believed, but did not dare to express it (12^{42}), and in all this St. John sees the fulfilment of the prophecy of Isaiah, when 'he saw his glory (i.e. of Jesus), and spake concerning him.'

In the part of the Gospel which we have now briefly considered, the author explains the series of events through which his convictions developed. We have therefore before us the idea of one who fulfilled the national expectation of a Messiah, but who, at the same time, identified Himself with the typology of the OT, spoke mysteriously of a deeper union with the Father, and who represented union with Himself as the one necessary means of satisfying human needs. These two latter points are developed at great length in the Last Discourses (cf. $14^{10.\ 31}$ 17^{4} 14^{1-12} 15^{1-11} etc.). But the Discourses are delivered under a sense of immediate departure, and therefore they develop, in language mysterious at the time but explained later by events, the close union of the Father and the Son, the future work of the Paraclete, and the new commandment to the followers of Jesus. The questions of the apostles recorded from time to time in the course of these chapters show that they only partially understood then what was said to them. But the teaching is continuous with what had gone before, and could only have confirmed the opinions already held by the apostles. We shall consider it more in detail further on.

One last sign is noted by St. John in the account of the Crucifixion—the effusion of blood and water, and the bearing of prophecy on the scene. This is mentioned with great emphasis, and the presence of the author as eye-witness is deliberately asserted (19^{35}). There then follows an account of the intercourse of the Risen Lord with various of His followers, and we then return to the passage mentioned before, in which St. John declares the purpose of his Gospel ($20^{30.\ 31}$).

It will be seen that the result attained by St. John is an evolution that starts from the idea of the Messiah, and rises through the witness of signs and the teaching of Discourses to a lofty and profound notion of Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God. It is this which is the fundamental idea of all St. John's theology, and it has been necessary, therefore, to put it first.

(2) It is obvious, however, that such a view could not be maintained without involving serious consequences upon the idea of God: or, to put the same thing in somewhat different language, the development in the notion of Jesus, from that of Messiah to that of the Son of God, will be found to rest upon theological presuppositions. These are revealed in the Discourses of the Lord, and in part drawn out by the author in the Gospel and Epistles. We have passed them by so far in order to display the historic movement of St. John's thought; but we must now turn to them.

The first passage which calls for consideration is, of course, the Prologue. This contains, in summary, St. John's theology of the Incarnation. It begins by describing the Person involved—the Word; and of Him it asserts eternal pre-existence, eternal communion with God, and finally Divinity itself. The author then proceeds to give an account of the various functions of the Word of God.* The Word of God is the instrument of

---

* It is assumed that the Pericope Adulteræ is out of place in this chapter.

* It is impossible to discuss at length the origin and associations of this much disputed expression—the Word of God (see art. Logos). It must suffice here to say that there seems to be a great difficulty in connecting it, as would at first sight appear natural, with Greek philosophic thought. It is true that the word λόγος in its earlier usage contained ideas which might have developed into such a conception as this of St. John. But in the history of Greek thought the development of the meaning of the word was governed by the particular interest of Greek philosophy. The idea of language or speech is complex. Speech conveys information (1) as to the mind of the speaker, (2) as to the subject spoken about. In the former case the uttered word appears as the representative of the person or character or act of the speaker; its reference to fact may be of merely secondary importance. In the other case the word has a sort of substantive existence. It does not matter who uses it; the important thing is what it means. The more this aspect of the relation is emphasized the more the idea of a word tends towards that of abstract scientific definition—it is a form conveying truth. Its ideal is to correspond as nearly as may be with the reality it describes. The Greeks found the ideal correspondence between thought and thing in universality; and therefore, concurrently with the development in philosophic thought, the word λόγος took on more and more the associations of universality, and lost more and more those of the individual thing or person. With the Hebrews, on the other hand, the Word of God meant always God speaking or doing certain things; the Word was the emissary and representative of God. A doctrine of Incarnation in the Johannine sense is possible on the one line of thought, and impossible on the other.

Creation (πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο, not ὑπ' αὐτοῦ). The gift of life, expressed in a living world, was the object, or, if we may so say, the ruling principle of the action of God through the Word, and life was to have been a sign or suggestion to man of the presence of the Word—to have been the light of men. But, owing to the intrusion of the darkness, the light now shines in a hostile atmosphere, without, however, being overcome by it. This doctrine lies closely in connexion with that of the Old Testament. The Pentateuch (Gn 1) and the Psalter (Ps 33^{6}) both ascribe creation to the word of God; they use the metaphor of speech to describe the act of God in it. And throughout the OT the presence and effect of evil is continually asserted. But St. John makes a considerable and important addition to the doctrine of the OT when he unequivocally asserts the Divinity of the Word. In the OT the idea of language was a metaphor used to describe an act; it is said that in Rabbinical thought the Word of God was beginning to take on a quasi-personal character; with St. John the Word by which the world was brought into being was a person, separate enough from God (ὁ θεός, i.e.), to be in communion with God, but yet essentially Divine in nature.

We next learn St. John's conception of that Revelation of the Word which he himself had experienced. It was heralded by John the Baptist, who was sent from God to witness concerning it. The light was already in the world, and had already a place of its own in the world, but the world rejected its appeal. New birth—birth of God—was given to those who received the light when it came—a birth that broke through and destroyed the old physical succession (1^{6-13}). Having thus described the Person of the Word, and the effect of His mission, St. John proceeds to describe the mode of His manifestation. 'The Word,' he says, 'became flesh, and dwelt as in a tent among us, full of grace and truth.' As thus Incarnate, the Word manifested His Divine glory. In regard to this, St John uses a remarkable phrase. He says it was 'glory as of an only-begotten from a Father,' i.e. it was identical in nature, but different, if the phrase may be allowed, in individuality from that of the Father. It was representative in the fullest sense, not merely an irradiation from without; it was Divine glory, but the glory of an only-begotten son. For the evidence of this, St. John refers to the witness of John the Baptist (1^{15}), and more particularly to the experience of himself and of the Church. 'We beheld his glory,' he says (1^{14}); and again 'of his fulness,' the grace and truth which came with Him, 'have all we received' in continually increasing proportions, grace in place of grace (1^{16}). Then St. John explains summarily the full height of this Revelation. It superseded the Mosaic law, which was partial and external, by means of this gift of grace and complete truth (1^{17}). It did not give us the vision of God: it meant that one who was God and only-begotten, who is in the bosom of the Father, had come among men and declared the truth.*

We have already seen in brief outline the process of historical observation through which St. John obtained his view of our Lord's nature. The Prologue shows us the same ideas formulated and in some degree systematized. The central point is still the Sonship,—Christ is Son of God in a unique sense,—but the mission of the Son is clearly defined in relation to other things. He is the Word of God: Eternal and Divine: He is the Instrument of Creation: the source of the knowledge of God which men should acquire by life and nature. His coming has superseded all previous revelation. In its earlier stages, as in the case of John, revelation was for witness of a light yet to come. The revelation of the Word was the manifestation of that Light. It was complete where the law, the highest expression of the old order, was partial: it gave final certainty about God on the authority of God only-begotten.

(3) The Epistles show how fundamental a doctrine this was in St. John's theology. He asserts in the most emphatic way (1 Jn 1^{1-4}) his own experience in the matter; how the life—the eternal life—which was continually (ἦν) with the Father, was manifested in time (ἐφανερώθη) to us; we saw and heard and touched beyond possibility of error. To deny the Father and the Son is the sign of antichrist (1 Jn $2^{22.\ 23}$); it is a departure from the original message (1 Jn 2^{24}). It is the test of spirits: 'Every spirit which confesses Jesus Christ come in the flesh is of God, and every spirit which confesses not Jesus, is not of God, and this is that spirit of antichrist, of which ye have heard that it cometh, and now it is already in the world' ($4^{2.\ 3}$; cf. $5^{1.\ 6-8.\ 12}$). In the Second Epistle St. John forbids his readers even to receive into their house and salute one who makes denial of this final truth (2 Jn $^{7-12}$). There is therefore no hesitation in his mind as to the truth or the necessity of this doctrine: it is the fundamental doctrine of Christianity and the test of true membership of the Church.

(4) It is in regard to this subject that the theology of St. John is most systematic. We must now pass on to the consideration of some other points less fully systematized, but no less decisive in their character. And first we must call attention to the Theology of the Father and the Son. It is contained, for the most part, in incidental references in the Discourses of the Lord. The Father is supreme, and is the source of the Being and all the action of the Son ($5^{19.\ 26}$ etc.). He has sent the Son into the world (3^{16}), and given Him commission to perform certain works there (5^{36} 8^{26} $10^{32.\ 37}$ 14^{31} 15^{10} 17^{4}). The relation between the Father and the Son is variously described. It is a profound and complete unity: 'I and the Father are one' (ἕν ἐσμεν) (10^{30} $17^{11.\ 21}$). But this unity does not destroy the distinction between the Father and the Son. The Father loves the Son (5^{19} 15^{9}), and the Son loves the Father (14^{31}); the Father knows the Son, and is known by Him (10^{15}; cf. 8^{55}). Before the world was, the Son enjoyed 'glory with the Father,' to which He returns (17^{5}). The Father abides (μένει) in the Son, and the Son in the Father ($8^{28.\ 29}$ $14^{10.\ 11}$): so that it is said 'the Father abiding in me doeth his works' (14^{10}). All that belongs to the Son belongs also to the Father, 'and thine are mine' (17^{10}): yet 'the Father is greater than I' (14^{28}). Hence the representation of the Father by the Son is complete: 'He that hath seen me hath seen the Father' (14^{9}, cf. 8^{19}). So that honour given to the Son is given to the Father ($5^{23.\ 38}$), and those who reject the Son reject also the Father (8^{19} 15^{21-24}; cf. 1 Jn 2^{22-24}). This fulness of union and intercourse throws some light upon the obscure subject of the witness of the Father. In $5^{31.\ 32}$ the Lord disclaims bearing witness concerning Himself, but refers instead to the witness of John, and then 5^{37} to the witness of the Father. In ch. 8, in answer to the Jews, He says, 'If I do bear witness of myself, my witness is true, because I know whence I came and whither I go' (8^{14}), and then again (8^{18}) refers to the witness of the Father. In $3^{32.\ 33}$ (probably a reflective passage by the evangelist and not part of a discourse) we read, 'He that receiveth his (i.e. the Son's) witness hath set to his seal that God is true' (ἐσφράγισεν ὅτι ὁ θεὸς ἀληθής ἐστιν); and in 1 Jn 5^{10} St. John says again, 'He that believeth on the Son hath the witness in himself; he that believeth not God, hath made him a liar, because he has not believed in the witness which God has witnessed concerning his Son.' Thus the most obvious sign of failure to receive the witness of the Father is to misunderstand the promises of God, and the indications of His purpose, which Christ fulfils. The witness of the Father is closely allied to the witness of Scripture, but is not quite the same. It seems to consist in that inner perception of the purpose of God resting on the love of God (5^{42}), which carries conviction in the presence of the life and works of Christ; the Jews fail 'because ye have not his word abiding in you' (5^{38}); without this, they search the Scriptures, and so fail to receive their witness also. The Son appeals to this witness against the charge of self-seeking or self-advertisement; and the certainty of His knowledge of His own nature, and of His mission ('whence I come and whither I go') justifies His witness to Himself.

(5) The next point for consideration, starting with the above-described theology of God and the Incarnation, is the process or scheme of salvation. To do this it is necessary to define first St. John's conception of the world, and of the condition requiring remedy. The word κόσμος means primarily the created order; so in $1^{9.10}$ we find that the world was created through the Word. Also the phrase ὁ βίος τοῦ κόσμου occurs (1 Jn 3^{17}) for this world's goods. From the idea of transitoriness (e.g. 1 Jn 2^{17}) the word gets a sinister sense; and we find it in its most characteristic signification of the fallen world, the world in opposition to the will of God. In this sense St. John says of it that the whole world lies in the evil one (1 Jn 5^{19}). It is the embodiment of the principle of hatred to all that God requires; by the inherent necessity of its nature it hates Christ and His Church (Jn 15^{18-23}, 1 Jn 3^{13}). Christ is alien from it (Jn 8^{23} 17^{14} 18^{36}, 1 Jn 4^{5}). Its hostility is represented in a ruler, ὁ ἄρχων τοῦ κόσμου τούτου (Jn 12^{31} 14^{30}), who has an 'hour' in which he apparently triumphs. The characteristic attitude of the world is sin, which is 'lawlessness,' i.e. self-will and rebellion (1 Jn 3^{4} 5^{17}). Those who live in sin are under the wrath of God (3^{36}): their life is no true life, their existence may be described as death (Jn 8^{24}, 1 Jn 3^{14}). From another slightly different point of view the principle of the world's hostility is called the flesh, and it is clearly declared to be impossible to pass by natural evolution out of the range of the flesh. That which is born of the flesh is flesh (Jn 3^{6}), and therefore there is no power in the flesh to restore or recreate itself; it can only go on reproducing itself perpetually. This is the condition of things which it is Christ's mission to redeem.

The impulse to restore the world comes from the Father, and is based on love: 'God so loved the world that he sent his only-begotten Son' to save it (Jn $3^{16.17}$; cf. 1 Jn 4^{10-14}). The effect of the mission of Christ is variously described; He comes that the world may be saved through His means (Jn 3^{17}; cf. 4^{42}, 1 Jn 4^{14}); that is the most general phrase. He is the Lamb of God, who takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1^{29}, 1 Jn 3^{5}). He comes that He may destroy the works of the devil (1 Jn 3^{8}). But perhaps the most frequent expression of the intended result is the phrase eternal life (Jn 3^{16}, 1 Jn 5^{11}). This forms the subject of many of the discourses and warnings of the Lord, and it is constantly occurring in the First Epistle. Those who believe have passed from death into life (1 Jn 3^{14}; cf. Jn 8^{24}); eternal life has been promised to mankind by God (1 Jn 2^{25}). Christ Himself is identified with it (1 Jn 1^{2} $5^{11.20}$). He declares that He has come 'that they may have life, and have abundance' (Jn 10^{10}); the commandment of the Father is eternal life (Jn 12^{50}). And again, 'This is life eternal, that they may know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent' (17^{3}). Thus the life which Christ brings consists in union with Christ, obedience to the Father's commandments, and knowledge of God. It is not a thing to be attained only in the future; it is actually in the possession of those who believe (Jn 6^{47}, 1 Jn 5^{11-13}). From another point of view this condition is described as light. Christ is the light of the world (Jn 8^{12}; cf. 3^{19} 12^{46}) in contradistinction to the darkness of sin (cf. 1 Jn 2^{9-11}). (See below, p. 689).

The means of salvation for the world is only through Christ. This is partly implied by the general statements of the purpose of God already cited, and partly by the series of metaphorical phrases used by Christ Himself to describe His functions. Thus He is the Bread of Life ($6^{35.51}$); without participation in His Flesh and Blood there is no true life at all (6^{53}). He is the true fulfilment of the type of the water in the wilderness ($7^{37.38}$); the light of the world (8^{12} 12^{46}). He is the Door into the true fold, to the exclusion of all others ($10^{7.9}$); and again, He is the good Shepherd ($10^{11.14}$). So, at the grave of Lazarus, He proclaims Himself the Resurrection and the Life (11^{25}); in answer to the question of Thomas, He declares Himself the Way, the Truth, and the Life (14^{6}). Through Him alone is man's access to the Father; in Him all truth and all life are summed up. Once more, He is the True Vine, the unity and quickening force of all those who believe (15^{1} etc.). Nor are His functions restricted to those whom He may be connected with during His earthly life, or to those who belong to the chosen people. His work is universal in power and validity (Jn 10^{16} 11^{52} 12^{32}, 1 Jn 2^{2}).

The idea of God, then, if we may so say, is the salvation of the world through His Son, Christ. We must now consider what action is necessary to achieve this purpose, both on the part of Christ and of mankind. We have already spoken of the obedience of Christ, and the exact way in which He fulfilled the commission of the Father; we have now to deal more in detail with the subject. (a) The method by which Christ saves the world is by the sacrifice of Himself through death. The law under which He lived is first suggested by the Baptist in his witness: Behold, the Lamb of God, who taketh away the sin of the world ($1^{29.36}$).[*] Christ Himself asserts the same truth, with greater or less distinctness. First to Nicodemus obscurely (3^{14}), and again more clearly to the Jews after the feeding of the 5000. 'I am the living Bread which came down from heaven . . . and the bread which I will give is my Flesh for the life of the world' (6^{51}). He is 'the good Shepherd that giveth his life for the sheep' ($10^{11.18}$; cf. 1 Jn 3^{16}); and by so doing He shows that He has the uttermost love (15^{13}). So deeply is this necessity woven into the fabric of things, that the high priest 'of that year,' speaking more wisely than he knew, prophesied that He must lay down His life for the people ($11^{51.52}$). It is the condition of drawing all men to Him (12^{32}). In two places in the First Epistle St. John uses the phrase ἱλασμός, or propitiation (2^{2} 4^{10}); once (1 Jn 1^{7}) St. John speaks of the blood of Jesus Christ as cleansing us from all sin. And our Lord Himself uses once the peculiar phrase, 'I sanctify myself for their sake' (Jn 17^{19}).

Thus it is by this process of sacrifice that our Lord performs His part in the plan initiated by God. (b) We now come to consider the function of man—the response required of the world. (1) The fundamental law under which the world is ordered here meets us. The world can do nothing for itself. He, therefore, that will see and enter the kingdom of God must be born again: the old physical sequence—of blood, of the will of the flesh, and the will of man—must be broken off, and a new kinship established (3^{3-6}, cf. 1^{13}). (2) Further, there is required of necessity faith in the Son, and acceptance of His mission (Jn 3^{16} 5^{24} $6^{40.\,47}$, 1 Jn 3^{23}). This faith is more than mere belief (8^{31}), which in the passage quoted fails to bear criticism. But St. John supplies no definition of it, or anything approaching a definition. It is rather trust in a person than belief in the truth of what he says: or rather, this kind of belief comes as a result of the trust. It is made impossible, as we shall shortly see, by certain moral conditions. (3) The new life which the new birth begins must be sustained by continual participation in the Life of Christ. This is the burden of the strong and startling language in the synagogue at Capernaum (Jn 6^{52-59}): 'Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man and drink his blood, ye have not life in yourselves. He that eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life, and I will raise him up at the last day.' And this is said in explanation of the phrase, 'the bread which I will give is my flesh for the life of the world.' It implies that the faithful must in some way, not explained by St. John, enter into and share the sacrifice of our Lord. The sacrifice is thus not an external transaction: all men must have a part in it.

[*] The precise reference of this phrase is, no doubt, obscure; but there can be no doubt that the association with the lamb was one of sacrifice.

In face of these demands stands the fact that Christ was in large measure rejected. He came to His own place, and His own people received Him not (Jn 1^{11}). This, which might easily become a difficulty, is met in two ways. First, St. John presents a strong theory of predestination. The failure no less than the success falls within the sovereignty of the Father. 'No man can come to me, except the Father draw him' (6^{44}); 'I manifested thy name to the men whom thou gavest me out of the world' (17^{6}, cf. 10^{29}). The success and the failure are even matters of prophetic prevision (12^{37-39}): Isaiah saw what would come about, 'when he saw his glory, and spake concerning him.' And Christ administers the will of the Father in this, as in other respects. 'Ye did not choose me, but I chose you, and set you that ye should go and bring forth fruit' (15^{16}, cf. ^{19}). Secondly, faith depends upon certain moral conditions. Those who are evil are, ipso facto, incapable of faith: they shun the light ($3^{19.\,20}$). This general truth is made plainer in various discourses of the Lord's. The essential moral fault which prevents faith is self-seeking, aiming at personal distinction, seeking glory one from another ($5^{41.\,44}$ 7^{18}). The Jews refuse to accept the teaching of Christ, because they do not understand the spirit in which it is given: If another comes in his own name, him ye will receive (5^{43}). They will not do the Father's will, and therefore they blind themselves. 'If any man will to do his will, he shall know concerning the teaching, whether it is of God, or I speak of myself' ($7^{17.\,18}$). And the peril of this position lies just in the fact that they are so self-confident. 'If ye had been blind, ye would not have had sin: but now ye say, We see; therefore your sin remaineth' (9^{41})

Thus it is that the manifestation of Christ produces a twofold effect, corresponding to the varieties of moral condition. On the one hand, it produces faith, and so eternal life; this is its natural and proper result. On the other hand, it produces rejection, which is a declaration of affinity with evil—in St. John's language, judgment (3^{19}). 'This is the judgment, that the light has come into the world, and men loved the darkness rather than the light, because their deeds were evil.' As eternal life is not a future state of blessedness, but is the correlative of right faith in the Son of Man, so judgment is a condition the precise opposite of life. It consists in the revelation, in action, of hostility to Christ and all that He represents. So Christ says ($12^{47.\,48}$), 'If any man hear my words and keep them not, I do not judge him: for I came not to judge the world, but to save the world. He that rejecteth me and receiveth not my words, hath one that judgeth him: the word that I spake, that will judge him in the last day.' Thus judgment follows the same course of meaning as life. The Father has given into the hands of the Son the two Divine prerogatives of life and judgment ($5^{21.\,22}$). Yet Christ speaks as if life were the immediate consequence of faith, and judgment the consequence of the refusal to believe (cf. 5^{24} 6^{47}). At the same time, both in the case of life and judgment, there is a sort of consummation to be looked for at the last day ($6^{40.\,54}$ $12^{47.\,48}$). In neither case does the condition of life or judgment begin after the last day; it is a process which begins here, and is defined and completed at the last day. In the same way Christ speaks before the Passion of having already overcome the world (16^{33}), and St. John in his First Epistle uses similar language of the faith (4^{4} $5^{4.\,5}$), although in the same Epistle he warns against continuance in sin. So again he speaks of the sinlessness of those who are 'born of God' (3^{9}) in similar connexions. On the other hand, to continue the refusal to accept Christ after the opportunity is finally past is 'to die in sin' (Jn $8^{21.\,24}$).

(6) It remains to consider the doctrine of the Holy Spirit and the Church as we have it in these books. The provisions made by the Lord for the future are to be found chiefly in the Last Discourses. These were uttered after the Last Supper and before the arrest. The prominent note in them is, of course, one of farewell: and the provision for the future is put in language which later experience would alone fully explain. First, our Lord promises an Advocate (παράκλητος) who will supply His place on His departure (14^{16}). There are several noticeable points in regard to this mission. Christ speaks of it as His own return (14^{18}): He promises in relation to it, that the Father will come with Himself to those who keep His sayings, and 'we will make our abode with him' (14^{23}). The Advocate is spoken of as distinct from the Father and the Son, and yet His mission is one which reveals the Father and the Son. Again, in 14^{16} Christ says, 'I will ask the Father, and he will give you another Advocate, that he may be with you for ever—the Spirit of truth.' In 14^{26} a different phrase is used: 'The Advocate, the Holy Ghost, whom the Father will send in my name'; and once again there is a further difference (15^{26}, cf. $16^{7.\,13}$), 'When the Advocate comes, whom I will send to you from the Father, the Spirit of truth, that proceedeth from the Father.' Thus there is difference of language in regard to the Spirit's mission, and it is difficult to determine precisely St. John's idea. It seems clear, however, that this is due to the close intercourse and union which we have already noticed in regard to the Father and the Son. The Spirit, though sent like the Son, is one in whom full Divinity resides; His activity is a mission, not the effusion of an impersonal influence. The mission of the Holy Spirit depends on the departure of Christ (16^{7}, cf. 7^{39}): the two dispensations are not to be synchronous. The nature of the mission of the Advocate is gathered from various phrases in these chapters. Like the Son, He will not speak from Himself ($16^{13.\,14}$), but He will speak the things He hears. His mission continues that of Christ. 'He will glorify me, because he will take of that which is mine, and will declare it unto you' (16^{14}). He will teach, and recall all the things which Christ had said (14^{26}). He will guide into all the truth, just because He speaks not of Himself (16^{13}). His Presence is described as an 'anointing' (χρίσμα, 1 Jn $2^{20.\,27}$) which protects those who have it from error; and is a sign (1 Jn 3^{24}) of the indwelling of Christ in us. Further, He continues the process of witness to Christ already mentioned (15^{26}). This last point brings us in presence of one of the most difficult passages in St. John's writings, that of the Three witnesses.* It is impossible to enter into the complicated discussions which lie round this verse. The witness of the Spirit is placed on a level with that of the water and the blood, and the witness of the three is said to be consentient. It seems probable that the phrase applied to Christ (ὁ ἐλθὼν δι' ὕδατος καὶ αἵματος) refers directly to the event noticed by St. John —the effusion of blood and water upon the cross ($19^{34.\,35}$). But also the Spirit is connected emphatically with water in the Gospel ($3^{5.\,6}$) in the passage which gives the principle for interpreting the rite of baptism. And again in 6^{63} the Spirit is appealed to when the disciples are puzzled by our Lord's language about eating His flesh and drinking His blood—a passage which contains the theology, so to say, of the other Sacrament. It is probable, therefore, that those are right who see in this passage an assertion of the witness — the evidence conveyed of the truth of the faith—which comes from the Sacraments, interpreted by the Spirit. Our uncertainty (1) as to the exact significance ascribed to the effusion (19^{34}), and (2) as to the exact position assigned by St. John to the Sacraments, makes this interpretation less than certain. So far we have considered the function of the Spirit in regard to the Church. He has also a function in regard to the world. The world cannot receive Him, because it neither sees nor knows Him (14^{17}); but His presence in the world rebukes or convicts it (ἐλέγχει) concerning sin, and righteousness, and judgment ($16^{8\text{-}11}$). That is, the presence of the Spirit shows up in its true character the nature of sin, in the refusal to believe in Christ: the nature of righteousness, in the triumph of Christ through humiliation and death, to which the Spirit is a perpetual witness: the nature of judgment, in the final condemnation already passed upon the ruler of this world, and reiterated so long as the faith of Christ is in the world.

The effect of this mission of the Holy Spirit upon the Church has two sides: it alters men's relations to God and to one another. As regards God, it brings them into the closest possible union. Again and again Christ speaks of abiding in them. The Father and the Son will make their abode with those who love the Son (14^{23}). He is the vine, and they are the branches, depending for life on their union with Him ($15^{4\text{-}6.\,7.\,11}$ etc.). And the same phrase is constantly used by St. John in his First Epistle ($2^{5.\,8.\,24}$ $3^{5.\,24}$ 4^{13} 5^{20}). It results in the certainty of access to God: we have boldness (2^{28} 4^{17}) at the last day ($3^{21.\,22}$) in judging our own conscience; ($5^{14.\,15}$) in prayer, knowing that He hears, and that we therefore have our requests. Six times does our Lord promise fulfilment to prayer in His name (Jn 14^{13} $15^{7.\,16}$ $16^{23.\,24.\,26}$). We are Christ's friends (15^{14}); His joy is in us, and our joy is fulfilled (15^{11} 17^{13}), even under persecution (16^{20}); to us He leaves His peace (14^{27}). He looks forward to a consummation in His Father's house, where His followers shall be with Him for ever (14^{3}); and then we, who are now sons, shall be like Him, for we shall see Him as He is (1 Jn $3^{2.\,3}$). He sets before the Church as its ideal of unity the abiding of the Father in the Son, the love of the Father and the Son (Jn $15^{9.\,10}$), and the unity of the Father and the Son (17^{11}), including in this those who shall believe through the preaching of the apostles ($17^{20.\,24\text{-}27}$). In this true correspondence between God and man, especially in the free intercourse through prayer, the Father is glorified in the Son (14^{13}).

This intimate union determines the character of the Church in its relation to the world. The apostles are sent into the world as Christ Himself was sent there (17^{18}); they are His representatives, so that they who receive them receive Him (13^{20}); and they will meet with the same hatred and persecution from the world as He did ($15^{17\text{-}21}$). Among themselves, they will keep His commandments ($14^{15.\,21.\,23.\,24}$ 15^{10}, cf. 1 Jn 2^{3}), and especially the new commandment to love one another (13^{34} $15^{12.\,17}$). This is emphasized in the Epistles when St. John is writing to the Church already constituted and at work (1 Jn $3^{11.\,23}$ 4^{21}, 2 Jn ^{5}). And St. John in his usual manner continually contrasts this principle of love, which is of God (1 Jn 4^{7}), with the opposing principle of hatred. This has the essence of murder in it, as the example of Cain shows (1 Jn $3^{12\text{-}15}$, cf. Jn 8^{44}, where the rising desire to kill Christ is connected with the devil, who was a murderer from the beginning); and this hatred is inconsistent with eternal life (1 Jn 3^{15}), or with the love of God (4^{20}). Their power to overcome the world, in which by Christ's wish and God's ordinance (Jn 17^{15}) they are placed, is their faith that Jesus is the Son of God (1 Jn $5^{4.\,5}$)—a faith which in St. John's own case and that of his fellow-apostles rested on experience (1 Jn $1^{1\text{-}4}$, Jn 1^{14}), but belongs also to those who have not seen but yet have believed (Jn 20^{29}).

At His departure, the Lord gave to His Church the power to forgive sins, saying, 'Whose soever sins ye shall remit, they are remitted unto them; and whose soever sins ye retain, they are retained' (20^{23}). To St. Peter also He gave the charge to tend and feed the flock ($21^{15.\,16.\,17}$). There are signs in the Epistles of the exercise of some discipline. It is made abundantly clear that sin is inconsistent with the Church altogether (1 Jn 1^{6} 2^{1} $3^{6.\,9}$ 5^{18}); to do sin is to relapse into the darkness from which the light has freed us ($2^{8.\,9}$, cf. $1^{6.\,7}$). Still if a man does commit a sin (ἐάν τις ἁμαρτῇ) we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous (2^{1}); the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses us from all sin. For certain sins, not unto death, St. John enjoins the prayer of intercession (1 Jn $5^{18\text{-}18}$); for heresy, he forbids all intercourse or salutation (2 Jn ^{10}). In one church Diotrephes ὁ φιλοπρωτεύων requires to be deprived of his undeserved eminence, and reduced to order (3 Jn $^{9.\,10}$).

(7) It would be impossible to close an account of the Theology of St. John's Gospel and Epistles without reference to the three great phrases in which the nature of God is described: 'God is Spirit' (Jn 4^{24}), 'God is Light' (1 Jn 1^{5}), and 'God is Love' (1 Jn $4^{8.\,16}$). These three phrases form the crown, and, at the same time, a summary of his Theology. It is important to consider them in close connexion with their content.

The first is ascribed to our Lord Himself in His dialogue with the woman of Samaria. She, finding herself in presence of a prophet, brings before Him the question that had long been at issue between the Jews and the Samaritans. 'Our fathers worshipped in this mountain, but ye say that in Jerusalem men ought to worship.' Jesus answers her implied question comprehensively. For the past ages, the Jews were right: they worshipped with some knowledge, and not blindly, looking forward to salvation: they had so much certainty about God. But for the future, both are alike wrong; the day of local worships is over;

---

* We assume the omission of the late Western gloss concerning the Three Heavenly witnesses.

God no longer chooses a particular place where men should approach Him: 'He is Spirit, and must be worshipped in spirit and truth.' Thus this phrase marks the transition from the old to the new order. It excludes all limitations of space and time and matter from God, and, at the same time, the context preserves the truth which the Jewish religion had enshrined.

In the second of these phrases we go further: it bears on the moral nature of God. Throughout these books the contrast of Light and Darkness is used metaphorically to express Good and Evil. In the immediate context of this phrase an instance occurs. God is Light, and therefore all who walk in darkness are out of communion with Him. Darkness means hatred (1 Jn 2^{11}) and blindness (ib.), and is passing away (2^{8}). The true light was manifested; and 'this is the message which we have heard of Him, and report to you, that God is light.' This phrase, which cannot be altogether separated from the thought of revelation, is really the correlative of the OT doctrine of the Holiness of the Lord. It conveys the assurance of the undimmed purity of God, and the need of purity to man, if he would have fellowship with God.*

In the third we pass beyond both the two previous phrases. The doctrine that God is Love, asserts, in the strongest possible form, His Personality, and the possibility of personal intercourse between God and Man. This is indeed the drift of the two contexts in which it occurs. The man who is without love does not know God, for God is love. Knowledge of Him, in other words, is possible, but possible through likeness in nature. And so later the same point is more strongly emphasized: 'God is love, and he that abideth in love abideth in God, and God in him' (1 Jn 4^{16}). The object for which Christ came to earth, that man should have this fellowship with Him and with the Father, depends on the fact that God is love. But it is possible to go a little further than this. The doctrine that God is love helps to clear up those difficult phrases (mentioned above, p. 688) in which Christ speaks of the mission of the Paraclete. The account of the work of the Father, the Son, and the Spirit is full of contradictions, if they are conceived on the analogy of three separate individuals; but these particular difficulties are in some degree modified if we think of them as Three essential eternal modes of the Divine Life, bound together in a perfect love. Such a thought explains the peculiar language used of the Word in His relation to the Father (ἦν πρὸς τὸν θεὸν, ὁ ὢν εἰς τὸν κόλπον τοῦ πατρός, 1$^{1.18}$). We cannot wonder that from this text has arisen the precise theology of the Holy Trinity.

B. THE APOCALYPSE.—The task of describing the theology of the Apocalypse is one of very great difficulty. There is no book more obscure, or more doubtful in its historical reference. The method of the author is to explain his ideas by means of an extremely complicated symbolism, to which it is hard to find the key. In interpreting OT prophecies, the first thing to be done is to decide, if possible, on the historical occasion from which they arose. But in the case of the Apocalypse there is great difficulty in getting any certain clue to the occasion. The majority of modern critics are of opinion that the book was written in the time of Nero; but they are not unanimous, and the ancient tradition is unvaried in favour of the times of Domitian. It will be necessary as far as possible to ignore these difficulties in the present discussion: they are dealt with in special articles. See JOHN (GOSPEL, p. 707 ff.) and REVELATION.

The aim of the book is limited, and is defined both at the beginning and at the end: it is to describe things ἃ δεῖ γενέσθαι ἐν τάχει (cf. 1^{1} 22^{16}). The visions recorded are not set down as mere pieces of the individual history of the writer: they are events which are full of meaning for the future. But interpreters are not agreed as to whether they are to be referred to the immediate history of the time, or to the whole course of the Church's life, or to the remote future at the end of the world. It is well to remember that St. John, supposing that he is the author, is capable, as has already been noticed, of idealizing in a remarkable way; so that he speaks of the sinlessness of the regenerate at the same time that he provides against the commission of actual sin. It is possible, therefore, that the descriptions even of the end of things are the pictorial exposition of principles permanently at work. In any case it will be sufficient to consider the working of the principles, leaving aside the question of their manifestation. The book falls into two very obvious and clear divisions. The first three chapters contain the opening vision and the Epistles to the Seven Churches: this forms the first division. The second (chs. 4–22) contains the Apocalypse proper—the vision or series of visions in which the things which must shortly come to pass are revealed.*

(a) The Doctrine of God.—There is no part of the book devoted to the exposition of this doctrine; such doctrine, therefore, as may be gathered from it, underlies the language in which the proper subject of the book is treated. We gather much, first, from the titles used of God. (α) In the salutation (1^{4}) we have the assertion of the eternity of God ἀπὸ ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος. The name stands undeclined in the nominative, in spite of its construction with the preposition ἀπό; and the imperfect ἦν is treated as a participle. The phrase thus stands for a Being who is subject to no change, but is always, through all the changes which occur; it is an expansion of the old covenant-name Jehovah. The phrase is repeated in 1^{8}, and is there sanctioned by the words, used by the prophets to authorize their message, λέγει ὁ Κύριος. It is worth noticing that in 4^{8}, when the same words recur in the ascription of glory by the four beasts, their order is changed. The words expressing permanence occur in the second instead of the first place: ὁ ἦν, καὶ ὁ ὢν, καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος. After the consummation of things (11^{17}) ὁ ἐρχόμενος is omitted (cf. 16^{5}). The same meaning is carried by the striking phrases τὸ Ἄ καὶ τὸ Ὦ (1^{8} 21^{6} 22^{13}), ὁ πρῶτος καὶ ὁ ἔσχατος (1^{17} 22^{13}), ἡ ἀρχὴ καὶ τὸ τέλος (22^{13}). God is conceived as eternal: from Him all things take their origin, and to Him all things return. In 10^{6} and 15^{7} τῷ ζῶντι εἰς τοὺς αἰῶνας τῶν αἰώνων, the endless continuity of an eternal Being is declared; in 15^{3} ὁ βασιλεὺς τῶν αἰώνων, the idea of rule or dominion is involved. (β) This brings us to a second idea which is frequently associated with God in this book, ὁ παντοκράτωρ—the all-ruling (1^{8} 4^{8} 15^{3} 16$^{7.14}$ 19$^{6.15}$ 21^{22}). It is noticeable that, with the exception of 1^{8} 4^{8}, and possibly 21^{22}, this title is used in connexion with some statement as to the Divine judgments; i.e. with the catastrophic declaration of the principles of His rule. This should be compared with the idea of judgment already traced in the Gospel of St. John (see above, p. 688). Besides this, the phrases should be noted in which the creation of the world is ascribed to God (10^{6} 14^{7}). These simply contain references to it as a fact. In 4^{11} the Will of God is definitely assigned as cause, both for the conception and realization of the created order: διὰ τὸ θέλημά σου ἦσαν καὶ *ἐκτίσθησαν. The cry of the souls slain for the word of God and the witness which they held, contains another title still, ὁ δεσπότης ὁ ἅγιος καὶ ἀληθινός (6^{10}). This word occurs but rarely in NT of God, and not elsewhere in St. John; it would seem to convey the idea of personal relationship, as St. Paul speaks of himself as the slave of Christ (δοῦλος). The word ὅσιος is used 15^{4}, but the usual word for the holiness of God is, as might be supposed, ἅγιος.

---

* Philo (de Somn. I. xiii., tom. i. p. 632 Mang.) uses the same phrase, but with the association of undimmed intellectual vision.

* The question of the internal structure of this section does not come before us.

The various doxologies heard in heavenly places by St. John convey the same teaching, but with some differences in expression. The Elders, in their response to the ascription of the Four Beasts, say, 'Thou art worthy, Lord and our God, to receive the glory, the honour, and the power, because thou didst create all things, and for thy will they were, and were created' (4^{11}). Later on (5^{13}), when the whole of creation responds to the angels and the elders, they ascribe blessing and honour and glory and might (τὸ κράτος); the redeemed (7^{10}) speak of salvation (ἡ σωτηρία); and the angels, in response to the great multitude from every nation under heaven (7^{12}), say, 'Amen: Blessing, and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honour, and power, and strength (ἡ ἰσχύς), be unto our God for ages of ages.' All these, in various ways, assert the supreme sovereignty of God. This is specially emphasized (11^{17} $15^{3.4}$) in regard to the judgments of God: the ways of God are vindicated when, after long trial, the evil is done away with, and holiness triumphs. So the elders, when they sing the song of Moses the servant of God, and of the Lamb, say, 'Just and true are thy ways, O King of ages' (15^{3}); and again, when the waters are turned into blood (16^{5}), St. John heard 'the angel of the waters saying, Thou art just, thou which art, and which wast, the Holy, because thou hast judged these things: because they poured forth the blood of saints and prophets, and thou hast given them blood to drink: they are worthy.' And the altar responds in the same sense (16^{7}, cf. 19^{2}). The majesty of God is described symbolically at the beginning of ch. 4; the Father is 'He that sitteth on the throne' in the centre of the heavenly place. The author does not attempt any description of this supreme Presence in this, or in any other of the many passages where the phrase ὁ καθήμενος ἐπὶ τῷ θρόνῳ occurs; he uses merely metaphorical language, and implies by so doing that God is in Himself invisible. Thus we have in this book an expansion of the old Hebrew doctrine of God: He is eternal, invisible, supreme Creator, Ruler, and Judge of the world. The coherence of this with the fuller Christian doctrine of God will be obvious when we consider the functions of the Son of God.

(γ) We will consider, first, the relation of the Father and the Son. It is noticeable that these names are most frequent in the first three chapters. The incarnate Son occupies a position of subordination. Thus in the preface to Rev we find these words: 'The Revelation of Jesus Christ, which God gave him, to show his servants' (1^{1}). And this is borne out in the chapters which follow: 'I will give him authority over the nations . . . as I also have received from my Father' (2^{27}). So He says, 'I will confess his name before my Father' (3^{5}); and in 3^{21} He draws a parallel between His own victory and triumph and that of His followers. In 3^{12} He even speaks of the Father as 'My God' (ὁ θεός μου). On the other hand, when St. John in the spirit on the Lord's Day sees the opening vision, the figure ὅμοιον υἱὸν ἀνθρώπου, the Son thus manifested uses of Himself words usually applied to the Father, the first and the last (1^{17}); referring to the Resurrection, so that there can be no possibility of mistake, and claiming further to possess the keys of Hades and of death. Moreover, the features which St. John notes in the figure—the flaming eyes, and two-edged sword from the mouth—are, as the messages to the various Churches show, symbolic of judgment. So He is the source from whom the messages to the Seven Churches come: He holds the seven stars in His right hand (i.e. the angels of the Seven Churches, 2^{1}; cf. $1^{16.\,20}$). These phrases imply sovereignty, and the exercise of judicial office. The same position is conveyed by the various titles used in this passage of the Son. He is 'the faithful and true witness' (1^{5} 3^{14}, cf. 1 Ti 6^{13}); 'the firstborn of the dead' (1^{5}), 'the amen' (3^{14}), 'the ruler of the kings of the earth' (1^{5}). These deal with His work on earth, with His function as fulfiller of the promises of God (cf. 2 Co $1^{19.\,20}$), and with its triumph over mankind. So, too, 2^{1} 3^{1}. But the title 'the beginning of the Creation of God' (3^{14}), 'the first and the last' (1^{17} 2^{8}), and those in which the prerogatives of judgment are asserted ($2^{12.\,18}$ 3^{7}), emphasize the Divine attributes of the Son of God (2^{18}). The teaching in these and similar passages precisely resembles in its ambiguity the language already noted in the Gospels. There also the Son speaks of Himself as derived and subordinate, and yet exercises functions which He also reserves for the Father. Such a phrase as Jn 5^{22} 'Neither doth the Father judge any man, but hath given all judgment to the Son,' expresses precisely the point of view of the Apocalypse.

In the first three chapters we find Christ dealing with the Church in the world; with the fourth we pass into the region of visions and symbolism; and the words Father and Son, as already noticed, are of rare occurrence. But the theology is the same, in spite of difference of language. Sovereign over all things is 'he that sitteth on the throne.' By His right hand is the Book written within and without, sealed with seven seals (5^{1}). The seer is told that the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David (cf. 22^{16}, where Jesus assumes this latter title to Himself), has overcome, so as to open the Book and its seven seals (5^{5}). Then 'in the midst of the Throne of the Four Beasts and in the midst of the Elders' he sees a Lamb standing as it had been slain (5^{6}). The Lamb came and took the Book from the right hand of Him that sitteth on the Throne (5^{7}). 'And when he received the Book, the four Beasts and the four-and-twenty Elders fell before the Lamb, having each a harp, and golden bowls full of incense, which are the prayers of the saints. And they sing a new song, saying, Thou art worthy to receive the Book, and to open its seals; because thou wast slain, and didst buy for God with thy blood out of every tribe, and tongue, and people, and nation, and madest them to our God a kingdom and priests; and they reign upon the earth' ($5^{8\text{-}10}$). The angels then respond to this new song with a doxology to the Lamb parallel in character to those addressed to the Father (5^{12}). And, lastly, the whole creation responds with a similar doxology, combining in it both the Lamb and Him that sitteth on the throne (5^{13}). It is obvious that this is a highly significant passage. The Lamb receives the Book from the Supreme; but He is treated with worship similar to that paid to the Supreme. (Contrast the scene in which John falls down to worship the angel, 19^{10} and $22^{8.\,9}$). Moreover, through the language used by the Elders ($5^{8\text{-}10}$), the Lamb is identified with Jesus Christ: 'To him that loved us and loosed us from our sins with his blood, and made us a kingdom and priests to God and his Father—to him be glory and might for ever' ($1^{5.\,6}$, cf. 7^{10}). The same position is maintained throughout the book. The

* If ἦσαν is the true reading, it is difficult to see what it can mean but this; cf. Jn 1^{4} ὃ γέγονεν ἐν αὐτῷ ζωὴ ἦν.

Lamb is mentioned in connexion with the Supreme ($7^{9.10}$ etc.), and He performs work in which His honour is of the same sort with that of God. The redeemed are they 'who follow the Lamb whithersoever he goeth: these were bought from among men a first-fruits to God and the Lamb' (14^4). He appears in the judgment, and witnesses the ruin of the Beast and his worshippers (14^{10}). He wars with the Beast, and overcomes; because He is King of kings and Lord of lords (17^{14}), cf. 'the wrath of the Lamb' (6^{16}). The Church, the new Jerusalem, is the Bride of the Lamb ($21^{9.10}$), and 'the Lord the God, all-Sovereign, is the temple of it, and the Lamb' (21^{22}). There also stands the throne of God and the Lamb (22^3). Similar teaching is found in connexion with the name of Christ (much more rare than the symbolic title 'the Lamb'). 'The kingdom of the world is become (the kingdom) of our Lord and of his Christ' (11^{15}). 'Now is come the salvation and the power and the kingdom of our God, and the authority of his Christ' (12^{10}). The whole scheme is bound up with the order of the world: the Lamb was slain from the foundation of the world (13^8); and yet those whose names are among the redeemed are said to have their names in the Lamb's book of life (13^8 21^{27}). It is difficult to draw any conclusion from this but that St. John regarded the Lamb as a Divine Being, to whom Divine honour was paid, and who was associated in His sovereignty by God. At the same time, He takes from God the commission to perform His functions: He is not independent. Little is said of human nature in regard to Him: twice only He is described as ὅμοιον υἱὸν (var. lec. υἱῷ) ἀνθρώπου (1^{13} 14^{14}). But the sacrifice and the blood of the Lamb are the means by which men are redeemed from their sins; and there is one definite allusion to the crucifixion (11^8 'the great city, which spiritually is called Sodom and Egypt where also their Lord was crucified'). With this may be compared the prophecy in 1^7 'Every eye shall see him, and they who pierced him' (ἐξεκέντησαν), and Jn 19^{37} ὄψονται εἰς ὃν ἐξεκέντησαν. The profession of those who follow Christ is called (from the point of view of its manifestation in the world) 'the witness of Jesus.' St. John claims to be giving this himself (1^2, cf. 19^{10}). It is, as it were, a message the contents of which are obnoxious to the world (1^9) and to the powers of darkness (11^7 12^{17} 17^6); it involves persecution even to death (6^9 17^6 20^4); it is the cause of the triumph of those who have it (12^{11}); and it is the fulfilment, the significance, the spirit of prophecy (19^{10}).

(b) We may speak here of the doctrine of the Spirit, so far as it is contained in this book. It is somewhat involved in symbolism. Thus we read of the seven spirits which are before His throne (1^4): the seven λαμπάδες (4^6) before the throne are identified with the seven spirits, and so also the seven eyes of the Lamb (5^6) are the seven spirits of God, sent (ἀπεσταλμένοι) into all the earth. The number seven probably stands for completeness, and the phrase 'the seven spirits' probably means the Spirit in the full variety of His manifestation. It is noticeable that the salutation to the seven Churches comes from the Eternal, and from the seven spirits, and from Jesus Christ (1^4) in that order: the seven spirits, in this case only, standing between the Father and the Son. In the Epistles themselves a peculiar use is to be observed. Each Epistle begins with an announcement from Christ, made with some symbol indicative of His authority, or His intention to exercise judgment; and each ends with the same formula: 'He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith to the Churches' ($2^{11.17}$ etc.). Also in 3^1 the Ep. to Sardis begins: 'These things saith he that hath the seven spirits, and the seven stars' (i.e. the angels of the Churches, 1^{20}). In two other places the Spirit is represented as speaking, 'I heard a voice from heaven saying, Write, Blessed are the dead that die in the Lord from henceforth: Yea, saith the Spirit, that they shall rest from their labours' (14^{13}). And again at the end (22^{17}), 'the Spirit and the Bride say, Come.' There is thus comparatively little definite allusion to the Spirit in this book. What there is, seems to involve the following points: (1) the Spirit in His various manifestations proceeds from the Father: (2) Christ holds the seven spirits, regulates the diverse operations of the Spirit in the Church; (3) the voice of the Spirit in the Church is, in a sense, the voice of Christ; (4) the Spirit joins in the prayer of the Bride. Though somewhat limited in character, these points imply a doctrine which, both in its clearness and obscurity, resembles the doctrine of the Last Discourses (see above).

(c) The remaining points for consideration are those connected with the facts of sin and judgment, salvation and the Church. It is better to take these together, owing to the particular form in which they come before us. In dealing with the Gospel we noted the use by the author of pairs of parallel but contrasted ideas, such as Light and Darkness, Life and Judgment, This method is carried out in the Apocalypse on a very extended scale. In the visions contained in this work we witness the warfare of two contending powers: on the one side is the Lamb, and on the other the devil. The devil is described under various names. In 12^3 we read, 'And another sign was seen in heaven, and behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns,' etc. This dragon is identified (12^9, cf. 20^2) with 'the old serpent, called the devil and Satan, who deceiveth the whole world.' The 'serpent' implies, of course, a reference to the story of the Fall, and this title, therefore, implies that the source of the evil in the world is the power that was against God. In other places we hear of a synagogue of Satan (2^9 3^9), a throne of Satan (2^{13}), and the place where Satan dwelleth (2^{13}); a doctrine of Satan, called by those who follow it 'the deep things of Satan' (2^{24} τὰ βαθέα τοῦ Σατανᾶ). But this is not all. There is described in this book an organized kingdom of evil, claiming sovereignty over men like the kingdom of the Lamb. This introduces the most tangled of all the questions connected with this book: the interpretation of the Beast. We cannot enter upon the various explanations proposed (see REVELATION), but must confine ourselves to the general question of the position occupied by the Beast in the book. He is the embodiment of the power of the devil (13^2): he aims at winning the homage of the world, and does so win it in a large measure (13^4): he has a certain power to vex the saints—power which is given him (ἐδόθη αὐτῷ, 13^7). Further, he has a representative, a second Beast, who works among men in favour of the first (13^{12}), and does signs (v.^{13}), and inspires an image of the first beast with life and speech: he also compels some to receive a mark in their hands or foreheads, and persecutes all others (vv.$^{16.17}$). In all this there is traceable a kind of attempt to caricature the methods and the kingdom of Christ. One of his heads was ὡς ἐσφαγμένην εἰς θάνατον, and the blow of his death was healed (13^4), as if he claimed resurrection. The second Beast has two horns, like the Lamb (13^{11}). The worshippers who are deceived say, 'Who is like unto the beast, and who is able to war with him?' (13^4), which caricatures the meaning of the word Michael,—'who is like unto God?'—Michael having cast the dragon out of heaven. In 16^{13} we find three powers spoken of—the dragon, the beast, and the prophet who occupies the place of the second beast.

Then later, a woman appears seated on a beast, clothed in scarlet, named Babylon the great. Between these two war arises, in pursuance of the plans of God (17^{17}). With all the obscurity of details the general sense of this imagery seems clear. The forces of evil in the world take their origin from Satan; and the essence of the evil consists in setting up rival claims to worship as against God. This is the force of the caricature of Divine methods. Satan claims to do for men all that God can do. As in the Gospel, the final difference between those who fall under the delusions of the Beast and those who do not is explained by means of predestination. All who dwell upon the earth shall worship him (the Beast), every one whose name has not been written in the book of life of the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (13^{8}, cf. 17^{8}). This, as well as the temporary power of the Beast, his persecution and ultimate fall, are in the hands of God.

With regard to the judgments of God, it is to be noted that they are retributive in character. During the time before the end the plagues of God come upon the world, and those who follow the Beast only blaspheme the more because of them, and fail to repent (16$^{9.\,10.\,11.\,21}$, cf. 9^{20} and contrast 11^{13}): pain in their case fails to convert. When the end comes, men are judged κατὰ τὰ ἔργα (20^{14} 22^{12}). More precisely, those who have slain the saints are given blood to drink (16^{6} 13^{10}); those who commit fornication in Thyatira are cast upon a bed (2^{20}); Babylon is punished with the cup which she mixed for others (18^{6}). The time of probation passes, and then the sins themselves are their own punishment: 'He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he that is filthy, let him be filthy still' (22^{11}).

The evil which has thus entered upon the world affects mankind, apparently as a whole; at least there is no sign in the book that any can avoid its taint. And it therefore requires to be abolished: men need salvation. In this book there is but one means to this end: the blood of the Lamb. The first allusion to this is in the doxology immediately before the salutation, τῷ ἀγαπῶντι ἡμᾶς καὶ λύσαντι ἡμᾶς ἐκ τῶν ἁμαρτιῶν ἐν τῷ αἵματι αὐτοῦ (1^{5}). It appears again in the doxology to the Lamb (5^{11}, cf. 14^{4}). The hundred and forty and four thousand are said to have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb (7^{14}, cf. 22^{14}): it is by means of it that they win victory over the Beast (12^{11}). A reference to it is made when He who is called the Word of God goes forth with His garments sprinkled with blood (19^{13}). Nothing is said as to the way in which this sacrifice is applied: the fact of it is asserted.

Those who are thus redeemed are made by Christ into a kingdom, priests unto God and His Father (1^{6} 5^{10}); that is, they are a society of men ruled over by God as King. They are sealed in their foreheads (7^{3}). They come from the twelve tribes, but not from these alone: 'I beheld, and, lo, a great multitude, that no man could number, from every nation, and tribe, and people, and tongue, standing before the throne, and before the Lamb' (7^{9}; cf. 14^{6}). Moreover, the whole creation has a part in the scheme of God, and responds with a doxology to the Lamb (5^{13}): the 'eternal Gospel' is based on the fact of Creation (14^{6}), 'I saw another angel flying in mid-heaven, having an eternal gospel to preach to those that sit upon the earth, and to every nation, and tribe, and tongue, and people, saying in a loud voice, Fear God, and give him glory; because the hour of his judgment has come: and worship him that made heaven, and earth, and the sun, and the springs of waters.'

In the meantime, before the end comes, the ideal of the Church is not attained. There is sin and heresy in the seven Churches. There are false apostles (2^{2}), false Jews (2^{9}), the teaching of Balaam (2^{14}), a false prophetess (2^{20}), impurity (3^{4}), lukewarmness (3^{15}). The devil has power to persecute, so that the men in the earth may be tested (2^{10} 3^{10}). Those who are slain cry out beneath the altar, How long? (6^{10}) but others, their fellow-servants and brethren, will have to be slain as they. This fate must befall especially the two witnesses, who prophesy against the Beast (11$^{3\text{-}8}$). So for all this time emphasis is laid upon the qualities of endurance and faithfulness (cf. 3^{10} 2^{10} 13^{10}). The cowardly, the unfaithful, those who murder, and lie, and are idolaters or impure (21^{8} 22^{15}), have no part in the heavenly kingdom. Even a Church, that is already in existence, may lose its place: 'if not, I come to thee, and will remove thy candlestick from its place, if thou repent not' (2^{5}).

In the eyes of God and of the seer the time of waiting is very short. 'Behold, I come as a thief' (16^{15} 22^{20}). And when the time does come the harvest of the world will be reaped (14^{15}), and the vintage gathered (14^{18}), and the evil will be finally separated from the good. Then comes the consummation. There will be the new heaven and new earth; the sea—symbolizing probably restlessness, and division and barrenness—will be no more. And the new Jerusalem, founded on the twelve apostles of the Lamb (21^{14}), will appear. In this the redeemed will dwell for ever (22^{5}) in perfect freedom and happiness. The actual presence of God and the Lamb will make a temple for worship unnecessary: the servants of God shall see His face. Thus the purpose for which man is created is fulfilled.

It is not, perhaps, fanciful to see a symbol of this perfect communion in the fact that it is after the renewal of the heaven and earth, that He that sitteth on the throne is said to speak (21^{5}). Before, voices came from the throne and from the temple, but none from the Supreme. Now at last, when all is fulfilled, He speaks.

It is manifestly impossible to exhaust within reasonable limits the meaning of this inexhaustible book. An attempt has been made to indicate the outlines of the theology assumed in it. It must be obvious by this time how closely the thought of the Apocalypse is connected with that of the Gospel and Epistles. Perhaps the most noticeable points of difference are the comparatively small place occupied in the Apocalypse by the doctrine of the Spirit, and the emphasis laid in this book upon the catastrophe of the judgment. It cannot, however, be said that these are very significant. For, first, the doctrine of the Spirit is similar in character to that in the Gospel so far as it goes; and, secondly, the judgment expresses in its final form a warfare which continues throughout the history of the world.

The Fourth Gospel is generally admitted to be the work of one remarkably gifted man. Neither in style nor in motive can criticism break it up into different centuries or antagonistic tendencies. Editorial hands have for the most part spared its subtle beauty. There is little with which it can be compared. It stands free of fashion, and possesses throughout a strongly marked idiosyncrasy.

The problem that is forced upon the student is this: Is the so-called 'Gospel' the outline of a biography, or the artistic clothing of an ideal? Have we a true report of the impression produced on the consciousness of an intimate friend by the teaching, manner, and deeds of One whom he could not think of as less than the Eternal Word of God manifest in the flesh, or must we conclude that what we have is the speculation of some one who did not shrink from creating its material and inventing the basis of its theologoumena?

The problem is the more puzzling because to the presumed author of the Gospel is also attributed the production of the Apocalypse. If this compound authorship can be accepted, the personality of 'John' becomes almost as perplexing to scientific history as that of the Lord Jesus Christ Himself. When the diversity of the characteristics of the two documents came into the clear consciousness of the 3rd cent. (Eus. HE vii. 10, 24, 25), the apostolic origin of the Apocalypse was repudiated, rather than that of the Gospel. But the preponderant belief of Christians has practically accepted the unity of the Johannine writings. The fact that St. John had the insight which enabled him to preserve discourses and sayings of the Lord Jesus, to see in His human life the fulness of grace and truth, the glory of the only-begotten Son, has seemed consonant with the fact that the same eyes might also have discerned in Him the slain Lamb, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the Prince of the kings of the earth.

If the Son of God did say and do the things recorded in this document, then everything in the universe, every fact in the history of the world, the conclusions of all philosophy, the meaning of all scientific discovery, the future of the world, and the goal of humanity, must be affected by its disclosures. We do not, indeed, contend that the Christian faith is dependent on the Fourth Gospel, or that, should this supreme expression of its inmost spirit be banished to the realm of speculative romance, the faith or the kingdom of Christ is relegated to the same region. The ministry of the Apostle to the Gentiles must have been completed between 30 and 40 years before this Gospel saw the light. Great historic Churches grew into importance and began to suffer disintegration from internal discord before it was possible to heal them by the Valedictory Discourse. The Churches of Judæa and of the Dispersion lived by 'the faith of the Lord of Glory' (Ja 2^1), and 'looked for the mercy of our Lord Jesus Christ unto eternal life' (Jude $^{20-22}$), before this document could have come into circulation.

If we read between the lines of the most authentic Epp. of St. Paul, St. Peter, or the Ep. of St. James, we see that the message of the apostles had already inaugurated a new philosophy of heaven and earth, of time and eternity, new conceptions of history and ethics, and new standards of life. The leaven had spread from Jerus. to Antioch; from thence it had spread to Ephesus, Corinth, and Rome. All this had occurred before the Fourth Gospel had been crystallized into form, or its interpretation of the baffling mystery had been offered to mankind. Even if we were robbed of the Apoc. and of the spiritual Gospel, or deprived of all confidence in either, we should still be in indefeasible possession of a faith which unriddles the universe, which works by love, which overcomes the world. We should, therefore, mistake most obvious facts if we persisted in regarding the Fourth Gospel as the 'acropolis' or citadel of the faith.

But although this is freely conceded, the inestimable preciousness of the document must still be urged with earnestness. Those who strenuously deny its historicity and repudiate its apostolic character are ready to confess, with Baur, Schenkel, Thoma, Taylor, that the highest, and essentially the truest, revelation of the Son of Man, and interpretation of the mind and will of God, are to be found in this record. Much which it contains has long since been verified by the Christian conscience as fundamentally true, and has permanently enriched the mind of man.

We hail the teaching of the Fourth Gospel as establishing for us the inspiring persuasion that the divine and human are not separated by an impassable chasm, but are in their innermost essence one; that, in the portraiture of the Logos made man, humanity at its best is nothing less than the clearest and most gracious revelation of the Eternal God, and that Divinity at its greatest has been manifested through the human.

A philosophy based on the intrinsic unknowableness of God, on the impossibility of converse being held between man and his Creator, is pledged to demonstrate the late origin of the Fourth Gospel, and to find in the Johannine teaching of St. Paul some of the materials of the pious fraud of this falsarius of the 2nd century. Many have struggled with the attempt to discover Alexandrine philosophy in the Fourth Gospel. Efforts have been made to show that in the speculations of Cerinthus, Valentinus, and Basilides we may find the historical antecedents of this Gospel. It was even urged by Volkmar that 'John' may have used the works of Justin Martyr, rather than Justin have quoted from 'John,' and a date was provisionally determined for the appearance of the Gospel just anterior to the time when, by general admission, it is known to have been regarded in Antioch and Lyons, Alexandria, Ephesus, and Rome as one of the four indisputable authorities for the biography of the Lord Jesus.

I. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE FOR THE EARLY EXISTENCE OF FOUR GOSPELS.—The strength of the argument for the historicity and the credibility of St. John's Gospel is to be found within itself: (1) in the proof which it explicitly contains of its own authorship; (2) in the transcendent revelation it gives of an august Personality immeasurably greater than that of the supposed author himself, who did not fully assimilate words or thoughts of his Master which yet, by some psychologic process, he was able to preserve and record for all time; (3) in the subtle harmonies between 'St. John's' conception of the Son of God and that expressed by the Synoptists and St. Paul; (4) in the germinant force of the uttered word of Jesus, and in the triumphant response it has found in the consciousness, the fears and hopes, of the human race. And yet there are discords as well as harmonies. These we shall presently attempt to separate, but first we must clearly apprehend what is the material of which these things can be said.

There is proof that towards the last quarter of the second cent., in every part of the Roman Empire, four Gospels had been selected and were regarded as authentic, and that these four documents were identical with those which are described as 'according to' Matthew, Mark, Luke, and JOHN. Up to that period, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον was a name for the good message, or acceptable speculation, which Christian or heretical writers were offering to their followers. Thus Hippolytus (Ref. Hær. vii. 27) speaks of the disciples of Basilides as possessing 'a gospel' which was the knowledge (γνῶσις) of supramundane things; but Theophilus of Antioch applied the name to the four separate Gospels, and we hear henceforward not only of the Gospel, but of τὰ εὐαγγέλια.

(a) The most conspicuous of these testimonies is that of IRENÆUS, Bishop of Lyons in Gaul, who lived between A.D. 140 and 202, and who wrote his treatise Refutation of Heresies between A.D. 180 and 190. Other fragments of his work, and a letter to Florinus, are preserved by Eusebius (HE v. 20). These are of considerable interest, and show, in combination, that the 'four Gospels' are, together with the Old Testament, to be regarded as 'the Scriptures.' Irenæus specifies these four (Hær. iii. 1), referring them by name to their respective authors. He makes frequent reference to St. John by name, and he gives a mystic reason for there being four Gospels, neither more nor fewer. Though this is fanciful and carries no theological weight, it shows that the canonical 'four' must have been long in circulation among the Churches of Lyons and Vienne.* Irenæus makes no fewer than 500 citations from the four Gospels, 100 of these being from the Fourth (see Index of Ante-Nicene Library, Works of Irenæus, ii. 193–197).

Great stress must also be laid on the relation that subsisted between Irenæus and Polycarp, the disciple of John the Apostle. If the letter to Florinus, recalling in lifelike form the appearance and ways of Polycarp, is genuine, it is quite incredible that the Johannine Gospel from which Irenæus thus quoted 100 times was not written by the venerated teacher of Polycarp.

(b) THEOPHILUS, Bishop of Antioch, c. A.D. 180, declared in his three Books addressed to Autolycus, a heathen, that the same things were advanced by the prophets and evangelists, and he quotes John (i. 13) by name. He is also reported to have written commentaries on the Gospels. On the genuineness of the Lat. transl. of these comm. much controversy has prevailed between Zahn and Harnack; but there is no question that Theophilus was acquainted with St. John's writings, and he designates him as 'spirit-bearing'—occupying the same level with the Law and the Prophets. It is, moreover, far from improbable that he refers to Jn 12^{24} and 20^{27}, for the resemblance to St. John's language is striking, and we know that he was acquainted with the Gospel.

(c) CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA was the head of the celebrated Catechetical School from A.D. 189, and was himself a pupil of Pantænus and the teacher of Origen, who succeeded him in his office. Irenæus and Hippolytus probably for a brief period followed his instructions. He was a littérateur, and diligent collector of the opinions and dicta of philosophers. He held in reverence other sacred books, in addition to the Canonical writings of the NT, such as the Gospel according to the Egyptians, and the Apoc. of Peter, a fragment of which has been recently brought to light. He was accustomed to cite and compare the testimonies of ancient writers, as well as early traditions, concerning the Evangelists and the apostles. It is unfortunate that the most interesting of these are preserved for us only by Eusebius (HE vi. 14, iii. 23), but they aver the existence and value of the four Gospels. In the Exhortation (προτρεπτικός, § 59) he quotes from one or other of the Gospels between 400 and 500 times, and cites St. John's by name. Eusebius preserves the tradition of Clement, that Peter approved of Mark's narrative, and that 'John, divinely moved by the Holy Spirit, wrote a spiritual Gospel on observing that the things obvious to the senses had been set forth in earlier Gospels.'

(d) TERTULLIAN, whose literary work was done in Carthage between A.D. 190 and A.D. 230, left abundant testimony to the existence and apostolic authority of each of the Gospels. He cites passages from almost every chapter of the Fourth Gospel, and from some chapters almost every verse (see Watkins, Bampton Lectures, p. 24). His evidence is of high value, because of the close attention he paid to the text of St. Luke's Gospel, and the detailed proof he advanced, verse by verse, that Marcion's 'gospel' was a mutilated copy of St. Luke. After long and anxious reinvestigation by Baur, Ritschl, Volkmar, the author of Supern. Religion, and Sanday, the contention of Tertullian has been sustained; but it is he also who makes it highly probable that Marcion was acquainted with the Fourth Gospel (see Godet's Introd. to Gospel of St. John, vol. i. 221); and without doubt, as in his work (adv. Praxeam, ch. xxiii.) against the monarchianism of Praxeas, Tertullian submitted to the authority of John the beloved disciple.

No weight need be laid upon the fragments which remain, chiefly in Syriac, of the writings of Melito of Sardis, or of Claudius Apollinaris of Hierapolis, though the list of their works given by Eusebius, and the high value set upon them by Jerome and Socrates, make it probable that treatises on the Paschal Festival and on the Birth of Christ showed acquaintance with the Four Gospels.

(e) But a strong link in the chain of proof is found in the writings of FLAVIUS JUSTINUS, the philosopher and martyr. Critics differ as to the chronology of Justin's career and the date of his martyrdom,* but Hort (Journal of Class. and Sac. Philol. iii. pp. 155–193), closely approximated by Volkmar, thought it safe to say that the chief works of Justin, his two Apologies and his Dialogue with Trypho, must fall between A.D. 145 and 148. Caspari and Krüger have ventured on a still earlier date. Justin tells us that, after passing through various stages of philosophic thought, he found the satisfaction of his mind restored by men of prophetic spirit, who did not demonstrate truth, but, being filled by the Holy Spirit, speaking things they had seen and heard, gave him what he wanted: 'kindled a flame in his soul,' and convinced him that 'this philosophy alone was profitable and safe.' The torch of Aristotle and Plato faded when he became familiar with the Light of Christ. In the first apology he frequently cites what he styles 'Memorials composed by the Apostles and their followers.' In ch. 66 he adds 'which are called Gospels,' but this clause, as opponents urge, may be a marginal gloss. The term or phrase is slightly varied. Thus he sometimes, as in Ap. i., calls them 'Memoirs of the Apostles,' sometimes 'Memoirs' simply, as in the Dialogue; and when he is referring to an incident mentioned by all four Evangelists, he introduces it by 'the apostles wrote.' The names of the apostles are not mentioned, yet no phrase could more adequately denote them than 'the apostles and those that followed them.' In addressing the Roman emperors, or the bigoted Jews of Rome or Asia Minor, the obscure names, Matthew, Mark, Luke, John, would have detracted from, rather than increased, their weight. This is parallel with the reticence of Tertullian, who, when writing his Apology and his address To the Nations, makes no distinct reference to the 'Gospels' or to their authors. Cyprian, Arnobius, and Lactantius follow the same rule. In Justin's references to the events of our Lord's life, he introduces a few picturesque details not to be found in the Canonical Gospels, indicating, it may be, some additional sources of information. If he possessed any 'harmony' of the evangelical narrative, as well as the 'memorials,' it is more likely that it was formed from them, than that it was the parent of them. It is, moreover, simply incredible that, between the date of Justin's writing the Apology or Dialogue and Irenæus' writing his Refutation, the Four Gospels should have been brought into existence, and utterly displaced Justin's 'memorials,' or that they should have come into such vogue as to be read in churches and be regarded as of primary importance in Lyons and Carthage, Antioch and Alexandria. Justin refers to some details which are found, so far as we know, in St. Matthew's Gospel only; he also cites some of the few specialities of St. Mark's Gospel, and at least seven peculiarities to be found in St. Luke's Gospel. The deviation from the strict accuracy of quotation may be the idiosyncrasy of the author, for he shows also slight and marked divergences from the LXX, and from the text of the Dialogues of Plato (see Sanday, Gospels in the Second Century). The deviations from strict accuracy are, as we should expect, more numerous in quotations from the Gospels than from these other sources. Except when quoting a lengthened passage from LXX or other sources, he may have fallen back upon his memory, as other divines have done in all ages.

* 'Religious veneration such as that with which Irenæus regarded these books is of slow growth. They must have held a great place in the Church as far back as the memory of living men extended' (R. W. Dale, Living Christ and Four Gospels, p. 145).

* Credner places the limits of his activity between A.D. 130–166 Volkmar reduced the limits between A.D. 140–150.

The contemporaneousness of Justin and Irenæus is a fact of importance when we call to mind the undoubted confidence which the latter places in the Fourth Gospel. Irenæus makes no fewer than 30 references to the Apology and Dialogue of Justin. Equally abundant are the references to Justin by Tertullian, Theophilus, and others, to say nothing at present of Tatian, the supposed author of the Diatessaron.

II. EXTERNAL EVIDENCE FOR THE EARLY EXISTENCE OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—(A) We will commence with the quotations from, or references to, the Fourth Gospel by Justin himself (see Watkins, Bampton Lectures, pp. 73–81, for a summary of recent investigations by Ezra Abbot, Thoma, Hilgenfeld, Drummond, Sanday, Westcott, Edwin A. Abbott, and others). The resemblances between Justin and the Fourth Gospel are undeniable, but it has been contended by some that 'John' borrowed from Justin, rather than the reverse. Such a contention, however, must be held to betray a deficiency of literary perception. Others, who accept the priority of John, urge that Justin did not regard the authority of the evangelist as apostolic; and that, if he had drawn upon the Gospel, he ought to have quoted it when endeavouring to establish the pre-existence of Christ, instead of citing words of OT prophets. This suggestion supposes that we can grasp the ethic and philosophy of citation in the 2nd century. There are seven or eight passages in the Apology, and several in the Dialogue, which turn on (1) the Johannine doctrine of the Logos, its idea of the relation of the Logos to God, as His πρῶτον γέννημα (ch. xxi.), His υἱὸς (chs. xxii. and lxviii.), His πρωτότοκος τῷ ἀγεννήτῳ θεῷ (ch. lviii.); (2) on the incarnation of the Logos, His becoming σάρξ, or ἄνθρωπος, in Jesus Christ, and the 'Teacher' or 'Saviour' of the world (Ap. v.; Dial. xlviii., cv.). Many portions of the Gospel, besides the Prologue, are referred to by Justin, e.g. in Ap. xxxv. he regards Isaiah's oracle in 48^2 as fulfilled by a curious text of Jn 19^{13}, where ἐκάθισε is altered into transitive ἐκάθισαν, and refers to Jesus being forced to sit on the βῆμα or judgment-seat, rather than to Pilate's taking his seat on it. This supposition, that part of the gross humiliation of Jesus consisted in placing Him upon the seat of judgment, is confirmed by the fragment of the Gospel of Peter recently discovered. In Dial. lxix., Justin refers to the incidents of Jesus healing those ἐκ γενετῆς πηρούς (cf. Jn 9), the lame also and dumb, by His word. Again, Jn 4^{10} is referred to in Dial. cxiv.

The most important passage is Ap. lxi., which professes to be the word of Christ Himself, ἄν μὴ ἀναγεννηθῆτε οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθητε εἰς τὴν βασιλείαν τῶν οὐρανῶν. Ὅτι δε καὶ ἀδύνατον εἰς τὰς μήτρας τῶν τεκουσῶν τοὺς ἅπαξ γεννωμένους ἐμβῆναι φανερὸν πᾶσίν ἐστιν. We have only to place this by the side of Jn 3^{3-5} to discern the original form of the idea, although there are many differences in the expression: Ἐὰν μή τις γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν, οὐ δύναται ἰδεῖν τὴν βασιλείαν τοῦ θεοῦ. λέγει πρὸς αὐτὸν ὁ Νικόδημος, Πῶς δύναται ἄνθρωπος γεννηθῆναι γέρων ὤν; μὴ δύναται εἰς τὴν κοιλίαν τῆς μητρὸς αὐτοῦ δεύτερον εἰσελθεῖν καὶ γεννηθῆναι. Schwegler, Baur, Zeller, Supern. Relig., E. A. Abbott, have called attention to every deviation, but none of the theories by which they account for these is so free from difficulty as the suggestion that Justin, in an awkward way, has appropriated with gravity, as his own confirmation of Christ's words, the semi-humorous query of Nicodemus which was passed over by our Lord in silence and implied rebuke. There was probably also an echo of Mt 18^8 blended by Justin with our Lord's words in Jn 3^{3-5}. The verbal differences are conspicuous, and yet accounted for by the very common interchange of the equivalent expressions 'kingdom of God' and 'kingdom of heaven.' Justin expresses the idea of γεννηθῇ ἄνωθεν by ἀναγεννηθῆτε, which is not to be wondered at, seeing that ἄνωθεν is often interpreted by 'again,' and that numerous later writers, who quote indisputably from the Fourth Gospel, make the same modification of the text (cf. also Vulg. and AV). Another deviation, the οὐ μὴ εἰσέλθητε, in place of οὐ δύναται ἰδεῖν, may easily be the reflection of the εἰσελθεῖν of v.^{5} Ezra Abbot found 69 similar deviations from the text in 46 different English divines of modern times.

Hilgenfeld and Keim admit that while the Synoptists affirm that John the Baptist was the 'voice of one crying,' Justin might have referred the exclamation to the consciousness of the Baptist by acquaintance with Jn $1^{22.23}$ and 3^{28}. When, in Apol. i. 63, Justin declares that the Jews knew neither the Father nor the Son, he must have had Jn 8^{19} and 16^3 in his memory.

The various uses of the Prologue in the passages referred to, led even Volkmar to declare that 'the prologue of John is the primordial revelation of the Logos in its immediate majesty, and that the writings of Justin are the first attempts at a rational analysis of the contents of the revelation.' Other and later writers derived these great truths from the Prologue of St. John's Gospel; why should not Justin be allowed to have done the same?[*]

Albrecht Thoma (Die Genesis des Joh. Evang. p. 824) has endeavoured to show that Justin found his idea of the Logos in Philo Judæus, and that he derived nothing from the Gospel, unless it be the identification of Jesus with the incarnation of the Logos. But the objection to this suggestion is, that while the Logos of Philo receives many striking designations, such as 'High Priest,' 'Son,' 'First-Begotten,' etc., Philo never hints at the Messianic idea or the Incarnation. Nothing could be less like the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ than the Philonic God who, by His λόγος, 'eternal reason,' created or sustains the universe (see Reynolds' introd. to Gospel of John in Pulpit Comm. p. xxviii).

(B) What indications do we find of the existence of the Fourth Gospel between the latest date of Justin and that of the literary activity of Irenæus?

(1) HERACLEON is referred to by Irenæus and Hippolytus, by Clemens Alex., and above all by Origen, as a disciple of Valentinus, the great Gnostic of the middle of the century. He is probably referred to by Irenæus as one of the unnamed Gnostics who, with Ptolemæus, helped to divide the Valentinians into two groups (Ref. Hær. ii. 4, vi. 35. 29), differing on the question whether the original principle of the universe was a monad or a dyad. He did not write a formal exposition of Valentinus, but a practical exegesis of the Gospels of Luke and John, in which the doctrines of Valentinus were assumed. He writes with extreme reverence for the text of the Gospels, as if they commanded attention on the highest ground. He is one of the earliest to write a commentary on any book of the NT; and from his commentary on the Fourth Gospel, Origen quotes 50 times in his own comm., sometimes accepting Heracleon's views, more frequently contradicting them. Large extracts from the comments on the first, second, fourth, and eighth chapters are thus preserved by Origen (see 'Heracleon' in Dict. Christ. Biog. by Salmon). The method of comment is allegorical; and while the historical or natural sense is not rejected, the higher and truer meaning is found in forced analogies. But the point of interest here is, that before Irenæus, and reaching back by Heracleon's personal relations with the celebrated heresiarch to Valentinus himself, this Gospel was esteemed as of prime importance and authority in the view of heretics as well as orthodox. That Justin should not have known this document, becomes almost incredible.

(2) This conclusion grows more certain when we compare with it the testimony of Justin's pupil, TATIAN, who between A.D. 160 and 170 issued his Discourse to the Greeks, in which explicit citations are made from Jn $1^{3.5}$, and also from Jn 1^{1} 4^{24}.[†] After the death of Justin, Tatian held and propagated certain heterodox opinions on the subject of marriage, which he regarded as 'corruption' and whoredom. He repudiated the OT as the record of the Demiurge, in consequence of its implied sanction of polygamy. Eusebius reports that Tatian was the founder of the sect of Encratites. All that Irenæus states is that Encratites appear to have appealed to Tatian, as holding that Adam could not be saved, seeing that 'in Adam all die.' Eusebius (HE iv. 29) refers to a much more important work of Tatian's, which was a patch-work of the evangelia, compiled after a fashion he did not understand, and called τὸ διὰ τεσσάρων.[*] This document, said Eus., 'is in the possession of some even now.' This passing observation is the first extant reference to the Diatessaron, on which much additional light has been thrown in recent times by unexpected discoveries, and by documents the importance of which had been long overlooked. This is not the place to tell the romantic story of the several steps by which the Diatessaron to which Eusebius referred has come into our hands. We are amazed at the tenuity and tenacity of the thread of proof on which the conclusion rests that we have before us the interweaving of four distinct Gospels and no others by Tatian, and dating near the middle of the 2nd cent. Seeing that this conclusion carries with it the early and wide circulation at that date of the Fourth Gospel, it naturally excites keen criticism (see Nineteenth Century, April 1895). The second reference in Greek antiquity is that of Theodoret (Hær. i. 20), Bp. of Cyrus or Cyrrhus in E. Syria (457–8), who attributes the Diatess. to Tatian, but condemns it for the omission of the genealogies and the rejection of the evidence that Christ, according to the flesh, was born of the seed of David. Theodoret states that more than 200 copies of this work were found in his little diocese, and that he substituted for them copies of the Four Gospels (see calculations based on this fact in Norton's Genuineness of Gospels, ch. 1, touching the extensive distribution of Scripture in the 5th cent.). It appears from this that the Harmony was in all probability written in Syr., which would explain Eusebius' ignorance of its contents. This (as Fuller urges) may account for the blunder made towards the close of the fourth century by Epiphanius (Hær. 46), who had got the idea that this document was none other than the 'Gospel according to the Hebrews.' Evidently, neither Eusebius nor Epiphanius had any definite information or actual knowledge of Syr. literature. But Victor, Bp. of Capua (d. A.D. 554), came into possession of a codex of NT containing an anonymous harmony of the four Gospels, which he called Diapente, and which he was disposed to identify with a 'harmony' made from that of Ammonius of Alexandria, or from that to which Eusebius referred as constructed by Tatian. That which Victor published was a revision in terms of Jerome's Vulg., and is one of the earliest and most valuable MSS of the Vulgate. This codex of the NT Vulg. was conveyed by Boniface to Fulda, and has had bestowed upon it the name Fuldensis. As far as the Gospels are concerned, it is practically identical with the Arab. VS of Tatian's Diatessaron which has subsequently come to light. Unlike the description of Tatian's Diat., it commences with Lk 1^{1-4} and contains portions of genealogies which Tatian's did not. These are found to be alterations of the original text, by a careful comparison of the index with the MS. This Latin codex was translated into the Old Saxon dialect in alliterative verse under the name Héliand. Another link of interest is the discovery of the Homilies of Aphraates, bishop and abbot of a convent near Mosul (A.D. 336–345). They were written in Syr., and give lengthened extracts from the Diatessaron. Another interesting fragment is a treatise, the Doctrine of Addai, which contains the curious Syr.

[*] Kirchhofer (Quellensammlung) and Charteris (Canonicity) quote a large number of other passages from both the Apol. and Dial. which reveal greater or less resemblance to passages from every part of the Gospel.

[†] See Fuller's most elaborate dissertation in Dict. of Christ. Biog., as well as that of Donaldson (Hist. of Ch. Doct. and Lit. vol. iii. pp. 1–60). Both these writers carefully analyze the 'Discourse' and summarize its teachings; Fuller gives the remarkable passage in which the Fourth Gospel is quoted.

[*] Salmon (Introd. to NT^{5}, p. 74), on the authority of Mahaffy, shows that διὰ τεσσάρων may be a musical term incorrectly transferred to literature, and means a harmony of four, as διὰ πασῶν a concord of the octave. διὰ πέντε of the first and fifth notes.

legend of the Saviour's letter to king Abgarus of Edessa; and this refers to the Harmony called Ditourion = Diatessaron, which was used and read in the Syriac churches. We learn from other Syr. documents of the 12th cent., on the authority of Dionysius Bar-Salibi, that Ephraem Syrus, a deacon of Edessa, who died A.D. 373, had written a commentary on the Diatessaron of Tatian in the last ten years of his life (see Lightfoot's discussion of this belated testimony of Bar-Salibi, Contemp. Review, 1877). It is an extraordinary circumstance that two forms of this commentary are found to exist in the Armenian language. These have been collated and translated into Latin by Aucher and Moesinger. Tatian is not mentioned, but Ephraem comments upon one passage after another of the Gospels, and not infrequently upon a text which is a blending of two or more Gospels.

Zahn (1881) and Wace (see Expos. 2nd ser. ii. 1, 128, 193; iv. 161, 294) have given a careful digest of all these passages, and the text on which Ephraem was commenting. The commentary appears to have been written in Syriac. Hamlyn Hill, assisted by Armitage Robinson, has, by comparison of Moesinger's Lat. and the Arm. text, reached a very close approximation to the words of Ephraem. Zahn has been able to arrange the text of the Diatessaron in one hundred sections, with explanatory and textual criticism, collation of the Lat., Syr., and Arm. Vulgates, and the codices A, B, etc. But a remarkable addition to the apparatus criticus has been romantically made by the examination of two Arabic MSS of the Diatessaron itself: one brought from Egypt to the Vatican Library in 1719, by Assemani, known by the title of No. XIV.; the other, also brought from Egypt to Ciasca, of the Vatican Library, and practically a repetition of No. XIV., but with important differences in detail. The collated text has been translated into Eng., and edited by Hamlyn Hill (Earliest Life of Christ, 1894; see also Hill, Dissertation on Gosp. Harmony of S. Ephraem, 1896; and Rendel Harris, Fragments of Com. of Ephrem Syrus, 1895). These translations leave no valid doubt that we have the text before us on which Ephraem commented, and which the Arab. MS avers is a translation from Syriac of the long-lost Diatessaron. A large portion of St. John's Gospel is included in the Diatessaron—a fact which establishes, if it is Tatian's collation of the four Gospels, not only the existence of the Fourth, but the esteem in which it was held between A.D. 150 and 160. The doubt cherished by many about the 'Memoirs' of Justin must therefore be abandoned. Harnack's judgment in the Encycl. Brit. (1888, xxiii. 81) is to the same effect. Watkins justly observes, 'the Diatessaron of Tatian is the key to the Memoirs of Justin' (Bamp. Lect. 71), and it certainly bridges the gulf between the literary phraseology of Justin and Irenæus.

(3) The MURATORIAN FRAGMENT, one of the earliest attempts to give a list of the books of NT, not only includes the Fourth Gospel, but, in legendary fashion, describes the circumstances under which the Apostle John was urged by Andrew and other apostles to prepare his narrative with their recognition and sanction (recognoscentibus cunctis). This testimony is extremely important, but its value depends on its date. The writer says, 'Hermas has very recently in our days written the "Shepherd" while Pius his brother was Bishop of Rome.' The earliest dates for the commencement and close of the episcopate of Pius I. are from A.D. 139–154, the latest from A.D. 141–156. It has been customary to say that the limit of the date (nupcrrime temporibus nostris) cannot be put later than A.D. 170 (so Döllinger, Lightfoot, and Westcott). But Salmon[*] (Introd. to NT, and art. in Smith, Dict. of Biog. vol. iii.) judges differently of this limit, on the ground that the great change in the position of the Bishops of Rome with and after Pius had so long passed as to be forgotten when the unknown author penned these words, and that we cannot assume a date earlier than about A.D. 200. One of the most weighty features of the proof that the Gospel was at that moment widely prized and regarded universally in the Church as the work of the Apostle John, is the reference to the First Epistle, which the writer treats as an appendix to the Gospel, adding that John 'professes that he was not only an eye-witness, but also a hearer and writer (scriptorem . . . per ordinem 'a historian') of all the wonderful things of the Lord.' The testimony of the Fragment thus confirms the conclusion already reached by the testimonies of Theophilus, Irenæus, Tatian, Justin, and Clement of Alexandria.

(4) Our evidence may be carried still further backwards by what remains of the words or life of PAPIAS, Bp. of Hierapolis. The fragments of the works of this early Christian writer were, for the most part, preserved by Eusebius (HE iii. 36, 39).[†] He is there said to have been bishop of the Church of Hierapolis, and a contemporary of Polycarp the disciple of John. It is more than probable that he was born between A.D. 60 and 70, and wrote his exposition in five books about A.D. 135. The estimate which Eusebius expresses of his mental character in different pages is contradictory. In one place he is called an eminently small man, in derogation, perhaps, of some extravagantly chiliastic prophecies which he is said to have referred to the lips of our Lord. Elsewhere Eusebius describes Papias as 'well skilled in all kinds of learning, and mighty in the Scriptures.' His importance to us lies in the probable source of his information and the nature of his written work. This last appears to have consisted of comments upon the words, miracles, and prophecies of Christ, such as he was eager to obtain from those who had known the Lord ('the truth'), and he mentions 'the elders Andrew, Peter, John, Philip, Thomas, and James, Matthew and other "disciples"' as authorities, whose words came to him by direct speech of friends of his who had known the apostles; and he adds 'what Aristion and the elder John say (λέγουσιν),' as though these elders had survived the rest, and were still available for information.

It is a vain wish that we had more than the few hundred words which Eusebius has preserved. With only these fragments, it is misleading and arbitrary to argue from the silence of Papias as to what he knew of the four Gospels or the Epistles of St. Paul. The passage preserved by Eusebius is taken from the fourth book of the Expositions of Papias,—Irenæus having informed us that Papias had written five such books,—in which he confirms his interpretations by his own reminiscences of the speech of those that had known the apostles. It is worthy of special regard that the earliest witnesses and disciples of our Lord are cited in the Eusebian fragment of Papias in the very order in which they are referred to in the Fourth Gospel. Eusebius does not cite passages from Papias in proof of the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel. He adopts this course upon the principle which he follows everywhere, viz. to mention very little concerning the entirely undisputed books, but to bring confirmation from various sources of those which had, upon any ground, been rejected or disputed. In like manner he makes no reference to any of the quotations indisputably made by Irenæus or Origen from the Gospel. The silence here is a proof that Papias made abundant use of the Gospel rather than the reverse. The references to Papias' use of 1 Peter and 1 John support a further suggestion, that Papias was familiar with the Gospels of Mark (the interpreter of Peter) and John the Divine. Eusebius does not refrain (in his Chronicon ad Olymp. 220) from speaking of 'Papias the Hieropolitan, and Polycarp Bp. of Smyrna, as being known to be hearers of John the Divine and Apostle, as is declared by Irenæus and others.'

[*] Similarly, Zahn and Harnack.

[†] The only other trace of the book, 'The Exposition of the Oracles of our Lord,' is in an inventory of the books in possession of the cathedral of Nismes, dated A.D. 1218.

This particular passage raises no question about John 'the elder,' of whose existence there is no proof except this solitary comment of Eusebius upon an obscure fragment of Papias. The present writer has discussed the subject fully in Introd. to Gospel in Pulpit Com.; see also Salmon, art. 'Joannes Presbyteros,' in Dict. Chr. Biog.; Farrar in Expos. (1881) 2nd ser. ii. 321; Haussleiter in Theol. Lit.-blatt, Sept. 25, 1896; and Gwatkin in Contemp. Rev., Feb. 1897 (cf. Expos. Times, viii. 1897, pp. 338, 416). Westcott, Lightfoot, and Gwatkin hold to the Eusebian suggestion. Delff advocated the existence of a disciple not John the Apostle, but possibly John the Presbyter, who is credited with the authorship of the Gospel, who was the disciple whom Jesus loved, and who knew more of the esoteric teaching than any of the Twelve. But the entire story of the second John is due, as many hold, to the inaccurate interpretation by Eusebius of the saying of Papias.

(5) In conjunction with Papias, it is well here to recount the testimony of POLYCARP, Bp. of Smyrna, who may be safely credited with carrying the evidence for the existence of the Gospel back to the lifetime of St. John. The letter of Irenæus to Florinus, preserved by Eusebius, HE v. 20, is charged with proof of his own personal remembrances of Polycarp. Irenæus recounts his ways, his 'personal intimacy with John and with the rest who had known the Lord.' 'The miracles and doctrine of the Lord were told by Polycarp, in consistency with the Holy Scriptures, as he received them from the eye-witnesses of the Doctrine of Salvation.' These 'Holy Scriptures' to which Irenæus refers were no other than the Gospels,—including the Fourth,—from which he made hundreds of citations in his great work. The historical character of Polycarp's visit to Rome, and of his martyrdom, has withstood all criticism. The memorable exclamation, 'Eighty and six years have I served Christ,' limits the interval between the martyrdom and birth of Polycarp. The painstaking researches of Waddington (independently confirmed by Lightfoot) give A.D. 155 as the date of the martyrdom, and therefore A.D. 69 as that of the birth, and possibly the baptism, of this venerable link between the apostles and the sub-apostolic Church. This would allow for Polycarp's having attained thirty years before the death of John. It is almost impossible to believe that Irenæus blundered so extravagantly as not to have found out, in the strength of his vigorous manhood, whether it was St. John himself, or another, of whom Polycarp spoke to him, in days so well remembered. The brief Epistle of Polycarp to the Philippians contains an unmistakable citation of 1 Jn $4^{2.3}$: 'For every one who does not confess that Jesus Christ has come in the flesh is Antichrist, and whoso does not confess the testimony of the Cross is of the devil.' The hypothesis of Volkmar, that the author of the 1st Ep. was quoting from Polycarp, is surely discredited by the assurance that Papias also made use of 1 Jn. The authenticity of Polycarp's letter has been placed beyond question by the researches of Lightfoot (Contemp. Review, 1877, and Apost. Fathers, pt. II. vols. i. and iii.). Dale, in his Living Christ and Four Gospels, developed a striking argument from the absence of mysticism and the lack of originality displayed by Polycarp, in addition to the fact that John, whom he knew, must have written the Gospel which he accepted, and taught his disciples to regard as Holy Scripture. Even the contrast between the tone, the teaching, and the chronology of the Synoptics, and the Fourth Gospel, certainly strengthens the conclusion. This contrast has been greatly exaggerated, but nothing is more likely to have prevented a widespread hesitation as to the authenticity of the Gospel, on account of this contrast, than the assurance of such a man as Polycarp.

6. The testimonies available from CLEMENS ROMANUS and BARNABAS are handicapped by their own antiquity. This is peculiarly the case with Barnabas, in the opinion of hostile critics. But Keim has urged that Barnabas is saturated with the ideas of the Fourth Gospel.* If this can be sustained, it must share, with corresponding features in the writings of St. Paul, the author of He, and others, the explanation that, pari passu with the Synoptic tradition, there had from the first been widely diffused a tradition of the teaching of the beloved disciple. Such diffusion must have urged the apostle in his latest years to put into fixed form his undying memories, and greatly facilitated its acceptance in the earliest years of the 2nd cent. There are, indeed, phrases which reflect the influence of Johannine teaching in the First Epistle of Clemens Romanus. Thus, among others, ch. xlix., 'He that hath love in Christ, let him do the commandments of Christ' (cf. Jn $14^{15.23}$, 1 Jn 5^{1-3}), and 'Jesus Christ our Lord gave His blood for us, by the will of God, and His flesh for our flesh, and His soul for our souls' (Jn 6^{51} and 15^{13}).

The Second (so-called) Epistle of Clement, which may be accepted, with Lightfoot, as 'an ancient homily of an unknown author,' say about A.D. 150, betrays no certain reference to either St. Paul or St. John. Still, note the tone of ch. ix.: 'If Christ the Lord, who saved us, being first spirit became flesh (ἐγένετο σάρξ), and so called us, in like manner in this flesh, we shall receive our reward. Let us then love one another.' We are certainly reminded here of Jn 1^{14} and the spirit of the first Ep., or, what seems more probable, we recognize the diffusion on all sides of those aspects of our Lord's teaching which we refer to Johannine memories.

(7) IGNATIUS.—The great controversy touching the genuineness of the Ignatian letters may be regarded as having now terminated in favour of the Vossian Shorter Gr. Text, and the triumphant refutation by Lightfoot of the hypothesis of Cureton that the three short forms of the Syr. VS of the Epp. to the Romans, to Polycarp, and to the Ephesians are the sole genuine nucleus of the entire literature. If these seven letters, vouched by the Ep. of Polycarp to the Philippians to be genuine, can be regarded as the writing of the Martyr on his way to Rome, certainly not later than A.D. 116, and more probably A.D. 109, we have indubitable traces of the Fourth Gospel having already found its way from Ephesus to Antioch when the memory of St. John must have been fragrant throughout Asia Minor.

A strongly Johannine phrase, not without a special difficulty of its own, appears in the letter to the Magnesians, viii. 2: 'There is one God, who manifested Himself through Jesus Christ, His Son, who is His Logos, proceeding from σιγή, who in all respects was well pleasing to Him that sent Him.' Lightfoot has shown how this difficult term σιγή was used in the 1st cent., and thinks that Ignatius had a leaning to the early pre-Valentin. Gnosis of the period. Whatever be the text, whether we should read, 'proceeding from σιγή,' or 'not proceeding from σιγή,' a reference to the Fourth Gospel is obvious. In the letter to the Romans, vii. 2, we read, 'the living water speaking within me (or, probably truer text, 'flowing, bubbling up'), says, "Come to the Father"; I take not delight in the nourishment of corruption, nor the pleasures of this life: I desire the bread of God, which is the flesh of Jesus Christ (of the seed of David), and desire the drink of God, which is His blood, which is incorruptible love.' In this passage we have reference to Jn 4^{14} and $6^{55.\,32.\,33}$. In the letter to the Philadelphians, vii. 1, ix. 1, there are further echoes, and Jn 10^{7} is expressively referred to.

* Charteris, Canonicity, quotes twenty passages which suggest some possible familiarity with Johannine phraseology.

Before passing from this period, we may refer to the Acta Martyrii Polycarpi, the date of which shortly follows the martyrdom, and 'the letter of the Churches of Lugdunum and Vienne' preserved by Eusebius, and presumably written by Irenæus, who was the bearer of it (HE v. 1): 'Then were fulfilled the words spoken by the Lord, that "the period should come when he that killeth you will think that he offers service to God,"' which is almost a verbal citation from Jn 16^{2}.

(8) The Epistle to Diognetus was once included among the writings of Justin. Whilst by some it has even been attributed to Scaliger, it is assigned by Nitzsch to A.D. 110–125, by Westcott to A.D. 117, by Bunsen to 135, and by Hilgenfeld to a much later period in the century. It does not therefore supply any valid evidence. Its early origin cannot, however, be disproved, and we find in it the remarkable phrase, apparently from Jn 17^{14} 'They (Christians) are not of this world.' In ch. x. there is a nearly accurate quotation of Jn 3^{16}, and a striking interpretation of Jn 1^{1} etc. applied to the functions of the Christ. There is also a reference to 1 Jn 4^{17} in the same chapter.

(9) In the Testaments of the XII Patriarchs, a Jewish Christian puts into the mouths of the founders of the Jewish race Christian counsels and consolations. Sinker, who edits and translates it for the Ante-Nicene Lib., places it at the end of the 1st or beginning of the 2nd cent. Many now regard it as a Jewish work edited for Christian readers. The Saviour is spoken of as 'Light of the world,' 'the Son of God,' 'the only Son,' 'the Lamb of God,' and 'the Spirit of truth'; 'sin unto death' (cf. 1 Jn 5^{16}) is referred to; 'eating of the tree of life' (Rev 2^{7})—all phrases which reveal the presence of the Johannine thought and expression.

(10) The Didaché of the Twelve Apostles may prove to be the most ancient of the post-apost. literature. It is referred to by Clement of Alexandria, who cites it as 'Scripture.' The simplicity of the style and the entire absence of any reference to the Ebionite or Gnostic heresies prove that it must have been antecedent to Irenæus or Justin.

The Ep. of Barnabas, which may have been written between A.D. 100 and 120, contains a confessed expansion of the earlier portions of the Didaché. A comparison of these related passages (see Bryennios' ed. of the Didaché and Schaff's Oldest Church Manual, where they are placed side by side, p. 228 ff.) has convinced almost all Eng. and Amer. scholars, as well as Zahn, Funk, Langen, of the priority of the Didaché.

The date of Hermas' Shepherd is very variously estimated, but, as in the case of Barnabas, what is common to the Didaché and the Shepherd is most certainly earlier than the latter (Schaff, p. 233).

We are brought by the Didaché into the midst of the movements of the early Church. It contains quotations from the Gospels of Mt and Lk. Though we cannot say that the writer had the Fourth Gospel in his hands, yet Harnack admits the striking connexion between the Eucharistic prayers of chs. ix. and x. and Jn 6 and 17.

John (1^{14}) used the remarkable word ἐσκήνωσεν to denote the dwelling in (with) us of the 'Word made flesh': see here Did. x. 2. Christ, 'I am the true Vine, and my Father is the husbandman': cf. Did. ix. 2, 'We give thanks to Thee, our Father, for the Holy Vine of Thy servant David, which Thou hast made known through Thy servant Jesus.' Cf. also Jn 15^{15} and 17^{26} with Did. ix. 2, 3 and x. 2. There are, moreover, striking resemblances between 1 Jn $2^{5.\,17}$ and Did. x. 5, 6. Much of this teaching obviously points to a community familiar with Johannine teaching.

(11) The use which HERMAS is supposed to have made of the four Gospels, and his adoption of the phraseology of the Fourth, have been diligently investigated by Dr. C. Taylor in his Witness of Hermas to the Four Gospels, 1892. The argument turns on the special style and method of Hermas. He translates into some synonymous or symbolic expression ideas differently phrased by Clemens II. Ancient Homily, the Didaché, or ad Diognetum. Thus in the Shepherd ἀγγελία ἀγαθή takes the place of εὐαγγέλιον. In Vision iii. and Similit. ix. the earliest suggestion of necessary fourfoldness of the Gospels corresponds with the fourfoldness with which all the universe is compacted [a theory found in Plato and Arist. Nic. Eth. I. x. 11, τετράγωνος ἄνευ ψόγου]. The four cherubic figures, the four pillars on which the Christ is seated, the Old and New Gate into the Symbolic Tower, are all supposed by Taylor to have been borrowed by Irenæus from Hermas, rather than the other way. The process by which the writer establishes scores of references by Hermas to the Fourth Gospel is a subtle one, and does not carry conviction, except perhaps as to the existence of the tetrad of Gospels a generation before Irenæus wrought out the comparison.

External evidences of the use of the Fourth Gospel by the enemies of Christianity and by well-known leaders of Gnostic heresies must not be passed over in this rapid recital. We will, in reviewing this evidence, commence with the later testimonies, and press upwards through the century.

(1) CELSUS was probably no other than Celsus the friend of Lucian, an Epicurean. He was the author of the λόγος ἀληθής to which Origen replied in the 3rd cent. He was a bitter enemy of the Christian faith, but from Origen's great work it appears that he was intimately acquainted with the four Gospels. He lived about A.D. 178, and thus shows not only that these works were beginning to be recognized as of paramount authority, but that they were known as such by heathen controversialists.

Origen (c. Celsum, i. 50) tells us that Celsus accused Christians of believing that 'the Son of God is come down from heaven' (see Jn 3^{31} 8^{23}). In i. 67 Origen quotes from Celsus, 'Thou hast made no manifestation, although they challenged thee in the temple to exhibit some unmistakable sign that thou wert Son of God' (cf. Jn 2^{18} 10^{24}). In i. 70 Celsus objected that the body of a God could not be thirsting at the well of Jacob, or eating broiled fish and honeycomb (Jn $4^{6f.}$, Lk 24^{42}). ii. 31 says that Celsus objected that Christians are in error who 'declare that the Logos is Son of God, when they present no pure and holy Logos, but a degraded man punished by scourging and crucifixion. In ii. 36 Celsus referred to the ichor flowing in the veins of the crucified; which is a reflection of Jn $19^{34.\,35}$. The Fourth Gospel must have been widely diffused for a heathen writer about A.D. 178 to have made this use of it.

(2) We possess only a Lat. tr. of the Recognitiones of the PSEUDO-CLEMENT, made by Rufinus. The Homilies are probably the more ancient work, and are extant in Greek. The date at which this Ebionite work was produced cannot be finally determined, but the best judgment throws it into the middle of the second century. Hilgenfeld in 1850 declined to see any quotation from the Fourth Gospel. Lagarde, however, gives 15 supposed references to it. Thus, Hom. iii. 52, 'The true Prophet hath sworn "I am the gate (πύλη) of life," whoso entereth by me, entereth into the life'; and again, 'My sheep hear my voice' (cf. Jn 10^9 and ^{27}). In Hom. xi. 26, 'Except ye be born again of or in living water (ὕδατι ζῶντι) unto the name of the Father, Son, Holy Spirit, ye shall not enter into the kingdom of the heavens' (cf. Jn 3^5). In 1853 Dressel discovered the xixth Homily, where, in ch. 22, occurs an almost verbal quotation of Jn $9^{2.3}$. Hilgenfeld yielded to this evidence, which makes Baur's date for the Gospel finally incredible. There is, doubtless, little agreement between the spirit and teaching of the Gospel and the Clementines, which makes the evidence still more remarkable.

(3) MONTANUS and Montanism also suffer as evidence by the uncertainty as to their date. The disproportionate space given to this theme in Eusebius, HE v., does not clearly fasten the rise of this Phrygian heresy to a distinct period, though giving the names and a sketch of the writers, Miltiades, Apollonius, etc., who contended with it in the reign of Commodus, 180 ff. Some have fixed on 140—Gieseler on 150—others 157, others 180. Salmon looks to the 3rd cent. for the origin of the heresy. If the earlier date should be finally established, the evidence becomes clear that John's Gospel must have been taken as a record of the valedictory discourse, for Montanus chose therefrom the term Paracletus, 'the other Comforter,' as referring to no other than to himself; actually claiming that our Lord prophesied his (Montanus') appearance in the fulness of time. Theodoret also says that Montanus made a similar use of the terms Λόγος and Νυμφίος.

(4) MARCION admittedly makes no reference or allusion to the Fourth Gospel, but Tertullian (adv. Marc. iv. 3) shows that Marcion uses Gal 2 to justify his rejection of gospels supposed to be apostolic, because they were apostolic, not because they were not so. Tertullian (de Carne Christi, ch. iii.), while arguing against the hyperspiritualism of Marcion, says, 'If thou hadst not rejected the writings opposed to thy system, the Gospel of John would be there to convince thee.' Surely the Fourth Gospel is more explicit than are the Synoptics in asserting the full humanity of the Lord Jesus. Marcion reached Rome in A.D. 140, and we are thus allowed to assume an earlier and wide diffusion of the various gospels which he rejected and mutilated to serve the purposes of his own system of philosophy.

(5) VALENTINUS, the poet-philosopher of Gnostic theosophy, with his disciples Ptolemæus and Heracleon, Theodotus and Marcus, formed an important school of thought, pervading the 2nd cent. He appeared in Rome between A.D. 135–160, having been before this in Alexandria, and is said to have died in Cyprus A.D. 160. Tertullian tells us that he made use of the whole of the instrumentum, i.e. books of NT (de Præscr. Hær. 38). Irenæus, about A.D. 182, wrote his great work (adv. Hær.) in part to meet and refute the eclectic errors of Valentinus and his school. Hippolytus wrote his Refutation of all Heresies in the same spirit, and they both quote from the master and his disciples, not always accurately discriminating them. Now, as we have seen (cf. p. 697^a), Heracleon [said by Clem. Alex. to have been well known to Valentinus] composed a comm. upon considerable portions of John's Gospel, extracts from which are preserved by Origen. These passages show that a disciple of Valentinus treated the Fourth Gospel as of divine authority. Ptolemæus also, in a letter of his addressed to Flora and preserved by Epiphanius (adv. Hær. xxxiii. 3–7), quotes Jn 1^{1-3} and Jn 12^{27}. Indeed, Irenæus positively assures us that Valentinus and his disciples 'abundantly make use of the Gospel'; and Hippolytus confirms this by a perverted use of Jn 10^8, which he attributes to Valentinus himself,—with the formula φησί rather than φασίν,—and cites also, as from Valentinus, the Johannine phrase, 'the Prince of this world,' 16^{11}. But the entire system of 'Æons,' and their 'Syzygies' or couples, which make up the Ogdoad and the Pleroma, is marked by the use of such terms as Πατήρ, Λόγος, Φῶς, Ζωή, Ἀλήθεια, Μονογενής, Παράκλητος, with others; it is clear that this cannot be accidental: either 'John' built upon Valentinus, or Valentinus, finding these terms in a book believed to be of sacred authority, utilized them for his own purposes. Putting the simple, natural, and religious use of these terms in the prologue of the Gospel and elsewhere, over against the highly technical and theosophical use of them in the system of Valentinus, it becomes clear that the heresiarch himself was familiar with the Fourth Gospel. In this conclusion, Bleek, Keim, Bunsen agree, as against Davidson and Sup. Rel. Thoma (p. 822) admits that the dependence of the Valentinian school upon the Gospel is not chronologically or dogmatically impossible, though indemonstrable.

(6) BASILIDES and the Basilidians. Basilides, whose work and system preceded that of Valentinus, both at Alexandria and Rome, is named by numerous writers—Epiphanius, Jerome (de Viris Ill. ch. xxi.), Hippolytus (vii. 8), and Eusebius (HE iv. 7) who places his period in the days of Hadrian (117–138) and speaks with intense abhorrence of his impieties and his inventions and asceticism. He does not refer to his doctrine. Hippolytus speaks of the claim made by the followers of Basilides that he had received special instructions from Matthias, one of the disciples of our Lord (Ac 1^{24}). Whether there may or may not be any truth in this report, at any rate it gives early antiquity to their father and founder. Epiphanius (Hær. xxiii. 1–7, xxiv. 1) attributes to B. a period of activity in Antioch before his appearance in Alexandria or Rome. If Basilides quoted from the Fourth Gospel, the origin of that precious document is thrown back to the earliest days of the century, and, as has already been urged, into the lifetime of the apostle. Now it is very probable that Hippolytus, in writing his great book (Ref. Hær. vii. 22), had the work of Basilides open before him, and that he referred to the master and to his school by his accustomed method of citation, φήσι for the former, while he used φασίν, or κατ' αὐτούς or λέγουσι for the latter. If the whole of this passage is read (see Eng. tr. in A.N. Lib.), little doubt can remain in any candid mind that Hippolytus was quoting two passages as cited by Basilides himself from Jn 1^9 and 2^4. (See also Matthew Arnold, God and the Bible, p. 268; Mangold-Bleek, Einleitung, 265; Watkins, Bamp. Lectures, p. 365).

(7) The Oriental Gnostics, Ophites, Naassenes, Peratæ (Bunsen's Hippolytus and his Age, see Introd. to St. John, xli. 11, by Reynolds), made, according to Hippolytus, abundant use of the Fourth Gospel. We cannot depend on his citations as representing the verbal use of the Gospel made by any specific section or leader of these extreme dualists. So great was their antagonism to the OT that they took the very name of the serpent, naḥash (Heb.) or ophis (Greek), as their ideal of intelligence and emancipation. What recent investigation has shown is, not that we must carry down the Pastoral Epistles or Colossians or the Fourth Gospel till after the days of Marcion for proof of the prevalence of these dualistic ideas, but that ideas of the kind were prevalent as early as the activity of St. Paul, who combated them at Corinth and Ephesus, and that the author of the Apoc. encountered them at Thyatira and elsewhere in Asia. Godet has treated the 'Christ party' in the Corinthian Church as those who sharply separated between 'Jesus' and 'the Christ'—who could accept the heavenly Christ, but repudiate the genuine incarnation, crucifixion, or resurrection; who could even anathematize Jesus, and claim special knowledge of, and union with, the Christ. The existence of such a party reveals the presence of these Gnostic tendencies in the middle of the 1st century. Consequently, we have no occasion to wait till the middle or end of the century to find the occasion for the protest against dualism discoverable in the Fourth Gospel.

There is one exception to the uniform result of these researches into the religious ideas of the century. A shadowy sect or people, called by Epiphanius Ἄλογοι [i.e. persons destitute of sound sense], Hær. II. i. 57, had manifested some antagonism to the Logos-Gospel. Epiph. is amused with the pun which he has perpetrated to their discredit, and hopes that it will stick to them. The objections which they raised were not of a philosophical or religious character, but had to do with chronological difficulties which the number of passovers suggests, the close association in which the highest dignity of Christ is placed with His presence at a wedding feast, and, further, the absurd statement that the Gospel had been produced, not by the disciple whom Jesus loved, but by Cerinthus. Tradition certainly has made John and Cerinthus contemporary, and this tradition is confirmed by the supposition of these 'stupid' people, that the Gospel had been written by Cerinthus. The views of Cerinthus leaned towards Ebionitism; the whole teaching of the Fourth Gospel is that the Christ came down from heaven.

It is with amazement we read in Reuss, History of NT, p. 233, 'The unspeakable pains that has been taken to collect external evidence only shows that there is none in the proper sense of the term.' We do not wish to accept evidence that would not be accepted elsewhere, but the proofs of the existence of the Fourth Gospel seem as cogent as those that are advanced for any books of the NT, to say nothing of the most celebrated patristic or classical masterpieces.

Our conclusion is that we discern the first indications of its appearance in the wide diffusion of Johannine ideas in the epistles of Barnabas and Clement, Ignatius and Polycarp, the Epistle to Diognetus, and the Didachê. We have pseudepigraphical literature like the Test. of XII Patriarchs and the Clementines, early heretics and dualists like Basilides and Valentinus quoting from its pages and falsely utilizing its authority. Nay, we actually find some of them commenting at length upon considerable portions of the Gospel. There is not only abundance of such evidence outside the pale of the Church, but the celebrated Christian philosopher, Justin Martyr, in quoting from 'The Memoirs of the Apostles and those that followed them,' has preserved a large number of the apothegms of Jesus; and that these must have been taken from the Gospel becomes almost demonstrated by the romantic discovery, not only of Tatian's Address to the Greeks, but also of the Diatessaron, where the largest part of the Fourth Gospel is interwoven with the other three. Within 20 years of this date we have the clear testimonies of Irenæus, Theophilus of Antioch, Clement of Alexandria, and Tertullian, and then that of Athenagoras, and the Muratorian Canon, frequently cementing the fragmentary relics of the century. Even Keim admits that the evidence is as strong as for any other of the Gospels. Not one of these reminiscences or citations was placed where it has been found for the sake of the modern apologist. It is simply marvellous that the elements of the testimony should thus have been drawn together from such a number of sources within the compass of a century.

III. CANONICITY OF THE FOURTH GOSPEL.—There is sufficient evidence that this Gospel is among the least disputed components of the earliest collection of documents. The Apoc., 2 P, 2 and 3 Jn, are missing from the Peshitta. In the Old Lat. belonging to the 2nd cent., He, 2 P, and Ja are wanting. The Mur. Canon does not contain a reference to Hebrews, unless it be identified with the Letter to the Alexandrians; and the reference to 2 and 3 Jn is dubious. The document is incomplete or mutilated, and does not contain explicit mention of the Gospels of Mt or Mk. Yet all these early indications of a list of NT books contain the Gospel of John. The same may be said of Origen's list (184–253). And Eusebius' Canon, which placed among the antilegomena Ja, 2 P, Jude, 2 and 3 Jn, and reckoned the Apoc. spurious (νόθην), contained the Fourth Gospel. The earliest codices of the 4th cent. (B, ℵ), the Canon of Athanasius and all those of the ecclesiastical councils, also include it. These facts establish widespread and ancient conviction as to the sacred character and authority of this document.

IV. INTERNAL EVIDENCE FOR THE AUTHORSHIP.—The familiar process by which the question of the authorship of the Fourth Gospel is limited and decided must now be briefly recounted in the light of the fresh treatment it has received at the hands of Wendt, Ewald, Weizsäcker, Beyschlag, Cross, Delff, and Sanday.

a. The author, whoever he may have been, was essentially a Jew.—From beginning to end he is saturated with Heb. and OT ideas, though they are illumined from within by the new and heavenly light which broke upon him through direct contact with Jesus.

i. The inner sources and main tendencies of the author's thought are to be found in the OT; and his quotations from it in independent freedom, even from the current Gr. VSS, are hardly now in dispute. The whole argument of the Prologue is a prophetic foreshortening of the history of 'His own,' and their age-long refusal to admit to the full the highest revelation of the Eternal. Note also the reference to the hope of the Prophet who should make all things clear, and to the Elijah of the new dispensation (1^{21} 4^{25}), our Lord's zeal for the sanctity of the temple (2^{13-20}), his familiarity with OT history (3^{14}), the ascription to Jesus by John the Baptist of the function of the Bridegroom of the true Israel, an idea which frequently appears in ancient oracles (Jer 2^{2}, Ezk 16^{8}, Hos $2^{19.\ 20}$). The writer's references to the feasts of the Jews, the passovers (chs. 2, 6, 12, 18), the unnamed feast (ch. 5) which may or may not be a passover, the feast of tabernacles (ch. 7), the feast of dedication (ch. 10), show the region of his religious ideas. He alludes to the special ceremonial of the feast of tabernacles in the pouring of water and illumination of the temple. The same conclusion may be drawn from his numerous references to Moses (1^{17} 5^{45} 7^{22}) and Abraham (ch. 8); from the great authority attributed to the law, and even from the verbal criticism of the Psalms (ch. 10); from the declaration that 'the Scriptures cannot be broken'; and especially from the fourteen passages quoted from OT. Five of these are attributed to our Lord, seven are made by the Evangelist, two by other speakers (see Turpie, Old Test. in the New; Westcott, Introduction in Speaker's Comm. p. xiii; Sanday, Expositor, March 1892, p. 178 ff.). Four of these agree with the accurate tr. in the LXX. Some, however, are in closer agreement with the Heb. against the LXX. Thus Jn 19^{37} 'They shall look on him whom they pierced' (=Zec 12^{10}) instead of 'insulted.' This tr. is found also in Rev 1^{7}, and is a curious link of linguistic correspondence between the Gospel and Apoc. It is found also in Justin, and in the versions of Theod., Symm., and Aquila. This does not necessarily imply that the author was utilizing his personal knowledge of Heb., but that more accurate translations of Zec than that of LXX existed. Cf. with this Jn 6^{45} (=Is 54^{13}); and especially 13^{18} (=Ps 41^{9}) 'He that eateth bread with me has lifted up his heel against me.' Here the Gospel stands alone, the four other extant Gr. VSS differing from each other. The passage 12^{40}, quoted accurately from LXX, where this version fairly represents Heb. in Mt and Ac, is different from both authorities in our Gospel. There is no case where this Gospel agrees with LXX against the Hebrew. These peculiarities indicate knowledge of the original Scriptures. Besides these phenomena of translation, let it be observed that the author is acquainted with a majority of the OT books, the historical books, Psalms, Proverbs, and both parts of Isaiah. He is familiar with the history of Abraham, Jacob, Moses, and David, with the brazen serpent, with circumcision, with the manna in the wilderness, and with OT similitude and doctrine.

ii. A point upon which the opponents of the Johannine authorship have laid much emphasis is the writer's use of the term 'the Jews,' as of a hostile party from whom he was separated, e.g. 'the purifying of the Jews' (2^{6}), 'the passover of the Jews' (2^{13}), 'a feast of the Jews' (5^{1} 6^{4}), 'the manner of the Jews is to bury' (19^{40}). But the writer is here conveying no reproach, but explaining to Gentiles events of his early life. Doubtless 'the Jews' are discriminated from the ὄχλος of Galilæans as hostile to Jesus, but the writer calls special attention to Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, to Joseph, and to those of οἱ ἴδιοι who received Him, as well as to the πολλοί who 'believed on Him.' He says that Jesus made more disciples in Judæa than John (4^{1}), and in a most emphatic way that Jesus recognized that σωτηρία is from the Jews. Cf. the difficult passage (4^{43-45}), where Jesus is said to regard the land of Judæa as 'his own country.' Even ch. 5, which discloses the enmity of 'the Jews' to our Lord's interpretation of the Sabbath (cf. ch. 9), is penetrated throughout with the Jewish ideas of the Sabbath, of the Scriptures, and of Moses. The dramatic episodes of chs. 7–10 reveal great antagonism on the part of the mob in Jerus. and the Jewish authorities to the teaching and mandate of Jesus, but the conversations display the author's intimate knowledge of Jewish law, alike of the Sabbath and of circumcision (7^{23}), and the Jewish idea of the διασπορά. And these three or four chapters are replete with assurances that 'many believed on him,' while 8^{31} speaks of 'the Jews that had believed him.'

Again, when Jesus speaks of 'their law' and 'your law,' which Pharisees and Sadducees had misinterpreted, it is as one who is bringing to their memory what they and not He had forgotten.

Moreover, not infrequently, by the term 'the Jews' the writer evidently means to denote technically the ruling powers in State and Church, the Sanhedrin in its pride, in opposition to the pilgrims from Galilee or from the 'Dispersion.'

One passage from the 'Jewish' Gospel of Mt (28^{15}) shows an analogous use of the οἱ Ἰουδαῖοι. See also Lk 23^{51}. St. Paul's use of the term is well known, and must have familiarized men in Ephesus, Corinth, and Thessalonica with it, without suggesting for a moment that he was not a 'Hebrew of Hebrews.'

iii. The author is by many opponents of the genuineness of the Gospel allowed to be of Jewish origin and sympathy, but not a Palestinian Jew. He is supposed to have belonged to Alexandria or Ephesus, otherwise, they contend, he would never have made so many errors of a topographical or historic kind. The most serious charge is his reference to Bethany beyond Jordan (1^{28} RV). But it is clear that the author was not confounding this Bethany with that near Jerusalem. And if there were two Bethsaidas, two Canas, two Antiochs, and two Cæsareas, why not two Bethanys? Origen, it is true, had not recognized the site, and probably suggested the Bethabara of AV which is found with variants in some MSS. Caspari has located it N. of the Sea of Galilee; Conder, nearly S.E. of the Sea, far above the traditional site and much nearer to Cana of Galilee. Then the reference to the Pool of Siloam (Jn 9^{7}) has been triumphantly confirmed by recent discovery. The mention of 'Ænon near Salim,' of Ephraim in the wilderness, and of 'Sychar' near Shechem, has been remarkably confirmed by recent research. In association with this may be classed the picturesque reference to the brook Kidron (18^{1}); the 'gabbatha' of the Roman governor, with its Aram. name (19^{13}); 'Solomon's porch' (10^{23}); 'the treasury in the temple' (8^{20}); the scenery and various nomenclature of the Sea of Galilee; and possibly the decoration of the temple courts by the golden vine (15^{1-7}).

These indications of personal knowledge have been disputed as evidence of the author's Pal. origin, because the writer might have visited Palestine and picked up, like the author of the 'Apocr. Gospel of Matthew,' a multitude of small details. So esp. Cross (Westminster Rev., Aug. 1890, p. 177). It is enough to refer to Sanday's complete reply in Expos., March 1892, p. 163.

Frequent use is made of the supposed ignorance of the writer touching the appointment of the Jewish high priest, illustrated by the statement that Caiaphas held the office 'in that year,' as though the sacerdotium had been an annual appointment. But the evangelist speaks of Annas being high priest in the very 'same year' in which Caiaphas delivered the unconscious prophecy of the effect of the death of Jesus (11^{49}). Moreover, St. Luke, both in the Gospel (3^{2}) and in the Acts (4^{6}), speaks of Annas and Caiaphas as 'high priests.' Annas had been deposed by the Roman procurator in favour of his son-in-law Caiaphas. His influence was great, though not officially recognized by Pilate; and therefore the evangelist, who was known to the family of the high priest, in giving the account of the preliminary examination by Annas, says that Jesus was sent bound by Annas to Caiaphas the high priest, from whom alone Pilate would have accepted the official charge of the Sanhedrin. The phrase 'that same year' reflects the absorbing interest of that year in which the highest court in the nation rejected and delivered over to the Gentiles the Incarnate Son of God. (See Pulp. Com. Introd. p. xl, and notes on 11^{49} $18^{13. 19. 23. 24}$).

Efforts have been made to relegate some of the most characteristic teaching of the Fourth Gospel and First Ep. of the same writer to the dominant influence of Philo Judæus of Alexandria. Lücke, Bleek, Baur, Keim, Schürer, Alb. Thoma, and many others have laid great emphasis on this filiation of ideas. But Siegfried has found the same influence abundantly evident in St. James, in Ep. to Heb., and in St. Paul. Luthardt, Godet, Pressensé, and others disclaim any relation, direct or indirect, on the part of St. John with the philosophy of Philo or his school. Even Keim and S. Davidson contend for the originality of the Fourth Gospel, pre-eminently in its teaching regarding the incarnation of the Son of God and its doctrine of the Messiah. The phraseology current in the Alex. school consists of important terms also used in the Johannine writings, i.e. not only Logos, but Light, Life, Truth, the Paraclete, the Archon, the Pleroma, the μονογενής and πρωτότοκος, 'only-begotten' and 'first-born.' These terms are used to denote the relation and mediation of the Divine Essence to the κόσμος, and part at least of the process by which all things have come into being. Philo endeavoured to utilize the speculation and phrases of both Plato and the Stoics in order to expound the teaching of the Pentateuch, but the amalgam was uncertain and really valueless. No one finally accepted these high-flown allegories of 'law,' or of 'narrative,' any more than they did the Stoic interpretation of the Homeric poems. It is, however, true that the place which, about the same time, St. Paul had in Co, Gal, and Col assigned to 'Christ' and 'the Son' and the 'Rock in the wilderness,' Philo had assigned to the 'Logos.' So, too, 'the heavenly bread' is explained by Philo as the manifestation of the Logos; and other terms in He 1^{1-3}, and the 'Wisdom' of the Psalms, and in the Sapiential Books, are by Philo similarly correlated with the Logos. There are, however, strong reasons for disputing either a verbal or a philosophical dependence of the author of the Fourth Gospel on the Alex. theosophy.

(a) The twofold meaning of the term 'Logos.' In Greek this represents not only, as in Philo, the Reason and Self-consciousness, the rationality of a thing or person, but also 'the word,' the expression, the process by which a revelation can be made or ratiocination carried into effect. The same ambiguous word is used for the Reason and the Word of both God and man. There are those who say that they are but the reverse and obverse sides of the same reality. At any rate, the same term is used by Philo for the archetypal reason and by 'John' for the creative energy, the divine personal nature, the source of life and light in man, which is at length incarnated in humanity, the glory of God revealed, full of grace and truth, the only-begotten and beloved of the Father, able to declare Him.*

(b) The Philonic Logos is in no sense personal. The Logos is often identified with the 'world,' as 'intelligible,' the 'image' of God in the universe; 'by His Logos, God is both governor and good.' True, Philo spoke of the Logos who, in place of the Angel of the Lord, brought back Hagar to Sarah (de Cher. p. 108), but by Hagar he meant not the woman Hagar, typical or historic, but 'human arts and science, brought back to the true virtue.' Numerous illustrations of the same method constantly recur. There is no personality in the Logos of Philo, such as we find adumbrated in the Books of Job or Wis, and, in another form, in 'the Son' of the Fourth Gospel, the 'Christ' of St. Paul, and the ἀπαύγασμα of God in He 1^{3}.

(c) The doctrine of Messiah was ignored by Philo, and that of the incarnation of the Logos was abhorrent to the whole Neo-Platonic school.

* Schürer (HJP II. iii. 340–368) has more fully given to Philo's Logos the quality of word.

(d) To the phraseology of Philo some curious analogies are found in the Fourth Gospel, but by Siegfried (l.c.) many similar ones have been found in all the books of NT. Even the Ep. of Ja, the Targums, and the Synop. Gospels (Pulp. Com. Introd. p. xlix) are supposed to reflect Philo's influence. But this phraseology is kindled into entirely new meaning by the Word made flesh,—cf. 'love,' 'faith,' 'righteousness,' 'life eternal,'—and the use of it does not in the least degree establish a non-Pal. origin for the author of the Fourth Gospel. Thoma's eloquent enumeration of the titles and glories of Philo's Logos vanishes as an anticipation of the Fourth Gospel when it is found that these are only tropical phrases for the discipline through which souls are passing to the rest of a true philosophy.

(e) The true origin of the ideas and phraseology of the Fourth Gospel is to be sought in the OT. St. Paul and St. John found their material in the books which they had studied from their youth, and in the traditional interpretations of the Pal. schools. The spoken word is throughout Gn 1 the creative agency, the mediator between the Eternal and the 'cosmos.' In Ps 33^{6} and 147^{15} 'the word of J"' is approximately personified for the same purpose. The personifications, moreover, of the direct activity of J" under the form of Memra or Debra of the Lord in the Targums, though they cannot attest a literary usage answering to the Prologue of 'John,' indirectly reveal a mental tone in the Aram. schools, out of which the Johannine representation sprang. The same remark may be made touching 'the Angel of J",' distinct from the created angels, who makes His appearance throughout the OT, and suggests awful and sublime depths in the bosom of the Divine Essence. The phrase is used as Logos is used, interchangeably with Deity and invested with all J"'s glory. Kurtz in his Old Covenant has criticised this, his earlier view (appx. of Eng. tr.); but see Westcott (Introd.), Liddon (Divinity of our Lord). Cf. also art. ANGEL, vol. i. p. 94.

Philo used to refer the manifestations of the Angel of J" to the operations of the Logos and to specialized functions of the human mind; the apostles found in this mysterious phraseology an age-long witness to the possibility of an incarnation.

Perhaps nothing more than a personification of wisdom can be found in Pr, Job, or the Sapiential Books, but this method of presentation reappears in the Epistles of Paul to the Corinthians and in those to the Colossians and Ephesians.* See also He $1^{1.2}$, from which it is clear that ideas of the Son, robed in phraseology of the Sapiential Books descriptive of wisdom, are independent of the treatment of the Alex. philosophy, and also of the author of the Fourth Gospel. With this may be compared the almost extreme Johannine phrases of Mt 11 and Lk 10. Where could these writers have obtained these notions except from the widely diffused traditions and holy memories of the apostles themselves? Thoma has done service in demonstrating the remarkable resemblance between the root-ideas of St. Paul and the Fourth Gospel. Beyschlag, in his Theology of NT, vol. i., has endeavoured with success to show the identical basis of the Synoptic and Johannine ideas of the relation between the Father and Son, the Father and Christ. Yet it is very noteworthy that 'John' uses a term from Gr. philosophy to which he attached a profoundly different sense from Philo, and to which the other sacred writers have not attained. It is almost a demonstration that he was a Palestinian, not an Alexandrian Jew.

β. The writer claims to have been an eye-witness and ear-witness of that which he describes. Numberless unconscious touches, without any theological bias in them, reveal the indelible impression left upon the writer of what he had seen and heard. E.g. observe the numerous indications of 'day' and 'hour' when that which he recorded took place ($1^{29.35.39.43}$ 2^{1} 3^{2} $4^{43.52}$ $6^{16.22}$ $12^{1.12}$ $13^{1.30}$ 18^{28} 20^{1}, and many others).

In 1^{14} and in 1 Jn 1^{1} he puts himself in the position of those disciples who beheld His glory, and in 19^{35} he lays the strongest emphasis on the testimony he was personally able to bear to a great sign which accompanied the piercing of the side of the dead Christ. The fact that the author speaks of himself in the third person under the term ἐκεῖνος is in keeping with other tacit references to himself elsewhere, and with a similar usage of ἐκεῖνος, referring to the subject of the sentence, in 9^{37}. The writer indicates throughout intimate acquaintance with the secret fears, thoughts, murmurs, and questionings of the innermost circle of the disciples. He knows what they thought at the time, and how they subsequently modified their views (1. $2^{11.21.22}$ 12^{16}); he records the conversations with Nathanael, Andrew, Philip (chs. 1–6); the questions of Peter, Thomas, Judas Alphæi, Philip, in the valedictory discourse, together with remarks of his own; he gives indications of the blank ignorance of the disciples themselves with reference to the great utterances of their Lord (4^{33} $6^{70.71}$ $11^{7.8.16}$ 16^{17}); the innermost mind of Peter at the feet-washing ($13^{6-11.22}$); the ignorance on the part of all of the deep significance of Scripture (20^{9}); and the conversations with Thomas (20^{24-29}).

He is, moreover, acquainted with the very thoughts and motives of Jesus Himself ($2^{24.25}$ 4^{1} 5^{6} $7^{1.6}$ $13^{1ff.}$); he gives a whole group of condensed perceptions of the blended divinity and humanity of our Lord which were flashed upon his consciousness by the Saviour's work and conduct (cf. 18^{4}–19^{28}). He certainly suggests himself as the unnamed disciple of the Baptist and of our Lord (ch. 1); and we feel that he must have been an auditor of the conversations with Nicodemus and the Samaritan woman, and with the nobleman in chs. 3. 4. Caspari's interesting suggestion that he had a house in Jerus., connected with the fish trade between that city and the lake, would explain his presence in Jerus. (ch. 5), and his intimate knowledge of what occurred (ch. 6) in 6^{17}. There is an unconscious revelation of his presence in the words, 'Now Jesus was not yet come to them.' We do not see any animosity to Peter's prominence. He is one of the two whom Jesus loved (20^{2}). We owe to his constant clinging to Jesus the details of the trial before Annas, the private converse with Pilate, and the words from the Cross which intrusted the Mother to his care ($19^{25.26}$).

The closing scenes of ch. 21, with the appendix by the survivors, leaves it without doubt that the writer was one of the disciples whom Jesus loved, but not Simon Peter. Those present at the Sea of Galilee ($21^{1.2}$) are Peter, distinguished from the unnamed disciple (v.^{20}); Thomas and Nathanael, who are elsewhere mentioned by name; the two sons of Zebedee; and two other of His disciples. Now, James the brother of John was early slain (Ac $12^{1.2}$). It follows that the 'beloved disciple' who, in the Epilogue, is accredited with the authorship, must either have been John the son of Zebedee, or one of the two unnamed disciples. Andrew and Philip are conceivably hinted at, but, seeing they are elsewhere mentioned by name, it is not probable; and since the two are mentioned last, it is more in accordance with the usage of the writer to understand that they did not belong to the number of the eleven apostles.

* See Watkins in Smith's *DB*² p. 1755, who also shows the link between OT and Fourth Gospel in many other particulars of 1 P.

The opinion that John, who is frequently referred to in the Synoptic Gospels and in the Acts (Ac 3^{1} 4^{13} 8^{14}–15; cf. Gal 2^{9}) in conjunction with Peter or with his brother (in Synop.) as at the very centre of the apostolic group, is not the disciple who produced this wonderful narrative, brings an anomalous circumstance to view: that the author, whoever he was, never once mentions the name of John. If he was some philosophic mystic of the 2nd cent., he must have deliberately invented the innumerable touches of the eye-witness, which he introduced with such apparent artlessness, with the view of suggesting that he was no other than 'the beloved disciple.' This supposition is so harsh that it cannot be accepted without more cogent reasons than those which have hitherto been advanced. Delff (Grundzüge d. Entwick.-Gesch. d. Relig. 1883, p. 266) has argued that the beloved disciple was a friend of Joseph and Nicodemus and the high priest, resident in Jerus., familiar with the Jerus. life of Christ, and from his education, higher than that of the Twelve, better able to appreciate and work into his matchless narrative the deeper teaching of Jesus. In that case some incongruities that have afflicted critics would be dissolved, but many fresh difficulties would be created, e.g. the utter disappearance of this remarkable personage from evangelic tradition; his acquaintance with Peter, Andrew, Philip and Thomas, Judas Alphæi and Judas Iscariot, Nathanael, Martha, Lazarus, and the Marys, to whom he has referred, together with his utter silence about 'John,' who took so high a place in the early development of the Church in the NT and early tradition. It is incumbent upon the student to weigh the indications which other literature supplies of the character and personality of John the son of Zebedee, and to see whether they are incompatible with the revelation which the writer has unconsciously offered of himself in the composition of the Fourth Gospel.

It must, however, be acknowledged that the self-revelation is studiously repressed. He never distinctly utters his own name, or that of his parents, or of his brother. He allows others to speak for him, and he hides himself behind the shadow of his Lord, and loses himself in the light of his Master's love. We can gather here and there what he thought of 'the Jews,' of the high priest, of Judas and Pilate. We can gather the interpretation he put upon certain perplexing sayings of the Lord, so different from their own lofty tone and fathomless depths, which he was nevertheless able to remember and record. But for the most part he conceals his own individuality.

V. THE CHARACTER AND CAREER OF JOHN AS PRESERVED IN OTHER LITERATURE. — A. The Synoptic Gospels tell us that a man named Zebedee (Mk $1^{19.\ 20}$) with his wife Salome had two sons, James and John, that they lived at Bethsaida, near Capernaum, on the Lake of Galilee, and were partners with Simon and Andrew the sons of Jonah (or of John, see RV and crit. notes on 1^{42} and $21^{15.\ 16}$) in a fishing enterprise (Mk 1^{29}, Lk 5^{10}). They had fishing-tackle, boats, hired servants, and a house. We gather from comparing Mt 27^{56} and Mk 15^{40} that Salome was the name of the mother of Zebedee's children. The Fourth Gospel makes it more than possible that she was sister of the mother of Jesus, and, if this inference is correct, she and her sons were nearly related to Jesus. Zebedee accepted, without recorded murmur, the departure of his sons and of his partners Simon and Andrew at the summons of Jesus to them. The father thenceforth disappears from view. Salome's devotion and ministry of her substance to the wants of Jesus and His disciples, suggest the religious enthusiasm and Messianic patriotism with which the family had been brought up, and it is probable that, through friendship and kinship with the holy society of Nazareth, her expectations had been raised to fever-point. Whether John was called into close companionship with Jesus only once for all, or on two or three separate occasions, belongs to the exegesis and harmony of the Gospels. Matthew (20^{20}) tells us that Salome presented a request of great compass and audacity, that her two sons might sit on the Saviour's right and left hand when He should come in His kingdom. It is most likely that she cherished ideas of a temporal and visible sovereignty, and that John at this period had not been weaned from these materialistic hopes. We gather, however, that the brothers were taught some lessons about the great tribulation, the baptism of sorrow and blood through which they would have to pass to such high fellowship with the Head of the kingdom.

For years before this, John had been in the innermost circle of Christ's disciples (Mt 10^{2}, Lk 6^{14}, Mk 3^{17}, Ac 1^{13}). He had been in the death-chamber of the child of Jairus (Mk 5^{37}, Lk 8^{51}). He had been taken into the cloud of transfiguration (Mt 17^{1}, Mk 9^{2}, and Lk 9^{28}), though Peter was the spokesman of the feelings of the three. The two brothers James and John, with Simon and Andrew, had been permitted to hear the discourse upon the last things, which had opened John's prophetic eye to the great world-wide events with which his Master's kingdom was associated. John was sent with Peter to prepare the passover. With Peter and James, he was a witness of the agony in the garden. There is not a word or a hint in all this incompatible with the spirit of the author of the Fourth Gospel.

We do not know why James and John were called by Jesus 'Boanerges.' There must have been something special in the courage and bearing or in the character of James which signalled him out to Herod Agrippa as a victim that would 'please the Jews' (Ac $12^{2\text{ff.}}$). It is probable that, being the elder of the two brothers, he was the more prominent petitioner for the coveted dignity of nearness to the King of Sorrows when approaching the goal of His self-sacrifice. A significant record occurs in Mk $9^{38\text{ff.}}$ and Lk $9^{49\text{ff.}}$, where John himself exclaims, 'Master, we saw one casting out demons in thy name, and we forbade him, because he followeth not (thee) with us.' The question seems to invite the rebuke he received, 'Forbid him not, etc. . . .' This was an event which revealed a jealous love for the Master, and it is paralleled by the spirit which flames forth in the treatment of those enemies of the cross with whom the author of the second and third Epistles contended. But the most striking instance of this spirit is recorded in Lk $9^{54.\ 55}$, where John as well as James burned with indignation against certain Samaritans who refused to receive Jesus. 'Master, said they, willest thou that we call fire from heaven to consume them, even as Elias did?' Here again the two brothers are rebuked. The apostle of love is traditionally accredited with a similar outburst of indignant wrath in his treatment of Cerinthus. The current mediæval representation of the author of the Fourth Gospel was that of one characterized by effeminate softness. This popular conception is not justified by the letter of the Gospel, but is due to tradition and legend. In no part of NT do we find such thrilling utterance of the wrath of God against sin as in Jn. (See $3^{18.\ 19.\ 36}$ 5^{29}). It is in Jn 6^{70} that Judas is called 'a devil'; cf. also 7^{34} $8^{23.\ 24.\ 44}$ 9^{39}. Even in the upper chamber, we hear terrible tones of the Judge of all the earth, and the traitor is called 'the son of perdition' (15^{25} 16^{1-3} 17^{12}), while the Evangelist himself (12^{37-43}) denounces the sin of the people in language which echoes Lk 9^{54}. There was much more for John to learn, and the occasional outbreaks of stormy wrath are of the very nature of a finite human love cherished with intensity of emotion for that wonderful Person whose grandeur of being, as well as whose human loveliness, was breaking upon his mind. There are no other special references to John in the Synoptic narrative, and, as a revelation of the personal character of the author, those mentioned are explained rather than contradicted by the tone of the Fourth Gospel.

B. The Acts of the Apostles hides John in the company of the Twelve, and behind the more prominent figure of Peter. Still, the promises given by the ascending Lord (ch. 1), and the preaching of Peter (chs. 2. 3. and 4), reveal the tone and matter of the closing discourse of our Lord, of which John's mind was the repertory. Compare Jn 5^{20} 7^{39} 17^{5} 16^{7} with the substance of Peter's great sermon at Pentecost, and the defence made by Peter and John (Ac 3. 4) with the vindication in the Fourth Gospel of the Messiahship of Jesus. (See esp. Jn 20^{31}). As in the Fourth Gospel, John is a silent presence in the early Church (see Ac 8), but the mission of the two apostles to Samaria prepares us for the mighty words which 'John' was at length to reveal to the world.

C. St. Paul's Epistle to the Galatians makes a reference to James, Cephas, and John as 'pillars' of the Mother Church, to whom St. Paul was willing to refer his Gentile ministry, based on Christ's own teaching concerning the place of ceremonial in the kingdom of God. This is the only reference in the writings of St. Paul to the personality of John, and so far there is not the smallest reason for questioning, on St. Paul's authority, the widely attested conviction that the beloved disciple was the author of the Fourth Gospel.

D. The First Epistle of John. The Mur. Canon makes distinct reference to 1 Jn as an appendix to the Gospel. It specifies two Epistles by the same evangelist later on. Eusebius (HE iii. 39) tells us that Papias 'used passages from the first Epistle'; and we have an unmistakable citation of 1 Jn 4^{1} in Polycarp's Epistle to Phil. ch. viii. The extreme significance of this quotation led the author of Supernatural Religion, vol. ii., to contend that 'John' quoted from Polycarp, rather than vice versâ. Tertullian frequently refers to, or quotes from, the Epistle. Clemens Alex., Origen, and Cyprian cite it as St. John's writing. Many who opposed the authenticity of the Gospel, like Bretschneider in his Probabilia, with Paulus and others, do not attempt to separate the authorship of the Gospel and Epistle; but Hilgenfeld and Davidson have advanced many reasons for believing that they belong to different writers and periods. Davidson (Introd. to NT) assigns some ten distinct points of difference, which hardly need more than statement for their refutation. Holtzmann (Einleitung, p. 463) admits identity of authorship. Haupt and Lias have shown how the original form of the teaching is referred by the apostle to the words of Jesus Himself, while in the Epistle we see the method adopted by the evangelist to apply it to the condition of the Church at the close of the century. Doubtless there are differences in style, weight, compass, between the utterances of the Lord and the application of these ideas to later days, but all the fundamental conceptions of the divine character and righteousness, of 'the word of life,' of the contrariety between 'the flesh' and 'the spirit,' between 'light' and 'darkness,' the emphasis upon the divine love, upon the Holy Spirit and the eternal life, appear in a practical form in the Epistle as well as in the Gospel. There is no necessity to invoke the shadowy form of the Presbyter John to explain the differences between the two documents. They must stand or fall together. Testimony to one becomes a witness for the coexistence of the other. They combine to give us the best insight into the mind of the author of both. What is worthy of particular attention is the conviction that we have here not only the apostle of love, but one whose wrath flamed against untruthfulness, unbelief, and the spirit of the world. Let special notice be taken of 1^{10} $2^{9-11.\,16.\,22}$ $3^{6.\,8.\,12.\,15}$ 4^{3} $5^{10.\,16}$. While there is every reason for recognizing, throughout, the disciple whom Jesus loved and the author of the Fourth Gospel, there is a striking correspondence with the disciple who was ready to call fire from heaven upon those who rejected the Lord and His truth. The first Epistle is a link between the Synoptic John and the personality of whom we are in search.

E. The Second and Third Epistles of John, so far as they bear on the character of the author of the Fourth Gospel. The authenticity and canonicity of the smaller Epistles have had to sustain a heavy fire of criticism. Even Eusebius hesitated to acknowledge them as St. John's own, but Clemens Alexandrinus, Irenæus, and Dionysius have little doubt about them. The small circulation of these private letters is enough to account for their non-inclusion in the Peshitta, though Ephraem Syrus quotes them. The Mur. Canon leaves it doubtful whether the compiler knew of more than two Epistles in all; Theodoret does not mention them. Theodore of Mopsuestia rejected them. Jerome, building on the view taken by Eusebius of the supposed reference to the Presbyter John by Papias, is disposed to attribute them to that shadowy personage; but he does not finally come to that conclusion, as he enumerates seven Catholic Epistles. In modern times the circumstance that the author calls himself 'the elder' has been pressed against their apostolic authority; but it should be remembered that St. Peter (1 P 5^{1}) calls himself συμπρεσβύτερος, and that Papias calls the apostles, including St. John, 'elders.' Irenæus gives the same title to Polycarp; and when writing to Soter, Bishop of Rome, gives no higher title to his predecessors in that see, though these are supposed to have included both St. Peter and St. Paul. These considerations show that the title is one which St. John might, consistently with much other usage, have used for himself. And that Diotrephes used malicious words about John the apostle is no reason for thinking that the author was other than the apostle, when we bear in mind the parallel experience of the greatest of the apostles. These Epistles teach the same fundamental truths, and are characterized by the same omissions as the first Epistle and the Gospel, in neither of which is there distinct reference to the Church or the Christian sacraments. The prime words are used in all three Epistles, such as ἀλήθεια, ἀγάπη, ἀντίχριστος, περιπατεῖν, etc. There is the same limpid style, aphoristic utterance, and extraordinarily simple way of saying deep, loving, and terrible things. Our conclusion is that these two Epistles do much to link together the authorship of the Gospel with their own, as well as demonstrably prove that any specially prophetic and 'thunderous' symptoms of character discovered in the Synoptic Gospels were not absent from the man who wrote with intense affection, breaking into flames of wrath, the Fourth Gospel. [On this subject see detailed treatment in Pulp. Com. Introduction; Ebrard's Comm. on the Epistles of John; Huther, Haupt, Westcott, Lücke, Alexander, and others; as well as the art. JOHN, EPISTLES OF, in this Dictionary].

F. A general comparison between the authors of the Apocalypse and of the Fourth Gospel.—The criticism of the Apoc. begun by Vischer, with Harnack's co-operation, and the theory of a Jewish document which is said to lie at the heart of it, and to be touched up by Christian vision and interlineated with Christian doctrine, have not reached a final stage. The theory might account for some of the most difficult phenomena without taking the authorship out of the hands of the Apostle John. But this is not the place to discuss either the authorship or the date of the Apocalypse. External evidence for the later date and the apostolic origin of the book is stronger than that for any other book in NT. The chief argument on which a much earlier date is assigned turns on purely internal considerations, such as, e.g., the suggestion that Jerus. is still standing when the Apoc. is written, that the succession of Roman emperors fixes the moment of its grand dénouement, that 'the number of the Beast' is a cryptogram of Nero Cæsar, whose anticipated reappearance after his supposed assassination was confidently feared by the world and the Church. These are controversial matters capable of decision only by careful exegesis, and much balancing of opposing theories. Davidson, Renan, and Farrar have argued in favour of this earlier date; while Lücke, Hengstenberg, and many others have taken the opposite side. It is admitted by all that the longer the interval between the composition of the Apoc. and the Gospel, the easier it becomes to argue that the fiery enthusiasm and prophetic blasts, and the imaginative intensity, more Hebrew than Greek, of the young apostle, may have subsided by long meditation and reflection on the vitalizing words of the Master in the days of His flesh; that the atmosphere of Ephesus and the wide diffusion of Hel. and Alex. culture may then have had time to purge his style and refine his tone, and direct him to a new standpoint of thought and feeling. Many scholars, from Dionysius of Alexandria, who elaborated the contrasts between the Apoc. and the Gospel almost as completely as has been done by modern critics, down to the early followers of Baur, such as Zeller and Hilgenfeld, have come to the conclusion that no ingenuity can ever show the two books to have originated from the same mind, whatever interval or change of scene may be intercalated between them. Some then, with F. C. Baur, by establishing the apostolic authorship of the Apoc., have believed that they demolished the authenticity of the Gospel; while others, by relinquishing the Apoc. and handing it over to some Judaic zealot, have believed that they left the course open to a full acceptance of the Johannine authorship of the Fourth Gospel. But however great the contrasts of an earlier and later style,—as witness, comparatively, in our own day, those of Burke and Carlyle,—a much greater conflict and dissimilarity may be observed when a man of commanding powers distinctly sets himself to approach a different subject, or to look and write from a new standpoint. Many writers, like Swift, Cowper, Wordsworth, and Tennyson, were throughout their career able to adopt, whether by dramatic temperament or deliberate tours de force, glaring contrasts of form, dialect, style, tone, manner, which are enough to deceive those who cannot discern the subtle resemblances, and, moreover, have no external evidence of authorship to guide them in their conclusions. The different attitude and atmosphere, the modified diction and general purpose of the two books, are not sufficient (whatever be the theory of date) to divorce them from each other while the internal and external evidences of the authenticity of each remain independently so convincing.

That John, the author of the Apoc., called himself a 'bond-slave of Jesus Christ,' and not an apostle, corresponds with the modesty of the writer of the Gospel, and with the very phrase of St. Paul in four of his Epistles. He classes himself among the 'prophets' of the NT, and does not dissociate himself from the apostles, some of whom were undoubtedly 'prophets,' and, since our Lord built His Church and kingdom (Mt 16^{18}) upon the petra of Peter's confession, it is not surprising that John should have seen the names of the twelve apostles upon the foundations of the new Jerusalem. The author declares that 'he bare witness to the word of God, and to the testimony of Jesus Christ' (Rev 1^2), which ranges him among the innermost circle of Christ's disciples. The 'John' cannot, by any ingenious theory, refer to any other personage of that name mentioned in NT. Further, the references to persecution, exile, Patmos, and an Ephesian residence, correspond with a whole cycle of tradition and citation which cannot be here given. It is true that Keim (Jesus of Nazara, Eng. tr. i. 143, 207) discounts the citations from Irenæus (ii. 22. 5, iii. 23), Clem. Alex., Justin, Apollonius (Eus. HE v. 18), Jerome, Epiphanius, etc., thinking that a blunder of Irenæus is the parent of all the supposed testimony; and Keim has been followed in this by Harnack and several other recent writers. But the arguments are unsatisfactory. On the other hand, the external testimonies to the Apocalypse are in various ways confirmatory of apostolic origin and authority, while a clear mention of it in the Mur. Canon—together with that of Peter—assigns it a sure place in the reverence of the Church early in the 2nd cent.

The arguments of Dionysius of Alexandria are based on fundamental differences between the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel.

(1) Differences of designation, such as that the author of the Apoc. calls himself 'John,' whereas the author of the Gospel withholds his name. This, as Salmon (Introd. to NT, 276) says, can be easily accounted for. The historical books of OT, with the exception of Neh, are all anonymous; the same may be said of the Synoptic Gospels and Ac, while all the prophetic books, with the exception of Daniel (see ch. 7), open with the name of the prophet himself. Now, the Apocalypse is distinctly prophetic, and its style and imagery are borrowed from that source. Dionysius did not reject it as uninspired, or as written by Cerinthus, or as having insufficient external testimony. He said that he could not understand its meaning, though this was not his point of critical doubt; but that its great dissimilarity in language, style, theme, and tone from the Gospel convinced him, that as there might be many 'Johns' in Asia during the 1st cent., one of them may have been the author. He argued, further, that the resemblance between the Gospel and the first Epistle in phrase, leading terms, and decisive teaching increases the feeling of discrepancy between the Gospel and the Apocalypse. On the hearsay that there were two tombs of 'John' at Ephesus, he raises the ghost of the shadowy 'Presbyter,' who has done such notable service in the piecing together of 2nd cent. fragments. The position occupied by Dionysius in the middle of the 3rd century may have been unconsciously adopted by this wise and candid man, owing to the strong objection he entertained for the chiliasm which he found in the Apocalypse. Nevertheless, his hypothesis was comparatively disregarded until the present century, when it was used in a contrary sense by F. C. Baur and his followers, who recognized and emphasized the apostolic authorship of the Apoc., to the entire repudiation of that of the Gospel, which was supposed to have originated under different conditions at the close of the 2nd cent. On the other hand, Lücke, Ewald, Lutzelberger, Düsterdieck, de Wette, and Neander, holding the authenticity of the Gospel as proved, and accepting the burden of the Dionysian argument, have resigned the authorship of the Apoc. to the 'Presbyter,' to 'John the Divine,' to John Mark, or to any other who could bear the weight of the responsibility. Volkmar and Renan pressed the Judaic aspects so strongly as to suppose that it was, among other things, an early manifesto against the Pauline Churches and doctrine, under the pseudonym of Balaam or the Nicolaitans.

(2) The emphasis laid upon the Heb. and Hel. spirit of the two books respectively has been brought into strong relief by Vischer's Die Offenbarung Johannis eine Jüdische Apokalypse in christlicher Bearbeitung: mit einem Nachwort von Adolph Harnack, 1886; see Schoen's Origine de l'Apocalypse, also Bousset's Commentary, and A. Meyer in Theol. Rundschau, Nov. and Dec. 1897. Doubtless the Apocalyptic literature of the Hebrews, as seen in Dn, 2 Es, Enoch, must have been present to the mind of the author; but that he or another re-edited a Jewish Apoc. is more than the precarious criticism which has prevailed of late can be said to have proved. Moreover, the links of connexion and the subtle resemblance between these two most wonderful testimonies to Christ have been too much slighted. The use of rare words and forms characterizing both documents, the practically identical Christology, and a certain resemblance in structure, lead to the conclusion that if John be indeed the author of the Apoc., then the author of the Gospel, notwithstanding its transparent differences, must have been his pupil and follower in the deepest motives and spirit of his utterance. Again, the supposed oppositions of style are certainly balanced by interesting correspondences, the fancied solecisms can be shown to have analogous representations in classical Greek, and certain views of the OT and of the Person of Christ are almost, if not quite, peculiar to these two works. The impression therefore grows upon many, that, notwithstanding the dicta of the Tübingen school, the two books not only may, but must, have issued from the same mind. If this be the final word of the long controversy, the authenticity of the Apoc. becomes one of the strongest arguments for the apostolic origin of the Fourth Gospel.

It is common to say that the Apoc. is strongly Heb. in its grammar, while the Gospel is written in excellent Hel. Greek. The substitution of καί in the Apoc., as representative of the Heb. ו, for the rich variety of Gr. particles, is urged as a conspicuous proof of the position. But we find also in the Gospel that, where the emotions are intense, and when every sentence becomes a heart-throb, as in chs. 15, 17, and in ch. 21 (where the succession of events constitutes the very nerve of the transcendent narrative), the author is equally content with the simple καί, and dispenses with all other particles. It is urged that πάντοτε and πώποτε and καθώς are used in the Gospel, but not in the Apocalypse. Now, the last word is used often in the Synoptics; and though the former words occur in Jn, they are not to be found in Ac, and only very occasionally in NT, so that no conclusion can be drawn from their omission in the Apocalypse. While the Heb. forms 'Amen,' 'Abaddon,' 'Hallelujah,' are found in the Apoc., and the Heb. imagery of the 'manna,' the 'root and offspring of David,' the 'twelve tribes of Israel,' and the 'New Jerus.' are introduced, they certainly are balanced by the long list of Heb. phrases, information, and imagery found in the Gospel (see below). The Gospel makes claim for the 'Word made flesh' that Abraham rejoiced to see the days of the Christ; that Moses wrote of Him; that Jesus Himself was the Heavenly 'Manna' which came down from heaven, that He was the Lamb of God, taking away sin, that He was the Bridegroom of the Church, that He was greater than the temple, able to rebuild it after its wanton destruction. The Lamb (τὸ ἀρνίον, not, however, ὁ ἀμνός) of the Apoc. is in tremendous conflict with the power of the theocracy, then with the world, then with concentrated world-powers, over which He gains the victory, and receives the acclamations of the universe. The Lamb of the Gospel narrative encounters the powers of the world, displays great 'signs' in the temple, on the land and on the sea, on the bodies and minds of men. Through meekness and submission, not through impotence, through the mystery of suffering and cruel death, and the glory of resurrection, He gains a victory over the world, over all its representatives, over the flesh and the devil. He takes His perpetual place with, among, and within His people, their Lord, their King. Doubtless there is a concrete specialism in the imagery of the Apoc. which seems to conflict with the universalism of the Gospel; but it must not be forgotten that the Apocalyptist sees 'a multitude which no man can number, gathered from every people and kindred and tribe,' who circle the throne of God and of the Lamb, and at last the 'leaves of the tree of life are for the healing of the nations.' The Hebraism of both documents is obvious, and it is hardly more conspicuous in the one than in the other. Instead of separating them by contrast, it may be held to establish community of origin.

(3) The grammatical peculiarities of the Apoc. include apparently 'false apposition,' the most remarkable example being 1^4, where ἀπό is followed by ὁ ὤν, καὶ ὁ ἦν, etc. This, however, arises from the writer having regarded the phrase as a tr. of the Eternal, as = J″, and an indeclinable noun. In 30 other places he gives ἀπό its proper regimen. Other instances of unusual apposition may easily be explained without recourse to solecism, such as the ἡ λέγουσα of 2^{20}, cf. 3^{12} 8^9 etc., which are paralleled by similar constructions in Plato (Winer, 671, Eng. tr.), Thucydides, and others. Anomalous varieties of gender and number are best explained by the fervid personifying temperament which gives masculine or feminine features to neuter nouns. The same peculiarities are found in other parts of NT, though they would scarcely be expected in the quiet, limpid prose of the Fourth Gospel. As a set-off against these curiosities, a considerable number of verbal coincidences demand attention. The verb μαρτυρεῖν and the noun μαρτυρία occur very frequently in the Gospel and the Epp. of John, very sparingly in other parts of NT, and in a different sense; but they occur 13 times in the Apocalypse. The word νικᾷν is used in the sense of overcoming evil and the world both in Gospel and Epp., and 17 times in the Apocalypse. Τηρεῖν τὸν λόγον is a phrase peculiar to the Gospel, Epp., and Apoc., and so is τηρεῖν τὰς ἐντολάς. The idea of the tabernacling of God among or with men, σκηνοῦν, is also to be found expressed by the same word in these documents. The following words are virtually peculiar to them: σφραγίζειν in the sense of 'confirm,' Ἐβραϊστί, λαλεῖν μετά τινος, κύριε σὺ οἶδας, περιπατεῖν μετά τινος, which are characteristic of all three writings. What is still more remarkable is that words strangely absent from the Gospel and Epp., like μετάνοια, γέεννα, are not to be found in Apocalypse. The word πίστις, which occurs 340 times in NT, does not occur in the Gospel, and is almost absent from Epp. and Apocalypse. The same Gr. tr. of Zec 12^{10}, different from LXX, is found in the Gospel, 19^{34-37}, and Apoc. 1^{7}. These correspondences might be greatly multiplied. Weiss and Watkins give lists of more than 100 words or phrases common to the three documents. The impression made upon some opponents of the authenticity of the Gospel is that the 2nd cent. writer who is supposed to have written it, studied the vocabulary, etc., of the Apoc., with the intention of producing the impression of Johannine authorship. This hypothesis neutralizes the hypothesis based upon their conspicuous dissimilarity.

(4) The plan, scope, and structure of the two books.—Many insist on the extreme contrast between the two writings in these respects, e.g. the absence in the Gospel of climax, the quiet flow of the stream of narrative and discourse, the movement from Jerus. to Galilee and back to the metropolis, with nearly imperceptible chronology, the lack of imaginative background, the omission of Transfiguration and Ascension, and only the quiet gathering intensity of conviction that the victory over evil must lie for all time with the Man of infinite capacity, boundless sympathy, and measureless affliction—so that at length the most sceptical of the Twelve admits His supreme claims. On the other hand, 'the revelation of Jesus Christ to His servant John' is an impressive series of tableaux, arranged in climacteric form, and with very marked septenary arrangements. After the first visions, come the letters to the Seven Churches, a special aspect and title of the Lord being presented in each. Next we have the vision of the seven seals of the Divine Book; the separate issues of the opening of the six seals; the intermezzo of the four angels and other angel; and then the new septenary group of trumpets introduced by the loosing of the seventh seal. Further, after the twofold revelation of the temple and the beasts, come the seven last plagues following on the pouring out of the seven vials. Then appear the closing contrasts of Babylon and the New Jerus.; the victory of the Logos of God over all His foes, the destruction of the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Evil One for ever and ever; and the renewal of all things in the light of the Lord. This series of magnificent images seems strangely diverse from the meditative, gentle flow of the river of life, of which we catch lucent gleams in the Fourth Gospel.

An examination of the Gospel reveals, however, a deeply pondered plan. One thing readily appears: the septenary arrangement. Seven great signs precede the Passion. These constitute a climax, and a revelation not only of divine realities but of the mind of the writer. The first sign (Jn 2^{11}) shows the mastery of the Word made flesh over the material of nature; the second (4^{54}) His mastery over one of the most cruel troubles of human nature, even when the Lord was not visibly present with the sufferer; the third (5^{8}) shows His power to restore the forces which have been lost by sin; the fourth and fifth ($6^{11.19}$) are great signs of power and pity, both on earth and sea, with mastery over the forces of nature; the sixth ($9^{1ff.}$) is a double proof of His being the 'Light of the World'; the seventh (11^{43}) is a concrete conflict with the most terrible evil of humanity, and a victory over it. In addition to this, a singular parallel to the throbbing suspense or postponement of climax in the Apoc., e.g. at the loosing of the seventh seal, at the sounding of the seventh trumpet, and in the intercalated scenes before the final victory and glory, may be traced also in the structure of the Gospel. Thus the 'hour' of the highest manifestation seems always at hand, but is again and again postponed. Without enumerating details, cf. Jn 2^{4} $4^{21.23}$ $5^{25.28}$ 7^{30} 8^{20} 12^{27}, followed by new and wonderful departures. In the midst of the valedictory discourse, 'Arise, let us go hence,' seems to strike the hour; but even now the moment comes for still higher teaching and the Eternal Prayer. This overlapping and renewal of suspense in striking interlineation are continued throughout the story of the Passion to the confession of Thomas and the hyperbole of the closing verses. Observe, further, the presence in both documents of prologue, rehearsal, conflict, victory, epilogue, which curiously correspond with each other and which almost bind them together. In each alike the prologue is an anticipation of the successive arguments of the visions or oracles, as the case may be. As the letters to the Seven Churches give a compendious forecast of the seals, trumpets, and vials, so Gosp. chs. ii.–iv. or v. give most vivid rehearsals of characteristic specimens of the Lord's method and teaching. The sublime key-word of the Gospel, 'The Word became flesh,' rises over the entire Gospel as 'an awful rose of dawn,' just as the vision of the Divine Christ in Rev 1 dominates every subsequent paragraph in the Apocalypse.

(5) This leads us to a brief treatment of the religious teaching of these two documents. Many modern critics, Strauss, Baur, Harnack, Wendt, Weiss, Ritschl, put into forcible antithesis the earlier and later Johannine teaching. There is no necessity for these distinctions. Gebhardt and others have given all the evidence needed to prove that no two books of Holy Scripture are so coincident in teaching, even to special peculiarities, as the Gospel and Apocalypse. In one, the author is calmly meditating upon the concrete facts, the peerless life, the transcendent teaching, the unique ending on earth of a ministry which was beginning to exert widespread spiritual influence upon individuals, and to produce political and even cosmic effects upon humanity and the world. In the other, the vision of the place which Jesus had taken in the sphere of providential rule flashes upon him. In the one, he is sweetly dreaming over the potent, procreant fact; in the other, fancy and even grotesque imagination forecast the future. The visions of Heb. seers, by their nature, follow one another, but do not grow from less to more—they are architectural rather than spontaneous. Remembering these different conditions, it is nothing short of unique that the ideas of the two documents should have been so similar, if not coincident. The same writer was able to see more deeply than any other into the heart of Jesus, and was also permitted to see more accurately than other apocalyptic writers into the ferments wrought in humanity by the leaven of the kingdom. [Gebhardt's Doct. of the Apoc., Eng. tr. pp. 305, 424; Reynolds' Introd. in Pulpit Comm. pp. lxxx–lxxxv].

These considerations may be held to prove that the twofold Johannine literature, instead of breaking the evidences of unity of authorship, reveals a high probability that the two documents proceeded from the same mind. We have also seen that the strong evidence for the existence of the Gospel towards the very beginning of the 2nd cent., and the traditional attribution of authorship to the son of Zebedee, are not countermanded by the characteristics of John supposed to be given in the Synoptic Gospels, the Acts, the Pauline Epistles, and the three Epistles of John.

Some able critics, like Gebhardt, Renan in some edd. of the Vie de Jésus, and Matthew Arnold, are ready to admit that the external evidence for the Fourth Gospel is as copious as for the Synoptic Gospels and the Pauline Epistles. Keim has even triumphed over Baur's chronology and pressed back the date of the existence of the Gospel to a time when the son of Zebedee may have been still living. But all these hold a view of the writing which deprives it of historic value. They regard it as a Christological romance in the form of a narrative, which was not intended even by the author to be taken as a serious or historical record of what was actually said and done. The intense personality of the author pervades the whole. He has, say they, very sparingly made use of the Synoptic Gospels and the teaching of St. Paul, and freely manipulated traditional material as suited his purpose, and he never intended to convey other than the grand impression produced upon his mind by the forms of the new faith. As Jth, Enoch, 2 Es, the Shepherd, the Platonic Dialogues, the Divina Commedia, Paradise Lost, etc., used semi-narrative forms for the purpose of conveying religious ideas, so our evangelist was one of the most effective writers of didactic fiction.

Others have gone much further than this. They have questioned every mark of early origin, and have thought that they found abundant evidence of later date, e.g. references to the second destruction of Jerus. under Hadrian. Some have found traces of Docetism, later Gnosticism, Neoplatonism in the Gospel, and have contended that it is an attempt to trace to the words of Jesus the two types of Hel. and Heb. Christianity, the writer's deliberate aim being to bring about the healing of a schism which can be traced back to the apostles themselves. The controversy turns on the relation of the Fourth Gospel to the Synoptic narrative, and this we must now examine.

VI. The Relation of the Fourth Gospel to the Synoptic Narrative.—A. A general statement of the contrast between them.—It is now admitted that this contrast has appeared to modern criticism more extreme than to that of previous centuries. 'Atmosphere' or climate are difficult to define, but the most conservative critics are conscious of a vital change when passing from genealogical details to the abysses of eternity, from the homely life and trade of Nazareth and Capernaum to the heated discussions of the temple courts, from the Sermon on the Mount to the valedictory discourse. The dramatis personæ are different. Nicodemus, Lazarus, and Nathanael, the impotent and the blind man, are introduced to us for the first time. Thomas starts into prominence and a position of high argumentative importance. The chronological elements differ. The various visits to the metropolis interfere with the simple flow of the Synoptic narrative. No direct mention is made of the birth in Bethlehem from the virgin mother. The story and testimonies of John the Baptist are taken up where the Synoptists drop them, and yet no direct account is given of his death. The temptation, the transfiguration, the agony in the garden, the trial before the Sanhedrin, the dereliction, the ascension, are apparently ignored. The main themes of the discourses, viz. the conditions of admission into the kingdom, are exchanged for profound hints as to the uniqueness of the Lord's own person, His pre-existence, His claim to reveal the Father and to give eternal life. The miracles of the Synoptic narrative appear to set forth His comradeship and His pity for the sorrows of the world, but the later narrative of miracles of Jesus seems mainly used to insist upon the apologetic value of His miracles—they are 'signs' of the glory of God. The little children have vanished from the scene, even from the hosannas of the triumphal entry. It is considered scarcely possible to exaggerate the contrast between the gradual development of the Synoptic Christ, and the aureole of Messianic and divine splendour which invests Him from the first in 'John's' representation.

The first three Gospels represent more than one current type of tradition. The Fourth Gospel is almost universally admitted to be the work of one thoughtful mind, which has impressed itself upon the whole work. The author in propriâ personâ addresses his readers with explanations of his own, and at times seems to expand by further reflections or recollections even the words of his adored Master; so that a vigorous subjective element cannot be excluded, although it may have been relatively exaggerated.

B. We have to examine these divergences and some others, and to decide whether the admission of their existence destroys the historical value of the Fourth Gospel. Primâ facie, the claim of the writer to be the most intimate friend and disciple of Jesus Christ must be held to give a weight and an authority to his autoptic representations to which none of the Synoptists can lay equal claim.

(1) Can we accept the new version of the principal scene of the ministry of Christ? Matthew and Mark refer to one passover feast only, for which they bring Jesus to Jerus.—while all the other incidents and teachings are confined to Galilee. It is worth while to remember that to the Romans and Hellenes, to whom Mk and Lk appeal, the difference between the two must have been very insignificant. To the introspective soul of John, who thought of days, places, hours of his intercourse with 'the Word incarnate,' it was of moment to record some of these things in sharper detail. Thus, seeing that the Synoptic narrative of the public ministry ignores the Judæan ministry of the first passover, he reveals his intimate knowledge of the facts by the use of the word πάλιν in 4^{3}, thereby corresponding with the Synoptists as to the date of the commencement of the public ministry. In ch. 5 we have an intermezzo in which a visit to Jerus. brings our Lord into conflict with the Pharisees on the Sabbatic law. This explains and corresponds with the long and bitter struggle with the Pharisees detailed by the Synoptists in the early portion of the Galilæan ministry. Jesus does not appear to have been accompanied by more than a few disciples on these visits to the metropolis. Caspari (Chron. Introd. to Life of Christ, Eng. tr. 142) has made the acute suggestion that John, who was known to Caiaphas, and had a house in Jerus. to which he resorted at the time of the great feasts, may have been the sole auditor and witness of the conversations, and have been his Master's host as well as his biographer. But 'John' never expanded these precious memoranda into a full biography. He, like his predecessors, has given us only fragments, pregnant incidents, great words, which lifted the veil from the mystery of the Lord's consciousness. The references to special occasions are abrupt, e.g. to the abiding in Judæa (3^{22}), the walking in Galilee (7^{1}), the retiring to Peræa (10^{40}), the pause at Ephraim (11^{54})—other signs and teachings are cited and summarized from first to last. It is helpful to remember that even the Synoptists are not silent about visits to Judæa, as compare the (Tisch.^{8}, WH) text of Lk 4^{44}, where εἰς τὰς συναγωγὰς τῆς Ἰουδαίας is inserted in the text —Tregelles and RV insert it in the margin. This might be synchronous with either the first visit of Jesus to Jerus. or even the second. In Lk 5^{17} the presence in Galilee of Pharisees from Jerusalem represents the impression already produced in the temple by the great discussion on the Sabbatic law. Both Matthew (23^{37}) and Luke ($13^{21.\ 33.\ 34}$) record the terrible and tender apostrophe, 'O Jerusalem . . . how often would I,' etc. In Lk 10^{38} the incident of Mary and Martha is not incompatible with our Lord's presence at Bethany during the feast of Tabernacles, described in Jn 7^{10}. The Synoptic narrative implies, in the final scenes, familiarity with people and things, which is best explained by the Johannine account of these visits to Jerusalem.

(2) Is the length of our Lord's public ministry so different, after all, in the two accounts as hopelessly to discredit either account? Browne (Ord. sæclorum) has endeavoured to compress even John's account into the short space of one year, contained between the first and last Passover; and this is effected by expunging from the text (Jn 6^4) the reference to another passover; but it has the tendency to render the whole narrative unhistorical when we consider the astounding brevity of the period during which the entire personal influence of Jesus upon friends and foes must have been produced. This becomes more striking when we compare it with the length of the teaching of Socrates, Buddha, or Mohammed. The same comparison may be made with the record of the ministry of Hosea, Jeremiah, or Ezra, or with the history of the career of Moses, David, or Solomon. The fact is that there is no positive statement in any of the four Gospels upon the subject. The only termini are the 15th year of Tiberius (Lk 3^1) and the recall of Pontius Pilate (A.D. 36). There is therefore more historic probability in the whole narrative if the extended chronology of John into two years and a half be followed. There is nothing to contradict it in the Synoptic narrative. See, further, art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 406 ff.

(3) The most perplexing and debated apparent discrepancy between the first three Gospels and the Fourth turns on the day of our Lord's death. As judged by critics of all schools a formidable difference emerges, which some, like Baur and Strauss, have lifted into capital importance as demonstrating the late origin of the Fourth Gospel at the hands of one who was ready from doctrinal and ecclesiastical motives to contradict the far-spread tradition of a century. It is assumed that the writer wished to make it appear that Jesus was the true Passover, in whom all the ancient symbolism of the Lamb and the system of sacrifices culminated, and that he did not hesitate to affirm by a group of incidental references that our Lord was crucified at the time when the Jews were preparing to kill and eat the paschal supper; whereas the Synop. Gospels had been unanimous in their assertion that the day preceding the agony and the crucifixion was that on which the days of unleavened bread commenced and the paschal lamb was slain and eaten, and that, the Lord Jesus having been tried and condemned on the day of the Feast and Holy Convocation, was laid in the grave on the evening of the Sabbath preparation. The difference of statement is explicit, and said, by the opponents of the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel, to be irreconcilable. This conclusion is strongly emphasized by the Tübingen writers, on the ground that the Quarto-deciman and Jewish-Christian party persisted in celebrating their 'feast of the Saviour's Passover' on the 14th day of Nisan, when the Jews slew their paschal lamb. Their festivals of rejoicing commenced after their fasting had ended, on whichever day of the week it occurred. According to Eusebius (HE v. 24), Polycrates of Ephesus affirmed that the Eastern Churches founded their custom in part on the practice of the Apostle John himself, 'who observed the 14*th day according to the Gospel.*' But what Gospel? Not the Fourth, according to the critics, but the Synoptic Gospels, where John is mentioned with Peter as preparing the Passover on the morning of the 13th Nisan, and celebrating it with the Lord on the night of the 14th. This, it has been alleged, runs directly counter to the representations of the Fourth Gospel.

Now, the difficulty here involved has been greatly aggravated by the twofold method in which conservative critics have endeavoured to solve it. Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Edersheim, Luthardt, M'Clellan, etc., satisfy themselves that every reference in John is compatible with the Synoptic assertion that the Lord's Supper coincided with the Jewish passover on the evening of 14th–15th of Nisan. They think that several of the proceedings of the night were exceptional, e.g. Judas going out, that the possible purchase of things needed for the feast or gift of alms could be justified, that 'the passover' which the chief priests were intending to hold, and for the ceremonial attendance on which they would not enter the prætorium, referred to a midday meal on the feast day called 'chagigah,' a 'thank-offering,' and sometimes termed by laxity 'passover' (2 Ch 30^{22} $35^{7.9}$), and that the references to the παρασκευή—and the bearing of the cross, are all compatible with the first day of convocation. It is thus thought that the two accounts are harmonized; but, on the other hand, Bleek, Greswell, Godet, Weiss, Westcott, Watkins, etc., have shown the entire incompatibility of the proceedings of the trial, of the crucifixion, the bearing of the cross by one coming from field labour, the purchase of spices, etc., with the most elastic interpretation of the letter of the law then in vogue. The violations of Sabbatic law in performing or allowing deeds of mercy would have been utterly insignificant by the side of these flagrant contradictions of both letter and spirit. These numerous details (see Reynolds' Introd. pp. xcii–xcv, and notes on the passages in Gosp.) cannot be discussed. The Synoptists themselves supply many confirmations of the Johannine view, especially the determination of the authorities not to apprehend Jesus 'on the feast day.' Since Luke reckons the 50th day after the first day following the Sabbath of Passover (see Lv 23^{15}, Dt 16^9) as that on which Pentecost had fully come (Ac 2^1), and as the universal tradition and custom of celebrating it on a Sunday cannot be disputed, it is evident that Luke must have reckoned in the year of our Lord's death that the paschal feast was held on the night following the crucifixion.

St. John, who took part in the preparation of the passover, was not purposely correcting a common tradition, but making the chronology more clear. Still there remains to be accounted for the explicit manner in which Luke and Mark refer to the celebration of the supper and the blending with it of the ancient ceremonial on the night of the betrayal. Godet and Westcott do not hesitate to imply that the Synoptic narrative shows that our Lord must have anticipated by a day the legal celebration. Haste and the imminence of the tragedy are thought to account for this departure. The fresh point made by Caspari (Chron. Introd. to Life of Christ, Eng. tr. pp. 195–217), is that the four evangelists are unanimous in the assertion that Jesus suffered on the 14th of Nisan, after having prepared for the paschal supper, though without the lamb, or the bitter herbs, or the elaborate ceremonial; that the lamb may have been reserved for the evening of the day of the crucifixion itself, for the hurry and awfulness of which they were unprepared. If this be the fact, the difficulty vanishes. In its favour may be added the Chronicon Paschale, which quotes Clemens Alex., who, following the chronology just set forth, implies that the disciples had learned that Jesus was Himself the Lamb, the food and the wine of the feast. The fact that Origen, Chrysostom, and others in the course of the various Easter controversies, took a different view from Clemens Alex., does not here concern us. The points at issue with the Western Church turn on other considerations not vitally connected with our present discussion. With three most plausible, if not absolutely satisfactory, methods of accounting for the difficulty, it is scarcely worthy of candid scholarship to speak of irreconcilable contradiction, or of the impossibility of St. John's being the author of the Fourth Gospel.

(4) The omission by the Synoptic Gospels of events and discourses which constitute vital portions of the Fourth Gospel is very startling, and difficult to explain; but it is important to observe that Matthew and Luke are also almost equally characterized by peculiarities of their own. Without enumerating them here in detail

(see Pulp. Com. xcvi), it may be sufficient to notice that while paragraphs of various length, peculiar to the author of the Fourth Gospel, amount to ninety-six, yet the specialities which we owe entirely to Lk amount to no fewer than seventy-two, and similar peculiarities of Mt to sixty-two, exceeding together by thirty-eight those of the Fourth Gospel. It is sufficient to urge that the three evangelists each found in the abundance of material what best corresponded with the supreme motive of his selection. Special emphasis has been laid upon the silence of the Synoptists on an event which definitely precipitated the tragedy. Most certainly, the death and restoration of Lazarus take so signal a place in the final working out of Jewish hostility, in John's Gospel, as to imply an extraordinary reticence on the part of the Synoptists. It is possible that amid the affluence of mighty works wrought in Galilee the sorrows and joys of Bethany did not bulk so largely as they seem to the critics to do when this one event is singled out for minute inspection.

(5) The omission by the Fourth Gospel of events of capital importance in the Synoptic narrative.

(a) The miraculous birth and infancy, the youth, the family, the genealogy of Jesus, and the early ministry of John the Baptist, are passed over in silence. Yet there are significant hints of these things which carry the reader's mind over the omission, without the suspicion of ignorance or indifference.

(b) The baptism of Jesus by John, with its accompaniments, is not definitely recorded, and yet it is implied in the testimony of John, and in the thrilling effect produced upon the mind of the Baptist by what he saw and heard. Similarly, no account is given of the imprisonment and death of the Baptist, yet both are hinted at.

(c) The omission of the temptation in the wilderness has been put down to doctrinal prepossessions of 2nd cent., but closer study seems to show that the evangelist inserts between the great testimonies of the Baptist and his imprisonment—i.e. in precisely the chronological position where Synoptic teaching places the temptation—a series of events covering the matter of each of them. The creative multiplication of wine, as an act of love to others rather than of self-assertion or the rectification of personal need, corresponds with the temptation to dispense with the Father's providential care of His beloved Son. The sudden descent upon the temple with reforming energy, in lieu of casting Himself from the pinnacle to attract the admiration of the sign-loving multitude, is charged with effective analogies. Then, thirdly, we find an unostentatious refusal of Christ to palter with evil, or to accept the sanction of the Sanhedrin in order to accomplish the ends of even His own mission. 'Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and him alone shalt thou serve,' rings through Jn 2. 3 and 4 just where the Synoptists had chronologically placed the mighty struggle with the suggestions of the devil.

(d) The omission of the transfiguration, an event which is fully described in the Synoptic narrative. This is surprising, because the latter represents the son of Zebedee as one of the three witnesses of the incident; but the explanation may be that the eyes of the beloved disciple received more convincing evidence than the bright cloud and the heavenly visitants and a supernatural voice, to establish the divine glory and Person of the Lord. 'We saw,' he said (1^{14}), 'his glory, the glory of the only-begotten.' It is worthy of notice in this respect that Moses and Elijah were perceived by John to have prepared the way of the Saviour and His sacrifice ($1^{17.23}$). The whole Gospel is a continuous revelation of the glory of the Life, a vindication of the fact that Jesus is the light- and sight-Giver to blinded humanity.

(e) A more perplexing omission is that of the institution of the Eucharist, especially as the very meal at which it took place is mentioned with some other accompaniments, such as the feet-washing of the disciples. Somewhere in the folds and parentheses of the stupendous sentence (13^{1-5}) we imagine that the institution of the Eucharist, which was intended for the sustenance and the responses of a transcendental love, lies concealed. On no supposition can we conceive the author to have been ignorant of the sacramental rite. We know that it had spread from Jerus. to Troas (Ac $20^{7.11}$) and Corinth, and was so highly esteemed as to be abused by the unwary (1 Co $11^{20f.}$). The best supposition is that the apostle has spread out over the discourse contained in chs. 13–17 the deepest and most essential features of the Eucharist. The teaching of transcendent love, and mutual indwelling and eternal life, is thus repeated by the divine Master in these chapters. More than this, John has reported the astonishing discourses at Capernaum (ch. 6), where the Lord described deep spiritual communion with Himself as 'eating his flesh and drinking his blood.' Christ laid emphasis on the faith which accepted the Incarnation, the reality and nearness of the God-man, the actual and perfect humanity of the Son of God, the divine Bread which came down from heaven, under the unique phrase 'eating his flesh,' and a deep appreciation and assimilation of His sacrificial death as nothing less than 'drinking his blood,' not only of 'the blood which is the life,' but the blood which was shed. So early in His ministry, He taught that what He also elsewhere in the Synop. narrative described as a ransom in place of many, was effected by the giving of His life. Thus He made it evident that life in Him was closely bound up with the stupendous idea of the death of the Christ of God. 'He that eateth me shall live because of me.' Two theories have prevailed—one, that a transcendental philosopher in the middle of the 2nd cent., ignoring or repudiating the sacrament of the body and blood, chose this way of expressing his spiritualization of this widely prevalent usage. The other hypothesis is, that the beloved disciple, having heard and recorded the Lord's own interpretation of eating His body and drinking His blood, was content. This seems to us far more reasonable. But why should he have omitted the symbol which was so well calculated to preserve the teaching of the great discourse at Capernaum, 6^{34-60}? We have just seen that he did not repel the historical concrete always in favour of the ideal representation. But he may reasonably have been wounded by the prevalence of heathen and superstitious adjuncts to the celebration of the Eucharist. He was not a bigoted spiritualist, as we may judge by the significance of the seven great miracles recorded by him, by the interesting feet-washing which had never become a sacramental usage. (See art. 'Fuss-waschung' by H. Merz in Herzog's RE; Smith's Dict. of Christ. Ant. 'Baptism,' §§ 34 and 67).

(f) The omission of the agony in the garden. Keim says, if St. John's account of the imperial bearing of Jesus in the garden and at the arrest be historical, then the Synoptic narrative is 'pulverized.' Renan, B. Weiss, and others are ready on the other hand to allow that we owe to this Gospel historic traits which throw much light upon the incidents of the passion. In John's account we have a more definite description of the place (κῆπος) than in Mt and Mk with their χωρίον, or Lk with the indefinite τόπος. The 'garden' was a 'place' 'to which Jesus often resorted with his disciples.' Moreover, if the Synop. narrative be historical, John must have been with His Lord in the depth of the olive shade. He must even have witnessed what Luke ($22^{43.44}$, see below) describes of an agony insupportable, of the exceeding bitter cry, of the cup which the Father gave the Son of His love to drink, of the bloody sweat, and of the supernatural rally when, having called from the depths of a divine despair to Him who was able to save Him from death, He was heard because of His godly fear. But this apostle must have seen as no other reporter saw so distinctly, the lanterns and torches which accompanied the temple-guard as they descended into the Kidron Valley by the steep side of the hill below the city wall; he knew the name, Malchus, of the servant of the high priest, whose right ear Peter smote. Note, in addition to all this, how Jesus, according to John, rebukes Simon Peter for his rash manifestation of physical courage, in words which remind us of the bitterest experience of Gethsemane. We must admit that little trace of the prostration of that awful scene presents itself when the God-man (according to the Fourth Gospel) faces the enemy. He there appears to be a match for all the treachery of Judas, the malice of the chief priests, and even the military power of Rome. He meets the serried ranks of evil in the imperial calm of the intercessory prayer. It is the manner of this evangelist, and of other scriptural writers, to leave unexplained gaps in the midst of what seems to be continuous narrative. Such a manifest lacuna occurs here between the close of the valedictory discourse and the arrest of the Son of Man. But we see even from the Synoptists that the great agony was over, and that the angel had strengthened Him (Lk 22^{43}, whose genuineness is indeed doubtful; see WH's note). The cry, 'Thy will be done,' had linked the Father's purpose of redemption with the bleeding heart of man. He had now the energy to rebuke the rabble that gathered round Him. He drove Judas to despair with words of incomparable reproach. He moved forwards, in the face of false witness, to the assertion of the highest claims of Messiahship and divine authority. Even according to the Synoptists, the agony of the garden is compatible with the most stupendous claims.

Moreover, it should not be forgotten that the Fourth Gospel never ignores the vicarious sorrow or the sacrificial agony of the Son of God. Not only does the author show in the valedictory address and prayer the keenest appreciation of suffering (see $16^{2.3.32}$ 17^{12} $15^{18-22f.}$ and 14^{30}), but he gives a parallel scene of surpassing intensity in 12^{25-34}, when a fearful looking for of deviation from the Father's will is surmounted by 'Father, glorify thy name!' The moral significance and the culminating intensity of the sacrifice is really placed chronologically before (not after) the experience of the upper chamber. Cf. also the strange blendings of humiliation and victory in the story of the resurrection of Lazarus. We must admit that as the temptation, the transfiguration, and the Eucharist are suggested throughout the Fourth Gospel, so also is the agony of Gethsemane, and, we may add, the bodily ascension of the Lord. The question arises: is the Synoptic narrative, which presents these themes in tableaux visions or revelations, or is the Fourth Gospel, which gives the same teaching in a group of objective facts and recorded words, the more historical?

To John's eye the grand synthesis of majesty and mercy, of divinity and humanity, of the ideal and the actual, the blending of the mystery of pain with the brightness of the glory, was present in all the word and work of the Logos incarnate. To the Synoptic tradition, the universally diffused synthesis is gathered up into scenes and acts of a drama which readers have no power to blend without philosophical and theological hypotheses. If we are right here, much of the current anti-theological criticism of the Fourth Gospel vanishes.

C. There are numerous correspondences between the two documents which merit special consideration.

(a) The broad facts, the leading outlines of the life of the Only-begotten are the same. The name of 'Jesus,' the place of His early residence (Nazareth), the indisputable reference to 'father,' 'mother,' 'brethren,' and 'sisters,' the significance of this in connexion with the confession of His birth from the Spirit and of His having come down from heaven, belong to the two sources. The birth at Bethlehem (Jn 7^{42}) is assumed to be true by the refusal to explain away a charge actually made. The reader knows that the Synop. tradition has already forestalled the objection which John, for special reasons, reported. Both sources of tradition agree that Capernaum was chosen by Jesus as the scene of special ministry. The different treatment of the Baptist is due to the obvious fact that the Fourth Gospel takes up his story where the Synoptics lay it down. After the wondrous manifestation in the Jordan, and the confidences between Jesus and John after the temptation, the Baptist was dazzled with a vision both of His glory and of His sacrifice. He penetrated the reality of both, and used the mighty names of 'Son of God,' 'Lamb of God,' and 'Bridegroom' of the veritable Israel. All this was perfectly compatible with the fact that the previous knowledge of Jesus by John—even a knowledge sufficient to justify the exclamation, 'I have need to be baptized of thee' (Mt 3^{14})—was as star-light to sun-light.

Two great 'signs' of our Lord's mastery over material elements and the forces of nature are recorded in the Fourth Gospel (6^{1-21}), and correspond with the Synoptic narrative in all their main features, and the two throw valuable side-lights on each other; e.g. the circumstance that Jesus constrained His disciples to enter the boat while He sent the multitude away (Mt 14^{22} ‖ Mk 6^{45}), is best explained by the sympathy felt by the disciples towards the desire of the multitude to take Jesus by force and hail Him as Messiah King (Jn 6^{15}). The combined narrative brings out the impressive feature of the history.

Jn 12 gives new and interesting details of the anointing of the Lord by a woman (cf. Mt 26, Mk 14). It is from the Fourth Gospel that we learn her name, as well as the date, the motive, the criticism of this noteworthy deed which has filled the Church and the world with the fragrance of its perfume.

John agrees with the Synoptists in the main features of the triumphal entry into Jerusalem. The accounts of the 'supper' that preceded the passion, notwithstanding differences already discussed, have much in common, e.g. the detection and departure of Judas, and much of the matter of advice and consolation given by the departing Lord (cf. Lk 13^{31-38} with the valedictory discourse).

In addition to this there are numerous identities, such as the trial scenes, the denials by Peter, the conduct of Pilate, the incident of Barabbas, the 'title' and accusation, the crucifixion, the two other victims, the death itself, with its certification—the witnesses of the resurrection. Much that John wrote would be more difficult to appreciate if we could not suppose that he had the narrative of the Synoptists before him. Thus, although John does not describe the discussion in the Sanhedrin or the decision arrived at, he implies it in Pilate's private interrogation of Jesus.

(b) Other matters of fact or teaching, given in detail by the Synoptists, are characteristically hinted at in the Fourth Gospel, e.g. John does not describe the baptism of Jesus, but he pointedly refers to the accompaniments and consequences of it. The reference in 3^{24} to the fact that 'John was not yet cast into prison,' is best explained by the evangelist's knowing from the Synoptic narrative that the commencement of our Lord's Galilæan ministry coincided with the imprisonment of John. Further, he seems to show that the previous Judæan ministry was not incompatible with the assertion that a great public ministry of Christ in Galilee was apparently dependent on the arrest of John's activity. The Saviour's knowledge of Peter, and the latter's acceptance of the authority of Jesus (Lk 5^{6}, Mt 4^{18}, Mk 1^{16}), are best understood from Jn 1^{43} and the record of their early intercourse in the place where the Baptist was first exercising his ministry. The parable of the Children of the Bridechamber in Mt 9^{15} is curiously confirmed by the last recorded utterance of the Baptist, Jn 3^{29}.

Again, there are proverbial sayings found in Jn which are preserved sometimes in different connexions by the Synoptics. Comp. 4^{44} with Mt 13^{57}, Mk 6^{4}, Lk 4^{24}; and 13^{16} with Lk 6^{40} and Mt 10^{24}; also 13^{20} with Mt 10^{40} and Lk 10^{16}.

The identity of the character of our Lord as portrayed in the Synop. and Johan. narratives is very remarkable, though this has been sometimes disputed. Even A. B. Bruce (Apologetics, p. 485) thinks it difficult to reconcile the apparent motive of the great miracles of the Fourth Gospel with the philanthropic, sympathetic, and personal reasons which dictate corresponding miracles and other incidents in the Synoptics. He says that while our Lord's chief motive in the Synoptics was pitifulness over human need, on the other hand the obvious purpose of His 'signs' in the Fourth Gospel was to call attention to His own Person and claims on human love and veneration. There is serious matter for contemplation here, should this contrast be observed throughout these documents. But the case of every applicant for His mercy was severally considered and dealt with according to His wisdom. As He said to the woman who washed and anointed His feet, 'Thy sins are forgiven thee'; 'She loved much'; 'Go in peace';—so to the woman taken in adultery, and brought before Him, He said, 'Go and sin no more.' Doubtless He healed many in the affluence of His love, as detailed by the Synoptists; but He would not allow the woman with the issue of blood to steal away with a purely temporal blessing; and in like manner He 'found' the sick man of Bethesda in the temple to give him warning, and did not rest after healing the blind man until He 'found' him to confer upon him the highest benediction. The reason of the miraculous feeding of the multitude in both documents is anxiety for their secular and physical requirements; and the creation of the elements of wine at the wedding feast is an answer to the call upon His pity on behalf of the embarrassed villagers. The walking of Jesus upon the boisterous lake was a distinctly expressed concern for the peril both of mind and body to which His disciples were exposed. In all these cases our Lord undoubtedly found occasion to bring out the great assurance that He had come forth from God and down from heaven; that He was the Light of the world, the Giver of strength, and a great Prophet. So though the raising of Lazarus was conditioned by consciousness of alliance with Heaven and oneness with the Father, yet few things in the Bible are more impressive than His sympathetic weeping over that grave, and His divine condolence with Martha and Mary.

Obviously, it was the purpose of the Fourth Evangelist to record the impressive words, gestures, revelations by which the Lord unveiled both Himself and the Father. These are more impressive in St. John than in the popular tradition, but they did not conceal the humanness of His love. The ironical charge, which was transformed into a crown of glory, 'He saved others, himself he could not save,' is one of the keynotes of the Fourth as well as of the other Gospels. On the other hand, do we not find in the Sermon on the Mount as well as in the charge to the twelve disciples (Mt 10), to say nothing of the interpretation of the great parables of the Sower, of the Tares, and of the Dragnet (Mt 13), and of the Seed growing secretly (Mk $4^{26ff.}$), stupendous claims of personal dignity, and of kinship with the supreme Revealer and Arbiter of human destiny? Does any assumption of the Fourth Gospel transcend the claims made by the great prophet of Mt 23–25? The Jesus of the Fourth Gospel felt that His own powers and claims were of supreme moment to mankind, but that the end of all He said and did was the life, light, peace, and joy of His brethren, and their victory over the world. Let the following passages be specially consulted: 5^{40} $6^{27.\ 47\text{-}50}$ $7^{17.\ 37.\ 38}$ $8^{12.\ 31.\ 32}$ $10^{9.\ 10.\ 28}$ 11^{40} $12^{25.\ 35}$ $13^{34.\ 35}$ $14^{3ff.}$, and almost every paragraph of the valedictory discourse. The same features and spirit pervade the Synoptic Gospels, establishing more of unity than diversity in their theme. They alone relate the supernatural birth of Jesus. Nothing more characteristically Johannine can be found than Mt $11^{25\text{-}30}$ and Lk $10^{21.\ 22}$, wherein the Lord's supreme self-consciousness was uttered, and is revealed in most close and gracious relations with the consolation and salvation of mankind. No words in the Fourth Gospel concerning our Lord's character and prerogatives are loftier than those in the Synoptic Gospels. We believe we are justified in saying that the Synoptists would be more difficult to expound without the light of the Fourth Evangelist than the Fourth Gospel without the aid of the Synoptists.

Other interesting and mutually corroborating elements are found in the four Gospels. There is, for example, the portraiture of certain personages in the Fourth Gospel of whom we know nothing elsewhere, not even the name—unless the name be a second name of one known to us by another.

(1) The most striking instance of this is Nathanael (chs. 1 and 21). A widely spread idea prevails that he is to be identified with the Bartholomew of the Synoptic lists of apostles, where he is (by his patronymic only) associated with Philip and Thomas.

(2) Nicodemus is thrice referred to (3. 7^{50} 19^{39}), nay, he is photographed by a few phrases. The familiarity of our Lord with this distinguished personage is quite parallel with numerous scattered hints of His social relationships, especially in Lk 7^{36} 8^{3} 19^{5}. There is no certain identification of Nicodemus with one N. ben-Gorion, who, according to the Talmud, survived the fall of Jerusalem (see Geikie, i. 584; Winer's Realwörterbuch, ii. 152).

(3) The woman of Samaria is portrayed with inimitable vivacity, and in a few sentences she has told her own story for all time. The references to Samaria and the Samaritans in Lk and Ac are all illumined by this sketch of the early intercourse of our Lord with the inhabitants of Sychar.

(4) Mary and Martha have been introduced to the Synoptic history almost as ideals of the contrast between the contemplative and the active religious life. In Jn there is a brilliant page of genuine biography and history. The time and the place are recorded; the characterization of the women is beautifully preserved along unconscious lines in Jn 11. The resemblance of their brother's name to that of the beggar of St. Luke's parable does not throw any light on this story, for all the surroundings are different, unless there be a faint adumbration in Abraham's word, 'Neither will they be persuaded,' etc., of the access of malignity in the hearts of the Pharisees, as reported in Jn 12^{10}, on hearing of the resurrection of Lazarus.

(5) The Virgin Mother. The reticence of the Synoptic account is one of the marvels of NT. We learn there that probably both she and Joseph also were the lowly heirs of the family and throne of David, that she occupied a purely OT standpoint, that she saw in the great function intrusted to her a solution of the baffling paradoxes of the theocratic kingdom. Mt and Lk combine to tell us of the gracious incidents of the infancy, while Mk sheds a very strong light on the probability that she shared with her other sons the fear that her prophetic child was 'beside himself,' and that she received from Him a severe yet filial rebuke. She would doubtless have spared Him every rough handling, and sought to restrain all undue exposure to the rising storm of mingled enthusiasm and malignity. The sublime way in which, according to Mk, the Lord baffled the design of the brethren, and emancipated Himself from the control of His domestic circle, is on many grounds, both literary and doctrinal, most noteworthy. Cf. and connect Mk 3^{20} with $^{30-35}$. Mary followed Jesus to Jerus. and was present at the tragedy, but there is no statement in any of the Synoptists that she was there. Lk, however, places her with her sons among the disciples before and after the Ascension, and it may be readily inferred that she was among the women who ministered to Jesus, though Mary of Magdala and Mary the mother of James the less and of Joses hide her from view. The same picture of the Virgin Mother is preserved by the beloved disciple. Here also she allows herself to be overshadowed by others and hidden in the glory of her Son and Lord. The author of the Fourth Gospel never breathes her name, but preserves the memory of the incident which he knew best, that he received the dying legacy of his Master, and as a son with a mother took her to his own home. The reference to the mother of our Lord frees his narrative from all Docetic taint; and the firm vindication of the truth that the Lord came in the flesh and was made flesh, seemed to him to be of the very essence of the Gospel, and the denial of it to be antichrist. At the same time, his constant reference to the supernatural, heaven-descended life of Christ gives the most vital basis for His immaculate conception. Minute touches also show at Cana the manner in which, while He delivered Himself from maternal control, Jesus obeyed her desire to meet the needs of their humble hosts. Thus, in the most subtle manner, the rare and wonderful portraiture is the same in both documents.

(6) The portrait of John the Baptist differs from that of the Synoptists; but if it be noted that the Fourth Gospel takes up the story where the current tradition dropped it, the chief difficulty vanishes. The strange question sent from the prison (Mt 11^2 and parallels) seems all the more strange in view of the great testimonies to Jesus borne by the Baptist as given in Jn 1 and 3 (cf. Reynolds, John the Baptist, 419–449). But there is nothing, after all, in the 'witness of John' which transcends the OT standpoint, and Christ declares (5^{36}) that He had 'greater witness than that of John.' Like Judaism itself, John would never have accomplished his proper work if he had not held to it too tenaciously even after it had reached its climax. But this involves exegetical considerations that are beyond our present scope.

(7) Of nothing are we more certain than of the historical character of Simon Peter. The blending of courage and weakness, the desire to suggest the courses to be followed even by his Lord, succeeded by the profound deference paid to the expression of the thought of Christ as soon as his reckless blundering was corrected, recur from first to last. This double personality appears at the earliest introduction to Jesus, amid the splendours of the transfiguration and the solemnities of Gethsemane, in his base denials and bitter tears, on the morning of the resurrection amid the visions of heavenly things, in the controversy with St. Paul over the essence of justification, and in the traditions of Church history. He is a real, not an imaginary man. If St. John had given a fundamentally different interpretation of his personality, it would have been strongly adverse to the historicity of his narrative; but the fact is, that in the transactions of chs. 13. 18. 20 and 21, though handling several diverse incidents, St. John's statements exactly preserve the same complicated features of St. Peter's inner and outer life. He who said to the Lord of the invisible world, 'Not so, Lord,' or 'Depart from me, for I am a sinful man,' or 'That be far from thee, Lord'; who would have builded tabernacles on the slopes of Hermon, or engaged a whole band of Roman soldiers with a single sword, and then declared with curses that he knew not the man whom he had risked his life to defend,—is the same as the disciple who first cried, 'Thou shalt never wash my feet' and then, 'not my feet only, but also my hands and my head'; who rushed into the sea to reach the feet of his risen Lord, and whose new act of impulsive curiosity received anew the rebuke of the Lord. The indelible imprint of personality is carried throughout the fourfold narrative.

(8) Caiaphas and Pilate, though portrayed at a different angle and in the midst of circumstances which though concordant with those of the Synoptists have a different bearing on the whole narrative, are alike etched from the life, and betray no departure from the reality common to the earlier representation. Caiaphas and Pilate are described as priest and ruler of Israel during the whole of the ministry of Jesus, Lk 3^1. The remorseless resolve of the Sadducean priest to find or make a capital charge against Jesus on the ground either of sedition or blasphemy; the unprincipled endeavour to keep the Pharisees from siding with Jesus in His reformatory zeal; the demand on oath from our Lord of the loftiest claim of Messiahship and Sonship with a view to his immediate condemnation on a charge to which Pilate could not listen; and the delivery of Jesus to the Romans on a new charge altogether, which Pilate saw through at a glance,—all this is left intact by the Fourth Evangelist, while he casts an additional light on the main motives of both the priest and the governor. The moral confusion of the motives of Caiaphas, evinced (11^{49}) in his prophetic forecast of a scapegoat to the indignant majesty of Rome, offered in the person of one absolutely innocent of the crimes alleged; the superstitious fears which blended in Pilate's mind with the abuse of his sovereign power; the uprising of his moral, at least of his political, conscience, which led to the temporary delay of the sentence,—all these elements are emphasized by the Fourth Gospel from its own sources of evidence. The private interviews between Pilate and Jesus, to which the beloved disciple was privy (18$^{33-38}$ 19$^{9-12}$), as well as the private and preliminary examination before Annas, add to the general information, and have a supplementary character; still the author does not ignore, but gives the result of the action of the Sanhedrin under the leadership of Caiaphas in Pilate's own words, 'Thine own nation and the chief priests delivered thee unto me' (18^{35}). The Barabbas incident brings into pointed relief the action of the priestly party as touched on in the Synoptic narrative, telling us that there was a pause and a questioning among the ὄχλος, which was overcome by the activity of the priests, who 'persuaded' the people (Mt 27^{20}); but the Johannine narrative shows how the fact corresponds with the earlier tradition; and the extremely culpable weakness of Pilate is further shown in the delineations of the Fourth Gospel. Pilate crushed the warnings of his own conscience, and was more intent on visiting his supercilious antipathy on the priests than on carrying out his own expressed conviction that the prisoner was innocent of the charge brought against Him. He yielded at last to a clamour which might complicate his relations with Tiberius, as the most fateful expression of Jewish national degradation at length burst upon his ear. 'We have no king but Cæsar' sealed the doom, not only of Jesus, but of the theocratic nation. Jesus was sacrificed to the cowardice and meanness of Pilate. The spirit of revenge which induced him to abide by the 'title' upon the Cross is another touch of characterization which we owe, as we believe, to the special sources of information possessed by the Fourth Evangelist. We are not concerned to deny that John's silence about the sublime assumption of the Messiahship and judgment of the world, and of the divine claim He made to the highest conceivable dignity, even when it sealed His death-warrant from the Sanhedrin, is a serious perplexity, but, at all events, it reveals no mere doctrinal perversity on the part of the writer to press the apparent theme and motive of his own wonderful contribution to the history of the Word made flesh.

We have thus considered the objections drawn from the chronological and biographical details of the Synoptic Gospels, and have shown that the omissions by the Synoptics of certain facts presumed to be of historical importance, as well as the striking omissions by the Fourth Gospel of events of cardinal significance in the Synoptic narrative, have often been pressed beyond their real significance. We have traced also the general correspondences in the chief facts and minute details of manner and matter between them, and examined the biographic portraiture of the most noted characters. There remain some general objections of greater or less moment which affect the whole composition.

D. Miscellaneous Objections.—a. The supposed exaggeration, through the mythopœic tendency in the later writer, of the supernatural element. The transmutation by creative process of 'water' into 'wine' is reckoned as an exaggerated and suspicious instance of divine prerogative attributed to the incarnate Logos. But this act seems by no means a more wonderful display of the will of Christ in harmony with the Supreme Will than is the multiplication of the bread, which belongs to the entire tradition. The heightened intensity of some of the special signs selected by 'John' is sometimes cited, e.g. the thirty-eight years of the man's infirmity in ch. 5 is compared disadvantageously with the eighteen years of similar paralysis as mentioned by Lk; so likewise the blindness from birth is compared unfavourably with the temporary blindness which Jesus healed, as recorded by Mt and Mk. But the way in which Mt tells of two blind men where the other evangelists, Mk and Lk, mention one, and two demoniacs instead of one at Gadara, and two multiplications of bread and fish instead of one in the other records, is far more open to the charge of mythical enlargement than anything that is here attributed to the Fourth Gospel. There is a deepening glory in the resurrections from the dead, which has been commented upon since the days of Augustine. The daughter of Jairus just laid upon her deathbed, and the young man at Nain being carried to his grave, might seem insufficient per se to prove that the Lord Jesus had the keys of death in His hands, but the fourth day of death and the assumed putridity of Lazarus' corpse are more conclusive evidence that the Lord is King, and can and will raise in some way all that are in the dust of death. He had chosen death and the sepulchre as His special battlefield,—the evangelist had ample facts from which he made selection with reference alike to blindness and death, and in both cases, as well as in the bread sign and the Bethesda 'Sabbath cure,' he apparently chose the incidents for the sake of the discourses with which they were followed, and which he remembered so well. It must not be forgotten in estimating the weight of this argument that the Fourth Gospel is parsimonious in describing specific miracles, though it records the fact of their abundance (20$^{30.31}$). Further, it is the only one of the four which declares that the miraculous is a kind of evidence far inferior to that of intuition and personal recognition of the divine in Himself (Jn 14$^{10-14}$). The miracle arrested attention, but it was still in the region of the natural and sensuous, and appealed rather to the understanding than to the higher conscience or to the spirit. The most startling and dramatic scenes, including, as we have seen, the temptation, the transfiguration, and the portents of the crucifixion, are shorn of those mysterious accompaniments which are desired by the miracle-loving multitude, and might be described as the unhistorical accretion of years. After prolonged pondering of the problem, we are convinced it might be urged that there is more of the mythical lustre overspreading the Synoptic narrative, more of the imaginative setting, and the solitary uncorroborated event or teaching in both Mt and Lk than in the Fourth Gospel, and more of the pictorial and even dramatic presentation in the Gospel of Mk than in either of them, and still more than in the stern self-repression and spiritual recollections of the great Apostle of Love.

β. Schenkel (Charakterbild Jesu, § ii., and elsewhere throughout his able work), Hase, Renan, Ritschl, and others, have emphasized the absence from the Fourth Gospel of that progressive mental and official development of the character and Messianic claim of Jesus alleged to be discoverable in the Synoptic tradition. But if the Preacher of the Sermon on the Mount identified Himself with 'righteousness,' and declared that, by penetrating the secrets of all hearts, He could and would dispose of the final destinies of individuals; if He was hailed as the Holy One of God by the demoniacs (Mk), and in the synagogue at Nazareth (Lk) aroused inveterate hatred by a double claim to Messianic dignity and to an obnoxious universalism,—there is not much room for development after that, especially when the three Gospels emphasize the significance of the Heavenly Voice which accompanied His baptism by John, and His subsequent transfiguration, as the climax of His Galilæan ministry. We are not concerned to deny the development of Jesus from His birth to the twelfth and afterwards to the thirtieth year of His life. Enough has been told to discriminate His infancy finally from that of the later legends of Buddha, or the precocities and monstrosities of the non-canonical Gospels of the Infancy. The originality of Jesus leaves no room to think that either John the Baptist or Philo, Hillel or Gamaliel, contributed anything to His mental resources or to His Messianic rôle. He knew His own mind, and followed it throughout, allowing the voice of the Father and the foreordained unfolding of human need and inquiry to determine the successive phases of revelation. While He was waiting for God, God was working in all things to the unveiling of His own true nature and the vindication of His love to the uttermost. There appears to be quite a parallel, if not a richer, development in the Fourth Gospel than in the other three. There is a wide space between the language addressed to Nathanael (1^{47}) and that to Philip on the night of the passion: 'Have I been so long time with you,' etc.; between the elementary instructions given to Nicodemus (3^{1-16}) touching the fundamental aspects of the new life, and the true nature of the kingdom of God, as consisting of regenerated men on the one hand, and on the other the sublime teaching of the 'good Shepherd,' the mutual indwelling of the Vine and its branches (ch. 15); the glorification of the Son of God, who would go unto the Father, prepare a place for them, 'come again to them' in the power and presence of the Comforter. Almost every school of criticism admits a momentous advance after the close of ch. 12. Those whom He had gathered out of the world, those who at length had come to believe in the mission of the Lord, are set forth at length as face to face with each other, under the shadow of the cross, in the coronation of sacrifice, suffering, sorrow, and death. A higher strain of instruction pervades the Fourth Gospel than that current in the Synoptic tradition—one more adapted to the solitary inquirers, or to a knot of carping and critical priests, or to the society of His own disciples at great crises of their spiritual history, or to angry sticklers for their own customs when preparing their final and deadly assault upon His life, than to the ordinary and miscellaneous groups at the lake side or on the hill slopes of Galilee. However, the contrast does not interfere with the historicity of either account. The progressive aspects of each group of revelations is obviously the result of the different susceptibilities of His audience and their power to catch the meaning of His teaching. In the case of St. John's Gospel this is heightened by the circumstance that the reporter is throughout one intense, perfervid, yet contemplative spirit, who received from the infinite fulness of the God-incarnate—knowing Him to be this—just the impression which he alone could receive, and in some degree record for after generations.

γ. The Gnostic element in the Fourth Gospel, as distinct from the Synoptic narratives, has been supposed to carry this document from the close of the 1st to the middle of the 2nd cent., to the great disparagement of its biographical and autoptic value. Siegfried, as we have seen, endeavours to establish an influence from Philo of Alexandria upon the entire literature of NT, upon Mt and Ja as well as on Hebrews and the Johannine writings. Thoma has maintained a similar thesis. He even fastens on Valentinus, as Baur had done on Marcion, to redate the Pauline Epistles, and so obtain, a fortiori, a plunge down into the 2nd cent. for the Johannine books. This kind of criticism overshoots itself. Both the 1st cent. B.C. and the 1st and 2nd cents. A.D. were seething with the ferment produced by the blending of Hel. and Oriental ideas, of Gr. and Heb. philosophy and phrase. There is no need to come down to the middle of the 2nd cent. to understand the phraseology of Col or Hebrews, the letters of Ignatius or Barnabas, or the Wisdom of Solomon. Specific terms, such as 'Logos,' 'Life,' and 'Light,' were ready at all times to take up a richer connotation than before. The special contrast between the Synoptists and John, to the disparagement of the latter, has been pressed, as though Jn had thus received the hall-mark of the end of 2nd cent. The question arises whether the creation of the whole world by the Logos or Son is affirmed or repudiated by the Fourth Gospel. Does it recognize the dualistic view of the source of good more than do the Synop. Gospels? Surely the latter give us more references to the malice, mischief, and kingdom of Satan, of darkness and demonism, than the Fourth Gospel, which never refers to demoniac energy. There is nothing more, on the other hand, than a vague side reference to the Creation in the Synoptics (Mk 10^{6}). Such language is by no means so clear and explicit with reference to Creation as πάντα δι' αὐτοῦ ἐγένετο (Jn 1^{3}), nor can it be pretended that matter (ἡ ὕλη) or any other element in the κόσμος is excepted from the πάντα, which owe absolutely their genesis to the Logos. The non-interpenetrating characteristics of 'light' and 'darkness' is not asserted. The power of 'darkness' is not chaotic or anarchic, but represents simply the negation of 'light.' 'Darkness' is not impenetrable to 'light.' The element of will or moral nature enters into the conditions of its permanence. The idea of ὁ πονηρός belongs rather to the Synop. than Johan. representations; see Mt 5^{37} 6^{13} 13^{19}, Lk 11^{26}. S. Davidson considered that Jesus (Jn 17^{9}) did not 'pray for the world,' because the κόσμος was hopelessly beyond the region of conversion or the power of prayer. This interpretation seems entirely inconsistent with 1^{29} 3^{16} 4^{42} $6^{33.51}$ 8^{12} 12^{47} 16^{8}, and even with the context of the assertion, 'I pray not for the world,' in which the Lord prays (v.^{21}) for those who should believe on Him through the word of His disciples, and looks forward to the great consummation of His own mission, 'that the world may believe that thou didst send me.' This is the final purpose of the Lord's intercession for His disciples. We admit that pervading the Fourth Gospel there is a class of references to an elect kingdom of susceptible souls to be found throughout the world, 'the other sheep' of 10^{16}, cf. $3^{20.21}$ 18^{37}, which suggest the wideness of God's mercy, and also the inscrutable and boundless depths of the divine decrees, the extent of the invisible and omnipotent graces affecting human destiny and counteracting human perversity and corruption. This is not Gnosticism, but one of the great teachings of Divine Revelation in the God-man. A Docetic element is charged upon the Fourth Gospel, and the Gnostic Ebionitism of the 2nd cent. is referred to as its source, and the later supposed date is assigned on this ground to the whole class of representation; but the Johan. writings, and especially the Gospel, are the most decidedly pronounced anti-Docetic documents in NT. They speak of the true humanity of the Son of Man with intentional emphasis. Thus the father, mother, brothers of Jesus are spoken of; the weariness, thirst, tears, inward groanings, personal affections, dress, food, spittle, touch, flesh, blood, bones, wounded side, are severally mentioned. He was 'made flesh,' i.e. full humanity; His dead body was partially embalmed, His raiment was divided among the soldiers. After His resurrection He was prepared to take broiled fish and honey and bread. We do not admit a treatment of the supposed phantasmic appearances or disappearances of the Lord (7^{30} 8^{59} 10^{39} 18^{6}) as Gnostic or Docetic in the Fourth, when similar events are recorded in the Synop. Gospels, e.g. Lk 4, as well as the walking on the water and the walk to Emmaus. Hilgenfeld has laid stress on a translation his theory has demanded, that in $8^{43.44}$ our Lord is supposed to refer to 'the father of the devil,' and so to the origination of the devil by some inferior god, like the Jehovah of OT as imagined by the Ophites. The whole of this contention has been taken up favourably by the advocates of the 2nd cent. date. It proceeds from unwillingness to recognize that the Gospel places the difference between the children of God and the children of the devil, not in primordial difference of essence, but in the will of man (see Godet's Introd. vol. i. 182 ff.).

δ. The phenomena of the Johan. discourses unquestionably introduce us to a new atmosphere, and to a place and audience different from those of the Synoptics. This is not finally explained by the frequent suggestion that the Synoptics represent our Lord as addressing the multitudes in Galilee, and that the Fourth Gospel is almost exclusively occupied with individuals, or with small groups of His disciples,—because, on the one hand, we see that the great controversy of ch. 6 was conducted in the synagogue of Capernaum, and those of chs. 5 and 10 were held with large and excited groups in the temple courts. On the other hand, the great Synoptic discourse on the last things was addressed to only four of the twelve disciples. Moreover, the comparison of Mt 5–7 with Lk 6 shows that the Sermon on the Mount was a selection of the most recondite instructions addressed at the first — and in the main — to the inner circle of the disciples. The same features are observed in the special discourse to the twelve disciples in Mt 10, and correspond with much similar instruction given to the seventy disciples in Lk 10^{1-16}. We cannot account for these differences of style and subject-matter on such easy terms. A considerable element of subjective choice is distinctly claimed by the author on two occasions. He selected his materials from copious accumulations, out of a wide range of memory and of tradition. The reporter put them together with the hope and belief that they would evoke confidence in the Messiah-functions and divine Sonship of Jesus (20^{31} and 21^{25}). Some of the most 'Johannine' utterances are likewise to be found in Mt $11^{25ff.}$, Lk $10^{25ff.}$. Moreover, every great claim made by our Lord in the Fourth Gospel is anticipated by the direct or implied teaching of the reported sayings, and the miracles and parables of the Synoptics. The diction of these sayings is different from that of the earlier narratives, though it is easy to exaggerate the difference, and to ignore a very fundamental element of the problem. We have already seen how much common matter there is in these four documents. Many proverbial sayings or startling apothegms, found in the Three, are not absent from the Fourth, though they are given in fresh connexions. The strain of the self-consciousness of Jesus appears frequently in the Synoptic narrative, though given there when our Lord was concerned with the judgment of men, and foreboding the consummation of all things. Whatever may be the ultimate solution of this great problem, this at least is shown to be probable, that there was from the first a twofold, double-sided strain in our Lord's discourse, on which minds of congenial and susceptible characteristics would and did lay hold, with verbal tenacity, when brought into intimate relation with Him. This corresponds with analogous phenomena in other regions of biographical record. Only by blending these and some dissimilar elements can we obtain the approximate portraiture. We need to combine the commonplace representation of the man Socrates by the matter-of-fact Xenophon, and even the lampoon of the Sophists in the comic satire of Aristophanes, with Plato's ideal of the great teacher, martyr, citizen, and philosopher, before we have the historic Socrates on our canvas. In like manner we are bound to take account of the Pauline Christ and that of the Ep. to the Hebrews, the 'unwritten words,' the threefold type of the Synoptists, and, above all, that representation which in this Gospel presses most near to that portion of His consciousness wherein He communes with the Father and with Himself. In these conversations and soliloquies the subjective element of the reporter is more conspicuous than elsewhere. The prince of biographers is he who is able to gather up the spirit and gist of a long conversation or discourse, and present it in the words of the Master Himself. This is exactly what John seems to have done, and thus he brings us nearer than any other to the great historic reality—'historic,' i.e. not, as often implied, on purely non-supernatural lines, but in the sense of objective fact.

The opponents of the authenticity of the Fourth Gospel urge that the writer, alike in his prologue and in the report of the Lord's words in the epilogue, and in the first Ep., adopts a style of expression which he puts into the mouth of Nathanael and Nicodemus, Mary and Martha, Caiaphas and Pilate, the blind man and John the Baptist, corresponding in diction so closely with the phraseology of Jesus, as to suggest that the Greek words of all the speakers, including the Lord Himself, are nothing else than St. John's own strongly characterized vocabulary and diction. Some of the most acute and learned defenders of the authenticity of the document have not hesitated practically to admit this contention. Watkins (in his Bampton Lectures, and in his article on the same theme in Smith's DB^{2}) has maintained the possibility of which we have spoken, and has endeavoured to account for the phenomena by the simple theory of translation from an Aramaic original. It is probable that some of the discourses have undergone this process of translation. There is a distinct tradition to a similar effect with reference to the Gospel of Matthew. The same peculiarity must be held equally possible in Mk and Lk. And many of the difficulties are surmounted in the present case by the theory of the translation of words uttered in Aramaic into the Greek of Jn, which, having been built up through long years, enabled him to make use of it in representing the words of others, and then he may have adopted the same favourite terms, and a somewhat similar construction of sentences on all occasions. But we cannot admit that this hypothesis completely satisfies the facts of the case.

ε. The diction of our Lord and of His biographer. There are peculiarities of diction, vocabulary, and structure which are certainly adopted by this writer—Gr. words are used by him and by no other, some of which are somewhat uncommon, such as ἄντλημα, ἀποσυνάγωγος, βιβρώσκειν, γλωσσόκομον, δακρύειν, δίδυμος, ἐπιχρίειν, θήκη, θρέμματα, κέρμα, κολλυβιστής, νιπτήρ, προσαίτης. But in respect of special vocabulary Jn does not differ from other writers of NT. Again, there is a peculiar fondness manifested in Gospel and Epistle for certain special and almost technical words, — which by frequent repetition acquire a deeper meaning,— such as φῶς (23 times), δόξα (42), κόσμος (78), μαρτυρία (47), γινώσκειν (55), πιστεύειν (98), σημεῖον (17 times). It is also clear that the writer adopted a Semitic connotation for ו in the καί which he makes do ample duty for the various connective particles of the Gr. tongue. A common phenomenon in the Johannine writings is simple juxtaposition of sentences, often producing by the mere use of καί, and in fact sometimes without it, an adversative, concessive, or peculiar emphasis (1^{4} 15^{24} 3^{11} 5^{39}). The very common antithesis of μέν and δέ is almost dropped, and καί repeatedly made to represent δέ. It is curious that the writer, after using λόγος in ch. 1, subsequently drops it and never puts it into the lips of Jesus. It recurs in the 1 Ep. (ch. 1) and in the Apocalypse. It therefore becomes clear by this and many other passages and peculiarities that the author had a Greek diction somewhat peculiar to himself, which he used when following his own lines of meditation or narrative. Attention may also be called to the remarkable fact, that he puts into the lips of our Lord no fewer than 145 words which he never uses in his own person. Thirty-eight of these are found also in the Synop. account of our Lord's discourses. A similar peculiarity of expression or construction is reserved by the writer for Jesus, but never adopted by himself. There are nine peculiarities of our Lord's diction, such as the reduplicated 'Amen,' which are peculiar to Jn and never found elsewhere. There are 500 words which are freely used by him in his own portions of the Gospel or in the words of one or other of the interlocutors, which he never attributes to our Lord, so that the phenomena of translation still leave some problems to be solved by closer investigation. That there was a certain amount of translation is obvious, and some strong subjective element in the selection and arrangement of material cannot be ignored; but an effort must have been made to conserve the sacred words of the Lord Jesus in a phraseology which was supposed especially adapted to represent and enshrine the original utterances of the Master. This becomes more obvious when the evangelist frequently comes into direct communication with his reader: when he speaks in propriâ personâ occasionally he offers a commentary on the words of our Lord, perhaps even an expansion along certain lines of his own, of the words of Jesus which, though he caught them (and even transferred them into Gr.), he had not fully comprehended. These contrasts between the writer's memories and his explanations, both of the narrative and of the discourse, deserve far more attention than they have received.

The surpassing majesty of the Prologue (1^{1-18}) indicates that the mind of the writer was interpenetrated, overwhelmed with the effect produced by his contact with the Lord Jesus Christ. Clearly, he could think of Him as nothing less than 'the only-begotten of the Father,' as the Agent by whom the fulness of grace and truth broke upon the world,—and yet he drew a distinction between ὁ θεός and the λόγος as divine element in Jesus, although in the same breath declaring an identity between them. The Word, said he, was 'in the beginning,' and 'with God,' and yet 'was God.' It was 'the Word' by whom 'all things' came into being. The Word was both the source and the sphere of life, of that life which was light. All the light which had ever flashed into the darkness, and which the darkness was too gross to admit, was the beaming of His face. This conflict with the darkness resulted in most tragical issues. Nevertheless, this Word at length came into the world, and did so along fresh lines, not merely as eminent in all life and light, but as a fully constituted humanity—'flesh.' From this point onward he proceeded to show how the soliloquies and words of Jesus fell upon his sensitive and susceptible soul, as belonging rather to eternity than to time, as voices which had in them an infinity of meaning and of truth. He selected a few only of these for description and comment, and they grew in weight and wonder till he laid down the pen. At the same time, we feel that the Lord did not write, and could not have written, the Prologue. The logical exordium, the sublime climax, were neither in our Lord's own manner nor in His own phrase, as afterwards reported by the evangelist. A full discussion of this comparison must be reserved for some other place, but a brief treatment of a few of the most salient passages may be attempted.

ζ. The incommensurability between the writer and his theme. We come into close contact with the writer in the following passages:—1^{25} $2^{9-11.\ 21\ 23-25}$ $3^{18-21.\ 23}$, possibly $^{34-36}$ 4^{4-6} 5^{1-6} $6^{6.\ 15.\ 17.\ 64.\ 65}$ $7^{30.\ 39}$ $8^{9.\ 20}$ $9^{7.\ 22}$ $10^{41.\ 42}$ $11^{6.\ 13.\ 33-35.\ 51.\ 52}$ $12^{16.\ 33.\ 37-43}$, possibly 12^{46-50} $13^{1-6.\ 11.\ 28-30}$ 16^{17-19} 17^{3} $18^{4.\ 9.\ 14.\ 28.\ 32}$ $19^{14.\ 24.\ 28.\ 35-37}$ $20^{30.\ 31}$ $21^{4.\ 23-25}$. These passages are independent of pure narrative, and are selected mainly because the writer essays to inform his readers of the secret sentiment of the disciples or of others, which does not appear in the narrative itself, but still more because of the way in which he attempts to make more obvious the words of the Lord Himself, when the wisdom of his interpretation, though doubtless up to a point conveying a deep or an obvious meaning, is not equal to the accuracy of his report. Only a few of these can be indicated here. 2^{21} 'But he spake of the temple of his body,' was doubtless a natural inference of a believer in the bodily resurrection of Jesus from the death to which the Sadducean party would in the main condemn Him. The first notes of the death-peal were sounded in the temple. The departure of Jesus from Jerus. was proof of the kind of reception which the great Prophet received from 'his own' as soon as 'darkness' set itself to quench the new 'light.' This was one and the nearest interpretation. But with all the subsequent history of the spiritual temple of believing men, and of the rapidity—the 'three days'—in which the new body and temple rose into spiritual splendour and sufficiency, it is difficult to believe that the evangelist sounded or grasped all the significance of the weighty words. The question whether 3^{16} or $^{18-21}$, and again $^{34-36}$, are expansions of the remembered and cited words of Jesus and the Baptist in the explanatory terms of the evangelist, cannot be discussed here, yet would not have arisen if criticism had not recognized in both places the subtle difference between the individuality of the evangelist and the style of each of his masters. The frequent reference to 'the hour' of Jesus, as in 7^{30} 8^{20}, suggests the knitted, anxious brow of the evangelist as he watched the approach of crisis, and the mysterious deliverance of the Lord from the malice, the arrest, the stones of His enemies. It is curious that many of the chief puzzles of exegesis are to be found in the evangelist's own comment or narrative. By far the most difficult theological crux is 7^{39}, which perhaps yields its treasure up to patient inquiry; but the statement of the passage is entirely due to 'John,' viz., that 'until Jesus was glorified' the Holy Spirit was not, had not been ('given' or 'manifested'). This assertion is apparently discordant with the teaching of Christ and his apostles, and of John himself. It was a question of 'more' or 'less,' not a contrast between nothing and something. The fulness or splendour of the new dispensation varies with the vital truth and revelation of God wherewith He energizes in the consciousness and even below the consciousness. The contrast between the quickening of intelligence under the OT, and the descent of the Holy Spirit upon Jesus, is so great as to account for John's words, and a fortiori the contrast between the ministry of the synagogue and the ascended Lord. The evangelist makes a great and unintentional revelation of himself in 13^{1-5}. His mind must have been working in flights of unparalleled ecstasy when he endeavoured to convey the impression which the feet-washing had made upon him. But the style of the passage, the assumption of co-ordinate emotions in the bosom of Jesus, and the motives not verbally revealed, differ profoundly from the diction and method of thought of the Lord Himself. St. John was able to represent the tones of the 'eternal now' when recording the words of Jesus, but when he tried to reflect the motives or inner spirit of Christ he could find no adequate language.

The purport of the Gospel and the plan and classification of its subject-matter have been variously presented by successive critics and commentators from Lampe of Utrecht (1724) to the present hour under the handling of Reuss, Godet, Luthardt, Thoma, and Beyschlag. Because the structure of this very wonderful book reveals a gathering intensity of meaning, and the succession of events a climacteric force, it does not follow that the broad outline of the chronology has been tampered with in either historical or theological interests. Many of the lives of our greatest men naturally arrange themselves in epochs, great opportunities, deep sayings of historic significance, crises, tragedies—as, e.g., those of Socrates, Cæsar, Buddha, Luther, William of Orange. Now, if we can accept the fundamental idea of God manifest in the flesh, we are satisfied that the most unsympathetic narrator would unconsciously sift material, and gather climax, and glow with dramatic intensity in spite of himself. The Synoptic narrative, with its most solemn and far-reaching suggestions, has prepared the way for the Fourth Gospel, which everywhere presupposes the existence of the wider and more copious detail. It lays down firmly the chronological points, between which it is not impossible to show that the vistas of miracle, parable, self-revelation open out. The non-obtruded but certain septenary arrangement, the gathering of the glory as the story moves from eternity to eternity, the poetic framework showing that from the great deep to the great deep it goes, does not disturb its true proportions of credible and realizable fact.

η. The order of the thought due to the evangelist.—We will make some attempt to show what is the actual order of the thought, whether intentional or not, on the part of the evangelist. As many writers show careful and subtle alliteration in their prose, rhythm and accentuation in their poetry, without any consciousness on their part, so the progress of the thought comes into view with the evolution of the life and self-revelation.

A. Proem. chs. 1–4 contain specimens of the nature and method of the Lord—first manifestations of the Logos Incarnate to His own, to Israel, and the world.—i. Prologue, 1^{1-18}. Explanation of the astonishing phenomena which Jn proceeds to record. Jesus is all that Synoptists endeavoured to prove, viz. Messiah, Son of God, Son of Man; but to St. John He is all this, because He is the incarnation of 'the Word,' v.^{14}, who is in the beginning 'with God' and 'God,' and has been variously manifested and active before the incarnation, in nature, prophecy, conscience, and grace.

ii. The testimonies of the forerunner, 1^{19-34}.

iii. The testimony of the first witnesses, 1^{35-51}.

iv. The testimony of two great signs, 2–3^{2}.

v. Revelation of heavenly things and the new life and redemption; meaning of the whole revelation, 3^{3-21}.

vi. The final testimony of the great seer, 3^{22-36}.

vii. The ministry of the Lord beyond the limits of the theocracy, the Life-giver, the Prophet, and Saviour, 4^{1-42}.

viii. The summation of the Galilæan ministry, 4^{43-54}.

B. The conflict of the Logos Incarnate with His own people, down to the signing of the death-warrant, chs. 5–11.

i. Christ (a) the source of life and healing to body and soul, of sabbatic rest and of resurrection glory, 5^{1-29}; (b) the witnesses to these claims, 5^{30-40}.

ii. Christ sustains the life of which He is the source, 6^{1-71}. (a) The signs (on land and sea) of creative power and love, 6^{1-21}. (b) The interpretation of the signs, $6^{22\text{ff.}}$. (c) Effect—increase of enmity and intensifying of faith, $6^{41\text{ff.}\ 60\text{ff.}}$.

iii. The truth. Dramatic scenes; conflicting parties, with murderous designs, thwarted, including the story of the adulteress, 7–8^{11}.

iv. The light of the world (8^{12}–9^{41}) vindicated by word and sign. The correlative Giver of sight as well as light, with conflicting issues.

v. The Shepherd of the flock of God, 10^{1-21}.

vi. Identity of essence and function with the Father (10^{22-42}), where the assumption is challenged and vindicated by word and sign.

vii. (a) The vanquisher of death and Hades (11^{1-57}), and the claim to be the 'Resurrection and the Life.'

(b) The different effect produced upon different classes, especially on the ecclesiastical powers. The ban of condemnation confirmed and published.

C. The close of the public ministry.

i. The feast of love and gratitude, and the presage of the burial, 12^{1-8}.

ii. The diverse effects of the sign, 12^{9-11}.

iii. The challenge of the authorities, 12^{12-19}.

iv. The request of the Greeks and the reply of Jesus, including the glorification of the Son of Man in and through death, and the anticipation of Gethsemane, 12^{20-29}.

v. Last words, and the reflections of the evangelist, 12^{30-50}.

D. The final manifestation of the Word Incarnate as love unto the uttermost, chs. 13–17.

I. The inner glorification of the perfect love to His own disciples.—i. Self-abandoning service, while simultaneously giving the highest expression of His divine commission and His God-consciousness, 13^{1-17}.

ii. Followed by the exclusion of the faithless disciple. 'It was night,' 13^{18-30}.

iii. The last conversation and discourse. (1) The glorification of the Son of Man, with its great demand on the disciples, 13^{31-35}. (2) The question of Simon Peter and its terrible response and sublime consolations (13^{36}–14^{4}). (3) The question of Thomas—bringing out the reply, that He, by death, was their way to the Father, 14^{5-7}. (4) The question of Philip, with greater revelations and the promise of the greater works, 14^{8-21}. (5) The question of Judas, the conditions of His self-manifestation, 14^{22-31}. (6) The parable of the Vine and its branches, 15^{1-10}. (7) The results of the union of Christ and His disciples—bitter but glorious, 15^{11}–16^{6}. (8) The promise of the Paraclete, 16^{7-33}. (9) The high-priestly intercession for Himself, for His disciples, for the whole Church, 17^{1-28}.

II. The more outward and public glorification in the passion, 18–19^{42}.—i. The betrayal, 18^{1-12}.

ii. Examination before Annas, with the discomfiture and denial of Simon Peter, 18^{13-27}.

iii. The Roman trial, presupposing the decision of the Sanhedrin, 18^{28}–19^{16}.

iv. The crucifixion. Love unto the uttermost, 19^{17-24}.

v. The words from the cross, 19^{25-30}.

vi. The side-piercing and the burial, 19^{31-42}.

III. The final glorification and the Resurrection.

(1) The evangelist's own personal conviction, 20^{1-10}.

(2) The manifestation to adoring love, 20^{11-18}.

(3) The manifestation to the ten disciples and others, $20^{19.\ 20}$.

(4) The peace, the gift of the Spirit, 20^{21-23}.

(5) The manifestation to anxious scepticism, eliciting the cry, 'My Lord and my God,' 20^{24-29}.

(6) The evangelist's summation of His argument throughout, $20^{30.\ 31}$.

IV. The Epilogue.

(1) The manifestation of Himself in the work of life, 21^{1-14}.

(2) The service of love. The rehabilitation of, and solemn charge given to, Simon Peter, 21^{15-19}.

(3) Special manifestation to waiting love, 21^{20-23}.

(4) Identification of the author by subsequent editors with the disciple whom Jesus loved, $21^{24\text{f.}}$.

By whomsoever this marvellous document was constructed, it is unique in literature. The concentration and supernatural fulness of the subject-matter — sentence within sentence, hint within hint—reveals worlds of reality with the prodigality wherewith Nature surprises us. An immensely difficult task has been successfully finished by the simplest means; the Divine-Human Christ of the Ep. to Hebrews and the Christ of Ro 3 and 8 and 1 Co 1–4 and 10–15, of Eph and Col, nay, the mysterious personality of Rev 1–3, is not incompatible with the preacher of the Sermon and the parables of the Sower, the Drag-net, and the Prodigal Son; and here He lives before us, and there is no inconsistency. The Supreme Man reveals Himself, still without comparison or analogy or rival, among the sons of men. He stands absolutely alone, yet infinitely near, the one who sums up but transcends all physical and physiological law. All attempts to account for the document upon principles other than those we have contended for, every hypothesis made to bring it down to the middle of the 2nd cent., and there to find an occasion or an author, must be pronounced to have failed, and we fall back upon the memories and love of the first generation or two after this great revelation had been made. It is bound by links which cannot be broken, to the history, the geography, the religion of the day, but transcends as yet all mere human history or known ways of nature.

VII. Literature. — The translation by C. R. Gregory of Luthardt's St. John, the Author of the Fourth Gospel, is enriched by a voluminous list of all the works and pamphlets written on the positive and negative side of this prolonged controversy, from Evanson, an Anglican clergyman in 1792, to Beyschlag in 1875. It occupies eighty 8vo pages. Crombie in his tr. of Meyer's Comm. on Jn has furnished an ample catalogue of selected works, bearing more upon the interpretation and exegesis of the text than on the controversy about its origin. These lists were completed in 1875. Watkins' Bampton Lectures have carried critical and classified enumeration to a later date. A digest of the most noteworthy literature and epoch-making works is all that can be here appended.

Evanson (Ipswich, 1792), with insufficient evidence, gave voice to a rising spirit of free-thinking among the English Deists of an earlier part of the century touching the 'dissonance of the four evangelists,' etc., and suggested that the Fourth was the work of a Platonist of the 2nd cent. Evanson was replied to by no other than Joseph Priestley and by James Simpson, and again took arms in 1794 in defence of his thesis. In 1796 Eckermann assailed the genuineness of the Gospels on the ground of the prominence therein given to miracles. He was one of the first who endeavoured to discriminate between the apost. or Johan. nucleus of the Gospel, and that which he thought had been added by later hands. Two years later, Eckermann retracted these views, 1798. Discussions prevailed between Schmidt and Bolton as to the original language, Syriac or Greek, in which the Gospel had first been written. In 1801 Vogel wrote a vulgar book in which he gave a melodramatic turn to the controversy by bringing the author of the Gospel for trial at the judgment day. Luthardt-Gregory enumerates about fifty works before 1820, but no deep impression was produced until the celebrated theologian Bretschneider issued his Modest Enquiries into the Genius and Origin of the Gospel and Epistle of John, in which he gathered to a point all the doubts that had been in the air for a generation. He was ably answered by Olshausen, Lücke, and others, and admitted that his doubts were resolved. Schleiermacher after this did not hesitate to recognize the true historical character of the Christ of John, anticipating views which have long been held in suspense. For several years the positions of Bretschneider were reconsidered by positive and negative critics. Paulus, de Wette, Sartorius, Stein, E. G. Bengel, Hase's different editions of his Leben Jesu, 1829 and 1834, and fifty other publications, prepared the way for the four edd. of the celebrated Life of Jesus by Strauss, 1835-1840, with which it is well to compare Das Leben Jesu für das Deutsche Volk, 1864. Neander's Life of Christ largely contributed to the refutation of Strauss, just as the latter had reduced to ridicule the rationalistic anti-supernaturalism of Paulus. Bruno Bauer (1840) made it clear that the mythical theory could not explain the Fourth Gospel, which throughout reveals the presence of a commanding thinker, who, if not a poet of distinct romantic faculty, must have been a wilful forger. Ebrard and others handled this hypothesis with severity. De Wette, Schenkel (1840), Reuss, Schwegler, and many others, grappled with special aspects of the many-sided controversy. In 1840 the highly important Introd. and Comm. of Lücke of Göttingen appeared, followed in 1852 by his celebrated Einleitung in die Offenbarung des Johannes, in which the authenticity of the Gospel is sustained by referring the Apocalypse to the Presbyter. Cf. Luthardt, De Compositione Evangelii Johannis. Andrews Norton, Genuineness of the four Gospels, 1837-1848, made a most notable contribution to the discussion as it stood before the efforts of Baur of Tübingen. The latter epoch-making theologian commenced his assault by maintaining, in 1844, that the Gospel could not have been written before A.D. 160. In the Th. Jahrb. 1845, Zeller pushed the date forward another decade. Baur wrote Krit. Untersuch. über d. Canon. Evangelien, Einleit. in d. NT. theol. Wissenschaft (1850-51 of Th. Jahrb.), Das Christenthum und d. Christl. Kirche d. drei ersten Jahrh. (1853, 3rd ed. 1863). In 1854 he replied to Luthardt, Fr. Delitzsch, Brückner, and Hase, who had disputed his positions. Hilgenfeld, in 1854, Die Evangelien, does not consent to postpone the date of the origin beyond A.D. 120-140. Schneider, 1854, Die Aechtheit des Jn. Evangeliums nach den Äusseren Zeugnissen, made an able reply to Baur's treatment of the internal evidence. Scholten, Schürer (to some extent), Ebrard, Luthardt (with reference to the relation of the Gospel to Justin Martyr and the Clementines) fought the issues earnestly. In 1856 Jordan Bucher issued his Des Apostels Johannes Lehre vom Logos, nach ihrem Wesen und Ursprunge, and endeavoured to identify the Logos of 'John' and Philo; and in 1857 Baur again replied. The date of the last passover now took a prominent place in the debate, and Tholuck again defended the position of the Fourth Gospel. The main thesis of Baur and Hilgenfeld and others was the discovery of a system of Church organization and Christian ideas through which the Fourth Gospel could alone have seen the light. Baur supposes that the Gospel reveals the presence of the 2nd cent. Gnosis, and further, that it reflects the healing of a conjectural and violent schism between the Jerus. apostles and St. Paul, and the Churches which derived their origin and tone from these sources respectively. The two tendencies towards Judaic exclusiveness on the one hand and Pauline universalism on the other, were intensified by Marcionitic anti-Judaism on the one side and Montanistic revolt against the Episcopate on the other. In the writings of Baur the further speculation was hazarded, that towards the close of the 2nd cent. a tendency towards co-operation began; that the Epp. to Col, Eph, Ti and Tit, He, and the Bk. of Ac, were fabricated to bring about a fusion of the hostile parties; that this Gospel was a part of the system of forgeries by which the Cath. Church was originated. It is supposed that an unknown writer cunningly suggested that he was the beloved friend of Jesus and knew His inmost heart; His belief in the theocracy, that 'salvation was of the Jews,' but that God was 'a Spirit'; that among Greeks as well as Jews the buried corn of wheat would bring forth much fruit. This extraordinary writer was ready to justify the Montanistic realization of the grace of the Paraclete, and also, by a delicate series of modifications of the Synoptic tradition, to make the passover of the Jews reach its climax at the hour of the crucifixion; and he sought, moreover, to link the Christ with the ΛΟΓΟΣ of a popular philosophy. Every line of the Gospel was searched for confirmation of some portion of the hypothesis; and adverse elements were cleverly contrived to spread out the occasion for the publication of the spiritual Gospel. The strife between the Eastern and Western Churches as to the celebration of the Easter festival had broken out, and it was a masterstroke to show that one of the Jerus. apostles, who is traditionally reported to have followed the Jewish celebration on the 14th Nisan, the day preceding the crucifixion, had actually set forth the identification of the crucifixion of Jesus with the sacrifice of the paschal lamb. Baur fixed A.D. 170 as the date when this astonishing feat of forgery, concealed polemic, and spiritual manifesto, first saw the light. The question of this date was discussed with great acumen. Ebrard (Introd. to Comm.), Thiersch, Hilgenfeld, Lange, Steitz in numerous articles in German journals, with occasional replies from Baur, who died in 1860, kept the controversy before the world.

We have already shown reason to believe that the date assigned by Baur, viz. A.D. 170, is quite untenable, and that step by step the appearance of the Gospel must be antedated at least by forty years and pushed back to the time of Basilides or Valentinus, who must have had the ideas and phrases of the Gospel before them. It has at length become impossible to deny that Justin quoted from the Fourth Gospel, and increasingly probable that Tatian, his contemporary and disciple, actually constructed a Harmony of the Four Gospels, with a chronological basis in the Gospel of John. In 1862 H. Ewald showed that no authorship of an ancient writing is so conclusively attested as that of the Fourth Gospel (see Die Johan. Schriften übersetzt u. erklärt). Weiss and Weizsäcker discussed, in Jahrb. f. deutsche Theologie, the relation of the Logos doctrine of John to its sources. Strauss and Hilgenfeld, in 1863, made assault upon the Mur. Canon and on minor defences of the Gospel; Volkmar, Renan, A. Réville thought to rehabilitate the argument that if the Fourth Gospel had been in use in A.D. 150, Marcion would have found it more useful for his purpose than Luke's. We have elsewhere shown that Marcion could not even by mutilation have expunged from John's Gospel the humanity of Jesus, his reverence for the Old Covenant, his identification of 'the Lord' of OT, the Creator of all things, with the God and Father of Christ.

In 1863 van Oosterzee's Life of Christ, Hengstenberg's Comm. on Gospel, favoured, while Echthal's Les Évangiles attacked the authenticity. Martineau's review of Renan's Vie de Jésus, and Astié, Explication de l'Évangile, followed in 1864, with Nicholas' advocating of a partition theory. To this may be added Schenkel's Charakterbild Jesu, which suggested that the original nucleus of the Gospel appeared A.D. 110-120, and was afterwards coloured by the Gnostic speculations of Basilides and Valentinus. In 1866 Holtzmann in Bunsen's Bibelwerk, Pressensé in his Jésus Christ son temps sa vie, etc., and Sabatier, Essai sur les sources de la vie,—all three maintaining the authenticity,—were encountered by Keim, Geschichte Jesu von Nazara, etc., who argued (1867) that the Gospel was published at the beg. of 2nd cent. under the name of the Apostle John, who nevertheless had never been in Ephesus. Taylor, An Attempt to ascertain the Character of the Fourth Gospel in relation to the three first, was strongly opposed to the authenticity. Tobler attempted to cut out the original kernel, and later on (1870) he reduced it to 81 verses. Oosterzee and Scholten again took up opposite sides, so also Ezra Abbot, Higginson, Milligan, and S. Davidson. In 1868 Riggenbach endeavoured to show that the Presbyter John and the apostle were one and the same. In 1869 Holtzmann returned to the controversy, as did Meyer, Introd. to the Exeg. Handb., Godet, Komm. z. d. Ev. Johannis, written also in French and translated into English. Stanley Leathes' Boyle Lecture (1870) on The Witness of St. John to Christ and Hilgenfeld kept up the struggle. In 1871 Krenkel, in his work, Der Apostel Johannes, argued that the apostle was the author of Apoc., but not of Gospel; cf. Milligan, arts. in Contemp. Rev. and Brit. and For. Evang. Rev.; and Hutton, Essays, Theological and Literary, who defended with great force the historicity of the Gospel against Baur and his followers. Holtzmann once more took up the claims of John the Presbyter. In 1872 appeared the important Comm. and Introd. of Schaff, being a tr. and great enlargement of Lange's Comm. in his Bibelwerk; and the singularly valuable Authorship and Hist. Character of 4th Gospel, by Sanday, followed in 1876 by The Gospels in the 2nd Cent. In 1874 was published Supernatural Religion, An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation, which created almost a literature of reply. The anonymous writer was vehemently adverse to the authenticity of this Gospel (vol. ii. 251–476) on every ground and every side issue. Lightfoot in the Contemp. Rev. (afterwards republished); Sanday in the Gospels during the 2nd Cent.; Row, The Jesus of the Evangelists; Luthardt, Der Johan. Ursp. des 4ten Evang. (tr. into Eng. by C. R. Gregory, 1875),—replied very successfully. Farrar's Life of Christ (1874) sustained the authenticity; but Hilgenfeld, in 1875, in Hist.-Krit. Einleit. in das NT., determined the limits of production between A.D. 132 and 140. Mangold (Bleek's Einleit.) was again adverse, but Matthew Arnold, Review of Objections to Literature and Dogma, (Cont. Review, afterwards republished in God and the Bible), defended the authenticity with high literary tact, but by falling back in part on some special partition theory of his own. In 1882 the remarkable work appeared of Albrecht Thoma, Die Genesis des Johan. Evang.: ein Beitrag zu seiner Ausleg., Gesch., u. Kritik, in which the author endeavoured to find an Alex.-Philonic origin for the entire Gospel, which is dealt with as Philo handled the Pent., and which, on this hypothesis, could have had no meaning save among the Neoplatonic schools, where supposed forecasts and summaries of history were only cryptograms of philosophical theory, e.g. ch. 9 is regarded as a cipher of the position and career of St. Paul, and ch. 21 an outline of the history of the Acts of Apostles. With ingenuity the theory was carried through 879 pages. In 1882 (Eng. tr. 1883) appeared B. Weiss, Life of Christ. The chapters on the 'Johannine' sources are singularly impressive, and vindicate the historicity of the Gospel against the speculations of various offshoots of the Tübingen School. The theory of the reminiscence of one who had fathomed the deep secret of the Incarnate Logos in Jesus, interprets the author's 'ideal elevation and spiritual form, but also his historical trustworthiness. If it be regarded as the invention of a semi-Gnostic philosopher of the 2nd cent., it is a delusive will-o'-the-wisp—in truth, a gigantic lie.' In the same sense Godet's invaluable Introd. to his Commentary touches and illumines every part of this great subject (Eng. tr. 1887). In 1885 Salmon's Hist. Introd. to the Study of NT gave ample space and great freshness to the maintenance of the authenticity. Edward Reuss in his Hist. of Sac. Scrip. of NT, tr. into Eng. by Houghton from the 5th Germ. ed., with additional bibliographical details, minimized the value of the external evidence, and left it as only barely possible that Jn was the work of the apostle. The introductory discussions of Hengstenberg are scattered throughout his Commentary. Special excursuses on the Paschal and other questions are to be found in M'Clellan's great work on the Gospels. Against Edwin Abbott's view in his article 'Gospels' in Encyc. Brit.^{9} may be put Ezra Abbot's External Evidence of the Fourth Gospel, and Westcott's Introd. to his invaluable Comm. on the Gospel in Speaker's Commentary (and published separately); also Milligan and Moulton, Introd. to their Comm. in Schaff's Popular Commentary, and Watkins' Introd. to Comm. in Ellicott's Comm. for Eng. Readers, as well as his very important discussion of the history of criticism in Bampton Lectures for 1890; Reynolds' Introd. to his Comm. on Jn in the Pulpit Commentary. Keim in his voluminous Life of Jesus of Nazara settled down to the date A.D. 130 and to a repudiation of St. John's residence in Ephesus. He decided that early antiquity was grievously misled by Irenæus in this and other respects, just as Riggenbach, Farrar, and others think that the very personality of 'John the Presbyter' has been created by an ill-starred guess of Eusebius. In Handkom. z. NT ('Joh. Evangelium'), Holtzmann, 1890, argues that the most extreme critical view which he adopts doubles the value of the Gospel. Edersheim's Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah (1883) throws vivid light upon the Johan. as well as other sources of the great biography by his intimate acquaintance with Heb. literature. In 1890 Hugo Delff, Das 4 Evangelium, and (1883) in his Grundzüge des Entwick.-Geschichte d. Religion, advocated a special view which creates many fresh difficulties, that 'John' was neither the son of Zebedee, nor John the Presbyter, nor the author of the Apoc., but a well-to-do philosophical disciple of Jesus, whom He loved and who was specially acquainted with the ministry in Jerus., who was subsequently confounded with the John of Acts and Apocalypse. P. Ewald, in 1890, Das Hauptproblem der Evangelienfrage, strove to bring out the original Johan. nucleus of the entire evangelical tradition, of which John has given the richest anthology. In 1891 Gloag issued Introd. to the Johan. Writings. This is one of the most complete résumés of the entire question in the light of modern criticism, embracing not only the Gospel but the Epp. and the Apocalypse. Harnack in his History of Dogma, vol. i. 96–98, admits that the origin of the Johan. writings is 'a marvellous enigma,' that therein a Christ clothes the indescribable with words, that a Pauline Christ walks on the earth 'far more human than the Christ of Paul, yet far more divine.' He seems to admit that Christ Himself is the author of ch. 17, but all is suffused in a bright cloud of the supra-historical. He repudiates the dependence on Philo and Hellenism, with which John has little in common but the word λόγος, and he regards the author as a born Jew. Important articles have appeared at various times in the Expositor by Lightfoot, Sanday, and others. In 1891 Willibald Beyschlag of Halle published his NT Theol. (Eng. tr. 1895). In vol. i. pp. 216–221 he avows his firm conviction of the genuineness of the Gospel, that it rests on historic facts and is superior to the Synoptists in many important details, that 'the Logos Romance' is a critical failure, and, notwithstanding great difficulties, he imagines that the subjective element necessary to a character formed and trained by the Master Himself may solve them.

VIII. The Teaching of the Fourth Gospel.

—A. Theology and Christology.—The teaching of Jesus cannot be satisfactorily discriminated from that of the evangelist, except in places where the latter speaks in propriâ personâ, or offers his interpretation of the Master's words. Alike in the Epistle and Prol. to Gospel, the apostle sums up or generalizes the teaching of Christ or of His mighty deeds, and for the ideas, thought by thought, fact by fact, he brings out a justification in the narrative itself. As to the Abbrechungen and Incongruenzen on which Wendt insists as indicating different strains of thought and purpose, e.g. in the different estimate of ἔργα, σημεῖα, and ῥήματα in the great plan of the Supreme Teacher, the reconciliation is not far to seek, and is to be found in the divine-human majesty of the Lord, whose Personality gives unity to all his representation. The consciousness of the Lord Jesus, as brought out in the fourfold revelation, provides the fact upon which the constructive intelligence of later centuries has founded its doctrine of the GODHEAD. To put it in a word, the Doctrine of the Divinity is simply an endeavour to state without explanation the various elements of that unique consciousness. The most fundamental element in the entire teaching is the absolute oneness of the Deity. Christ never taught the existence of two or three Gods, though the unity or solity embraced the divine indwelling in the entire universe, an infinite transcendence involving the internal relations of Fatherhood and Sonship, and all the mighty operations of the Spirit in the world and in the minds of men. There is only one veritable God, μόνος ἀληθινὸς θεός (17^{3}), although the Lord was self-conscious of the nearest possible approach of the centres of the spheres, both of His divine and human nature, to the Centre of the all-including and embracing Unity. The theophanies of the OT are outshone by the eternal knowledge of the Only-begotten (1^{18} and 6^{46}), and the adequate sufficing power of the human life and consciousness of Jesus to disclose the secrets of the divine bosom. This revelation differs widely from the Gnostic or Oriental or modern impersonality, 'the Absolute.' Here the ineffable is clothed in forms not incompatible with the Eternal Unity. 'Father,' 'Son,' 'Word,' 'Love,' 'Life,' 'Light,' 'Spirit' are terms which make no schism of the one Deity, but are each necessary concepts in it. This is so complete and thoroughgoing that Fairbairn has skilfully pressed the position that the Lord Jesus was in fact the first monotheist in the history of the world.

A few of the elements of this great synthesis must be specified.

(1) In $4^{24\text{ff.}}$ the spirituality of the One who is called 'the Father' is insisted upon. The spirit of man leads the way to the most direct realization of the Eternal.

(2) He is the living and life-giving One, or even Life itself. In the Logos—who is God—there is Life. The mystery of 'life' was not solved, or a definition given, by Jesus or the evangelists; nor is the mystery reduced, but intensified, by the widest and latest researches of science; but St. John may at least be credited with seeing behind the inexplicable phenomena of 'life'—physical, ethical, spiritual, and eternal—nothing less than the personal activity of the Lord God, the Living One.

(3) In this life is light. In 1 Jn 1^{5} God is (not luminous, but) 'Light, and in him is no darkness at all,' no evil, no imperfection, absolute purity, goodness, righteousness, and illumination (Jn 17^{25} $1^{4.\,5}$).

(4) The most characteristic doctrine of God which we must attribute to the evangelist is that God is Love (1 Jn 4^{8}), or that the most essential quality and absolute essence of God is that which freely lavishes Himself on the objects of His love. The moral perfections which our Lord attributes to this living and loving One are truth (8^{26}), righteousness (17^{25}), and holiness (17^{11}).

(5) But the most characteristic name and function is that of 'Father,' 'my Father,' 'your Father,' the 'living Father' who has life in Himself (5^{26}), who seeks for spiritual worshippers (4^{23}, where the vital internal relation between God as Father and God as Spirit is made very evident). This fatherly love is, first of all, lavished on the Son and on those who are given to Him. He becomes the source of life to others, and in Him God loves the world ($5^{19.26}$ 10^{17} $17^{24.26}$ and 3^{16}). Preparation for this revelation of Fatherhood is found in OT and Hel. thought and in the Synop. teaching, but the Fourth Gospel is peculiarly saturated with the ennobling and uplifting thought. Here we come face to face with one who could speak of the Almighty as 'my Father.' He was the 'wisdom' and the 'power' of God, not only (as St. Paul represented it) as the 'image,' but as 'the Son of His love.' The relation of Logos to Theos is warmed into the deeper relation of Son to Father, the Only-begotten to the Eternal. The Fatherhood is essential to God, and therefore eternal. If the Father be thought of as the Supreme Giver evermore lavishing upon an adequate object His own fulness of being, then the Son also is eternal, and from the relation between the giver and receiver, between the Father and Son, does the very conception of Deity emerge. From before all time and worlds, and independently of time or space, the writer saw the infinite giving and receiving of Eternal Love; and he saw in the completeness of the mutual relation the moral and spiritual ἀρχή of the universe. This is not the monad of the Platonic schools or the Gnostic sects, but the living fulness of an infinite Personality, within which there is the reciprocal interchange of gracious and everlasting relations. St. John is alive to the primordial rank and supremacy of the Father, and tells us by the lips of the Divine Son that the Father is the source of all power, and of the self-dependence of the Son. 'He gave to the Son to have life in himself,' He is 'greater' than the Son, 'gives the Spirit' to the Son without measure, He 'sent the Son into the world' to learn and fulfil all His will (5^{27} 10^{31-37} 14^{24}). Yet the unity and the solity of the Eternal turns upon this very relation; and so identical is the substance and will of the Father and Son, that 'all things,' πάντα, flow out of the mutual relation (1^{1-3}), the monarchy of the Father compatible with unity of the Father and Son.

(6) The relation of Logos to Theos, as conceived by the evangelist, is sustained by the successive words and deeds of Jesus which had slowly broken on the mind of the writer. The majestic words of the Prologue which are repeated in the opening sentences of the Ep. are the necessary antecedents of the events, the twofold meaning and ambiguity of the term Logos, connoting the self-consciousness and the necessarily connected utterance of the Eternal Theos. This Logos so interpreted is both 'God' and 'with God' at once. He is the organ of divine activity and the great image of His glory. Beyschlag, in his attempt to reduce all the subsequent narrative to the ordinary human consciousness of Jesus, appears to ignore or minimize the supra-historic basis which precedes the historic narrative. Before the manifestation in the flesh of Christ, the Logos was the divine agent of creation. No element of matter, no thrill of force, no harmony or beauty of the cosmos was excluded. The life and light of God streamed forth from Him. The divine immanence in nature and man was His function. The darkness was not in harmony with the Light, and did not apprehend it. He came age after age to His own, to those who were prepared by conscience, providence, and prophecy, and His own received Him not. The Logos even to the present hour, is working in events, laws, and forces, designing and forecasting and evolving the eternal purpose; yet the world and even His own know it not, nay, He is rejected and despised. An element of deep tragedy has entered into human nature which has ever resisted Omnipotence, but never exhausted the resources of divine love. Conscience, even the 'light which lighteth every man,' was reinforced by prophetic voices, of which the Baptist was the highest type, and the conflict between the Spirit and the flesh, the light and the darkness, the Logos and humanity, is always in progress. The victory over the world and the flesh has made still greater demand upon an infinite compassion, and so we are led on to believe in a higher and more convincing contact of the Logos with human nature. The indwelling of the Logos with the cosmos falls immeasurably short of the Incarnation, i.e. of an event which is described in the assurance (v.^{14}) that the Word became flesh. The Logos did not become 'all things,' but became σάρξ, to heal the source of human corruption, and consummate the plan of God.

(7) The entire Johannine conception turns on what is meant by these words. Is the synthesis of the divine and human such as obliterates either of the two elements in the Christ; or is it one which, while preserving both in their completeness, stretches the vinculum between them, so that it snaps, and there is left no other than a human Saviour, after all? Beyschlag objects to the ecclesiastical orthodoxy, and wisely discounts the Kenotic theories of Gess, Thomasius, Godet, Pressensé, and others, on the ground that if our Lord never adopted phraseology incompatible with 'mere humanity,' the idea of a divine consciousness and the hypothesis of a true incarnation could never have arisen. Putting aside the two extremes of Nestorian and Monophysite interpretation, and shrinking from the Catholic acceptance of what is true in both, Beyschlag falls back upon the bare human consciousness and historical surroundings of Jesus. He reviews the great sayings of our Lord which affirm a remembrance of 'the glory which he had with the Father before the world was' ($17^{5.24}$), or which assert a conscious existence before Abraham (8^{58}), or which indicate a realization of being 'in heaven' while yet on earth (3^{13}), or which refer to His descent from heaven and return thither ($6^{33.51.62}$), and affirm conscious unity with the Father. In doing this the critic is content with a purely Ebionitic interpretation which leaves the mystery of the greatest fact in the history of the moral world entirely unsolved. He falls back upon a method of interpreting Christ's own pre-existence, corresponding with the Rabbin. method of regarding things of high value, such as the ark of the covenant, as 'eternally pre-existent in God.' By the use of metaphor, or fervid imagination, or intense prophetic or mystic realization of the divine indwelling, and full reconciliation with God, even absorption into the divine fulness, the expressions arose from which he supposes the Christian faith to have had its origin. A similar interpretation of the words and the consciousness of Jesus is advocated in Drummond's Hibbert Lecture, Via Veritas Vita, where we seem called upon to forgive our Lord the use of phrases which, after all, are only the commonplaces of the religious life.

The statement, ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο, does not, in John's usage, mean a transubstantiation of λόγος into σάρξ, so that henceforth there is no longer λόγος but only σάρξ, seeing that the evangelist (2^{9}) uses a precisely similar phrase to denote 'the water which had become wine.' As the water took up into itself elements not previously in it, so the eternal Logos took up human nature into Himself, and this is enough for humiliation of the Infinite Love. The method of the consciousness can only occasionally (if ever) be given its fulness, but the three axes of revolution in succession suggest the entire mystery. These are 'the Son of God,' 'the Son of Man,' and the 'Christ'; and these remarkable terms are found in the Synoptic Gospels in much the same sense as in the Fourth.

The first, Son of God, is an honorific ascription when used by the disciples or by the Jews, and it is nearly if not perfectly identical with 'Messiah.' It is paralleled by the extraordinary prevalence of like terms among surrounding religions and nations. In Egypt the same king is often set forth on monuments as 'the son' and 'beloved' of many different personages of the Pantheon. God-born was the highest superlative to denote glory and authority. Nathanael ($1^{50.\,51}$) identifies 'the Son of God' with the theocratic king. Martha (11^{27}) anticipates the advent of one so near to and beloved of God as to have power over death and Hades. Still, the Synoptic citation of the adjuration of Caiaphas shows that he regarded the title, not only as an honorific term for Messiah, but as one which it was blasphemy to assume. The claim to be 'Son of God' in a unique sense, a sense that associated Him with God and enthroned Him as supreme Judge, was the specific charge on which Jesus was condemned by the Sanhedrin. Not merely is He the human offspring of the eternal God, but, as He spake of Himself, pre-eminently the Son, the highest expression of the relation of Son to Father, the archetype of Sonship in itself. Doubtless He is 'sent into the world,' to reveal the Father because He is the eternal spectator and companion of the Father, the object of eternal love, the conscious exposition of the Father's character and grace. The entire term is chastened and exalted by the ordered sequence of events. In $3^{28.\,29}$ $4^{25.\,29}$ 6^{14} the expected 'Prophet' rather than the triumphant 'King' comes into view, and Simon Peter's confession ($6^{68f.}$ RV) shows that he had grasped the richer aspect of Messiahship which Jesus now permits to become His self-revelation. $12^{12-19.\,34-36}$ convey the most explicit acceptance of the term by Him, and He actually uses it in the intercessory prayer (17^{3}). The entire progress of the thought culminating in 20^{31} shows that the evangelist blended into one the correlated ideas of 'Logos made flesh,' 'the Son of God,' and 'the Christ.'

The other term Son of Man is a mode of expression which, with only two exceptions (Ac 7^{56}, Rev 1^{13}), is never used by any of the disciples, but is confined to His own self-designation. It is being more and more conceded by criticism that the expression is not a euphemism for 'man' as in the prophecies of Ezekiel, or a translation of the Aram. 'bar-enosh,' but a reflection of the transcendent meaning assigned to it in Dn 7. The ideal man there is lifted into the highest glory, and receives an eternal kingdom. It is as Son of Man that Jesus claims to be Lord of the Sabbath, the forgiver of sin, the judge of quick and dead. In the Synoptic representations and in this Gospel He calls himself Son of Man, because of the divine nature which is the substratum and explanation of the human. In 3^{14} 5^{27} and elsewhere we find in this title a revelation of the highest glory and the most perfect sympathy, not a tertium quid, neither God nor man, but at once both God and man. He was known to be Son of Man, the highest, holiest man, by the experience of those who knew Him best. He did not hesitate to use the title of Himself. The inference was, and still is, that He is 'Son of God,' i.e. that the divine will and indwelling must be presupposed to justify such a term.

(8) The relation of the Father and the Son, or of Theos and Logos, does not exhaust the Johannine conception of 'the only true God.' Indeed the OT writers speak of the Spirit of God as the agent of the Eternal in creation, as the primal source of the human Ego, and as discriminating the living soul of man from that of the animal. With them Spirit is the cause of all beauty or genius, of all prophetic gift, and all sanctifying grace. The Spirit of God is by the Synoptists set forth as the occasion of the humanity and formation of the person of the Lord Jesus. The divine personal Spirit perfects the human character and completes the official equipment of the Son of Man to be the Saviour of the world. So completely is He dominated by the Spirit, that He claims to communicate the Holy Spirit to others (Mt 3^{11}, cf. Lk 11^{13}), while the Pauline teaching identifies the Spirit of Christ with that of the Father (Ro 8^{9-11}). The NT yearns after the unity of the self-conscious Father and the self-conscious Son—the unity of the divine nature as self-conscious in the Christ, together with the conscience of human nature, the unity of all believers in one body by the One all co-ordinating Head. These unities find their best explanation in the Lord's own teaching concerning the Spirit. In the Synop. (Mt $12^{29.\,32}$ and parallel passages) the dispensation of the Son of Man is contrasted with the dispensation of the Spirit; and in the Fourth Gospel Christ claims to give the Spirit to the Church, that the world may be convinced 'of sin, righteousness, and judgment.' The Lord so states the relation of the Holy Spirit to His own consciousness, that He identifies the coming of the Comforter with His own return. The indwelling of the Father and of the Son in human souls is effectuated by nothing less than the Spirit, i.e. by the activity and personality of all the fulness of the Godhead. His advent was an incoming to souls both of the Father and of the Son, for the one cannot be without the other. Beyschlag, Reuss, and others seem anxious lest they find anything like Trinitarian doctrine in these numberless references to the Ego of the Father, of the Son, of the Spirit, of the Christ. The Unitarian development of the 4th to the 6th cent. is not homogeneous, because encumbered by the attempt to repudiate the philosophical explanations of the so-called heretics. The Gospels, and particularly the Fourth, like the greatest symbols of the faith, are content to say (a) that Jesus was Son of Man; to show that He was Man in body, soul, spirit, will—Man, i.e. in all respects, in birth, frailty, limitations, sufferings, and death; (b) that the mind of Jesus sounded also the depth of the divine consciousness, so that in His full personality He had dwelt in the bosom of the Father and was able to reveal Him (1^{18}); (c) that in the completing and glorifying of the Son of Man, in the resurrection and ascension of the Christ, the God-man shared finally in the very glory of the Eternal.

B. The Johannine Teaching concerning the Cosmos.—(a) The evangelist, following his Master, discriminates the world of things from that of men. Everywhere the cosmos is created, not self-originated. It is the platform of the entire representation, and consists both of heaven and earth. It is not evil in its origin or essence, though it is the theatre of both moral perversity and divine redemption. (b) The Gospel and Epp. use κόσμος for humanity considered apart from grace, just as they use σάρξ for human nature apart from the spiritual life.

This may include humanity in its pride, power, civilization, and refinement. To this is not given the faculty of knowing the Eternal Father ('The world hath not known thee'), or of discerning the pre-incarnate Logos, or even of seeing the Father in the Son of His love. The world of men strangely hates the highest light and shrinks from it (3^{19}), neither comes to it. The Father loves the world in its need (3^{16}); Jesus comes into it to 'save,' to 'draw it,' and to be a way for it unto the Father. There is vivid contrast between those who see the light, who live the heavenly life, who are 'convinced of sin, righteousness, and judgment,' who overcome the darkness and the flesh, who follow the Good Shepherd, who feed on the bread of God, with whom the Father and Son take up their abode, who are 'of the truth' and hear the voice of the Son of God; and, on the other hand, those who do not come, are not drawn, nor convinced, who are in danger of perishing, are 'sons of perdition,' are veritably 'lost.' The ultimate cause of the contrast cannot be explained away, nor can any good or bad name which is assigned to it modify the issue. The intense severity of our Lord's judgment (7. 8) is not due to a Gnostic twist given by this evangelist to the teaching of Jesus, but to the historic accuracy with which the tendencies and hostility of the classes in Jerus. were known and set forth. Yet the human will, and no inexorable fate, is (throughout the Johannine theology) the critical element in the question of light or darkness. The activity of the will is not the absolute solution of the puzzle, but it is the proximate occasion of all moral issues. The dualism of the Fourth Gospel is not more explicit than the dualism of other parts of NT, such as St. Paul or the Synoptists. (c) St. John and St. Paul, and the Synoptists also, recognize a moral centre of the evil in humanity. Though St. John makes no reference to demoniacs, he refers to 'the Prince of this world' as the source and occasion of the trials of the Lord, between whom and Christ there is irreconcilable antagonism. The designs of the enemies of Jesus are affiliated to the father of lies and manslaying, and the phrase is akin to the use by our Lord and the Baptist of the terrible term 'ye brood of vipers.' Thoma (lib. cit. 202–205) regards the circumscription of the operations of the Evil One to the mind of humanity as strongly differentiating the Fourth Gospel from the rest of NT. True, there is no reference to 'possession' in St. John; but neither is there to leprosy, or fever, or other forms of disease on which, as we hear (2^{23} 3^{2} 4^{48} 5^{36} 20^{30}), Jesus wrought marvellous signs. The statement that St. John ignores the visible works of the devil is excessive (see 1 Jn 3^{8} and Jn 12^{31}). Thoma does not agree with Hilgenfeld in finding the Valentinian Demiurge in St. John's doctrine of the ἄρχων. It is refuted by the teaching of the Gospel and Epistle on the expulsion of the devil and the consecration of the world.

C. The Johannine Soteriology.—In grasping the Johan. ideal of salvation, Beyschlag finds the same thoughts as in the Synop. teaching concerning 'the kingdom,' which phrase, when he finds it in ch. 3, he regards as the simple equivalent of 'the life' and 'the eternal life' given by the great Teacher and Revealer of the Father. The kingdom and the life are closely allied in the teaching of Christ, and found in both sources; but they must be discriminated. The kingdom of God is the region within men and communities and the world in which the will of God operates through the free powers of the individual. The methods of discovering it, of entering it, of finding in it hidden potencies and of bringing forth its countless signs, whether acts or fruits, are always in evidence. It is originated as life is in new forms, by seed charged with its future. It has internal intensive force and extensive evolutionary energy, embracing every form of divine indwelling and spiritual growth. In St. John's Gospel, Salvation is Life, Light in its essence, and Truth and Love in method, instrument, or form. But the very idea of salvation, which was appreciated, to begin with, by John the Baptist (1^{29}) and by the Samaritans (Jn 4^{42}, 1 Jn 4^{14}), implies from OT times the great need of man and the greatest work of God. It denotes the rectification or reinstitution of all the relations which had been shattered by sin,—all that is elsewhere covered by such Pauline phrases as pardon, justification, sanctification, adoption,—all such divine experiences as faith, hope, love, life eternal,—in fine, all the work wrought for us by the Christ, the Son of God,—all the internal transformation which is effected in us, in the fabric of our being, by the Spirit of the Father and of the Son. Christ in the Fourth Gospel makes provision for abolishing the shame and curse, and indicates the hopelessness involved in dying in sins. The most damning sin is a steady refusal to admit His own claim. Faith in Him is the condition of deliverance, not merely by its remoter ethical importance or its stimulus to obedience, but by the very nature of the case; moral surrender to the highest revelation of God is salvation and eternal life.

Christ is that in human nature, and does that in it and through it which can stanch the wound and arrest the spell of sin. He had always been coming into the world—a fact testified by the prophets ($1^{5\text{ff.}}$). The great Lawgiver spoke of Him (5^{46}); Abraham desired a fuller revelation (8^{56}); all the Scriptures testified to Him (5^{39}). Nevertheless, these operations of the Logos, so long as conducted along these lines, were insufficient to secure conviction until He came into closer contact with humanity, was more obviously manifest in human flesh, and came into actual living personal union with the disturbed and imperilled roots of our mind, heart, and will. He thus provides a tangible object of faith. He renews the eye of faith, and supplies the motive of search. He is the shield from condemnation, the deliverance from wrath, the emancipation from bondage. He can 'save' from the malicious destruction of alien powers (10^{10}), from the deadly pangs of unsatisfied hunger (6^{50}); and He can give the food of which if a man eats he shall never die. Under the three often quoted metaphors, salvation covered all the need of man and all the capacities of the Infinite—LIFE, LIGHT, and LOVE.

There is no salvation if we do not consciously possess another LIFE than this ever-vanishing, always-threatened earthly existence. The heavenly life is not menaced by the million perils of earth and the organized hate of hell, by the cruel temptations of time and sense, and will be finally emancipated from the fear which hath torment. Life in its perpetuity is independent of the conditions of death, it is veritable (answering, i.e., to its ideal and archetype), it is eternal. The purport of the Fourth Gospel was to give concrete proof that Jesus has the power to establish the indispensable conditions and execute the initial stages of this everlasting life. Jesus began by declaring that He would build up the temple of His body after men had destroyed it (ch. 2), and that those who believed in Him should receive this life at His hands ($3^{16.\,17.\,36}$). He selected the palsied man as an image of the method and need of the conferring of life, and He exercised the function along the lines of the divine Father's life-giving work ($5^{21\text{-}29}$). He sustained human life by creative forces against various perils of hunger and storm, with express parabolic instruction as to the deliverances of the inner life from greater peril, and that by His own imperial mandate. The whole of ch. 6 is one continuous illustration of how the Incarnate One could give eternal life, how those who would feed on Him (on His flesh and blood) should die no more for ever. The whole lesson of His unique relation to life, and His power over death, is once more given in ch. 11, where no barriers block the access of His eternal power and Godhead as the Son of the Father's love, and as working out the will of the Eternal. He unriddles death and takes away its sting. In the night of the passion He says, 'because I live, ye shall live'; and the evangelist tells us that all that has been written by himself was to make evident to us, that by believing we might have life through His name (20^{31}).

A second analogue and interpretation of σωτηρία pervading the Fourth Gospel is LIGHT. It is the antithesis of darkness, both moral and intellectual. Darkness is dependent on two conditions, absence of illumination and deficiency or destitution of the power of vision, and in both respects He fulfils the functions of light. He is 'the light of the world' (8^{12}, and cf. 9^{5}), the forth-streaming of the Divine Glory ($12^{35.\ 46}$), the image of His substance, 'the truth' (ἀλήθεια) concerning God, the full expression of the archetypal man, the embodiment of the normal relations between God and man ('for I do always those things that please him'; 'my meat is to do,' etc. 4^{34}); 'I knew that thou hearest me always' (11^{42}). Thus salvation and eternal life is a knowledge of this truth (17^{3}), an acceptance of the light. Moral contamination occasions mental and spiritual blindness —a doctrine inverting the Platonic dictum, which charges all moral contamination on mental incapacity. In the soteriology of St. John the subjective condition is so hopelessly imperfect, and the need of visual faculty has become so imperative, that Christ is represented as restoring a man 'blind from birth' to the exercise of sight, and as commenting on the analogy between this imperial act and what He would do for humanity ($9^{37\text{-}41}$). The glory into which the light of the full revelation of God has ushered His own human nature is the very same light and glory which He supplicates for all His own, and into which He will bring them.

But in close association with Life and Light appears the highest conception of the nature of God which has ever dawned on human intelligence. If God is love, the central essence is absolute self-surrender to the well-being of others. That 'God IS LOVE,' and Love is of God, are the final outcome of the irradiation of St. John's mind with 'the light of the knowledge of the glory (the essential beauty) of God in the face of Jesus Christ.'

The Prologue commences the sublime details by declaring that the incarnate and only-begotten was full of grace and truth. He had been 'in the bosom of the Father,' and declared that which no other had seen. He said, 'the Father loveth me, because I am laying down my life—not as if that were to be the final end, as so many seem resolved to have it, but—that I may take it again' (10^{17}). The revelation of the principle of sacrificial love in the eternal heart of God, as the motive of the heavenly giving, sending, and equipping of the Son, receives its triumphant expression in the human life, which adequately revealed the eternal. A large portion of the Gospel is interfused with this thought. In the conversation with Nicodemus the keynote was the eternal self-sacrificing love of God, of which He had become the expression ($3^{16\text{ff.}}$). To the Samaritans He made it clear that He was seeking the salvation of men, 'of the world' ($4^{32.\ 42}$), by the sacrifice of Himself. The discourses of ch. 6 indicate the fountain of self-abnegating love, by which He was giving life to the world. The excited scenes of chs. 7 and 8 combine sternest condemnation of sin with love to sinners. Chs. 9. 10. 11 are the apotheosis of love and sacrifice. Ch. 12 is the record of the response of love to Himself, the fragrance of which has filled 'the whole world.' The evangelist himself shows in $13^{1\text{ff.}}$ how he had personally felt the pulsation of divine love in the breast of Jesus, and how the Lord loved His own unto the uttermost. Every paragraph of the 'Discourse' and 'Prayer' is a fresh variation of the great revelation; and the scenes of the arrest, the magnanimous self-surrender, intensify the teaching. The record of His relations with His mother, with the other Marys, with the beloved disciple, with Thomas and Simon, give a perfectly unique revelation of the fundamental essence of Deity, and the forecast of the fulfilment of the high-priestly prayer, 'that the love wherewith thou lovest me may be in them, and I in them.'

We have further to state the significance assigned in the Johannine writings to the death of the great Sacrifice.

In the first Epistle the author regards the blood of Christ as the propitiation for the sin of the world, and as that which cleanses from all sin, and that God 'laid down his life for us.' In the Apoc. in various ways and many degrees of intensity the saved are the purchase of the blood of a high-priestly sacrifice, are souls redeemed by 'the blood of the Lamb which was slain'; while a right to the final privileges of the saved, access to the Tree of Life, is secured by washing the robes (RV).

St. Paul had laid the greatest emphasis on the expiation of sin, the redemption, the propitiation for sin, the ransom, and the righteousness of men through faith in the blood of Christ.

The Synoptists, by the record of the institution of the Lord's Supper, refer to the lips of Jesus Himself the sublime declaration that His blood was being 'shed for the remission of sin.' Mark refers to our Lord the weighty saying, that He had come to give His life a ransom for many (ἀντὶ πολλῶν).

The way in which St. John handles this momentous teaching differs from these familiar representations, but is not incompatible with them. Reuss (Théol. Chrét.), Beyschlag, and others emphasize the contrast, and try to exclude from the Fourth Gospel all reference to or implication of the expiatory worth of the death of Christ. We admit, of course, that the glorious dignity of the incarnate Son of God has covered even the humiliation of His death with a mantle of lustre. The 'lifting up of the Son of Man' (12^{32}), and the bursting of abundant fruit from the dying of the corn of wheat, give a character to the awful tragedy somewhat different from that of the Synoptists. Weiss, against the whole of the Tübingen school, rightly emphasizes those elements where the same truth appears in altered form, e.g. where John the Baptist (1^{29}) indicates the Lord Jesus in His essential character and function as fulfilling the oracle of Is 53. The chief significance of this is, that the whole passage is frequently quoted by NT writers and speakers as descriptive of the very heart of the work of Christ. By the use thus made of it by Peter, Philip, John, Matthew, Clemens Romanus, it becomes a chapter of NT doctrine, and the quotations of portions practically cover the whole oracle. Now with these citations John the Baptist's words, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' must be placed. Continual anticipations of Calvary and the Cross occur. In the record of the first cleansing of the temple, in the prolongation of 'the hour,' and in the arrest of murderous hands in act to strike, the whole of the Saviour's holy life becomes a continuous sacrifice. The double reference by the evangelist to the prophecy of Caiaphas is specially charged with the same idea ($11^{49ff.}$ 18^{14}).

In the discourse at Capernaum (6^{51}), the eating His flesh and drinking His blood, in other words the moral surrender to His violent death, is life. The moral assimilation of the stupendous fact of the divine-human person of the Lord, eating of the flesh, and the acceptance of the sacrifice of that mysterious life of His for the life of the world, 'drinking his blood,' utterly transcends a purely and simply human consciousness. Beyschlag here wonders at Weiss, but does not reply to him or to thousands who have come to the same conclusion before him. A full interpretation which does not emasculate the reference by our Lord Himself to the 'brazen serpent' (3^{14}), leaves the sacrificial meaning of the conquest of sin and death by the Son of Man still glittering with meaning, and calling with undiminished force for faith, love, and obedience.

We have already drawn attention to ch. 10, where our Lord, by sacrificing Himself as the Good Shepherd for the flock, does not relinquish His saving work. Indeed He renews, by resuming His life, His power to deliver men as a shepherd of the sheep, and then His arms become identified with the everlasting arms, and His hands with the almighty hands of the Father. If the Jews had taken the Tübingen view, surely they would not have lifted stones to stone their Saviour-shepherd for His presumption and blasphemy.

The whole tone of the final discourse (14. 15. 16) is that Christ's very method of departure from this world, amid the exultation of the world and the lamentation of His disciples, unveils the nature of His heavenly work, and the fact that His way of returning to the Father (viz. death and resurrection) is the ground on which He calls Himself their 'way,' and says that no man cometh unto the Father but by Him. The entire method by which, in this Gospel, he conveyed the fact of the resurrection to different classes of mankind is charged with the highest order of revelation, for He bare in His risen form the signs of His fearful agony and shame, and yet wielded all authority in heaven and earth.

(a) The method of appropriating the great salvation. Faith is as explicitly pressed in the Fourth Gospel as by the Synoptists and St. Paul. Believing in His name is the condition of becoming 'sons of God.' In great variety of connexion, faith is made the foundation and condition of eternal life (3^{15-18}, cf. ^{36} and 5^{24}). Coming to Him is the physical analogue of mental and moral surrender to Him (6^{35}). This is the part of man in the synthesis, the condition which God demands. He whom God hath sent is indeed the power by which the Father draws men to Himself (6^{65}, cf. 12^{32} 14^{6}). Belief in His name was itself conditioned by moral willingness to do the Father's will, and was itself the indispensable antecedent of receiving the Holy Spirit (7^{37-39}).

(b) The following of Jesus. All progress in the divine life is a prolongation of the act of faith. The abiding of Christ in the soul, and of the soul in Christ (the chief theme of ch. 15), are essential to any conception of the efficacy of faith, and emphasize the mutual relations of the human and divine will, the growth and continuance both of grace and faith. 'Following Jesus' and 'abiding in him' are frequently identified with such organic union as to ensure final participation with Him in eternal life and glory. He who sows and they who reap rejoice together (4^{37}); 'He that eateth me shall live by me' (6^{57}); 'He that receiveth whomsoever I shall send receiveth me'; 'He that receiveth me receiveth him that sent me'; 'I am in my Father, and ye in me, and I in you'; 'My Father will love you, and we will come and make our abode with you.' Union will be life-giving; and though separation between the Lord and His disciples is an obvious matter of fact, yet in the power of the spiritual presence after His ascension His disciple may be enabled to 'touch him' (20^{17}). The 'peace,' the 'joy,' the 'love,' the 'glory' will pass from the central heart of Jesus to 'whosoever wills' or 'comes' (14^{27} 15^{11} 16^{22} $17^{22.26}$).

D. The Johannine Eschatology.—The teaching of the Fourth Gospel differs from the rest of NT in its bearing on the future life and eternal judgment.

If, however, the truths in the parables are stripped of their imaginative clothing, and the great arguments and implications of St. Paul deprived of their metaphor, and the nucleus of the apocalyptic visions laid bare, it is probable that we shall find nothing more than, nay, not so much as, we find in the Fourth Gospel. The latter has no festival rejoicing, no exclusion of the guest who does not wear the wedding garment, no scene of final judgment and everlasting life and punishment; yet there is judgment ever ripening in the 'loving of darkness,' and there is freedom from condemnation and even from death in any form; and these are shown to be essentially equivalent to the moral rupture with God on the one side, or to ethical harmony with the highest concept of God as 'Light' and 'Love' on the other. The future, like the past, is lost in an eternal now. In $5^{28.29}$ the resurrection, the final consummation, are doubtless involved, but in 15^{6} the process which burns up the fruitless prunings would seem to be eternal. The blinding of the foolish heart, the abiding of the divine wrath upon the disobedient, the judgment that is always being enacted and evolved, the terror of dying in sins, the judgment that is inevitable and just (8^{16}), and the crisis, the expulsion of the world and its prince, all bring the reader into more vivid realization of the objective fact of judgment than do the parables of the Rich Man, the Marriage, the Talents, or the final unveiling of the great white throne. The momentous events of Heb. history had thrown a lurid light on the prophetic metaphors of the popular discourse; but as the apostle ponders and reports the principle of the eternal judgment upon men and nations and on the entire world, we get closer to the heart and mind of Jesus than by any other medium of communication.

In 1 Jn $2^{18.28}$ and 4^{17} the writer anticipates the consummation and the parousia, of which the whole NT speaks. It is the perversity of criticism which endeavours to separate the two documents on this very ground, or which cannot discern the harmony between them. The kingdom of God upon earth (ch. 3), the multitudes who are 'of the truth' and 'hear his voice,' who come to the light and yield to His control, the underlying theocracy, or Christocracy, identify the teaching of the Fourth Gospel with that of the Synoptists. 'These things are written that ye may believe that Jesus is the CHRIST, the Son of God, and that believing ye might have life through His name.' In these words the beloved disciple sums up the teaching of all the Gospels.

IX. LITERATURE.—The literature of this subject is in part contained in the foregoing list of works issued during the last hundred years. Some of those which now follow embrace the theology of the Epp. and Apoc. as well as the Gospel. Beyschlag, whose work on NT Theol. is the last on our previous list, has taken each separately, though he has given the theology of the Gospel and the Epistles with some deliberate estimate of their agreement as well as their alleged divergences.

The following works are occupied with the entire subject:—Neander, Hist. of Planting, etc., of Christ. Church, Eng. tr. vol. ii. 1-58; Reuss, Hist. de la Théol. Chrét. ii. 369-561, also his Theol. Johan. Baur, in his Bib. Theol., emphasized the details in which the author of the Gospel rose above the Hebraic and Pauline Christianity. Schmidt and van Oosterzee, in their works on Bib. Theol. of NT, have separated the teaching of Christ in Synop. from that of the Prologue and the Epistles of John. Köstlin, Der Lehrbegriff des Evangeliums und der Briefe Johannis, moves along the lines of the Tübingen criticism. Weiss, Bib. Theol. of NT (Eng. tr. ii. 311-421), gives an exhaustive treatment. Wendt, Der Inhalt der Lehre Jesu, 1890, is largely occupied with the peculiarities and (notwithstanding difficulties) the historical value of the material which was at the disposal of the writer, and in the second part with a very elaborate examination of the teaching of Jesus as gathered from the fourfold representations. Beyschlag criticizes throughout many of the conclusions of Wendt, and everywhere minimizes the amount of approach to traditional views of the person and sacrificial work of Christ, accepted by Weiss and Wendt. They all three fundamentally differ from Hilgenfeld, Das Evangelium und die Briefe Johannis nach ihrem Lehrbegriff dargestellt, and Albrecht Thoma, Genesis Joh. Evangeliums, 1882, pp. 171-302. Marcus Dods, in the Expositor's Bible, on St. John's Gospel, covers much of the ground in practical and forceful manner, and the Memorabilia of Jesus, by Peyton, with much vivacity and mystic extravagance, yet brings out the heart of the teaching of Jesus. The same may be said of Sears, Heart of Christ, and of a vast number of comm. (e.g. Westcott in Speak. Comm.) on the Gospel, of which no list is here attempted.

Of the twenty-one Epp. now included in the NT Canon, three, which form a series by themselves, are associated with the name of St. John. Historical testimony shows them to have been in existence in certain parts of the Church, and to have been used by men of note in the Church, at a very early period; in the case of the longest, at least by the middle of the 2nd cent., and, in the case of the other two, before the 3rd cent. was far advanced. Their connexion with the name of John, and their wide recognition as authoritative writings, are also things of very ancient date; taking us, in the case of the first, as far back as to Papias and Irenæus, and, in the case of the others, perhaps to Clement of Alexandria and Origen, certainly to Dionysius, the pupil of Origen. Before the close of the 4th cent. they had become so generally accepted that they were recognized in the Canons of Councils. From time to time, though never on a large scale till our own century, their claims have been disputed, their connexion with the name of John being denied, or another John than the son of Zebedee being thought to be the writer. But it has been the prevailing belief from the oldest times that they are all three apostolic writings, and part of the legacy of the beloved disciple to the Church.

They belong to a group of Epp. which from a very early date have occupied a position of their own in the NT Canon, and have been known by a distinct title. This group, which in most ancient MSS of the NT (with occasional exceptions, as in the case of ℵ) is placed between Acts and the Pauline Epp., did not appear as a separate collection at one and the same period all over the Church, nor did it include all these three Epp. from the beginning. It had neither the same name nor the same compass at all times or in all the different sections of the Christian communion.

In the Eastern Church the Epp. embraced in it received the title of Catholic or General (καθολικαί). In the Western Church, in which the collection was of later formation, they were known, at least from the 6th cent., as Canonical (Canonicæ). In one important section of the Church, the Syrian, the group consisted only of three Epp., and among these only the longest of the Johannine letters found a place. In other parts of the Church, and in the Eastern division at least by the beginning of the 4th cent., it embraced seven Epistles. These included our three, the longest of the three being, along with 1 Peter, the earliest accepted of the whole collection, and the two shorter being added at a later period. (See the article CATHOLIC EPISTLES).

By their inclusion in the peculiar circle of the Catholic Epp. these three are marked off in one particular respect both from the Pauline Epp. and from other Epp. which were held in a measure of honour in the Church but not ultimately accepted as canonical. In other respects they also form a class by themselves. They have a character which cannot be mistaken. They are so obviously distinguished from the other members of the group to which they belong and from the NT Epp. generally, that the least discerning eye must recognize their apartness.

The peculiar character is most evident, of course, in the largest of the three, but it discovers itself also in the smaller two. The latter are Epp. of extremest brevity, the shortest writings in the Canon. They are writings, too, of incidental interest, and personal or ecclesiastical, not to say congregational, concern; while the former looks more like a studied composition, and deals with the weightiest questions of doctrine and the largest concerns of practice. Yet they are so much of the same stamp that in all ages the prevailing, if not absolutely universal, opinion has been, that they come from the same mint and are by the same hand. They are writings in which the profound and the simple kiss each other, great and inexhaustible thoughts being wedded to the clearest and least ambitious terms. They combine the qualities of majesty, maturity, authority, and serenity with occasional fire and vehement utterance.

They are almost impersonal as regards the mind to which we owe them. The first gives no hint of the author beyond the fact that he classes himself in an unstudied and informal way with those who had seen Christ in the flesh, and indicates a measure of acquaintance with the circumstances of those whom he addresses. The second and third give only the intimations contained in the use of the designation of 'the presbyter,' and in the mention of certain individuals whom we have no means of identifying with any confidence. Yet, devoid as they are of tangible, personal notes, the writer's individuality makes itself felt throughout. They move within a circle of ideas which, while not without points of affinity with the thought of the other NT Epp., especially the greater Pauline letters, are for the most part their own. They have a diction which also belongs in a marked degree to themselves. Their words are words of calmest dignity, yet instinct with emotion—words which might be those of the philosopher, but yet are those of the common Christian intelligence.

A large literature has grown up around these Epp., which has always found something new to say in expounding their teaching and in grappling with the problems of their history. The affluence of their thought, the fruitfulness of their doctrine, the spell of their spirituality and their deep tranquillity, have attracted the richest and devoutest minds, the most practical and the most speculative intellects in every age. Their characteristic contents, the forms in which they present the essential message of the gospel, the expression which they give to some of the cardinal Christian doctrines, the insight which they afford into the condition of the early Christian societies, the light which they shed upon the operation and the influence of certain kinds of error, make them Epp. of singular interest. Even in the few verses of the Third Ep. disclosures are found which are of far-reaching significance for the story of the life and the theory of the constitution of the primitive Church.

Questions of various interest and of no small difficulty are connected with them. They present some problems in exegesis (I 2^{19} $3^{2.9.19}$ $5^{6-8.16}$), and some curious points in textual criticism (I 3^{1} 2^{23} $4^{3.20}$ 5^{7}, II ^{8}, III ^{2}). Most things touching their literary history have been the subject of dispute, and some of them are far from easy to determine. The old debate is prolonged as to the where and the by whom of their composition; whether they were written in Ephesus, in Patmos, or elsewhere; whether by one hand or more; whether by one John or two Johns or three. The destination of the first two; the way in which the second and the third came to rank as Catholic Epp. and to have a position in the Canon; the source and the explanation of their special form of doctrine; whether a place can be found within the apostolic age for the type of thought and the ecclesiastical conditions which they exhibit,—these are questions which are still under discussion.

Of these questions, that of their origin and authorship is of primary importance. The answer which comes readiest to hand when one reads them together is that all three are products of the same mind. The answer that is suggested both by historical testimony and by their contents is that that mind is the mind to which we also owe the Fourth Gospel and the Apocalypse. And in point of fact these are the views which prevailed in the ancient Church, and which have been generally acquiesced in since then. But they were not left unchallenged even in ancient times, while in modern times they have been disavowed by a succession of thinkers of distinguished rank among NT critics.

In our own century, in particular, their claims to apostolic date and worth have been strongly contested, and judgments of the most diverse kind have been pronounced upon them by the critical schools. There are those who find no difficulty in attributing all three Epp., as well as the Gospel, to the Apostle John, but discover another hand in the Apocalypse. Bleek, e.g., admits the existence of clear points of contact between all the writings assigned to St. John. But he is of opinion, at the same time, that the affinity between the Epp. and Gospel on the one hand, and the Bk. of Revelation on the other, is limited and occasional, while the difference is great and pervading. That difference is held to extend not only to the diction and the style, of which in the case of the Apoc. the one is confessedly peculiar and the other is pronounced rough and broken, but to the whole genius of the books, their attitude to the Jewish people, city, and temple, their teaching on the Parousia, and other things. It is thought to amount to so much that, if the Epp. are ascribed to St. John, the Apoc. must either be allowed to be a forgery by a much later hand or be explained as the work of another John, 'the presbyter,' referred to by Papias in a way interpreted by many as distinguishing him from the apostle (Euseb. HE iii. 39). There are others, again, who read the story of these writings in the reverse way, fixing the stigma of the spurious on the Epp. alone, or on the Epp. and the Gospel together. S. G. Lange regarded the Gospel and the Apoc. as the real writings of St. John, but took the First Ep. to be the work of an imitator a century later. The Tübingen critics agree in claiming the Apoc. for St. John, and in repudiating the other writings, though they differ with regard to the order of the latter. Baur himself (in 1857) held the First Ep. to be an imitation of the Gospel by a different hand, while Hilgenfeld places the Ep. earlier than the Gospel. Among those, too, who hold by the common Johannine authorship, certain differences appear, some regarding the First Ep. as the middle term between the Gospel and the Apoc. (Godet), others giving the Ep. a position in time between the Apoc. and the Gospel.

The historical case, as it has been understood by the great majority of students, so far as concerns the main questions, is this: that, while certain doubts overhung for a time the recognition of the shorter Epp., we find them, so far back as we can trace them, bearing the name of John and never any other, when the author's name is given; and that, while certain differences of view appeared in the early Church regarding the particular John, all three were regarded by most as writings of the apostle, and had an assured position as such before the close of the 4th cent. Whether the case can be accepted as it has thus been put, and what the probabilities are with the critical theories referred to, will best appear as the final result of a study of the writings. We shall take each Ep. therefore by itself, and shall look at its order of thought and the various questions which have been raised with respect to its occasion, its purpose, its message, etc. Having done this, we shall take up anew the problem of its origin and authorship, endeavouring to estimate the worth of the traditional view on the one hand and the counter-theories on the other.

THE FIRST EPISTLE. — 1. Order of Thought. — The Ep. opens with some calm and lofty sentences, not cast in the form of epistolary introduction with which we are most familiar in the NT, but more in that of the Ep. to the Hebrews. In these, without indicating either himself or his readers except in an indirect and general way, the writer states at once the great fact on which all that he has to say rests, viz. the historical manifestation in Jesus Christ of the life that is behind all life, the eternal life that was with the Father. He declares at the outset, too, in this Introduction, the great object which he has in view in addressing his readers, viz. that his joy in them might be perfected by seeing them one with him in that fellowship with God in which he and the brethren with whom he classes himself are conscious of standing (1^{1-4}). He enters then at once upon his specific subject, giving as the basis of his counsel and the fundamental apostolic message the truth that 'God is light'; from which the immediate inference is that a walk in the light is indispensable on our part to this fellowship with God. This inference, however, from which there can be no escape, is declared, not in its logical directness, but in the form that to profess to be in fellowship with God and to continue to walk in darkness, is to commit ourselves to a lie and to all unreality. This walk in the light is not to be thus dealt with. Too much depends on it—not only fellowship with God, but fellowship with other members of Christ's body, and also the purgation of sin by Christ's blood. The cleansing which every Christian needs and which he also obtains coming thus into view, the explanation follows that on the one hand, if we claim to have no sin, we deceive ourselves and put God Himself to the lie, while on the other hand real confession of sin brings with it the divine forgiveness and the divine cleansing (1^{5-10}). The same thought is put in another form before the writer passes to his next subject, when he proceeds to remind his readers that all that he writes to them of the revelation of life, the fellowship with God, the pardon and purification of sin, is written with the practical purpose of instructing them not to sin, and then, recognizing the sin of which the true Christian cannot but be conscious, he points to the certainty of its forgiveness in virtue of what Christ is as Paraclete and Propitiation ($2^{1.2}$).

The thought of the new fellowship which has come by the Gospel leads to another near akin to it—that of the knowledge which the same Gospel requires and makes possible. The position in which those addressed were at the time, furnishes the occasion for speaking with emphasis and decision of the knowledge with which alone the believer is concerned, and of spurious forms with lofty pretensions. So the writer declares the knowledge of God in its reality to be possible only where the humble way of practical obedience to God's commandments is followed; in which connexion he urges the necessity of walking as Christ walked. In further illustration of the kind of life which befits the Christian, he identifies the walk in the light with the walk in brotherly love, and holds before his readers the duty of loving the brethren as the commandment of commandments, one at once old and new (3^{7-11}). He warns these Christians also against the love of the world and the seductions of false teachers, which are contrary to the love of the brethren, and presses this warning with the greater insistence because the world's opportunity is now short. It is the last time with it and all things, as is witnessed by the fact that many antichrists have appeared. These antichrists are described, and the description is pointed by an exhortation to these believers to abide in that knowledge which they have by the Holy Ghost, a knowledge which cannot deceive, so that they may not be put to shame in the great day of the Lord's Parousia (2^{12-28}).

The thought of God as light passes over next into the thought of God as righteous. Following out this new idea, the writer proceeds to say that only he who is righteous can be the child of God; that the man who has the hope of being like God or Christ must purify himself; and that, as Christ is sinless, he who is in Christ cannot sin. But he adds, with an eye to the subtle deception of the false teachers, that to be righteous means to do righteousness, and in sharp and decisive terms distinguishes those who sin as the children of the devil, from those who do not and cannot sin as the children of God. He identifies this righteousness also, which is the note of the son of God, as he had previously done in the case of the walk in light, with the love of the brethren, and again warns his readers against the love of the world, which, as was seen in the instance of Cain, means hatred of the children of God (2^{29}–3^{12}). At this point he sets Christ before them again as the supreme pattern of Christian love—a love which must be in deed and truth, and which carries with it these two blessings—the consciousness of being of the truth and the confidence that our prayers shall be heard. Touching again on God's commandment, he shows that it, too, means two things, viz. belief in Christ and love of one another, and explains that he who keeps the divine commandments not only is in fellowship with God, but has through the Spirit the consciousness of that fellowship (3^{12-24}).

Returning to the question of the immediate dangers which threatened his readers, the writer speaks again of the false prophets; and his words of warning on that subject become the occasion for taking up anew the two great themes—the law of love and the keeping of God's commandments, which are so much in his view. He repeats his cautions against the seductions of misleading teachers, and indicates the marks of distinction between the spirit of God and the spirit of Antichrist, between the spirit of truth and the spirit of error (4^{1-6}). He urges again the supreme duty of love—love to God indeed in the first instance, but also, and more particularly in this case, love to man. He reminds those for whom he is so solicitous, that the man who is of God is of love, called to love Him who Himself is love, and who has given the last proof of that in the mission and propitiatory death of His Son. To love God, he tells them, is to be in God, and to have God in them, and to be delivered from the torment of fear. It is all this, but it is also a love that gives proof of itself in the obvious practical duties of loving the brethren and keeping the divine commandments. And these commandments, he adds, whatever they may be to others, cannot be grievous to those who are begotten of God (4^{6}–5^{3}). The mention of this new relation to God, expressed by the term 'begotten of God,' forms a natural point of transition to the idea of the new mental attitude that goes with the new birth. So the writer comes to speak of faith,—of what it is as belief in Jesus as the Son of God, and of the witness which it carries with it to His being that; of the victorious might that is in that belief, and of the witness as something more than any external testimony—a witness which the believer has in himself (5^{4-12}). As the letter approaches its conclusion he states again the great object with which it has been written. He refers once more to what prayer is to the children of God, the confidence in it which is their prerogative, and the things they are entitled to ask (5^{13-17}). He brings the Epistle to an end by proclaiming anew the separation of the Christian from sin and from the wicked one; the privilege which is the Christian's both in understanding and in possession; and the necessity that is laid upon those who know the true God and have fellowship with Him to keep themselves from idols (5^{18-21}).

2. Character.—It appears, therefore, that the argument of the Epistle, if such a term can be applied to it, turns on a few large and simple ideas. It unfolds itself mostly in terms of certain broad antagonisms—those between Christ and Antichrist, believers and the world, the children of God and the children of the devil, the love of God and the love of the world, righteousness and unrighteousness, confidence and fear, love and hate, sins and a sin unto death, walking in the light and walking in darkness, being begotten of God and being touched by 'that wicked one.' In connexion with these fundamental and recurring antitheses we have a series of statements of what the message of the gospel is; of what fellowship with God is, how it comes, and what it implies; of what Christ is, and what His mission into this world means; of what the believer is, and what the Christian vocation involves.

The message of the gospel is that God is light; that we are to love one another; that in Christ God has given us eternal life. The fellowship with God which is in view is made possible by two things—the historical manifestation of God in Christ and the believer's faith, the former being the objective ground of this new and gracious relation, the latter its subjective condition. This fellowship brings with it the graces of joy, forgiveness, knowledge, the cleansing of the life, the liberty of intercession, the answer to prayer, the assurance and fearlessness of children. It involves a walking in the light, the doing of righteousness, the purifying of ourselves, love to God and love to the brethren, filial obedience, practical benevolence, the observance of the divine commandments, the forswearing of idols. Christ is the Son of God, the only-begotten Son, the manifestation of the Father and of that eternal life which was with the Father; pre-existent as being sent by God into the world; true man, righteous, sinless, the Paraclete with the Father, the propitiation for the sin of the world. His mission is to destroy the works of the devil, to bring us back to God, to give us eternal life, to put away our sin, and to be the Saviour of the world. And the Christian is one who has fellowship with God; who confesses his sin and is cleansed and forgiven; who is begotten of God and sins not; who has the gift of knowledge and can distinguish good from evil, the children of God from the world, truth from error, the false prophet or the false spirit from the true; who walks in the light and does the truth, loving God and the brethren, imitating Christ, and finding no grievousness in the divine commandments; who has passed out of death into life; who knows that his prayers are heard, and looks with holy confidence to the coming of his Lord and the judgment, and has the consciousness of eternal life in him.

Alike in the matter of its thought and in the way in which its ideas are expressed, this Epistle has a character wholly its own. The only Epp. of the NT which are of the same stamp are the two smaller letters which are associated with it. It differs most of all from the Epp. which bear St. Paul's name. It has nothing of the formal structure, the systematic course, the dialectical movement of these. The logical particles which abound in the Pauline writings are strange to this Epistle. Its thought moves on, but not in an obvious progress to a goal. It takes the form of a succession of ideas which seem to have no logical relation, and which fall only now and again into a connected series. They are delivered, not in the way of reasoned statements, but as a series of reflections and declarations given in meditative, aphoristic fashion. This lack of the constructive quality gives the teaching of the Epistle a peculiar directness and simplicity. But it is the directness of authority, the simplicity of truths which are felt to be self-attesting. These characteristics add to the vigour, the originality, the attractiveness of the Epistle. They have strangely been regarded by some as tokens of weakness, and have been reckoned among the things which are supposed to speak of the 'feebleness of old age' (S. G. Lange). Even Baur discovered a certain 'indefiniteness,' a tendency to repetition, a want of 'logical force,' in the tenor of the Ep. which gave it a 'tone of childlike feebleness.' But those critics show a better insight—and they are of Baur's school as well as of others—who find a peculiar beauty, richness, and originality in the Epistle, a special freshness and vividness, particularly in what it says of the 'subjective, inner life of Christianity' (Hilgenfeld).

If the characteristic ideas of the Ep. are few and simple, they are of large significance, and they are presented in new aspects and relations as often as they recur. They belong to the region of primary principles, realities of the intuition, certainties of the experience, absolute truths. And they are given in their absoluteness. The regenerate man is one who cannot sin; Christian faith is presented in its ideal character and completeness; the revelation of life is exhibited in its finality, not in the stages of its historical realization. They are ideas which take us into the inner and essential nature of things, into the real that is behind the phenomenal, the inward that is the heart of the outward, the permanent that is the ground of the transitory, the future that is in the bosom of the present. They are mystical in the sense that they are given as truths of immediate certitude, absolute reality, inward vision. But they are not mystical in the sense of being the pure products of intuition, things only of the subjective world, or superior to the common experience of life. They are given in practical relation to the ordinary course of Christian life and conduct. They have their roots, too, in the great facts of the objective revelation of God in Christ, in that which 'we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled of the word of life' (1^1).

3. Ideas.—The doctrinal and ethical ideas which meet us in the other NT Epp. appear also in this letter. But they are presented in a special light, and with distinctive notes. The Theology of the Ep. has its own points of interest. God is seen in this Ep., as elsewhere, in His Fatherhood, His truth, His righteousness, His forgiving grace, and in the fulness of His life as expressed in His triune Being. But, above all else, He is 'light' (1^5) and He is 'love,' loving us before we loved Him, and so imparting Himself to us that He dwells in us ($4^{8.10.12}$). The Christology also has its peculiar features. Christ is the Son, 'the Son of God,' 'the Only-begotten,' who was with the Father before He appeared in the world. He is the explanation of all things. For in Him we see the eternal life that is behind all things, and from Him we have the life that is life indeed. His divine and pre-temporal relations are not left without expression or intimation. But it is especially in His human nature and relations that He forms the great subject of this Epistle. He is never called 'the Son of Man,' it is true, yet it is the integrity of His humanity that is especially affirmed—the fact that He appeared on earth in the full reality of the 'flesh,' neither in phantasmal form nor in divided being, neither as mere spirit nor yet with the divine and the human in any loose or temporary connexion, but as at once 'Jesus' and 'the Christ,'—Jesus Christ come in the flesh, and 'not by water only, but by water and blood' (2^{22} $4^{2.3}$ 5^6). His sinlessness is asserted (3^5), as it is in the Pauline and Petrine writings, and He is said to have been 'sent' by God (4^8), as St. Paul also speaks of His appearance on earth. But His entrance into our world, and His assumption of our nature and estate, are not given, as they are in St. Paul, under the aspect of a humiliation. The designation 'the Paraclete,' which occurs in the NT only in the Johannine writings, and is used in the Fourth Gospel directly of the Holy Spirit and only implicitly of Christ, is applied here to the Son Himself directly and definitely (2^2). Further, in this Ep. Christ is presented less in respect of what He was and is, and more in respect of what proceeds from Him and is done by Him. It is a question whether the term 'the Word' is used directly and personally of Him. The form which the sentence takes in which that great term is used is indirect, and its subject is neuter and impersonal (1^{1-3}). It is specifically as 'the life' that He is set before us here, and the more general term is chosen to express His appearance on earth. It is a φανεροῦσθαι. It is not said of Him that 'the Word was made flesh'; and though the idea that His entrance into our world was a real incarnation is implied in the description of Him as 'come in the flesh,' that event is exhibited rather as a manifestation, and in particular the manifestation of life.

The Holy Spirit, again, is spoken of especially as given by God and as bearing witness to Christ (3^{24} 5^{8}). Sin is 'unrighteousness' (1^{9} $3^{6.7}$ 5^{17}) and 'lawlessness' (3^{4}); but it is also 'darkness' (1^{6}) and 'death' (3^{14}). The believer is the 'child' of God (τέκνον, not υἱός), 'born' or 'begotten of God,' the special relation in which he is introduced being that of the new life rather than the new standing ($3^{1.2}$). Large expression is given also to the forces of evil which are opposed to Christ and the children of God. They are the devil and his works (3^{8}), the spirit of deceit (4^{6} πνεῦμα τῆς πλάνης), seducing spirits that have to be tried (4^{1}), the many 'antichrists' who have separated themselves from the Church or been cast out of it, and in whom the antichrist of prophecy is seen ($2^{18.19}$ 4^{3}). Among these forces is mentioned also 'the world,' an expression which in this Epistle conveys the largest and most complex conception of immediate, encircling evil (2^{15-17} 3^{13} 4^{1-5} $5^{5.19}$). Faith, too, has its special aspect and compass here. It is the great subjective condition of the Christian life and standing, but it is not presented here either in the broad idea of it which is expressed in the Epistle to the Hebrews (11^{1}), or in the definite character given to it in the great Pauline Epistles. It is neither generally 'the assurance of things hoped for, the proving of things not seen,' though it comes near to that, nor distinctively the faith that justifies and gives peace with God. It is belief in Jesus Christ, the belief that comes with regeneration, that is of the new life, that is the characteristic note of the man who is born of God. As such it is power, it is victory, it is its own witness ($5^{1-5.10}$).

The Ep. also has its doctrine of the last things. Its theology, indeed, is not distinctively an eschatological theology. Its fundamental idea is rather that of life, and that 'life' not as a thing wholly or specifically of the future. It is a 'life' that has been with the Father from the beginning, and that has been historically revealed in Christ (1^{1-3}). It is in Christ, and it becomes our possession now in virtue of our belief in Him and attitude to Him ($5^{11.12}$). It is 'eternal' life, and that not in respect of its perpetuity merely, or its changelessness, but distinctively in respect of its quality—as essential life, a new ethical order of being, not a certain duration of existence, but the kind of life that means the ideal good of life, the perfection of life, its satisfaction in God. This great conception of life as 'eternal life,' which bulks so largely in the Fourth Gospel, occurring there some seventeen times, has an equally prominent place in this Ep., meeting us here six times in the forms ζωὴ αἰώνιος (3^{15} $5^{11.13.20}$) and ἡ ζωὴ ἡ αἰώνιος (1^{2} 2^{25}). But while this qualitative or ethical conception of life, which lifts it above distinctions of present and future, is the prevailing idea, it does not exclude the eschatological. The 'life' which is essential, and which is ours now in Christ, also looks to a fuller completeness, a future perfection. The Ep. speaks of a manifestation of what the children of God are destined to be (3^{2}). It has its word of hope, its vision of a blessedness still prospective, its anticipation of a manifestation in which we shall see Christ as He is, its doctrine of an advent of Christ which it expresses, as St. Paul also expresses it, as a Parousia ($3^{2.3}$ 2^{28}). There is no express mention, it is true, of the Resurrection. But it is implied in what is said of the Parousia and the Judgment, the fact of a great Judgment in the future being stated in express terms (4^{17}). The things of the End may occupy a smaller place in this Ep. than in the writings of St. Peter and St. Paul. But alongside the present conditions which are expressed by the same words, the 'coming' of Christ, the 'judgment,' the 'life eternal' appear also as events of the end and as final conditions. These are, in brief, the main ideas of the Epistle. They have an important bearing, as will be seen, on the question of the authorship of the writing. See also art. JOHN (LIFE AND THEOLOGY OF).

4. Form and Structure.—There are certain questions relating to the form and construction of the Epistle. They are matters of subordinate importance, which have had a consideration given them that is much beyond their merits. One of these is the question whether this writing is really an Epistle or something else. The fact that it has neither an introduction nor a conclusion, such as we find in other NT Epp., neither a greeting nor a benediction nor a doxology, such as we get in the Pauline Epp., together with the circumstance that in much of its matter it does not run in terms of direct address, has led some to deny it the character of a letter, and to speak of it as a homiletical essay or a pastoral (Reuss, Westcott), a libellus rather than an Epistle (Bengel), a manual of doctrine (Heidegger), a treatise (Michaelis), a practical or polemical composition meant to form part of the Gospel (Berger, Storr). But if it wants the usual form of superscription and greeting, it has an equivalent resembling the opening of the Ep. to the Hebrews. If it has not the kind of conclusion, or the doxology, with which we are familiar in the Pauline Epp., that is the case also with the Ep. of James. The freedom of the style, the use of such direct terms as 'I write unto you,' 'I wrote unto you,' and the footing on which writer and readers stand to each other all through its contents, show it to be no formal composition or didactic treatise, but an Epistle in the proper sense of the word.

Nor is anything to be gained by applying to 1 Jn such ingenious distinctions as are attempted to be drawn (e.g. by Deissmann, Bibelstudien) between 'letter' and 'epistle,' and denying it the former designation. If the term 'letter' were to be restricted, indeed, in common speech to a piece of private correspondence not meant for the public, it might be necessary to speak only of 3 Jn as a 'letter,' and to describe 1 Jn and (on a particular interpretation of its address) 2 Jn as 'Epistles.' And so some would hold St. Paul's letters to be the only 'letters' in the proper sense in the NT. But there are 'open' letters as well as closed, encyclical letters as well as personal, letters to communities as well as to individuals. What gives to a composition the character of a letter is its style and contents. And though there is not a little in 1 Jn that might suit an address or discourse, there is more that fits a letter, especially such a letter as one might write who had both age and honour on his side, and who could write both freely and authoritatively. The relations which the writing indicates between writer and readers are not distant, but familiar. They are the near relations of those who know each other well.

The question of the structure of the Ep. has also been much debated. Some have pronounced the writing to be wholly without a plan, and to consist simply of a number of reflections, counsels, or deliverances loosely put together, without continuity or logical connexion (Calvin, cf. his Argumentum Epist. 1 Joh.; Flacius Illyricus, Episcopus)

Others have regarded it as a systematic composition, on a dogmatic plan, and with a methodical arrangement of ideas in all its parts. Bengel, e.g., asserted for it an elaborate contextual plan on a basis mainly Trinitarian. These are extreme opinions, and the truth lies somewhere between them. It is impossible to claim for this Ep. the strict logical sequence of thought which some imagine they find in it. But it is at the same time more than a series of unrelated ideas, a collection of unconnected maxims or aphorisms. There is a certain order in the Ep., due to the object with which it is declared to have been written. But it is an order that can be taken only in a broad and general way. Attempts have been made to carry it out in detail; but they have been only partially successful. Some have distributed the contents of the Ep. into something like eight groups of ideas (Lücke); others have found five main divisions in it, viz. 1^{5}–2^{11} 2^{12-27} 2^{28}–3^{24a} 3^{24b}–4^{21} 5^{1-21} (Hofmann, cf. Schriftbeweis; Luthardt); others four, viz. 1^{5}–2^{11} 2^{12-28} 2^{29}–3^{22} 3^{23}–5^{17}, dealing respectively with the danger of moral indifference, the love of the world and Antichrist, the necessity of a life of brotherly love, and faith as the foundation of the Christian life (Huther). Some, again, have arranged the matter of the Ep. on the plan of three great exhortations, viz. 1^{5}–2^{28} 2^{29}–4^{6} 4^{7}–5^{21}, with Introduction and Conclusion (de Wette). Others have regarded it as consisting of Introduction, Conclusion, and two great connected sections, viz. 1^{5}–2^{28} 2^{29}–5^{5}, both parts setting forth the same subject of fellowship with God the Father and the Lord Jesus Christ; but each in its own way—the former having for its special theme the proposition that God is light, the latter the proposition that God is righteous (Düsterdieck, Alford). Divisions of a somewhat different kind are also suggested, as, e.g., into three main sections, each with three or four sub-sections, the subjects for these sections being taken to be the 'problem of life and those to whom it is proposed,' the 'conflict of truth and falsehood without and within,' and the 'Christian life: the victory of faith' (Westcott).

There is more or less truth in these different readings of the plan of the Ep., and there is a certain measure of agreement among them. But even the simplest schemes do not admit of precise application. One can see that there are certain primary thoughts, especially the great ideas that God is light, that God is righteous, that God is love, to which much of the matter of the Ep. naturally relates itself; and that there are certain paragraphs or series of verses that have on the whole distinct subjects. But the ideas which give a special character to some particular section of the Ep. are not confined to that section. They meet us again and again, though it may not be quite in the same form. The Ep. has its introduction, its body, and its conclusion. It has its ruling thoughts, and it passes from one thought to another by points of transition which can often, if not always, be recognized. In its main contents it has a certain order and succession of ideas. But it is an order that follows the way of suggestion, not that of logical connexion. It is not systematically carried out, neither does it show itself upon the surface. It has the freedom that is proper to a letter, the unstudied, non-constructive character that belongs to a series of meditations or practical counsels.

5. Independence.—This is a question of greater importance. Among the NT writings there is one, though only one, that is at once seen to be of the same character as this Epistle. That is the Fourth Gospel. The resemblance is so great and unmistakable as at once to suggest the question, how the two are related to each other. In the Epistle we get the same general style as in the Gospel, the same simplicity of language with the same profoundness and exaltation of thought, the same lofty serenity, the same peculiar structure, the same sententious or aphoristic tone, the same habit of giving a statement both in the affirmative form and in the negative, and of taking up, repeating, and extending an idea already expressed; the same way of conveying truth by the use of contrasts, like that between light and darkness, life and death, love and hate; the same methods of forming sentences and carrying the thought forward. There are the same fundamental conceptions, too, of God, Christ, the purpose of the Son's mission, the nature of His work, His relations to God and to man, the character and standing of His disciples, the world, life, death, the present and the future. Many of the terms which are characteristic of the one are characteristic of the other. Of this class are the following:—ἀληθής, ἀλήθεια, ἁμαρτίαν ἔχειν, ἀνθρωποκτόνος, γεννηθῆναι ἐκ, ἐντολὴ καινή, ζωή, ζωὴ αἰώνιος, θεᾶσθαι, κόσμος, μαρτυρεῖν, μεταβαίνειν ἐκ τοῦ θανάτου εἰς τὴν ζωήν, μονογενής (of Christ), παιδία, παράκλητος, περιπατεῖν ἐν τῇ σκοτίᾳ, πιστεύειν εἰς, παῤῥησία, τὸ πνεῦμα τῆς ἀληθείας, ποιεῖν τὴν ἀλήθειαν, ποιεῖν τὴν ἁμαρτίαν, ὁ πονηρός, σκοτία, σωτὴρ τοῦ κόσμου, τέκνα θεοῦ, τεκνία, τιθέναι τὴν ψυχὴν αὐτοῦ, φανεροῦν, φῶς, χαρὰ πεπληρωμένη. Other terms distinctive of the Gospel and the Apocalypse together meet us also in the Ep.; e.g. ἀγαπᾷν, ἀγάπη, ἁγνίζειν ἑαυτόν, ἀληθινός, γινώσκειν, εἶναι ἐκ, θεωρεῖν, μαρτυρία, μένειν, νικᾷν, πλανᾷν, τηρεῖν τὰς ἐντολάς, τηρεῖν τὸν λόγον, φαίνειν. Peculiar syntactical forms, or peculiar uses of familiar formulæ, which occur in the Gospel, occur also in the Ep., as in the case of ἵνα, ἀλλ' ἵνα, etc. There are also many obvious parallelisms of thought and expression. Examples of these may be seen in such passages of the Ep. as—2^{14} 2^{17} 3^{8} 3^{13} 3^{22} 3^{23} 4^{6} 4^{15} 4^{16} 5^{4} 5^{9} 5^{20} when compared respectively with those passages of the Gospel—5^{38} 8^{35} 8^{44} 15^{18} 8^{29} 13^{34} 8^{47} 6^{56} 6^{69} 16^{33} 5^{32} 17^{3}.

In view of all this some have denied the character of independence to the Ep., and have spoken of it as a copy of the Gospel which shows all through the imitative hand (Baur). Others, who have not been disposed to go so far as that, have regarded it as a 'companion' to the Gospel, the second part of the Gospel (Michaelis, Storr, Eichhorn), a kind of dedicatory writing meant to go with the Gospel (Hug, Thiersch, Hausrath, Hofmann, Ebrard, Haupt), a summary or recasting and practical setting of the contents of the Gospel (Hoekstra, Holtzmann), a covering letter designed to serve as a kind of introduction to the Gospel (Lightfoot), etc.

But there are clear and significant differences between the two writings, notwithstanding this remarkable general similarity. There is no such local colouring in the Ep. as we have in the Gospel. There is no such Hebrew stamp in the Ep. as there is in the Gospel. There is not a single quotation from the OT in the former, while in the latter we have both citations from the OT and references to the OT. These differences, indeed, are not conclusive. They may be due to the natural difference between narrative and letter, or to the different circumstances and objects of the writings. But there is much more than these. The ideas which are common to both are, in not a few cases, differently put, and have a different aspect.

In the Ep., e.g., Christ's appearance on earth is presented, as we have seen, in the broad light of a manifestation. The specific function of advocacy or intercession is ascribed to Him. The qualities of faithfulness and righteousness on the side of God, and the grace of confession on the side of man, are given in a particular connexion with the forgiveness and the cleansing of sin; and faith appears in the definite character of a power of overcoming. In the case of certain ideas of the Ep., the affinities are rather with the teaching of the great Pauline Epp. than with the Fourth Gospel. This is true, not only of what is said of God or of Christ as δίκαιος (cf. 1^{9} 2^{2} with Ro 3^{26}), but also of the description of Christ as ἱλασμός (cf. 2^{2} 4^{10} with Ro 3^{25}), the designation of His Second Coming as a παρουσία (cf. 2^{28} with 1 Co 15^{23}, 1 Th 2^{19} etc.), etc. But, besides this, the Ep. has not a few ideas which it does not share with the Gospel. Such ideas are those, e.g., of a 'fellowship (κοινωνία) with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ,' a 'love perfected' (ἀγάπη τετελειωμένη), an 'Antichrist' and 'Antichrists,' a 'sin unto death' (ἁμαρτία πρὸς θάνατον), a 'Divine seed' (σπέρμα αὐτοῦ), an 'unction from the Holy One' (χρίσμα ἀπὸ τοῦ ἁγίου). Such terms as ἀγγελία and πλάνος, such phrases as ἐπιθυμία τῶν ὀφθαλμῶν, ἐπιθυμία τῆς σαρκός, ἐν σαρκὶ ἔρχεσθαι, ἐν τῷ φωτὶ περιπατεῖν, ποιεῖν τὴν ἀνομίαν, ποιεῖν τὴν δικαιοσύνην, belong to the Ep. and not to the Gospel. Such ideas, again, as those of the 'wrath of God' (ἡ ὀργὴ τοῦ θεοῦ), to 'be from above' (εἶναι ἐκ τῶν ἄνω), 'to be from beneath' (εἶναι ἐκ τῶν κάτω), and such designations as 'the Holy Spirit' (τὸ πνεῦμα τὸ ἅγιον), which are in the Gospel (3^{36} 8^{23} 1^{33} etc.), do not recur in the Epistle. And to these things others might be added. Where the Gospel, e.g., declares God to be 'Spirit' (πνεῦμα, 4^{24}), the Ep. declares Him to be 'love' (ἀγάπη, 4^{16}); where the Gospel speaks of the Son being 'in the Father' and the 'Father in the Son' ($14^{10.\,11}$ etc.), the Ep. speaks of us as being 'in God' and God 'in us' (ἡμεῖς ἐν τῷ θεῷ 2^{5} 4^{4}, ὁ ἐν ἡμῖν 2^{5} 4^{4}).

There are also certain minuter differences in usage, as in the preference of the Ep. for the preposition ἀπό after such verbs as αἰτεῖν, ἀκούειν, λαμβάνειν, where the Gospel has παρά. To which must be added the fact that no clear reference to the Gospel is discovered in the Epistle. There is enough, therefore, to show that the Ep. is not dependent on the Gospel, not a second part of it, nor a remodelling of its contents, whether for practical or for polemical purposes, but an independent composition having its own particular occasion, purpose, and character.

6. Purpose and Occasion.—Its purpose is that the readers may have fellowship with the writer and his associates who have been eye-witnesses of the Word of life, and whose fellowship is with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ; that the joy which the writer and his brethren have in them may be made complete by seeing that fellowship realized in their case; and that those addressed may have the comfortable consciousness of possessing eternal life ($1^{2.\,3}$ 5^{13}). The writer's object, therefore, is to be taken in the breadth which he himself gives it. It is not to be limited to the combating of certain errors, the refutation of certain false teachers, or the reproof of certain shortcomings. The Ep. does deal with certain faults in life, certain errorists and defective doctrines. But its primary purpose is to help these Christians to be partakers with the writer and his fellow-witnesses in the completeness and satisfaction of the Christian life. It is with a view to this that other subjects are introduced, that certain instructions are given, and that counsels are offered against certain infirmities and perils.

The Ep., nevertheless, may have had a particular occasion. That is found by some in a certain critical condition of the Church or Churches addressed (Lücke, etc.); and there are, no doubt, things in the Ep. which point to shortcomings, especially in the matter of brotherly love. But there is nothing to indicate that those addressed were in a peculiarly dangerous or faulty condition, or that the moral life had sunk very low among them. The Ep. is not one of reproof. It is rather written under the sense that writer and readers are living in 'the last time,' and that the Coming of the Lord is expected. Its particular occasion, therefore, may rather be sought in what it says of the appearance of certain false teachers, in which event the writer sees the token of 'the last time.' Who were those errorists that are here spoken of as 'Antichrists'? To this question many different answers have been given. Some of them may be at once dismissed as too large and indefinite. To say, e.g. (with Bleek), that the men in view are Christians, men who had lost their faith or had practised it unworthily, or that they are men who had fallen into Antinomian licence, is inconsistent both with the fact that the 'Antichrists' are described as outside the Church, and with the kind of fault that is attributed to them here. Further, if Antinomian error had been specially in view, we should have expected (so Neander), not such a declaration as 'Every one that doeth sin, doeth also lawlessness; and sin is lawlessness' (3^{4} RV), but rather 'Every one that doeth lawlessness, doeth also sin; and lawlessness is sin.' To say that they were Jews (Löffler), or that they were Ebionites, is equally wide of the mark, nothing being found to imply that the error in question was merely a denial of the Messiahship of Jesus, or a reduction of Christ to the rank of a second Moses. There is as little to support the idea that the Ep. has in view more than one class of errorists, Ebionites and Sabians (Storr), or Ebionite and Docetic teachers (Sander).

It is more reasonable to identify them with Docetic teachers of the Gnostic type. They are described as denying that 'Jesus is the Christ,' as denying 'the Father and the Son' ($2^{22.\,23}$), and as confessing 'not Jesus' (4^{3}). They are contrasted with those who are of the spirit that 'confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh' (4^{2}); and, toward the close of the Ep., though they are not mentioned, the note that is still insisted on is belief 'that Jesus is the Christ' (5^{1}). These terms do not carry us to the particular refinements of Gnosticism that are connected with the name of Basilides, as some think (Pfleiderer). There is no point of contact with the strange Basilidean theories of a tripartite sonship, the division of the world into the Ogdoad and the Hebdomad, and the destiny of Jesus to be the 'first-fruits of the sorting of the things confused.' Nor is there any real analogy between the doctrine of the Son in the Ep. and the vague speculations of these Gnostics about the descent of a light from the Hebdomad upon Jesus the Son of Mary at the Annunciation. There might seem more, perhaps, that resembles the Valentinian doctrine, in which the idea of σπέρματα has a large and prominent place. But the Christology of the Ep. is far removed from any one or all of the three views of the origin of Jesus which are ascribed to Valentinus by Irenæus (i. 11. 15, etc.). The terms point to something more specific, however, than the ordinary Docetic doctrine which bore that our Lord had only an apparent body all through His life on earth, and until His Ascension. They best suit the teachings of the Gnostic Cerinthus, in which Oriental, Jewish, and Christian ideas seem to have been mixed up, and which distinguished between the man 'Jesus' and 'Christ' the heavenly Being, and affirmed that 'the Christ' united Himself with 'Jesus' only at the baptism of the latter, and continued with Him only till His Passion. Beyond this the terms do not seem to warrant us to go. It is probably too much to say (e.g. with Holtzmann) that the error in view all through the Ep. is the dualistic form of Gnosis which was Christologically Docetic and practically Antinomian, or (with Lipsius, etc.) that both Docetism and Antinomianism are intended. It is doubtful whether we can say (e.g. with Weiss, Harnack, etc.) that the Ep. is directed also against men within the Church who misunderstood and perverted St. Paul's doctrine. Such statements as 'he that doeth righteousness is righteous' (3^7), are not enough to bear the weight of such inferences.

7. Authorship.—Who, then, is the author of an Ep. which speaks of a form of Gnostic doctrine like that associated with the name of the traditional opponent of the Apostle John in his old age? The general answer, as has been said, has been: the Apostle John himself. This was the almost universal belief of the early Church, the exceptions being few, of small account, and easily understood. The sect of the Alogi may have rejected the Ep., as they did the Gospel and the Apocalypse. But the statement in Epiphanius (Hær. tom. i. c. 34) amounts only to a perhaps, and the rejection, if it was the fact, would have been, as in the case of the Gospel, for doctrinal reasons. Marcion, we know, refused it a place in his very limited Canon; but his exclusion of it and of so much else in the NT turned, not upon the question of historical testimony, but on that of harmony with his own special views. At a much later period an obscure statement is made by Cosmas Indicopleustes in the 6th cent. (Topogr. Christ. I. vii.), to the effect that some maintained that all the Catholic Epp. were written by presbyters, not by apostles. And Leontius of Byzantium (contr. Nestor. et Eutych. iii. 14) speaks of Theodore of Mopsuestia as 'abrogating' the Ep. of James and the other Catholic Epp.—'Epistolam Jacobi et alias deinceps aliorum catholicas abrogat et antiquat.' This is all. And so the case stood, as far as we know, till late in the 16th cent., when Joseph Scaliger declared all three Epp. not to be by the apostle. Then S. G. Lange, with strange taste, pronounced the first unworthy of an apostle, though he felt the force of the historical testimony for its apostolic origin. Others tried to prove it to be the work of a Jewish Christian author and a Gnostic reviser (Claudius), or ascribed it to the presbyter John (Bretschneider, Paulus). But the severest assault made upon the Ep. in ancient or in modern times is that of Baur and his school. The Tübingen criticism has not been at one in all things. Some of its adherents have held the Gospel and the Ep. to be by the same author (K. R. Köstlin, Georgii); others have held them to be by different hands (Baur, Hilgenfeld, etc.). But the school has been at one in denying the apostolic origin of the Ep., and in ascribing it to a writer of the 2nd cent.

The reasons given for this view of the Ep. are such as the following:—The circumstances, the forms of thought, and the condition of the Church which appear in it, it is said, point to a later period than the apostolic. Different critics fix on different things in support of this contention. Some fix upon the doctrine of the Logos as they suppose it to be expressed here (Bretschneider); of which it is enough to say that in Hebrew thought and in Greek there was a soil prepared for it before the close of the 1st cent. at any rate. Others argue from the acquaintance which it betrays with Docetic error. But it is too much to assert that that type of error does not emerge till the post-apostolic age, and the particular form in view here is, as we have seen, like the doctrine attributed to Cerinthus. Others (Hilgenfeld, etc.) reason from its reference to Gnostic doctrine. But while the riper and more complicated forms of Gnosticism belong to a later time, it is not made historically good that there was not or could not be at the earlier date Gnostic ideas of a simpler and more rudimentary kind, and it is acknowledged (e.g. by Hilgenfeld) that it is only an undeveloped form that appears in this Epistle. But besides that, it has to be said that the things in the Ep. which are supposed to betray the influence of Gnostic thought are not sufficient for the purpose. Of the doctrine ascribed to the 'Antichrists' we have already spoken. But much is made of the use of the terms σπέρμα and χρίσμα, and of the idea that we should only love and not fear God. But the terms σπέρμα and χρίσμα have a totally different application here from what they have in the far-fetched and impracticable speculations of the Gnostic sects. Nor do we require to go to Gnostic sources for their origin. They have their explanation in the ideas of Revelation—the one in the OT idea of an anointing, the other in the NT idea of a birth or a being begotten of God. And that there should be, not the fear that hath torment, but pure love to God, is surely a most Christian idea.

It is further argued that the Ep. cannot be an apostolic composition, because it shows the presence of Montanistic doctrine (Planck, Baur). Traces of Montanism are thought to be found especially in what is said of the moral condition of the believer, of the unction, and of sins 'not unto death' and 'a sin unto death.' With respect to the first, the Ep. speaks, it is true, of the moral condition of the believer in its ideal perfection. But it is not an absolute sinlessness that it ascribes to him, nor does it speak of his perfection at all in the Montanist way. For the Montanists claimed a spiritual perfection above other Christians. The idea of the chrism or 'unction,' as it appears here, is as little Montanistic as it is Gnostic. It rests upon biblical ideas and biblical employments of the act of anointing with oil. Neither does the distinction between two kinds of sin necessarily bear the sense which Baur puts upon it. Even if we were to grant this, it would not carry the late date with it. Hilgenfeld has pointed out that the idea of special mortal sins is found in the Periodi Petri, a part of the pseudo-Clementine literature, and, in his opinion, it is therefore earlier than Montanism. Much more, too, would surely have been made of the doctrine of the Paraclete, if the Ep. had been written by a Montanist or under Montanistic influences. Other arguments adverse to its apostolic origin and its connexion with John the evangelist are of even less importance. The brevity of the reference to the false teachers and the limited refutation of them have been held to be inconsistent with the claims preferred on behalf of the Epistle. But this is to overlook the method of the Ep., which is to present the truth, and to do that authoritatively, rather than to expose error. The vagueness of the introduction, and the want of anything in it to identify the writer with John the apostle, are also adduced. But it is customary with St. John not to name himself directly, and the author associates himself at least with the eye-witnesses of Christ's life, and speaks all through in a tone befitting one conscious of apostolic dignity.

Once more the apostolic authorship is contested on the ground that the Ep. is so different from the Apocalypse. This is, of course, an important argument with those of the Tübingen school, and it is perhaps best put by those of that school who, like Hilgenfeld, hold the Ep. to be older than the Gospel. The Apoc. being by John the apostle, the remarkable way in which it differs from the Ep. in language and conception makes it impossible, it is argued, for the latter to be by the same hand. The differences, indeed, are great, and extend not only to vocabulary, grammar, and phraseology, but to attitude, spirit, and idea. They may be explained so far, however, by difference in circumstance, time of composition, subject, and so far also by the fact that the one writing is an Ep., while the other belongs to the peculiar order of apocalyptic literature which has a form and a method of its own. The difference in idea, too, is in important cases much less than the Tübingen critics are inclined to make it. There is no such antagonism, e.g., as they suppose between the God of wrath in the Apoc. and the God of love in the Ep., or between the view of the divine righteousness as judging evil in the Apoc. and the view of the same righteousness as forgiving sin in the Epistle. That there are many points of affinity, too, between Gospel, Ep., and Apoc., is admitted by critics like Hilgenfeld. But the question of the Apoc. is one by itself. See art. REVELATION (BOOK OF).

The arguments in favour of the non-apostolic origin of the Ep. are far from convincing. Even were they much more so than they are, they could not prevail against the historical evidence. For that is peculiarly strong. The entire witness of antiquity (with the solitary exceptions already referred to in the cases of Cosmas and Leontius) from the time of Eusebius is for the Johannine authorship. Athanasius, Cyril of Jerusalem, Epiphanius, and others attest it. Jerome, speaking of the Apostle John, in his Catalogue of Ecclesiastical Writers (ch. 9), says of him: 'Scripsit autem et unam epistolam, cujus exordium est, Quod fuit ab initio . . . quæ ab universis ecclesiasticis et eruditis viris probatur.' Eusebius himself places it among the Homologoumena (HE iii. 25), and ascribes it to John (HE iii. 24, 25). Travelling back from these declarations, we find Dionysius, the scholar of Origen, citing the words of the Ep. as those of the evangelist, and reasoning against the Johannine origin of the Apoc. from its unlikeness to the Ep. in style and language (Euseb. HE vii. 25). We find Origen himself repeatedly quoting it or referring to it as by John (e.g. Ev. Joh. tom. xiii. 21). It is in the Peshiṭta, and in the Muratorian Fragment, the latter quoting the words 'Quæ vidimus oculis nostris et auribus audivimus et manus nostræ palpaverunt hæc scripsimus vobis' as John's. Similar testimony is borne to it by Cyprian (Ep. 25), who quotes $2^{3.4}$, by Tertullian (adv. Marc. v. 16; adv. Prax. ch. 13, 28; adv. Gnost. 12, etc.), and by Clem. Alex. (Strom. ii. 15, iii. 4, 5, iv. 16). Irenæus, too, quotes the Ep. several times, and ascribes it to John, the Lord's disciple, who also wrote the Gospel (de Hær. iii. 16; Euseb. HE v. 8). Further, Papias (who is described by Irenæus as Ἰωάννου μὲν ἀκουστής, Πολυκάρπου δ' ἑταῖρος) is reported by Eusebius (HE iii. 39) to have 'used testimonies from John's former Ep.' (κέχρηται δ' ὁ αὐτὸς μαρτυρίαις ἀπὸ τῆς Ἰωάννου προτέρας ἐπιστολῆς). And Polycarp, the disciple of St. John (ad Philipp. ch. 7), has the sentence πὰς γὰρ ὃς ἂν μὴ ὁμολογῇ Ἰησοῦν Χριστὸν ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθέναι, ἀντίχριστός ἐστιν; which so closely resembles 1 Jn 4^{3} that few (though Scholten is of the number) have refused to see in it an evidence of Polycarp's acquaintance with the Epistle.

Whether we can carry the chain of witness further back even than Polycarp's letter, is doubtful. It depends chiefly on the date to which the Didaché is referred, and on the view taken of certain sentences in it. The Ep. appears to be known, indeed, to the writer of the Ep. to Diognetus; but the date of that writing, which is placed by Lightfoot (St. Ignatius and St. Polycarp, i. 517) between A.D. 117 and 130, is uncertain. Traces of it have also been found by some in Justin Martyr, the Ep. of Barnabas, the Shepherd of Hermas, and the Epistles of Ignatius. But these are not definite enough to prove acquaintance with the writing. They may indicate no more than the use of terms which were common to all Christians, or to certain circles of Christians, at the time. But in the Didaché we have, perhaps, something more. In chs. x., xi., e.g., we find the phrase τελειῶσαι αὐτὴν ἐν τῇ ἀγάπῃ σου; παρελθέτω ὁ κόσμος οὗτος; πᾶς δὲ προφήτης δεδοκιμασμένος. These remind us of the τετελείωται ἐν ἀγάπῃ of our Ep. (4^{18}) and the parallel phrases in 2^{5} $4^{12.17}$; of the ὁ κόσμος παράγεται of 2^{17} (a very similar form occurs, however, also in St. Paul, 1 Co 7^{31}); and of the δοκιμάζετε τὰ πνεύματα of 4^{1}. If these are regarded as reminiscences of the words of the Ep., and not simply as proofs of acquaintance with John's teaching, it may be, in oral form, and if the Didaché can be referred to the closing years of the first century or the opening years of the second, we have a witness earlier even than Polycarp.

To this must be added the argument drawn from the relation in which Gospel and Ep. stand to each other. If it can be shown that the two writings are by one hand, then all that goes to prove the Gospel to be the work of the evangelist John goes to prove the Ep. to be his also. This question, whether the author of the Gospel also wrote the Ep., is answered in the negative by the Tübingen critics generally. In support of that position it is urged that the two writings differ radically in their attitude to the OT law, in their view of the person of Christ, in their doctrines of the Holy Spirit and the work of Christ, in their eschatology, and in their general mode of thought. The Ep., it is said, stands 'in a more intimate relationship' to the law than is the case with the Gospel. But in point of fact there is no mention of the νόμος in the Ep., and the passages which are supposed to have it specially in view have another application. It does not appear that in the use of the term ἀνομία in 3^{4} it is the Mosaic law that is particularly in view, or that the ἀπ' ἀρχῆς in $2^{7.8}$ refers specially to the OT law of love. The idea of a personal Logos, again, which is found in the Prologue to the Gospel, is thought to be foreign to the Epistle. But if we have not the term ὁ λόγος, we have the phrase ὁ λόγος τῆς ζωῆς in the introduction to the Ep.; and, even if it is allowed to be a question whether the latter phrase has the same sense as the former, we have a similar conception of the superhuman, pre-temporal, personal being of Christ in the terms 'life' and 'Son of God' as they appear in the Epistle. The Holy Spirit, it is further urged, is not presented as He is in the Gospel in personal relations, of which the use of the neuter term χρίσμα is supposed to be a proof. But the term χρίσμα is an easily understood term for a particular gift or operation of the Holy One; and the 'witness' which is said to be borne by the Spirit (5^{6}), which is also ascribed to the Spirit by Christ in the Fourth Gospel (15^{26}), points to the harmony of the two writings on the subject of the personality of the Holy Ghost.

The designation of Christ as 'Advocate' (2^{2}) is also held by Baur and others of his school to be in affinity with the Ep. to the Hebrews rather than with the Fourth Gospel, and to indicate a view of Christ's relation to His disciples which 'lay far apart from the evangelist.' But the idea of Christ as Intercessor is not peculiar to any particular Ep., but is found again and again in the NT; nor can it be made out that in anything else that is said of Christ's relations to His disciples there is any difference between the Ep. and the Gospel. Nor is it the case that the Ep. has an eschatology which is not known to the Gospel. The conceptions of a present judgment and a spiritual Parousia prevail, it is true, in the Gospel, but not to the exclusion of the ideas of a future judgment and a Parousia at the end of things ($5^{28.\ 29}$ $6^{39.\ 40}$ etc.). And the eschatological conception of the Advent and the Judgment is expressed in the Ep., but not to the absolute exclusion of the form of doctrine characteristic of the Gospel. For it speaks of a passing from death to life which is already accomplished, and of eternal life as a present possession. Further, to say, with Baur, Hilgenfeld, and others, that there is a more 'material and external' mode of thought in the Ep. than in the Gospel, is to misjudge and misinterpret the former. The designation, e.g., of God as 'light' is strangely thought to express a more material conception of God than is possible to the writer of the Gospel, and the symbols of the 'water' and the 'blood' are thought to be differently used, more materially in the Ep., more ideally in the Gospel. But these suppositions rest on mistaken interpretations of the passages.

There are differences between the two writings, as we have seen, and these differences are neither few in number nor inconsiderable in weight. They are differences which go to establish the independence of the two compositions. But they are not sufficient to prove a difference of authorship. They can be made to appear so only by forced constructions, and by overlooking the distinct purposes and circumstances of the writings. They can be explained by the differences between the Gospel and the Ep. in the occasions which produced them, the subjects with which they have to deal, and the ends which they have in view, and by the natural difference between an historical composition and a letter. On the other hand, there are similarities of the most remarkable kind in thought, style, and expression, in characteristic ideas, in imagery and symbolism, and in the special type of doctrine. They are similarities which pervade the two writings, and point strongly to identity of authorship.

No explanation of the origin of the Ep., therefore, fits the facts so well as the one that has prevailed. It is to internal considerations that those appeal who reject it; and it is largely on the ground of the supposed impossibility of two writings so different in character as the Ep. and the Apoc. proceeding from one and the same hand, that the Tübingen critics deny the apostolicity of the former. The external evidence is not seriously assailed. It is admitted even by so uncompromising a critic as the late Dr. Samuel Davidson that 'the letter is well attested by the voice of antiquity, and that, as far as external evidence reaches, its authenticity seems to be secure' (Introduction to the NT, ii. 302).

8. Place and Date.—If the Ep. is the work of John, it is most natural to suppose it to have been written in Asia Minor, most probably in Ephesus. It is true that we have no definite statement in early Christian literature to that effect, and some who regard it as intended to form a companion to the Gospel are inclined to refer it to Patmos. But it is with Ephesus that the most ancient tradition connects the composition of the Gospel. What Irenæus says of John the μαθητὴς τοῦ Κυρίου and his Gospel is this: καὶ αὐτὸς ἐξέδωκε τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, ἐν Ἐφέσῳ τῆς Ἀσίας διατρίβων (adv. Hær. iii. 1), and the same is said in effect by Jerome (Prolog. to Matth. vol. vii. pp. 5, 6). If the Gospel and the Ep., therefore, belong to the same period in John's life, as many things go to show, it is reasonable to suppose that the Ep. as well as the Gospel was written in Asia Minor, and most probably in Ephesus, all the more that it is with that territory and that city that ancient tradition connects the closing stage of John's career.

If there is little by which to determine the place where the Ep. was written, there is as little by which to fix its date. Some, indeed, have thought it possible to define the time of its composition precisely, and have been bold enough even to refer it to one particular year. Ebrard ascribes it to the year 95 of the Dionysian era. But his reasoning turns upon the uncertain suppositions that the Ep. is a dedicatory companion to the Gospel, and that the Gospel was written in Patmos, John being in that island, as he holds, in the fifteenth year of Domitian. Ewald, again, puts the writing of the Gospel at 80 A.D., but thinks it was not in circulation till immediately before John's death; while the Ep., according to him, was written later, but circulated earlier. All that can be said with any measure of confidence is that the Ep. belongs to the later apostolic period. This seems the natural, if not the necessary, inference from the general cast of its contents, the condition of the Christian communities which is indicated in it, the errors which it combats, the lack of any reference to the contest between legalism and liberty, and the impression which it conveys that the questions which occupy so large a place in the great Pauline Epp. are no longer the questions of the day. It is in harmony with the traditional account of the period of John's stay in Ephesus, as it appears in Polycrates (cf. Euseb. HE iii. 31), Irenæus (adv. Hær. ii. 39, iii. 1, 3), Origen, and Clement of Alexandria (Euseb. HE iii. 1, 23), as well as in Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. c. 9). It is also in harmony with the tone of the Ep., for it reads like the calm counsel of old age and ripest experience; and with the presumption which is created by St. Paul's declared principle of action (Ro 15^{20}), and by the absence of any reference to John or any salutation to him in the Pauline Epp. addressed to Asiatic Churches, that it was written after the death of the great Apostle of the Gentiles. It is most probable, also, that it was written after the destruction of Jerusalem, though how long after that event it is impossible to say. Some, indeed (e.g. Grotius, Düsterdieck, Fritzsche), have held it to be earlier than that catastrophe, on the ground of the mention of 'the last hour' in 2^{18}, or for the broader reason that an event of so terrible moment could scarcely have passed without some notice, if it had happened. But there may be no allusion to that event, for the simple reason that there was no special call to refer to it, or because it was no longer a very recent thing. Nor can anything be made of the statement in 2^{18}. The term 'the last hour' applies, not to the destruction of Jerusalem (how could the 'antichrists' be signs of that?), but to the Parousia, in which connexion we find the phrase ἔσχατοι καιροί used even by Ignatius (Ep. ad Ephes. c. xi.). The Gnostic teaching which is condemned, and the external position of the errorists, combine with other things to point to a period later than 70 A.D., and towards the end of the century. This is in harmony also with the traditional date of Cerinthus, with whose doctrine the view of Christ's Person repudiated in the Ep. is most probably identified, and with the period in John's life to which tradition assigns his connexion with the heretic.

It has been sought to define the time of composition more precisely by determining the chronological relation of the Ep. to the Gospel. But the materials for doing so are far too scanty, and the arguments which have been urged for the one view or the other have little weight. Some hold the Ep. to be prior to the Gospel, on the ground that writings of 'momentary design, like letters, come naturally before writings of permanent design, like narratives or histories' (Thiersch); or on the ground that a letter of warning to particular Churches against particular errors would probably have been written earlier than a composition like the Gospel, which deals with the historical foundations, and appears to be addressed to all Christendom (Huther, al.). Others argue for the posteriority of the Ep. on the basis of certain passages which are supposed to refer to the Gospel, or to presuppose it, or on the ground that the Ep. seems to require the Gospel for its explanation. But, even if the latter were granted, it would not follow that the Ep. was later than the Gospel. Reuss, who thinks that the former needs the latter as its commentary, yet admits that 'as it once had one in the oral instruction of the author, it is not thereby proved that it is later' (Hist. of the NT, Houghton's tr., p. 237). And as to the passages appealed to in particular, the opening verses in their relation to the Prologue of the Gospel, the phrase ἐν σαρκὶ ἐληλυθότα (4^2) as compared with σὰρξ ἐγένετο, etc., they are almost equally applicable or inapplicable as arguments for the priority of the Ep. and for its posteriority. There is, indeed, nothing in the Ep. that can be justly said to presuppose the existence of the Gospel as we have it, or to go beyond what is explainable by the earlier oral preaching and teaching.

9. Destination.—The Ep. being written, then, in the scenes of the closing stage of John's apostolic ministry, it is most reasonable to suppose it to have been written for readers belonging to those parts. It has been supposed, indeed, to have been addressed to Palestinian Christians (Benson). But there is nothing to favour such a supposition, the contents of the Ep. pointing to a Gentile-Christian audience rather than a Jewish-Christian. Some have thought it directed to a single Church, that of Ephesus (Hug), or even that of Corinth (Lightfoot). But its wide scope and encyclical character are inconsistent with that. Others have regarded it as addressed to Christians outside the scene of the life and ministry of John in his old age (Holtzmann), or as an encyclical of the widest scope (Hilgenfeld). But the terms which are said to bear this out do not meet the case. The καὶ ὑμῖν and καὶ ὑμεῖς in 1^3 do not suffice to establish a distinction between the Asiatic Christians among whom John was writing and those to whom his letter is directed; and while the character of the Ep. suits its designation as a Catholic Ep., there are things in it, especially the references to particular forms of error, which so far limit and define its destination.

The most curious thing connected with this question of the readers that are in view, is the fact that Augustine, in quoting 3^2, speaks of the passage as being in John's 'Epistle to the Parthians' (quod dictum est a Joanne in epistola ad Parthos, Quæst. Evang. ii. 39). That is the only certain occurrence, indeed, of this designation in Augustine's works. It is given, however, in the Benedictine edition of his Tractates on the Ep., in the title; in the Indiculus operum S. Augustini of Possidius; in one or two manuscripts; in the contra Varimadum Arianum of Idacius Clarus or Vigilius Tapsensis; and in Bede's (if it is genuine) Prologus super septem epistolas canonicas, where it is said that many ecclesiastical writers, and among them the great Athanasius, affirm this Ep. to be 'written to the Parthians.' Hence it has been supposed by some (Grotius, etc.) that the Ep. was addressed to Jewish Christians living beyond the Euphrates within the limits of the Parthian empire. But we hear of no connexion between John and Parthia, and the designation ad Parthos appears to have been unknown to the Church of the East, and even to the Church of the West before Augustine's time. It is a pure puzzle, a curiosity on which nothing can be based. It has been accounted for as a mistake for ad Pathmios (Serrarius), ad sparsos (Wetstein), adpertius (Semler), ad Spartos (Scholz, on the authority of a 12th century manuscript), πρὸς διασπαρσαμένους (!) (Holtzmann, Mangold), πρὸς πάντας (Paulus), πρὸς παρθένους (Gieseler, etc.). Most favour the last of these explanations. Some think that the title πρὸς παρθένους was given to express the pure condition of the Churches addressed (Whiston); others, that the inscription of the Second Ep. (πρὸς παρθένους) as found in some manuscripts was transferred as more suitable to the First (Hug). Some, again, suppose that the title ran ἐπιστολὴ τοῦ Ἰωάννου τοῦ παρθένου, John having the designation ἀποστόλου καὶ εὐαγγελιστοῦ παρθένου in the inscription borne by the Apoc. in one manuscript (Cod. Guelpher.); others, that Augustine misunderstood what was said by Clem. Alex. (Frag. 1011) about the Second Ep. being written πρὸς παρθένους, and transferred the title to the First (Huther). All is conjecture, and can in no way affect the probabilities of the case (supported as these are by the tradition bearing on John's residence and work in Asia Minor) that the Ep. had in view the Churches that would be naturally addressed from Ephesus. It is therefore with those Asiatic regions in which Gnostic speculations had become rife (Apoc. $2^{6\text{ etc.}}$), and with that great city in which Paul had planted a Christian Church, and in which John had lived on, according to Irenæus (adv. Hær. ii. 22^5, iii. 3^3), into the reign of Trajan, that this majestic Ep., with its heavenly calm and its lofty message of truth and love, is connected in respect both of readers and of writer.

LITERATURE.—Among the numerous Commentaries, special mention may be made of those of Œcumenius, Calvin, Düsterdieck, Lücke, Huther, Ebrard, Rothe (most fruitful of all), Haupt, Alford, Jelf, Westcott, Holtzmann, de Wette-Brückner, Braune, Alexander (in the Speaker's Comm.), Ewald, Plummer; among books on Introduction, especially those by Weiss, Reuss, Bleek, Hilgenfeld, Salmon, S. Davidson, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Zahn; and among works of other kinds, the Expositions by Neander, F. D. Maurice, R. S. Candlish, Lias, and Watson, Erdmann's Primæ Ep. Joan. argumentum, nexus et consilium; Luthardt's de Primæ Joan. Ep. Compositione; Flatt's de antichristis et pseudoprophetis in Ep. Joan.; Gfrörer's Urchristenthum; Besser's Bibelstunden; Pfleiderer's Urchristenthum and Hibbert Lectures; Harnack's Geschichte der altchrist. Literatur bis Eusebius.

THE SECOND EPISTLE.—1. Contents.—This brief Ep., though it touches the First Ep. at several points, and has also something in common with the Third, has an independent value, and a distinct interest. It is unmistakably a letter, and is distinguished from the First Ep. by its personal and private character. It is addressed, not to a wide circle of readers, as is the case with the First, but to a particular individual or Church, and it represents a writer who speaks less with the tone of command, but with more of the earnestness that cares for individual Christians, and seeks to come into direct relations with them. As to its origin and much else belonging to it, we have little or nothing to guide us beyond what can be gathered from its own tenor. It seems to have been occasioned by the pressure of dangers arising from false teaching, and its object is to secure the individual or the Church that is addressed against these perils until the writer could visit the scene in person.

With this object in view the author begins his letter, somewhat in St. Paul's way, with a commendation of the person or persons to whom he writes, and with a large Christian greeting. Again, with a tact and courtesy such as we find in St. Paul's letters, he expresses the joy which he had in the consistent life of her (be it lady or Church) whom he addresses. From this he passes on to an exhortation, couched in terms of entreaty, to fulfil the great law of Christian love—a love explained to imply a life and walk in practical obedience to the divine commandments. His reason for writing in such a strain is, as he indicates, his fear of the possible influence of certain errorists, whom he identifies with Antichrist, because they deny that Jesus is the Christ come in the complete reality of human nature. He counsels watchfulness against the insidious teaching of such deceivers, and speaks of the loss which would follow the acceptance of it. He reminds his reader or readers further of the fact that fellowship with God cannot be enjoyed unless one abides by the true doctrine of Christ. He declares those who deny that doctrine to be men not to be received or welcomed, lest one should make himself partaker in their evil. He adds certain explanations about the shortness of his letter, and his intention to come in person. He closes with a brief salutation from certain Christians with whom he is associated at the time.

2. Authorship.—This Ep. has much in common with the First. It speaks, as the latter does, of 'love,' 'truth,' 'the truth,' 'the commandments,' a 'new commandment' and one 'had from the beginning,' of 'loving in truth,' and 'walking in truth,' of 'abiding in' one, of a 'joy' that may be 'fulfilled.' It speaks, too, of 'Antichrist,' and deals with the same form of error—the denial that Jesus is 'the Christ come in the flesh.' And it uses the same methods of stating a thing—first positively, and then negatively. There are some things, it is true, in which it differs from 1 Jn. It has certain phrases and grammatical forms which do not occur in the First Ep.—e.g. εἴ τις for ἐάν τις, περιπατεῖν κατά for περιπατεῖν ἐν, ἐρχόμενος ἐν σαρκί for ἐληλυθὼς ἐν σαρκί, θεὸν ἔχειν, διδαχὴ Χριστοῦ, διδαχὴν φέρειν, βλέπετε ἑαυτούς, etc. But little can be made of such things as these. They are not enough to establish any essential difference in idea or in style. It is admitted, even by some who dispute the apostolic origin of 2 Jn, that 'these deviations do not destroy the force of the argument contained in the resemblances' (S. Davidson's Introd. to the NT, ii. p. 329).

This being the case, the inference would seem to be that 2 Jn is by the same hand as 1 Jn. This has been in point of fact the general view, and even some of those who have denied the Johannine authorship of 1 Jn have admitted that the two Epp. are by the same writer (Bretschneider, Paulus). But there are some who deny that identity of authorship can be inferred from the similarities which have been noticed, even though these come to so much that more than a half of the smaller Ep. can be found in the larger. They think that these striking resemblances can be explained by the art of a forger, or as the imitative work of a writer who knew 1 Jn well. So some who have recognized 1 Jn to be by the evangelist have ascribed 2 Jn to a different hand—either to the Presbyter John (Erasmus, Grotius, etc.), or to some other John unknown to us. Baur has a somewhat elaborate and far-fetched theory of the origin of this Epistle. He holds it to be of Montanist origin, and to be addressed to the Church to which the Gaius of 3 Jn belongs. He takes it to be indeed the Ep. which is referred to in 3 Jn ^{9}, and to be intended for one of the sections of the Roman Church, in which Church he thinks a schism had taken place. He bases this largely on the statement made by Clem. Alex. in his Hypotyposes as to 2 Jn being written ad quandam Babyloniam electam, supposing that Rome is meant by the Babylonia, and that the term electa, ἐκλεκτή, is a designation given to the Church in harmony with the Montanist idea of the Church as the pure and holy bride of Christ. But all this turns on a fanciful and inconsistent interpretation of Clement's words, and those who agree for the most part with Baur, both in his general positions and in his denial of the apostolic origin of 2 Jn, often decline to follow him here. Hilgenfeld, e.g., rejects this peculiar Montanist account of the Ep., and tries to explain it as an official condemnation, in the form of a letter, of fellowship with Gnostic teachers. That the Ep. cannot be ascribed to John the evangelist, however, is also held by some who are unable to go all the way either with Baur or with Hilgenfeld, and whose general view of it is essentially different. Ebrard, e.g., following Erasmus, assigns it to the Presbyter John, passing lightly over the resemblances to 1 Jn as so many allusions and reminiscences, and regarding the distinctive passages as essentially different from the evangelist's style.

Although the internal evidence, therefore, is held by most to point to the author of the First Ep. as also the writer of the Second, and to the Apostle John as that writer, it is not read in that way by all. How, then, does the case stand with respect to the external evidence? The historical testimony, it must be admitted, is neither very abundant nor very clear. That it should be so need not seem strange when regard is had to the extreme brevity of the Ep. and its private character. What we have is as much as could be expected, and it is on the whole sufficient for the purpose. The Ep. seems not to have been accepted by the school of Antioch. Theodore of Mopsuestia appears to be reported by Leontius of Byzantium as rejecting James and the other Cath. Epp. The words, however, viz. ob quam causam, ut arbitror, ipsam epistolam Jacobi et alias deinceps catholicas abrogat et antiquat, are not very precise. Theodoret makes no reference to 2 Jn. In a homily on Mt 21^{23}, which is doubtfully ascribed to Chrysostom, it is said of it, as well as of 3 Jn, οἱ πατέρες ἀποκανονίζονται. Jerome (de Vir. Illus. c. 9) contrasts the two smaller Epp. with the First, and speaks of them as ascribed to the Presbyter John. Origen, who quotes 1 Jn, never quotes either 2 Jn or 3 Jn. He knows of the circulation, however, of the two minor Epp., but remarks that 'not all affirm them to be genuine' (Euseb. HE vi. 25). Neither the one nor the other seems to have been included in the Peshiṭta Version. And Eusebius classes both among the Antilegomena. He speaks of them as the 'so-called second and third of John,' and indicates that it was questioned whether they belonged to the evangelist, 'or possibly to another of the same name as he' (HE iii. 25^{3}).

On the other hand, Irenæus quotes 2 Jn $^{10.\,11}$ as the words of 'John, the disciple of the Lord' (adv. Hær. i. 16^{3}), and gives the statement about the 'deceivers' and 'Antichrist' (2 Jn ^{7}) also as by the Lord's 'disciple,' though he refers to it as in 1 Jn instead of 2 Jn (adv. Hær. iii. 16^{8}). Clement of Alex. speaks of John 'in his larger Epistle' (ἐν τῇ μείζονι ἐπιστολῇ) as seeming to teach a certain thing; from which it is clear that he knew a shorter Ep. or shorter Epp. (Strom. ii. 15). In a fragmentary Latin translation of the Hypotyposes he speaks of the same Ep. in these very definite terms: Secunda Joannis epistola, quæ ad virgines scripta simplicissima est; scripta vero est ad quandam Babyloniam Electam nomine, significat autem electionem ecclesiæ sanctæ. He is also reported by Eusebius (HE vi. 14^{1}) to have commented in his Hypotyposes on the disputed books, viz. 'the Epistle of Jude and the other Catholic Epistles.' Dionysius of Alexandria (in a passage given in Eusebius, HE vii. 25) speaks of John as not naming himself, ἐν τῇ δευτέρᾳ φερομένῃ Ἰωάννου καὶ τρίτῃ, καίτοι βραχείαις οὔσαις ἐπιστολαῖς, but as writing 'anonymously as the presbyter.' Dionysius therefore regarded the anonymity of 2 Jn as quite in John's manner. And the school of Alexandria seems to have generally accepted the Second Ep. as John the apostle's. Alexander, e.g., in quoting vv.$^{10.\,11}$ says of them ὡς παρήγγειλεν ὁ μακάριος Ἰωάννης (Socrates, HE i. 6). The Muratorian Fragment refers to at least two Epp. of John in the difficult sentence, Epistola sane Jude et superscripti Johannis duas in catholica habentur et sapientia ab amicis Salomonis in honorem ipsius scripta (Routh, Reliq. Sac. i. p. 296). But the text requires emendation, and it is differently interpreted, some (Lücke, Huther, etc.) understanding it to speak for the Johannine authorship, others (reading ut for et sapientia)* taking it to mean that, as the Book of Wisdom was not written by Solomon, so these Epp. were not written by John the apostle.

It should be added that, though the great North African Fathers, Tertullian and Cyprian, do not quote 2 Jn, it is clear that it was recognized in their Church. For Cyprian himself, in reporting the statements made by the bishops at the synod which was held at Carthage in A.D. 256, speaks of Aurelius, bishop of Chullabi, as appealing to 2 Jn ^{10} in these words: Joannes Apostolus in epistola sua posuit dicens, si quis ad vos venit, etc. In like manner, although the Ep. was not in the great Syriac Version, it appears to have been used by Ephraem in the 4th cent., and that in a way indicating that it was understood to be by John the apostle (de Amore Paup. iii. 52; ad Imitat. Prov. i. 76). And while Eusebius placed it, as we have seen, among the 'disputed' books, he expresses himself differently in his Demonstratio Evangelica (iii. 5), when he gives, as it appears, his own opinion. There he says of John that in his Epistles he 'either makes no mention of himself or calls himself presbyter, but nowhere apostle or evangelist'—ἐν μὲν ταῖς ἐπιστολαῖς αὑτοῦ οὐδὲ μνήμην τῆς οἰκείας προσηγορίας ποιεῖται, ἢ πρεσβύτερον ἑαυτὸν ὀνομάζει, οὐδαμοῦ δὲ ἀπόστολον οὐδὲ εὐαγγελιστήν). It was included, too, in the Old Latin VS.

The most ancient historical testimony, therefore, although it is of limited quantity, is in favour of the authorship by John the apostle. It is testimony that comes from sources so far apart as Gaul, Alexandria, and North Africa. It is confirmed by the resemblance of 2 Jn to 1 Jn; the considerations which go to establish the Johannine origin of the latter being so far available also for the Johannine origin of the former. Nor is any difficulty created by the designation 'the elder.' That title rather supports the apostolic origin. It is still a moot point whether we have historical ground for believing in the existence of a Presbyter John in Ephesus as distinct from the Apostle John. Nor is there anything in the case as regards 2 Jn to make the hypothesis of this shadowy second John either necessary or helpful. It is to the apostle that the earliest evidence points. It is difficult, indeed, to understand how this small private letter could have been accepted as it was, and in due time made part of the Canon, unless the general opinion of the Church had ascribed it to John. And the use of the title, 'the elder,' in the inscription tells for the ordinary view. No one wishing to pass off a writing as by the apostle would have chosen so indefinite a title. No ordinary person, writing with honest intent in his own name, would have called himself 'the elder,' as if there were none but he; while, if the writer so styling himself had been a person of extraordinary importance, it would be strange that we should know nothing of him. There is nothing to show that the title is used to distinguish 'presbyter' from 'apostle.' Apostles could also be called presbyters, as we see from the NT itself (1 P 5^1), and as is the case in the very sentence from Papias on which the hypothesis of a distinct Presbyter John is founded. It may be a question in what particular sense the title is applied to the writer, whether with reference to his advanced age, as St. Paul speaks of himself as the 'aged,' ὁ πρεσβυτής (Philem ^{9}), or, as is rather the case, in respect of his peculiar position. But on no lips could this simple title be so fit or so intelligible as on those of the evangelist, the last of the apostles, who for long years had been overseer of the Christian community in Asia Minor. On his lips the name would explain itself, and it would mean more than 'apostle.' It would be the note of the peculiar relation, both official and fatherly, which the apostle had held to the Churches and their members in those parts, and would be at once understood wherever his superintendence had been known.

3. Time, Place, and Destination.—It is impossible to determine with certainty the time when the Ep. was written. It seems to belong to the closing years of the apostle. But whether it is earlier or later than the larger Ep. we have no means of deciding. There are those (e.g. Ebrard) who argue that it must be later, because there are things in it which appear to refer back to the First Epistle. But the similarities and supposed allusions are not of the kind that can be explained only by the priority of the larger Epistle. It is also probable that 2 Jn was written in the place where 1 Jn was written, especially as the false teachers in view are of the same order in both Epp. If the visit which is intimated in v.^{12} can be taken as an intended tour of inspection, we may go further, and say that, in all probability, the letter was written in Ephesus, the centre of the Asiatic circle.

The destination of the Ep. is also a matter of great difficulty. The most definite statement we have on the subject in early Christian literature is in the Latin fragment (if it be authentic) of the Hypotyposes of Clement of Alexandria, already referred to. But it is a mixed statement, and one that does not help us much. It is to the effect that the Ep. was written ad virgines, and to 'a certain Babylonian, Electa by name' (ad quandam Babyloniam Electam), but that this name Electa signified the election of the holy Church. The question turns upon the address ἐκλεκτῇ Κυρίᾳ, and the difficulty is in determining whether that refers to an individual or to a community. These different renderings of it are proposed: (1) to an elect lady; (2) to the elect lady; (3) to the elect Kyria; (4) to the lady Electa; (5) to Electa Kyria. Grammatically, the first is the simplest and most natural, but it is too indefinite. It is not easy to see how a letter of such a tenor could have been addressed so vaguely. The second interpretation may also be taken as grammatically defensible (cf. ἐκλεκτοῖς παρεπιδήμοις, 1 P 1^1), and has been followed by the English Versions and by Luther's German der auserwählten Frau. The third, which appears to have been favoured by Athanasius, and has been accepted later by Bengel, Lücke, de Wette, Düsterdieck, Ebrard, etc., is supported so far by the fact that Κυρίᾳ occurs as a proper name (Gruter, Inscript. p. 1127 n. 11), and by the analogy of the address of 3 Jn. But against it is the consideration that the more natural form in that case would have been Κυρίᾳ τῇ ἐκλεκτῇ, as we have Γαΐῳ τῷ ἀγαπητῷ (3 Jn ^{1}), Ῥοῦφον τὸν ἐκλεκτόν (Ro 16^{13}), and in the Ep. itself, ἀδελφῆς σοῦ τῆς ἐκλεκτῆς (v.^{13}). The fourth rendering, though favoured by Clement, has the difficulty that, while Electus occurs as a personal name, Electa seems not to be found among the names of women. But, apart from this, there is the fact that the term ἐκλεκτή occurs again in v.^{13}, and it is most unlikely that two sisters should have had the same name Electa. The least probable interpretation is the last, which, in addition to other difficulties, makes the person in question the bearer of two strange names.

* Et is confirmed, however, by the new MS of the Fragment published in Miscellanea Cassinese, 1897.

On the whole, there is most to favour the rendering 'to the elect lady,' and the idea that the Ep. is addressed to a Christian matron, who was held in high esteem in a wide Christian circle, and about whose children the apostle had something to write, partly in praise, partly in caution. But of this lady we know nothing beyond what is told us here. The supposition that the person addressed may have been Martha of Bethany has nothing to support it but the fanciful idea that Kyria in Gr. is like Martha in Heb., both being feminine forms of the word for 'Lord.' The designation in question, however, has been understood by not a few to be a figurative expression for a Christian society, rather than a literal description of an individual Christian. The reason for this is found partly in John's way of using symbolical terms, partly in the idea that the salutation would come more naturally from a Church to a Church, but chiefly in the fact that there is comparatively little in the Ep. that applies distinctly to an individual, and much that runs in plural terms — loving 'one another,' looking 'to yourselves,' etc. Hence Jerome, followed by Hilgenfeld, Lünemann, and Schmiedel, held the letter to be addressed to the Church generally. But this surely is excluded by the mention of the 'elect sister.' Others, with more probability, have supposed the Ep. to be directed to a particular Church; and some have attempted to identify the Church as that of Jerusalem (Whitby), or that of Philadelphia (Whiston), or that of Corinth (Serrarius). But it is doubtful whether any writer would naturally introduce such a symbolism into a brief private letter like this. And as it admits of no doubt that the Third Ep. is addressed to an individual, it seems most reasonable to suppose that the companion letter is also written to an individual. In this case we have another example, and a very interesting one, of the private correspondence of the apostles, and an instructive instance of John's pastoral concern for an individual believer and her children.

LITERATURE.—Among the Commentaries, especially those by Huther, Düsterdieck, Lücke, Alford, Ebrard, Westcott; among the books of Introduction, those given under the First Epistle; and in addition, Ritmeier, de Electa Domina; Krigele, de Κυρίᾳ Joannis; H. G. B. Müller, Comm. in Sec. Ep. Joan.; Rambonnet, de Sec. Ep. Joannea; Knauer, Studien u. Kritiken, 1833; S. Cox, The Private Letters of St. Paul and St. John.

THE THIRD EPISTLE.—1. Contents.—This Ep. is also very brief. The writer explains that it is so, not because he has little to say, but because he expects shortly to see the person addressed, and to 'speak face to face' with him (vv.$^{13.14}$) It is occupied mostly with things of personal and circumstantial interest, but it touches some important principles, and gives us glimpses of the condition of the early Christian societies which are of great value. It has all the marks of a letter, in freedom of style, and in the use of inscription, benediction, and salutation. It is written with much point and spirit, with some dramatic force, and also with singular tact. It begins with an expression of the writer's love for the friend addressed, his interest in his welfare, and his joy in the reports brought him by others of his truth and his consistent walk. It then praises him specially for the kindness which he had shown to certain 'brethren and strangers,' and commends these men further to his hospitable care. In strong terms it then condemns the action of a certain Diotrephes who had acted in a very different spirit, setting himself arrogantly against the writer, and grasping at authority, neither himself receiving such stranger brethren, nor allowing others to do so. Such ambitious and unbrotherly conduct, it says, is not to be imitated, and cannot be favoured by one who is of God. Passing from this unwelcome subject, it speaks a good word for a certain Demetrius, with whom perhaps the letter was to go, and closes with some personal explanations, a brief benediction, and mutual greetings.

2. Time, Place, Destination.—This Ep. raises no doubt about its destination. It is addressed to an individual, and is of a private character all through. But beyond the fact that his name was Gaius, that he had the confidence of the writer, and that he had a large and generous sense of Christian duty to strangers, we know nothing of the recipient. There is nothing to identify him with the Gaius or Caius, one of the 'men of Macedonia' who were 'Paul's companions in travel' (Ac 19^{29}); with the Gaius of Derbe who accompanied Paul into Asia (Ac 20^{4}); with the Corinthian Gaius who was one of the few baptized by Paul (1 Co 1^{14}), and is described as Paul's 'host' and that 'of the whole Church' (Ro 16^{23}); or with another of the same name who is said to have been made bishop of Pergamos by John (Const. Apostol. vii. 46). The fact that the Gaius of this Ep. and the Gaius of Corinth have both the character of hospitality, is a very slender basis on which to establish the identity of the two. The name Gaius was one of the commonest personal names, and the prominent men in the Churches of Asia Minor may not have been the same in John's time as in Paul's. The Ep. itself, indeed, does not show that this Gaius was a presbyter or held any official position. He may very well have been a simple member, though one of influence and repute. Nor does the Ep. make it possible for us to identify the Church to which he belonged. Some, indeed, have thought it to be the Church of Pergamos, a Gaius being mentioned in the Apost. Const. as bishop of that place (Wolf, Thoma); and some have taken it to be the Church of Corinth, supposing this Gaius to be the Gaius of Corinth referred to in the Pauline Epp. (Koenen). We can only say that in all probability it was one in the Ephesian circle.

Nor have we more to guide us in determining the date of the Ep. and the place where it was written. Its general character and its likeness to 2 Jn point to the close of the apostle's ministry, if it is his composition, and to one or other of the Asiatic Churches over which his superintendence was exercised. As in the case of 2 Jn, Ephesus would most probably be the place, especially if the visit referred to in v.^{14} could be understood to mean a tour of inspection. And Eusebius (HE iii. 23), speaking of John's administration of the Churches in Asia after the death of Domitian, quotes from Clement a statement bearing that the apostle 'coming from the isle of Patmos to Ephesus, went also, when called, to the neighbouring regions of the Gentiles; in some to appoint bishops, in some to institute entire new Churches, in others to appoint to the ministry some one of those that were pointed out by the Holy Ghost.'

3. Occasion.—The Ep. appears to have been occasioned by the visits of certain Christian brethren who moved about from place to place, probably as travelling preachers or missionary teachers, and by the different receptions that had been given them. Such men were dependent on the hospitality of their brethren, and deserved to enjoy it. They had visited the Church to which Gaius belonged, and had also come to John. They had received a brotherly welcome from Gaius, but had been rudely treated by another member of the Church, a man of ambitious spirit who disowned the apostle's authority. The letter is written in these circumstances to encourage Gaius in his generous attitude to such strangers, and to intimate the apostle's purpose to visit the Church in person and set matters right. We gather from it, too, that it had been preceded by another short letter, which seems to have had no effect. That letter has been identified by some with 1 Jn (Storr, etc.), by others with 2 Jn (Besser, Ewald, etc.). But the subjects dealt with in these Epp. are so unlike those questions of hospitality to a particular class which make the main contents of 3 Jn, that little can be said for such identifications. The letter appears to be one of the lost Epp. of Apostles.

4. Affinities and Authorship.—It has marked affinities both with 1 Jn and 2 Jn. It has some words, φλυαρεῖν, φιλοπρωτεύειν, ὑπολαμβάνειν as = welcome, which are not found in these others. But they are due to the case which the Ep. has to express. It has other words and phrases, such as προπέμπειν, εὐουδοῦσθαι, ὑγιαίνειν, ἐπιδέχεσθαι, πιστὸν ποιεῖν, which are either peculiar or more after Paul's style than John's. But they are far outweighed by the general resemblance in the case of the two smaller letters; the similarity of the terms in which the closing personal explanations are made (2 Jn [12. 13], 3 Jn [13. 14]); and the occurrence of such parallelisms of phrase between 3 Jn and the Johannine writings as these—ἐν ἀληθείᾳ (v.[1. 3], cf. 1 Jn 3[18], 2 Jn [1. 4]), ἐκ θεοῦ εἶναι (v.[11], cf. 1 Jn 2[29]), θεὸν ὁρᾷν (v.[11], cf. 1 Jn 3[6]), μαρτυρεῖν τινι (v.[12], cf. Jn 21[24]), οἶδας ὅτι ἡ μαρτυρία ἡμῶν ἀληθής ἐστιν (v.[12], cf. Jn 21[24]).

In respect of historical attestation this Ep. stands much in the same position as 2 Jn. The testimony to its recognition in the Church and to its being from the hand of the Apostle John, is on the whole, however, somewhat less in amount and in definiteness. Like 2 Jn, it was omitted by the Peshitta, and seems not to have been accepted by the school of Antioch. Like 2 Jn, it was placed by Eusebius among the Antilegomena, and was referred to by Origen as one not admitted by all to be genuine. From the time of Eusebius it appears to have been generally received. With 2 Jn it found a place in the Apostolic Canons, the sixtieth Canon of the Council of Laodicea (A.D. 364), the Canon of Cyril of Jerusalem, the Canon of the third Council of Carthage (A.D. 397), etc. It is referred to by Jerome as among the Catholic Epp., but as said to have been written together with 2 Jn by John the presbyter (de Vir. Illustr. c. 9), to whom it was also attributed in the decree of Damasus (Charteris, Canonicity, p. 24), and by Cosmas Indicopleustes. It is not quoted by Tertullian, Cyprian, or Irenæus. It is not mentioned by Clement of Alexandria when he deals with the Second Epistle. Eusebius, however, speaks of Clement as having explained the Catholic Epp. in his Hypotyposes (HE vi. 14), from which it may perhaps be inferred that he used this Ep. as well as the others. There is no such evidence that this Ep. was recognized by the Church of North Africa as we have in the case of 2 Jn, notwithstanding the lack of any reference to it in the writings of the great North African Fathers. On the other hand, it has a place in the Muratorian Canon (according to the most probable interpretation); it was in the Old Latin Version; it was recognized by Dionysius of Alexandria; and it was quoted by Ephraem the Syrian. The most ancient testimony to its existence and recognition associates it not with the presbyter, but with the Apostle John. This association is in harmony with the Johannine touches which attract our attention in it, while the arguments that go to show this Ep. to be from the same hand as the other two Epp. ascribed to John, go also to prove it to be by the Apostle John. The doubts which overhung it for a time may have been due to its private character and the length of time which a letter of this kind would naturally take before it could become widely known in the Churches.

It has been supposed by some that v.[12] shows that the writer wished to identify himself with the disciple referred to in Jn 21[24] (Pfleiderer). But there is nothing to support this. Ewald (Joh. Schriften, p. 505) was of opinion that of a number of letters written by John to individuals or particular Churches, only 2 and 3 Jn have survived; that both these Epp. were meant for the same Church; and that the Third was written lest the Second should have been prevented by Diotrephes from getting into the hands for which it was intended. Hilgenfeld has a curious theory of 3 Jn as a letter of introduction intended to assert the rights of the Church of John against the exclusiveness of the rigorous Jewish-Christian party in the matter of letters of commendation. Baur's theory is still more curious and fine-spun. He thought that a schism had been caused in the Church to which Gaius belonged by the Montanist movement; that the exclusive party was headed by Diotrephes; and that this Ep. was written under John's name against the Roman episcopate—the Roman bishop, Soter, or Anicetus, or Eleutherus, being aimed at under the pseudonym Diotrephes.

5. Peculiar Interest.—The great interest of this Ep. lies in the insight which it gives us into the ordinary life of the Christian communities of those early times and this wide Asiatic territory, which had enjoyed the oversight of the last of the apostles. It helps us to see what these Churches were, not as we idealize them, but in their actual everyday condition, with their excellences and defects, their noble and their ignoble figures, their meek and their ambitious members, the errors into which they might be betrayed, their varied, mixed, and stirring life. It shows us something, too, of their independence, of the kind of ministry that was in exercise among them, and their relation to it, of their order also and administration. On these latter subjects it has so much to suggest that it seems to mark a notable stage in the growth of the Church and the history of its organization. It discloses a condition of things like that with which the Didaché has made us familiar. It places us at the point of transition from the apostolic age to the post-apostolic, from the primitive simplicity to a more developed constitution. Harnack thinks we can see in it the struggle between the old patriarchal, provincial order of things, with its ministry of travelling missionary preachers, and the rise of the settled, organized Church, with its officials, its rights, and its administration. He finds in it nothing less than the emergence of the Episcopate proper, and recognizes in Diotrephes the first bishop of the monarchical type known to us by name.

JOIADA (יוֹיָדָע, Ἰοειδί, Ἰωδά, Ἰωαδά, Ἰωδαέ).—1. One of the two who repaired the 'old gate' (Neh 3[6]). 2. High priest, son of Eliashib (Neh 12[10. 11. 22]). He seems to have sympathized with his father's gentilizing policy, since one of his sons married the daughter of Sanballat the Horonite, and so 'defiled the priesthood' (Neh 13[28f.]).

JOIAKIM (יוֹיָקִים), Neh 12[10. 12. 26]; Joakim (Ἰωακείμ), 1 Es 5[5], where see QPB.—A high priest, son of Jeshua.

JOIARIB (יוֹיָרִיב, Ἀρείβ, Ἰωρείβ, Ἰωιαρίβ, Ἰωαρείμ).—1. Ezr 8[16], one of the two teachers sent by Ezra to Iddo to ask for ministers for the temple. 2. Neh 11[5], ancestor of Maaseiah a Judahite, one of 'the chiefs of the province that dwelt in Jerusalem' in Nehemiah's time. See also JEHOIARIB.

JOKDEAM (יָקְדְעָם).—A city of Judah, Jos 15^{56}, whose site has not been identified. See JORKEAM.

JOKIM (יֹוקִים, Ἰωακείμ), 1 Ch 4^{22}, a Judahite, son or descendant of Shelah.

JOKMEAM (יָקְמְעָם; B Ἰκαάμ, A Ἰεκμαάν).—A town in Ephraim given to the Levites, near Beth-horon, 1 Ch 6^{68} [Heb. ^{53}]. In Jos 21^{22} it is called Kibzaim (LXX omits). No site answering to either of these names is known. Jokmeam is mentioned also in 1 K 4^{12}, where AV has incorrectly Jok*n*eam (but see next art.). C. R. CONDER.

JOKNEAM (יָקְנְעָם, perh. 'let the people possess' [see Gray, Heb. Prop. Names, 218]).—A royal city of the Canaanites, on Carmel and the S.W. border of Zebulun, with a 'torrent-valley' (apparently the gorge of the Kishon, which is dry in parts in summer) to the east, Jos 12^{22} 19^{11}. It was given to the Levites, according to Jos 21^{34}, where it is enumerated as belonging to Zebulun. It is possibly the same as Jok*m*eam of 1 K 4^{12} (B Λουκάμ, Luc. Οὐκάμ), which is mentioned as on the border of one of Solomon's commissariat districts, probably at the boundary between Issachar and Zebulun. The site is found at the present Tell Ḳeimûn, on the E. slope of Carmel, near the Kishon—a conspicuous mound with ruins of a small town. In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onom. s. Camon) it was known as lying 6 Roman miles N. of Legio (Lejjûn), on the way to Ptolemais ('Akka), and in the 12th cent. A.D. it was called Cain Mons or 'Mt. Cain,' from a legend which made it the place where Cain died. It became the centre of a small independent Seigneurie. The ruins include those of a Byzantine building, apparently a chapel. In the Samaritan Book of Joshua it is noticed as the scene of a conflict between the Hebrews and the giants, and Joshua is said to have been here shut up in magic walls of brass, till, on sending a dove to Nabih the Hebrew king of Gilead, he was rescued.

Jokneam appears in Jth 7^{3} under the name Cyamon (Κυαμών) in connexion with the encampment of Holofernes (but see Buhl, GAP 210; Robinson, BRP iii. 339 n.).

JOKSHAN (יָקְשָׁן, Ἰεξάν, Ἰεκσάν, Ἰεκτάν).—Son of Abraham and Keturah, and father of Sheba (Saba) and Dedan, Gn 25^{2} (1 Ch 1^{32}). The name seems quite unknown, and the suggestion of Tuch that it is identical with Joktan seems the most plausible. The two forms might represent respectively the Hebrew and Aramaic pronunciation of the same word (cf. קטר קשר, קטי קשא, where the Aramaic ט is hardened from ת, as in קטל for קתל, קטין for קתין). The Arabic genealogists apparently have no suggestion for his identification; for Yāḳish (or rather Yāfish), who is mentioned by a writer quoted by Yāḳūt (iii. 635, Osiander in ZDMG x. 31), owes his existence to a conflation of the names Jokshan and Japheth.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JOKTAN (יָקְטָן, Ἰεκτάν, Ἰουκτάς, Jos. Ant. I. vi. 4).—Son of Eber, and father of a number of races (Gn 10^{26}, 1 Ch 1^{20}). The races mentioned dwelt 'from Mesha to Sephar'; and though the import of these names is doubtful, the occurrence among them of Saba, Ḥadramaut, and Salif makes it certain that Arabia or a portion of Arabia is intended. When the attention of the Arabic genealogists was drawn to the Old Testament by Mohammed's ostensible acceptance of it, they noticed the names that have been quoted, and drew the same conclusion from them. Two lists of identifications made by archæologists of the early centuries of Islam are given in the miscellaneous work called Al-Iḳd al-Farīd (ii. 51). They had to grapple with several difficulties at the outset. The native tradition made Saba son of Yashjub, and Ḥadramaut son of Ḥimyar (Ḥamdani, p. 85). The genealogies were harmonized by the supposition that some links had been omitted in the Hebrew record; hence Saba is made by the Arabic historians 'son of Yashjub son of Ya'rub son of Ḳaḥṭān (Yoktan)'; the insertion of the link Ya'rub being to mark the epoch at which the Hebrews (sons of Eber) became Arabs (Ibn Ḳutaibah's Manual of History, p. 209, ed. Cairo). Moreover, the name Joktan was itself unknown; some genealogist therefore hit on the name Ḳaḥṭān, which really belonged to some tribe or region (Muḳaddasi in Bibl. Geogr. Arab. iii. 104), and thought it near enough to be identified with the Hebrew name; and though this identification was not universally accepted (Tāj al-'Arūs, s.v.), it was till recently generally adopted both in the East and the West. Mas'ūdi, who records another and probably more ancient pedigree for Ḳaḥṭān, says that he found the biblical genealogy accepted by tribal authorities all over South Arabia. What can scarcely be determined now is whether the legend that makes Ḳaḥṭān founder of the S. Arabian tribes is earlier or later than his identification with Joktan; but it seems clear that there is no connexion between the two names. The word Ḳaḥṭān (of which there was a variety, Aḳhāt) probably means 'droughty,' and originally applied to some strip of territory. It might have been expected that some of the numerous inscriptions that have been discovered in S. Arabia would throw light on the passage of Gn, but the most important contribution to its interpretation which has been obtained from that source would seem to be the discovery by Glaser of the ancient name of San'ā, whence it would appear that the old identification of Uzal with that city is erroneous.

Since, therefore, both the Arabic legends and the inscriptions fail us, we are left to conjecture. The name may be an ethnological invention intended to connect the Arabs with the Hebrews, and in that case the Targum on 1 Ch (published in Lagarde's Hagiographa Chaldaice) is probably right in deriving it from the Hebrew, with the sense 'smaller' or 'shorter,' not, however, with reference to the length of human life, but in comparison with the other 'half' (Peleg) of the sons of Eber. If, however, the name be Arabic and geographical, probably the connexion suggested by Glaser (Skizze, ii. 423) between it and Ḳaṭan, the name of several mountains in Arabia (Yāḳūt, s.v.), and also of a tribe mentioned by Ptolemy (Katanitæ), has most in its favour. The Arabs, however, tell us that Ḳaṭan is properly an anatomical term; and if these mountains be named from their resemblance to some portion of the body, the form Yoḳtan remains unexplained. If the name met us in an Arabic genealogy, we should almost certainly have the observation that Joktan was the first who had a fixed residence (Arab. ḳaṭana yaḳṭunu).

With regard to the thirteen names of Joktan's sons, the meagreness of the list forbids us to suppose that it is the intention of the genealogist to give a description of the Arabian peninsula, or indeed of any portion of it; his purpose is rather to localize ethnologically, and to some extent geographically, the races with whose names his readers were already familiar. Hence Saba and Havilah, to which peculiar interest attached, are localized differently in the tables admitted into Gn (10^{7} 25^{3}).

We learn from Ezk 27^{19} that Uzal was famous in connexion with the spice trade; and it is probable that, were more of the old Hebrew literature preserved, we should be able in each case to name the sedes glossæ. The discovery, therefore, of places with identical names in the Arabian peninsula is not sufficient to identify the localities of the table, unless it be shown that the places discovered were of sufficient importance to have been heard of by the Israelites. Glaser's suggestion (l.c.), that the table proceeds geographically from S. to N., seems inconsistent with the mention of Saba near the end; for surely Saba should count as a southern or, at any rate, midland state. We cannot even be sure that all the names which occur in it are connected with Arabia; the Targ. on Chron. hints that the juxtaposition of Saba, Ophir, and Havilah is due to all three being connected with the gold industry (cf. Is 60^{6}), and this fact would to an ancient ethnologist have constituted a claim to affinity independently of local considerations. The more probable suggestions that have been made for the identification of the names that occur only in this passage are quoted in the separate articles.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

JOKTHEEL (יָקְתְאֵל).—This name occurs twice in OT as applied to two very different places: one a city or town of the Amorites, the other the capital of Edom. 1. A city described (Jos 15$^{33.38}$, B Ἰακαρεήλ, A and Luc. Ἰεχθαήλ) as lying in 'the Shephelah,' along with some others, from which we gather that it was situated on the extensive plain bordering Philistia, bounded on the E. by the tableland of southern Judæa, and on the W. by the Mediterranean. In the general allotment by Joshua it came into possession of the tribe of Judah. Its site has not been recovered. 2. The name (which Wetzstein, in Del. Jes.^{3} 703 f., explains from the Arab., 'protection of God') given (2 K 14^{7}, B and Luc. Καθοήλ, A Ἰεκθοήλ) to Sela, the ancient capital of the Edomites, after its capture by Amaziah king of Judah (see SELA). It may have been bestowed by Amaziah in recognition of the aid afforded by J″ in the capture of a city of such amazing strength as Sela, and the overthrow of the Edomites in the Valley of Salt. The latter was at the southern end of the Dead Sea, and thus within the territory of the kings of Judah. The name 'Joktheel' did not take permanent hold on the place, because the Edomites in the reign of Ahaz regained their sovereignty (2 Ch 28^{17}), and doubtless restored to their capital its original name of Sela.

JOLLITY.—1 Es 3^{20} 'It [wine] turneth also every thought into jollity (εὐωχία) and mirth'; and Sir 13^{8} 'Beware that thou be not deceived, and brought down in thy jollity' (ἐν εὐφροσύνῃ σου; AVm 'by thy simplicity'; RV 'in thy mirth'). The meaning is 'mirth,' which is the commonest meaning of the word. Thus Shaks., Mid. Night's Dream, v. i. 377—

> 'A fortnight hold we this solemnity,
> In nightly revels and new jollity';

And Milton, PL xi. 714—

> 'And all was turned to jollity and game.'

So Latimer, Sermons (Arber's ed. p. 58), 'Joab and the other company beynge in theyr jolitye, and kepyng good cheare, heard it.' But in a subsequent sermon (p. 113) Latimer has it with the sense of splendour, 'He shewed him al the kyngdomes of the worlde, and all theyr jolitye.' Cf. Jth 10^{3} Wyc. 1382, 'she clothide hir with the clothis of hir jolite,' 1388 'gladnesse.' The adj. 'jolly' is used by Tind., Ex 15^{4} 'His jolye captaynes are drowned in the red see'; and by Coverdale, Job 40^{10} 'up, decke the in thy joly araye, poure out the indignacion of thy wrath.'

Literature.

i. JONAH AND 2 K 14^{25}.—The name יוֹנָה (Ἰωνᾶς) is found in the canon. OT only in 2 K 14^{25} and Jon 1^{1}–4^{9} (cf. Mandelkern, Vet. Test. Concord. Heb. et Chald. 1896, p. 1438^{a}). In the former of these passages, where it is used of 'the servant of God, Jonah the son of Amittai, the prophet, which was of Gath-hepher,' the expression 'through his servant' (בְּיַד־עַבְדּוֹ) is nothing remarkable, occurring as it does also in 1 K (8^{56}) 14^{18} 15^{29}, 2 K 9^{36} 10^{10} in the same sense as in 2 K 14^{25}. The name Amittai (אֲמִתַּי) is found nowhere in OT except in 2 K 14^{25} and Jon 1^{1} (Mandelkern, loc. cit. p. 1367^{b}). Hence all we know of the father of the prophet Jonah is this at most, that he was an inhabitant of the place called גַּת הַחֵפֶר (='press of Ḥepher,' proper names having elsewhere also for certain reasons the article attached to them [cf. König, Histor.-comparat. Syntax d. Heb. 1897, § 295]). It is the same place that is meant by גִּתָּה חֵפֶר in Jos 19^{13}, where the context shows that we have the so-called locative form ('to Gath-hepher,' LXX ἐπί, κ.τ.λ.). There are other instances where the locative, like Gittáh, is accented on the last syllable (cf. Shalíshah, etc., in 2 K 4^{42} etc.).* This accentuation may be determined by the immediately following guttural (cf. Lehrgeb. ii. 517). The חֵפֶר without the article in Jos 19^{13} may have arisen through haplography of the ה, or הַחֵפֶר (2 K 14^{25}) and חֵפֶר (Jos 19^{13}) may be related to each other as הָעֲנָק and עֲנָק, etc. (König, Syntax, § 295*d*). Hence we are neither to find the place-name 'Gath-hepher' in 2 K 14^{25} (G. A. Smith, Twelve Prophets, ii. 496) nor the place-name 'Gittah-hepher' in Jos 19^{13} (ib. note 1). The place Gath (ha)ḥepher lay in the territory assigned to the tribe of Zebulun, Jos 19$^{10.13}$.

In 2 K 14^{25} it is further recorded of Jonah that in the time of Jeroboam II. (c. B.C. 781–741) this prophet predicted the re-conquest of the eastern boundaries of Israel. In this passage 'the sea of the Arabah' (i.e. the Dead Sea) fixes, of course, only *ex*clusively the terminus ad quem. The uncertain expression 'the brook of the Arabah' (נַחַל הָעֲרָבָה) in Am 6^{14} does not contradict this assumption, which is commended also by other considerations (see below, § ii.).

ii. JONAH AND Is 15 f.—We should be much better informed regarding the work of the prophet Jonah, if he were the author of the prophecy which forms at least the basis of Is 15^{1}–16^{12}, and to which Isaiah himself added the epilogue, 'This is the word which J″ in time past spake concerning Moab, and now hath J″ spoken, saying,' etc. (16$^{13f.}$). That earlier prophecy is, in point of fact, attributed to Jonah by Hitzig (Des Proph. Jonah Orakel üb. Moab, 1831), Maurer, Knobel (Der Prophetismus der Hebräer, ii. 124), Riehm (Einleit. in d. AT, ii. 62), Duhm (Theol. d. Proph. 71), Renan (Hist. du peuple d'Israël, ii. 417). But (a) the announcement of Jonah, which is mentioned in 2 K 14^{25}, had certainly a much wider scope than the oracle of Is 15^{1}–16^{12}. (b) If the author of Is 15^{1}–16^{12} was an inhabitant of the Northern kingdom and a subject of Jeroboam II. (which even Cheyne, Introd. to Bk. of Isaiah, 1895, p. 88, regards as possible), he could only ironically have called upon the Moabites to send presents to Zion ($16^{1ff.}$). (c) In the words, 'Send lambs (כָּר) for the ruler of the land . . . to Zion' (16^1), such a political relation of the Moabites to Jerusalem is most naturally presupposed as we find in 2 K 3^4 (כָּרִים). In all probability, the Moabites after the time of Mesha became tributary again to the kings of Judah, and Is 15^1–16^{12} related to an attack made upon the land of Moab by the Assyrians. From this part of Isaiah, then, no information regarding Jonah ben-Amittai can be derived.

iii. JONAH AND THE BOOK OF JONAH.—1. An abundant source of information about Jonah would be opened to us, if the fifth of the twelve minor prophetical books was written by him. The essential contents of this book are as follows:—

(a) Jonah ben-Amittai evaded the Divine commission to go and preach against the city of Nineveh (1^{1-3}). His motive, however, was not 'indolence, sloth, fear of man' (Kleinert, 1893, ad loc.), but the fear that J", on account of His compassionate disposition, would not execute the threatened judgment (4^2). Many exegetes have sought to justify this motive by remarking that Jonah will have feared to prove a 'prophet of lies' (נְבִיא הַשָּׁקֶר) (cf. the Midrash in Jalqûṭ Shimʻoni on Jonah,* and the Gesch. d. Proph. Jona by B. Wolf [see below], 1897, p. 12). Others will have it that Jonah did not wish to save a people which threatened destruction to Israel (so the Mechilta to Ex 1^4, Jerome, Rashi, Kimchi,† Abravanel). According to Mikhlal Jophi, ad loc., Jonah was afraid that the Ninevites, if they repented at the preaching of a single prophet, would put to shame the Israelites, who did not repent in spite of many prophets (אינם שבים מדרכם הרעה). Yet other interpreters suppose that Jonah was reluctant to make known to a heathen people the knowledge of the true God (Hengstenberg, *Christologie*², i. 469, 'because he grudged the exercise of compassion towards the heathen').

(b) God brought about the punishment of Jonah by means of a great storm (1^{4-16}). Acc. to Philo (de Jona oratio, Op., ed. Richter, vii. 377 ff.), it was the snoring of Jonah that drew the attention of the captain of the vessel to him ('Tradebat eum vox narium stertentium, quum altius reddatur in supinis jacentibus'). On the other hand, the Arabo-Syrian History of the Prophet Jonah makes the latter confess his fault on his own impulse, and Jonah is thus held up as a model of noble love of the truth. Moreover, the casting of lots (גּוֹרָלוֹת 1^7) is not introduced till after v.^{14}, somewhat after the example of the Midrash. (For the language of the latter see Wolf, p. 16 f.). In this way the casting of lots would be a last attempt to save the life of the prophet. Also, according to Edm. Hardy (ZDMG, 1896, p. 153), it is related in the Hindu Jat, 439 (ed. Fausböll, iv. 2), how sailors discovered the guilt of Mittavindaka by casting lots three times, and how, using almost the very language of Jon 1^{14}, they exposed him on a raft.

(c) But a merciful God thus reduced Jonah to straits, not in order to destroy him, but ultimately to rescue him (2^{1-11}).

(d) Thereupon the prophet proclaimed in Nineveh that in forty days the city would be destroyed (3^{1-4}). The same number 40 (אַרְבָּעִים), which is common to the MT, Targum, Pesh., and Vulg., is given also in one manuscript of the above-named History of the Prophet Jonah (p. viii, l. 3, 'arba'îna). But the LXX (τρεῖς), Philo (op. cit. § 27, 'civitas ista tres tantum dies habet'), the Arab. (ثلاثة), and the other manuscript of the History (ܬܠܬܐ) have all the number 3. Perhaps this variation is simply due to the relation between מַהֲלַךְ שְׁלֹשֶׁת יָמִים (3^{3b}) and מַהֲלַךְ יוֹם אֶחָד (v.^{4a}), for it might be supposed that the catastrophe would ensue after the three days' transit through the city. It is less probable that the influence at work was the 'three' of 2^1 [Eng. 1^{17}]. But the Midrash mentioned a fast of שלשה ימים ושלשה לילות (Wolf, p. 25^1). A symbolical sense of the number 'three' is not to be thought of, nor is an interchange of the numbers μ′ and γ′ (W. Böhme, ZATW, 1887, p. 239) likely. Further, the verb נֶהְפָּכֶת, which is imitated in מתהפכא and in the Pesh. ܡܬܗܦܟܐ, was intended to express the sense of outward destruction; hence correctly καταστραφήσεται (LXX), subvertetur (Vulgate), تخسف (disparebit), and Mikhlal Jophi, ad loc., רוצה לאמר במהפכת סדום ועמרה כי מעשיה היו כמעשיהם. Wolf, indeed (op. cit. p. 21 f.), contends strongly that the נֶהְפָּכֶת of v.^{4} is used 'with intentional ambiguity,' it not being in the plan of an all-seeing Providence to destroy the city. But this argument would be justified only if in other prophetical threatenings also, which remained unfulfilled in consequence of man's repentance, an ambiguous expression had been used. But, e.g., in 1 K 21^{21} it is positively announced to king Ahab, 'Behold, I will bring evil upon thee'; no condition is added, yet the prophet was afterwards told, 'I will not bring,' etc. (v.^{29}).

(e) Then the people, as well as the king of Nineveh, took Jonah for a messenger of the Deity; a general fast was ordained, and the inhabitants turned from their evil ways (3^{5-10}). So universal was the fasting enjoined that even 'cattle and small cattle' were neither to eat nor drink (v.^{7}). Nowack (ad loc.) regards the words הָאָדָם וְהַבְּהֵמָה in 3^8 as a later gloss; but, even so, the subjects would not be altered, for in v.^{7b} 'cattle and small cattle' have been mentioned. A real participation of animals in the fast has therefore been rightly recognized also, e.g., by Philo (op. cit. § 37 f.) in the passage. His words are, 'Tantum (sic) humiliationem animumque compositum secundum scripturam vestiti sunt, ut pecudes quoque eorum precibus vacantes eos juvarent,' etc. Further, the author of the Arab.-Syr. History of Jonah put in the mouth of the Ninevites the following prayer, 'If this repentance be not accepted of God, transgressors will in future despair of the possibility of return.' He went on to tell how the Divine pardon was announced by the sending of a letter and the dispelling of a darkness which had lain over the city during the fast (Wolf, op. cit. p. 26).

(f) Enraged at the action of God, Jonah was brought, through his own grief at the loss of a 'gourd,'* to see that God had rightly pardoned the Ninevites.

The ḳîḳayôn, according to the Talmud, resembles the צלוליבא, a tree from whose pith oil and medicines were prepared. It is the Arabic ḥirwa'un, 'ricinus frutex' (Freytag, Lex. Arab.). Kimchi had already cited this explanation, which appears also in Mikhlal Jophi. It was not the κολοκύνθη, ܩܪܐ, 'cf. ܩܪܥܐ

2. The Unity of the Book 'Jonah.'—This book might, at least partially, be a genuine source of information about Jonah ben-Amittai, if it were composed of several strata. The latter position was once maintained by Müller in Paulus' Memorabilien, vi. p. 167 ff., and by Nachtigall in Eichhorn's Allgemeiner Bibliothek, ix. 221–273 (cf. Eichhorn, Einleit. iv. § 577*b*). According to Nachtigall (and Bunsen), among the sacred books of the Hebrews there was 'a prayer of Jonah the son of Amittai,' with the note appended, 'after God had delivered him out of the hand of the king of Assyria.' This prayer is supposed to be preserved in Jon 2^{3-10}, and then chs. 3 and 4 and still later chs. 1 and $2^{1f. 11}$ [Eng. 1^{17} 2^{10}] to have been added to it. Nachtigall has started from a correct perception, namely, that the first part of the prayer (Jon 2^{3-10}) cannot have been uttered by a man who has been swallowed by a sea-monster. Jonah could not out of the belly of the fish say to God, 'Posuisti me in securo loco' (Philo, op. cit. § 22). Having regard to his other experiences, and even per se, it was impossible that Jonah should regard his sojourn in the fish's belly as a preliminary to his complete deliverance (Kimchi on 2^{3} בחיותו ירע שיצא ממעי הרג בשלום). This prayer could only at best then be uttered after Jonah's deliverance, which is recorded in 2^{11} [Eng. ^{10}]. If now the author of $2^{1f. 11}$ had already before him that prayer of thanksgiving (Nachtigall, Bunsen), he would have introduced it after 2^{11}, otherwise he must have placed the origin of the poem within the body of the great fish, in order by this improbability to indicate the didactic purpose of his narrative. But it is more likely that this composition has been supplemented by a later writer who missed the contents of the prayer referred to in 2^{2} (Knobel, Der Prophetismus der Hebräer, ii. 377). This older assumption also appears to us the only correct element in the contentions of W. Böhme ('Die Compos. d. Buches Jona' in ZATW, 1887, pp. 224 ff., 234), and it is approved also by Cheyne (Origin of the Psalter, 1891, p. 126), Budde (ZATW, 1892, p. 42), and Nowack (Handcomm. 1897, p. 180). G. A. Smith (Twelve Prophets, ii. 512) opposes it, appealing to וַיְמַן ('and he arranged or ordered') of 2^{1} [Eng. 1^{17}], as showing that the author knew that Jonah was to be saved by means of the fish. But the man who was swallowed by the fish did not know this. Hence, if Jonah himself wrote the book, he ascribed to himself by prolepsis a prayer of thanksgiving; while, if it was a later writer who put this prayer in the mouth of the swallowed Jonah, he ascribed to the hero of the narrative an action which in the situation of Jon 2^{2} would be a psychological enigma.

Köhler, again (Theol. Rev. xvi. 139 ff.), thinks to discover in the Bk. of Jonah partly signs of an earlier age and partly traces of a later revision (but see G. A. Smith, ii. 510^{2}). Finally, W. Böhme (op. cit.) has started the theory that four strata can be distinguished within the Bk. of Jonah. But neither his formal arguments nor those based upon the contents can be regarded as valid. This hypothesis has already been examined by the present writer in his Einleitung, p. 378 f., and, as no one has since ventured to defend the assumption that the Bk. of Jonah was composed from different strata, it is unnecessary to go into the question in more detail.

3. Is there a necessary relation between the person and the Book of Jonah? The genetic connexion of Jonah ben-Amittai and the Bk. of Jonah appears to be based upon this much at least: We seem compelled to assume that a tradition existed, according to which Jonah ben-Amittai journeyed beyond his own country, that he was involved in a dangerous situation, and that he was ultimately delivered from this. Without such a tradition, it seems inexplicable why it is to the name of Jonah that the book is attached. Riehm, indeed (Introduction, ii. 167), says, 'The reason why the author selected the name of Jonah was that the only prophet that would serve his purpose was one whose name was on the one hand familiar to the people, but about whom on the other hand they knew nothing more.' This, however, is inconclusive. There were several prophets of that kind. Only in one event would the choice of the name Jonah ben-Amittai (Jon 1^{1}) be explicable without a historical tradition, namely, if Amittai were meant to be a nomen appellativum, i.e. if 'Jonah filius creduli' were so designated as a representative of believers κατ' ἐξοχήν, the so-called orthodox party. We call attention to this possibility, because in investigating so difficult a question all possibilities must be weighed. It is a fact at all events that, in the case of this ben-Amittai (Jon 1^{1}), Gath (ha)hepher is not specified as his birthplace (see further, below, 4 c, p. 747^{b}).

4. The formal character of the Book of Jonah.—Notwithstanding that the book may rest upon a tradition about Jonah, yet the essential character of the book consists in this, that it belongs to the category of symbolical narratives.

(a) There were such narratives. For instance, in Jer $25^{15ff.}$ it is said, 'Take this cup,' etc., and 'I took the cup at the hand of J" and made all the nations drink' (v.^{17}). Thus actions of the prophet are recorded as if they had been outwardly performed, and yet they cannot have really been so. Rather is the story merely a form of representation in which a Divine message is presented in a visible and therefore impressive fashion. This being manifestly the case with Jer $25^{15ff.}$, there is no need in $13^{4ff.}$ to take the name Pĕrath, which everywhere else (15 times) means the Euphrates (so also in Jer 51^{63}), to refer to a place which is not meant anywhere else in OT, nor so understood by LXX (ἐπὶ τὸν Εὐφράτην, κ.τ.λ.), etc., in Jer $13^{4ff.}$, and which stood in no relation to the captivity of Israel. For the same reason it is unnecessary to suppose that the prophet Ezekiel actually lay for 390 days upon his left and for 40 days upon his right side ($4^{5f.}$ etc.). Moreover, in 24^{3} the words 'Set on the caldron and pour water into it,' etc., are called by Ezekiel a māshāl (cf. the Arab. miṯlun, similitudo, παραβολή; see König's art. 'Zur Deutung der symbolischen Handlungen des Propheten Hesekiel,' in the Neue kirchliche Zeitschrift, iii. 650 ff.). Similar to the narrative of Jer $25^{15ff.}$ is that of Hos $1^{1ff.}$ and $3^{1ff.}$ (so, inter alios, Hitzig, Simson, Keil, Wünsche, Reuss [Gesch. d. heil. Schriften ATs, 1890, § 223]; see, further, art. HOSEA in this Dictionary). For there it is expressly said, 'Go, take to thee mulierem fornicationis,' and, even if the latter phrase can mean only 'a wife of whoredoms' (Cheyne, Camb. Bible, ad loc.; G. A. Smith, i. 234, 'a wife of harlotry'), it is improperly assumed by some interpreters (e.g. Cheyne, Wellh., Nowack, G. A. Smith) that the woman had not beforehand 'an inclination to infidelity.' Such an interpretation runs counter to the text, according to which at the very outset Hosea was inspired with the idea of marrying a mulier fornicationis (i.e. idololatriæ eorumque vitiorum quæ cum illa cohærere solebant). Besides, an 'inclination to infidelity' was a thing by no means strange to the majority of the nation, with which J" as it were contracted a marriage in the time of Moses (cf. Ex 32^{8}). Again, if the commission of J″ was literally carried out, Hosea must have married an adulteress (Hos 3^{1}). But, with a view to the visible presentation of a truth, there is no need for such an outward performance of actions which would have been not only in themselves repugnant, but also unnatural for the prophet himself.

cucurbita, pepo' (Brockelmann, Lex. Syr. s.v.), Arab. يقطين (Koran, xxxvii. 146). As Jerome replaced cucurbita of the old Latin by hedera ('ivy'), there arose 'tumultus in plebe' (Augustinus, ad Hieron., Epistola 88).

(b) The above-cited symbolic tales may be imitated in the Book of Jonah (cf. especially the parallelism between Hos 1^{2} 3^{1} and Jon 1^{1} 3^{1}, also Ezk 3^{25} etc.). As Ezekiel was bound, etc., as the representative of the people (3^{25} $4^{8ff.}$ $5^{1ff.}$ etc.), so in the Bk. of Jonah it was related how Jonah undertook a mission to the goyîm, etc. This might happen all the more readily that elsewhere the people of Israel and the prophetic order are identified with one another; the servant of J″, who, according to Is 41^{8} etc., is the people of Israel, is a designation in 42^{1} etc. of the servant of God who is to bring, i.e. proclaim to the goyîm sententiam et normam iudicii or lucem (Is 42^{6} 49^{6}, cf. 43^{10}), and so also the people of Israel is called the son of God (Ex 4^{22}, Hos 11^{1}). This servant of God was in many ways also blind, and deaf (Is 42^{19}), and dumb (56^{10}); cf. Jon 1^{3}. Further, the captivity of Israel is several times compared to a grave from which they are to come forth again alive; Ezk $37^{11f.}$ 'These bones are the whole house of Israel' (rightly interpreted even by Hengstenberg, Christologie, ii. p. 588, not 'ii. p. 125' as Bertholet cites it, Kurzer Handcom. zu Hesekiel, 1897, p. 184); cf. Ezk 19^{5} 33^{10} 39^{25}. Again, the captivity of Israel is compared to being devoured, 'Nebuchadnezzar hath swallowed me up like a sea-monster (tannîn), and he hath filled his belly' (Jer 51^{34}; cf. v.^{44} אֶת־בִּלְעוֹ, and in Is 27^{1} the comparison of the secular power to a livyathan (crocodile) and a tannîn; see esp. G. A. Smith, 1898, pp. 523–526). Note also that Israel's deliverance from exile is compared to a new birth (Is 66^{8}) and a dream (Ps 126^{1}). Further, as pre-exilic Israel was wont to decline its missionary call (Jon 1^{3}), so a part of exilic and post-exilic Israel discovered in this mission only a call to threaten the goyîm (cf. Jer 29^{10}, Ezk 18^{29} 33^{20}, Ps 137^{8}, Is 34 f. $63^{1ff.}$, Ob $^{10ff.}$, Mal $1^{4f.}$ 3^{14}, Jon $3^{1ff.}$). But in this same exilic and post-exilic period there are also voices to be heard calling for prayer to God on behalf of the goyîm (Jer 29^{7}) and giving expression to the universalistic tendency of the theocracy (Zec 8^{23}, cf. Jon 3^{10} 4^{11}; see below, 7 a). The voice of such a preacher may be heard also in the Bk. of Jonah, whose author may have selected the individualistic presentation of his idea because this was least likely to miss making an impression. This, which for shortness may be called the symbolical interpretation of the Bk. of Jonah, is in the main upheld by Hardt, Kleinert (Commentary, 1874), Bloch (Studien zur Gesch. der Samml. d. altheb. Lit. 1876, p. 72 ff.), Cheyne (art. in Theol. Rev. 1877, p. 214 ff.), C. H. H. Wright (Biblical Essays, T. and T. Clark, 1886, p. 45 ff.),* Ed. König (Einleitung, 1893, p. 380), Kleinert (Commentary, 1893, p. 18 ff.), G. A. Smith (1898, p. 502 ff.).†

(c) The choice of the name Jonah as the subject of this symbolical narrative may also (see above, 3, p. 746^{b}) have been favoured by the following circumstance. Jonah was an inhabitant of the kingdom of Samaria, and 'the name Jonah signifies a dove. Ephraim, the Northern kingdom, the kingdom of Israel as distinguished from that of Judah, is termed by Hosea, the only other prophetic writer who belonged to that kingdom, "a silly dove" (יוֹנָה Hos 7^{11}); and when that prophet predicts the Return from Captivity, he speaks of Ephraim as returning as "a dove (יוֹנָה) out of the land of Assyria" (11^{11}).' C. H. H. Wright, from whose Biblical Essays (1886, p. 45) these words are quoted, has not, however, recalled יוֹנַת אֵלֶם רְחֹקִים (Ps 56^{1}), which is most probably interpreted columba (silentii=) silens peregrinorum locorum=inter et propter peregrinos (on the silence of b after m see König, Syntax, § 330*m*). This expression in Ps 56^{1} is already referred by the Talmud to כְּנִשְׁתָּא דְיִשְׂרָאֵל וג׳, by the LXX to ὁ λαὸς ὁ ἀπὸ τῶν ἁγίων μεμακρυμμένης, and so also by the Arabic ('ummatun) and the Ethiopic (chézeb=populus). [Wellhausen (in Haupt's SBOT) changes אלם into א״ים, but this suggestion lacks probability]. A remarkable coincidence between Israelitish and foreign conceptions may be discovered in the analogy between the sojourn of the dove (יוֹנָה) in the fish's belly, and the descent of the 'dove' Semiramis from the fish-woman (cf. the ancient picture in Vigouroux, Die Bibel und die neueren Entdeckungen, iii. 355) Atargatis or Δερκετώ or Dercetis, who also had a temple at Ashkelon, cf. Ovid, Metam. iv. 45 ff.—

> 'Derceti, quam versa squamis velantibus artus
> Stagna Palæstini credunt motasse figura;
> An magis, ut sumptis illius filia pennis
> Extremos albis in turribus egerit annos.'

I venture also to call attention to the circumstance that the name 'Nineveh' (Herodot. i. 103, 106, 193, ii. 150, iii. 155, Νῖνος) is a compound with the root נון (cf. Assyr. nûnu, 'fish' [Del. Assyr. Handwörterb. 1896, p. 454*a*], Aram. נוּנָא, ܢܘܢܐ, e.g. Jon $2^{1.\,11}$). For the oft-recurring ideographic way of writing the name of this city characterizes it as Ni-nu-a or Ni-na-a, 'fish-dwelling.' Hence in the first element of the name we should not be disposed to find 'ni, Fett, Fettigkeit, Ueberfluss' (Frd. Delitzsch, art. 'Ninive' in PRE^{2} x. 589). It may be not impossible that nun, which on account of the following nua might be differentiated, or through n (cf. Lehrgebäude, ii. 510 f. and נין) modified to nin, has been combined with nua or naa, and thus arose Ni-nu-a or Ni-na-a.

5. The Date of the Book.—This symbolical narrative was written, not in the 8th cent., but in the post-exilic period.

(a) Literary arguments. The story contains no positive trace that it attributed itself to Jonah. On the contrary, the book speaks of Jonah in the third person everywhere except in the oratio directa of 1^{9} $2^{3ff.}$ etc. Of course the circumstance that in any writing a name is used in the third person, is no sure sign that that writing proceeds from a different author (cf. König, Einleitung, p. 314^{4} on Is 7). But, all the same, it is not without significance that Hosea, who opens with the third person, in the further course of his story passes to the use of the first person; cf. 'Then spake J″ to me' (Hos 3^{1-3}) with 'Then came the word of J″ to Jonah' (Jon 3^{1} etc.).

(b) Linguistic indications. The Book of Hosea shows what phase of development the Heb. language had reached in the Northern kingdom in the 8th cent. But the linguistic character of the Book of Jonah is quite different from this. In Hosea the occurrences of anokhî to anî are as 11 : 11, whereas in Jonah the ratio is 2 (1^{9} 3^{2}) : 5

[*] Wright cites (p. xxv) the following passages: 2 S $12^{1ff.}$ (Nathan's parable) $14^{6f.}$ (the parabolical narrative of the wise woman of Tekoa), 1 K 20^{39-41} (the parabolical tale of the prisoner who was allowed to escape). These, however, do not furnish real parallels to the Bk. of Jonah, for, like all parables, they have an unknown, general subject. Nevertheless, they show that in Israel it was customary to introduce abstract truths in the form of individualistic tales. This disposition is also a factor in the origin of narratives about real visions, like those of 1 K 22^{19-22} and of Amos and Ezekiel.

[†] Similar is the judgment of Augusti (Einleitung, 1827, § 225), Hitzig (in the Preface to his Exposition of the Book of Jonah in Kurzgef. exeg. Hdbch.), Bleek (Einleitung, 1878, § 229), Riehm (Einleitung, 1889, ii. § 81, 'The contents of the book are pure invention'), Reuss (Gesch. d. h. Schr. ATs, 1890, § 407), et alii, who have not recognized the analogy of the symbolical narratives of the prophets.

($1^{9.\,12}$ $2^{5.\,10}$ 4^{11}); cf. in Malachi 1 anokhî (הִנֵּה אָנֹכִי 3^{23}) to 8 anî. In Hosea we find only אֲשֶׁר (some eight times), whereas in Jonah שֶׁ is found (these passages are wanting in Mandelkern's Concordance, 1291 ff., but are given in König's Syntax, § 54) three times, $1^{7.\,12}$ 4^{10}, as in Ezr 8^{20}, 1 Ch 5^{20} 27^{27}, Ec 1^{3} etc. But in Jonah there occurs בַּאֲשֶׁר לְ (1^{8}) * side by side with בְּשֶׁלְּ ($1^{7.\,12}$), while in Ec 8^{17} the secondary form בְּשֶׁל אֲשֶׁר already appears (König, Syntax, § 389*e*).——רִבּוֹ (‘myriad’) has not been recognized by tradition in Hos 8^{12}, probably, indeed, on the authority of MSS (see König, Lehrgeb. ii. 222^{1}); yet in Ezekiel (16^{7}) we have the genuinely Hebrew word רְבָבָה, whereas רִבּוֹ occurs in Jon 4^{11}, Ps 68^{18}, Ezr $2^{64.\,69}$, Neh $7^{66.\,77f.}$, Dn 11^{12}, 1 Ch 29^{7}.——הִתְעַשֵּׁת=cogitare in Jon 1^{6}, cf. Dn 6^{4} and Hos 10^{13} Targ., אִתְעַשְׁתְּתוּן.——‘J″, the God of heaven’ is found in Gn $24^{3.\,7}$ (overlooked by G. A. Smith, ii. 497^{2}), Jon 1^{9}, Ezr 1^{2}, Neh 1^{5}, 2 Ch 36^{23}, and the simple ‘God of heaven’ in Ps 136^{26}, Ezr $5^{11f.\,69f.}$ $7^{12.\,21.\,23}$, Neh 1^{4} 2^{4}, Dn $2^{18f.\,37.\,44}$.——The notion of ‘command’ (verb) does not occur at all in Hosea, but it is difficult to imagine that he would have expressed it by מִנָּה (Jon 2^{1} 4^{6-8}, 1 Ch 9^{29}, Dn $1^{5.\,10f.}$ [Aram.], Ezr 7^{25} etc.), for he expresses ‘command’ (noun) by צַו (5^{11}) and not by טַעַם (Jon 3^{7} [Aram.], Ezr 4^{19} etc., Dn 3^{10} etc.).——Cf., further, שָׁתַק=consēdit, siluit (Jon $1^{11f.}$, Ps 107^{30}, Pr 26^{20}) common in Aramaic (Merx, Chrest. Targ. 294; Nöldeke, ZDMG, 1868, p. 499). Taking all this into account, it is an unnatural supposition that the author of the Book of Jonah should have exhibited all the above-mentioned linguistic features to a reader of the 8th cent. B.C. He must have belonged to a period when the written language of the Israelites had already come into close contact with the Aramaic.

(c) Material indications. Nineveh, at the time when the Book of Jonah was composed, was no longer in existence. This is clear from the statement (3^{3}), ‘Now Nineveh was (הָיְתָה, cf. König, Syntax, § 362*m*) a great city for God’ (i.e. according even to a superhuman standard). Hävernick (Einl. ii. 2, p. 359) declined to accept this interpretation, and appealed to Gn 1^{2} וְהָאָרֶץ הָיְתָה תֹהוּ וָבֹהוּ. But even this passage confirms the above as the correct explanation of Jon 3^{3}. For to the writer of Gn 1^{2} the earth was no longer a chaos. Further, the ‘three days' journey’ of 3^{3}, taken in connexion with ‘and Jonah began to enter into the city one day's journey’ (Syntax, § 330*e*), must refer to the distance through, not round, the city (Schrader, *KAT*² ad loc.). A diameter of such proportions would, however, presuppose a circumference such as even the combination of four cities (Gn $10^{11f.}$, Keilinsch. Bibliot. ii. 117) could not have possessed. Then it would be strange that Jonah himself or a contemporary of his should not have given the name of the ‘king of Nineveh’ (3^{6}) in question. Besides this, Sayce (HCM 487, quoted by Driver, *LOT*⁶ 322) is of opinion that the title ‘king of Nineveh’ could never have been applied to him while the Assyrian empire was still in existence.

(d) Arguments drawn from the history of the formation of the OT Canon. (α) In the so-called prophetæ priores of the Heb. OT there is no word of Jonah's journey to Nineveh (2 K 14^{25}). Nor in the latter passage is there any reference to other words of Jonah, such as is intended to the Book of Micah in 1 K 22^{28} וַיֹּאמֶר שִׁמְעוּ עַמִּים כֻּלָּם (cf. König, Einleitung, 330 f.).——(β) The order of the prophetæ posteriores, and especially of the Minor Prophets, was only in its general principles a fixed one. This order was not meant to be chronological (König, Einleit. 301). The collectors of the Canon did not intend the books which have no chronological superscription to be considered as belonging to the period mentioned in the nearest preceding book which bears a date. For, on the one hand, in the case of the Book of Amos, the chronological superscription of the Book of Hosea is repeated, and, on the other hand, it cannot be meant that Nahum and Habakkuk prophesied at the date assigned to the preceding book (Mic 1^{1}). Therefore it may be assumed that the Book of Jonah was inserted after the Book of Obadiah on the ground, not of its chronology, but of its contents. Might it not have been supposed that the words צִיר בַּגּוֹיִם שֻׁלָּח (‘nuntius ad gentes missus est’) found a clear illustration in the story of Jonah? Moreover, in the centuries after the Exile, it was the fate of the Edomites that formed the subject of the liveliest discussion (cf. Mal 1^{4}, 1 Es $4^{45.\,50}$, Sir $50^{25f.}$). Hence it is probable that the question why the threats pronounced against Edom had remained unfulfilled was intended to be answered in the Book of Jonah.——(γ) Again, the opening words וַיְהִי דְּבַר יהוה וגו׳ appear to the present writer to contain an indirect allusion (Syntax, § 368*a*) to the Book of Obadiah, and to have an adversative force (ib. § 369*f*). This introduction to the Book of Jonah appears, then, to have originated when the book attained its present position in the Heb. and Gr. OT. On the other hand, probability is lacking to the theory of Budde (ZATW, 1892, p. 41) that the Book of Jonah was originally an extract from the ‘Midrash to the Book of Kings’ (2 Ch 24^{27}). For, in the first place, the story of Jon $1^{1ff.}$ would not have fitted well on to 2 K $14^{25f.}$. In the second place, this story, whose incidents are enacted wholly outside the political history and the land of Israel, would not have been at all suitable in the מִדְרַשׁ סֵפֶר הַמְּלָכִים. Not so clear is the justice of the remark of Nowack (1897, on Jon 1^{1}) that the Chronicles do not breathe the spirit which the supposed Midrash would have exhibited.——(δ) The Book of the Twelve Minor Prophets was included among the ‘prophets’ or ‘prophecies’ which already lay before Ben-Sirach (Prologue ll. 6 and 14), for 49^{10} reads καὶ τῶν δώδεκα προφητῶν τὰ ὀστᾶ ἀναθάλοι ἐκ τοῦ τόπου αὐτῶν, or, in the recently published Heb. text of the Sirach fragments, גַּם שְׁנֵים עָשָׂר הַנְּבִיאִים וגו׳. Against the view of Jacob (ZATW, 1887, p. 280) that 49^{10} is an interpolation, Nöldeke (ZATW, 1888, p. 156), Buhl (Kanon u. Text, 1891, p. 11), and Wellhausen (Skizzen, v. 211) have declared themselves. Not without importance is also the question whether the πάππος of Ben-Sirach (to whom we owe the Greek translation of the Proverbs of Sirach) and the Prologue to the book flourished as early as c. B.C. 300. The present writer claims to have proved this in his Einleitung (1893, p. 488), and his conclusions are now accepted also by J. Halévy (Étude sur la partie du texte hébreu de l'Ecclésiastique récemment découverte, 1897) and Baethgen (*Hand-commentar zu den Psalmen*², 1897, p. xxvii). This circumstance forbids one to carry down the composition of the Book of Jonah beyond the year B.C. 300, as G. A. Smith (ii. 498) is inclined to do.

In the above sections (3–5) we have sought, from the oldest indications, to characterize the Book of Jonah positively. What follows will give the negative supplement to this.

6. The principal other interpretations of the Book of Jonah.

* It is improbable that the words בַּאֲשֶׁר לְמִי הָרָעָה הַזֹּאת לָנוּ were originally a ‘marginal gloss’ (so Kautzsch, AT; Nowack, Kl. Proph., ad loc.; G. A. Smith, ii. 513). For if בְּשֶׁלְּמִי (v.7) were to be explained, the marginal gloss would have been simply בַּאֲשֶׁר לְמִי, the whole sentence would not have been written on the margin. Moreover, the sentence is not absolutely superfluous in v.8. Rather is the question there quite intelligible psychologically as an indirect introduction to the following questions. It is equally intelligible why the question propter quem hæc calamitas nobis acciderit, being an apparent repetition, should have been omitted in cod. B of the LXX.

(a) The symbolical character of such a narrative, although in all probability this is the character of the Book of Jonah, might readily be missed. For it is psychologically explicable how histories which are related as concrete occurrences should preferably be understood by many as an account of real events. As a matter of fact, this has happened in not a few instances. For instance, has not the story of the dead bones (Ezk 37^1-14^) been very frequently understood (cf. Hitzig, Bib. Theol. 1880, p. 109) as if we had to do with literal dead bodies? And that notwithstanding the explanation of the bones in v.^11^ 'These bones are the whole house of Israel.' How often, again, are the stories of the hiding of the girdle (Jer 13^3-7^) and of the marrying of an adulterous wife (Hos 3^1ff.^) understood as real history! Accordingly, the fact that this may have happened also in the case of the Book of Jonah is no proof of the non-symbolical character of the latter.

(b) Certainly, those who collected the Canon or those who arranged the Δωδεκαπρόφητον may still have rightly regarded the Book of Jonah as a symbolical narrative, for they placed it in a class of writings containing other examples of symbolical character and prophetic tendency. But at a later period the book was frequently treated as if it contained non-symbolical history. At the same time, in examining the evidence on this point, one has to exercise great caution. The authors in question may simply have expressed themselves with a natural brevity, as if they considered the history of Jonah a real affair. This principle may be applied to every instance where some element in the Book of Jonah is merely cited. This may be the case where Jesus Christ (Mt 12^40^) illustrated his burial by the statement that it would continue only three days, like the sojourn of Jonah in the belly of the sea-monster. But the following saying (v.^41^), that the men of Nineveh would, on the day of judgment, put to shame the contemporaries of Jesus, is most naturally interpreted on the presupposition that the story of Jonah was a non-symbolical one. Still, the question remains whether this presupposition was merely that of the hearers of Jesus (see further, below, 6 d δ, p. 751^b^). The history of Jonah is, however, conceived as non-symbolical when into the mouth of Tobit * are put the words, πέπεισμαι ὅσα ἐλάλησεν Ἰωνᾶς ὁ προφήτης περὶ Νινευή (To 14^4^), and πάντως ἔσται ἃ ἐλάλησεν ὁ προφήτης Ἰωνᾶς (v.^8^). Philo, too, regarded the story of Jonah as non-symbolical, for he took pains to explain the marvel of the fish (Orat. de Jona, § 16, 21). The same interpretation is followed in 3 Mac 6^8^ (cf. König, Einleit. p. 483) and in Jos. Ant. IX. x. 2. According to the latter, Ἰωνᾶς εἰς Ταρσὸν ἔπλει τῆς Κιλικίας (!), and he reproduces the whole contents of the Book of Jonah, with the exception of the displeasure of Jonah at the sparing of Nineveh. So also in the Mishna, Ta'anît ii. 1,† Bab. Ta'anît 15*a*, Nedarîm 38*a*, where וַיִּתֵּן שְׂכָרָהּ (Jon 1^3^) is incorrectly understood as if Jonah had paid the price of the whole ship (של ספינה כולה), and had thus, in contrast to Amos, been a wealthy man. (For other passages see B. Wolf, op. cit. p. 6). Jewish tradition, however, contains also the information that the history contained in the Book of Jonah was enacted in the reign of Osnappar (Ezr 4^10^ [Assurbanipal?]), and, seeing that the date of Jeroboam II. and that of Osnappar were different, the rabbinical tradition spoke of two Jonahs, of whom the first was of the tribe of Zebulun and the second of the tribe of Asher (see, further, Fürst, Der Kanon d. AT nach d. Ueberlief. in Talm. und Midrasch, p. 33 f.). Again, in Numeri Rabbah, sect. 18, the Book of Jonah is called 'a book by itself and counted separately.' This, however, was simply 'because it is exclusively occupied with the heathen, and Israel is not mentioned in it. But that its canonicity was doubted in earlier times there is no evidence' (Wildeboer-Bacon, Origin of Canon of OT, 1895, 70-72). The non-symbolical or externo-historical interpretation of the story of Jonah is the predominating one also among the Christians of the earlier centuries (cf., inter alios, Justin Martyr, Dialog. c. Tryph. cap. 107).

(c) But gradually questions were everywhere raised about the authenticity of the ancient tradition, and in connexion with this began also the examination of the externo-historical interpretation of the Book of Jonah. The natural clearness of Luther's way of thinking is seen in his judgment upon at least the prayer of Jon 2^3-10^ 'He was not so comfortably placed as to be able to indite so fine a poem.' Continued examination of the book did not lead all critics (see above, 4 b) to a symbolical interpretation of the story. Some reached, by means of almost ludicrous * attempts, the third of the leading explanations of the Book of Jonah. This attributes a legendary character to the story, and may therefore itself be called, for shortness, the legendary interpretation of the Book of Jonah. Its chief representatives are the following.

Already (in his Einleit.^4^ iv. § 576) Eichhorn discovered in the book the presentation of a 'folk-tale.' He pointed to the fact that in 2^1ff.^, as compared with ch. 1, the narrative is 'quite interrupted, short, incomplete, and unsatisfying.' Hence he held that 'under such circumstances it is no arbitrary hypothesis to assume merely that Jonah, mounted upon the sea-monster, was driven ashore by the storm, and to regard the three days' sojourn in the fish's belly as a popular clothing of this.' 'If the story of Jonah's escape upon the sea-monster . . . was handed on from mouth to mouth . . . for several centuries, how readily might it assume its present form! This is also in harmony with the spirit of the ancient world, as we may gather from the similar clothing given to similar occurrences in Greek history, e.g. to the history of Hercules' (see the Greek quotations in Bochart, Hicrozoicon, ii. 5, 12). The legendary interpretation is accepted, further, by Rosenmüller (Scholia in Vet. Test., ad Jonam); Knobel (Der Prophetismus d. Heb. ii. 370ff.); de Wette (Einleit. § 291); Winer (RL, s.v. 'Jona'); Vatke (Einleit., 1886, § 217, 'a legend'); Nowack (Klein. Proph., 1897, p. 175, 'we have before us a prophetic legend'). Essentially similar is the judgment of von Orelli (1896, p. 93 f.), who says, for instance, 'The marvel of the fish was certainly received from tradition,' but 'the story in its present form was written at the close of the Chaldæan or the opening of the Persian period.' But if the book simply contained a 'Propheten-legende,' this would in the tradition have involuntarily and unconsciously taken its rise, and then the evident didactic tendency of the book would not be adequately explained. Hence Nowack asserts that 'the author used freedom in moulding the traditional material as suited his aim.' But in that case the contents of the book might be called simply 'the free use of an ancient prophetic legend' (Kautzsch, Abriss d. Gesch. d. alttest. Schriftthums, 1897, p. 120). It is more likely, however, that the book has no ancient history for basis.

* This book was written before the renovation of Herod's temple (König, Einleitung, p. 478).

† לֹא נֶאֱמַר בְּאַנְשֵׁי נִינְוֵה וַיַּרְא אֱלֹהִים אֶת שַׂקָּם וְאֶת תַּעֲנִיתָם אֶלָּא וירא האלהים את מעשיהם וג׳ (Jon 3^10^).

* Not Abravanel (cf. Wolf, op. cit. p. 6, note 4, against Hävernick, Einleit. ii. 2, p. 327), but H. Ad. Grimm (Der Proph. Jona aufs neue übersetzt, etc.), supposed that Jonah dreamed that he was swallowed by a great fish. Clericus, again, threw out the suggestion (Bibliot. anc. et mod., tome xx. 2, p. 459) that Jonah 'was picked up by a ship whose figurehead was a whale'; while Anton (in Paulus' Neues Repertorium, Bd. iii. p. 36 ff.) supposed that Jonah clung to the belly of the fish. See, for more fancies of the same kind, Eichhorn, Einleit.^4^ Bd. iv. § 575.

Many upholders of this legendary interpretation, in dealing with particular features of the Book of Jonah, have appealed to legends and myths of antiquity. In the first place, they have reminded us that it was in the neighbourhood of Joppa that Andromeda, too, was reduced to straits by a sea-monster (Jos. BJ III. ix. 3, ἔνθα τῶν Ἀνδρομέδας δεσμῶν ἔτι δεικνύμενοι τύποι πιστοῦνται τὴν ἀρχαιότητα τοῦ μύθου; cf. on Andromeda also W. R. Smith, RS 159, and Duhm, Kurzer Hdcom., 1897, on Job 7^{12}). But this tale agrees with the story of Jonah in the single point of the locality, Joppa (יָפוֹ, Ἰόππη), and the latter was the natural one to fix upon in the case of a man fleeing from Palestine to the Mediterranean. Still less can the 'legend' of Jonah be derived from the story of the Trojan princess Hesione, who was delivered by Hercules from a sea-monster (Il. xx. 145 ff., xxi. 441 ff.). For the features of this tale, which in some measure resemble the history of Jonah, were all produced at a much later date, and hence it is far easier to see here a modification of the story of Jonah than to suppose that the author of the latter borrowed from that foreign tale (cf. Hitzig's third 'Vorbemerkung' to his Commentar über Jona). Finally, F. C. Baur, above all, has connected (Ilgen's Zeitschrift, 1837, p. 102 ff.) the story of Jonah with the Babylono-Assyrian myth of Oannes. On this see further, below, p. 751, note *.

(d) But even the externo-historical interpretation of the Book of Jonah has found defenders down to the most recent times. Of these we may mention first, Frz. Kaulen, representing the traditionalist Roman Catholic Church (Einleit. in d. heil. Schrift, 1892, § 414), then C. F. Keil (Einleit., 1873, § 89), and J. Kennedy (On the Book of Jonah, 1895). This standpoint may perhaps be best characterized in some such way as the following:—

(a) Features which point to the didactic character of the story of Jonah are not sufficiently taken into account even by the most recent representatives of the externo-historical interpretation. To begin with, the circumstance is significant that the book closes with the presentation of a general truth (against B. Wolf, op. cit. p. 28). Cf., further, what has been said above (p. 746^{a}) on the interpolation of the prayer (Jon 2$^{3-10}$). Again, the repentance of the city of Nineveh is depicted with such grotesque features that the intention of the writer to indicate the didactic tendency of the narrative appears sufficiently clear. For, not to speak of the king sitting in ashes (3^{6b}), the very beasts are also mentioned as partaking in the fast and the mourning (3$^{7f.}$). This command that 'the cattle, the oxen, and the sheep should eat nothing and should drink no water,' and that 'man and beast' (see above, p. 745^{b}) should put on sackcloth, is not to be co-ordinated with the custom whereby at the death of Masistios the Persians cut off their own hair and that of the horses and beasts of burden (Herodot. ix. 24; Plutarch, Aristides, cap. 14, ἔκειραν ἐπὶ τῷ Μασιστίῳ καὶ ἵππους καὶ ἡμιόνους), or the custom mentioned by Chrysostom of harnessing horses with black trappings to a hearse. Further, Kleinert (ad loc.) refers to the mourning which, according to the myth (cf. Virgil, Eclog. v. 19 ff.), was held over the death of Daphnis. But by his reference Kleinert himself unconsciously concedes that the representation in Jon 3$^{7f.}$ can be compared only with an *un*real occurrence. Moreover, the complaint of Jonah about the gourd (4^{8b}) is put into such hyperbolical language ('for me death is better than life'), that one is compelled to assume that the writer did not mean the complaint to be understood as a serious one. Again, the narrator puts in the mouth of the prophet the statement that he does 'right' (הֵיטֵב) to be angry over the loss of the gourd, 'even unto death.' But is this not to depict him as an ill-natured child who sulks over the loss of a toy? Certainly, it is not without ground that Ant. Baumgarten, in his L'humour dans l'ancien Testament (1896, p. 27^{1}), has adduced 'Jonah, angry even unto death at having seen the gourd perish,' as fit to be included in the category he is dealing with.

(β) Elements in the story, which upon the symbolical interpretation explain themselves, are wrongly weakened by the adherents of the externo-historical interpretation. For instance, the expression 'three days and three nights' (Jon 2^{1}) indicates by its twofold mention of the number 'three' that the writer has in view a small 'numerus rotundus' (cf. Ex 20^{5}, 2 K 11$^{5f.}$, Ezk 5^{2}, Zec 13$^{8f.}$ etc.; specially 'three days,' Gn 40$^{10.12}$ 42^{17}, Ex 10^{22} 19^{11}, Jos 1^{11} 2$^{16.22}$, 2 S 24^{13}, 1 K 12^{5}, 2 K 20^{5}, Hos 6^{2}, Jon 2^{1}, Est 4^{16}, Mt 16^{21}; 'three months' or 'years,' Ex 2^{2}, Lv 19^{23}, Is 16^{14} 20^{3}, Dn 1^{5} etc.; cf. Röckerath, Bib. Chronol., 1865, 11 ff., also Rud. Hirzel, 'Rundzahlen' in Abhand. d. sächs. Gessell. d. Wissensch., Leipzig, 1885). The author would not have specified in detail 'three days and three nights,' if he had meant merely one day along with part of the preceding and the following day. Hence his meaning cannot have been 'a period of 37 hours' (Kaulen, Einleit. § 414). Such an interpretation of the text (Jon 2^{1}) can by no means be built upon 1 S 30$^{12f.}$, Est 4^{16} 5^{1} (against Kleinert and v. Orelli, ad loc.), which is opposed also by the expression 'seven days and seven nights' of Job 2^{13}.——The representatives of the externo-historical interpretation appeal, further, to narratives according to which the gigantic shark carcharias has been known to swallow a man or even a horse whole—nay, to have vomited up a tunny fish and the body of a sailor undecomposed (Kaulen, Einleit. § 414). In an occurrence of this kind, which is most correctly related by Eichhorn (Einleit.^{4} iv. 340 f.), a '"Seehund," after taking a sailor in its jaws, immediately of its own accord threw him out again, and he was picked up alive and only slightly injured.' Here we miss the 'three days and three nights.' Or we read in the Neue Luth. Kirchenzeitung (1895, p. 303 f.), that the whale-hunter, James Bartley, was in February 1891 swallowed by a whale, and that on the following day, when the animal was killed, he was taken alive out of its stomach. 'He lay in a swoon in the belly of the whale. The sailors had much difficulty in restoring him to consciousness. It was not till after three months' nursing that James Bartley recovered his reason.' But, granting the truth of this story, the Jonah of the OT was longer in the belly of the fish than James Bartley, and, so far from there being any word of illness or subsequent nursing, he is said even in the fish's belly to have indited a song of thanksgiving. This point is overlooked also by B. Wolf, op. cit.——Here also, finally, comes in the following point. The text (Jon 4^{10}) says that the gourd 'tanquam filius noctis factus est et tanquam (cf. König, Syntax, § 332*k*) filius noctis (alterius) periit (so also Pesh.). The words בִּן־לַיְלָה הָיָה necessarily imply that the gourd was the product of a single night (Targ. בְּלֵילְיָא הֲוָין הֲוָא; LXX ἡ ὑπὸ νύκτα ἐγενήθη). But Kaulen (Einleit. § 414) denies this sense to the text. He says, 'The plant simply grew out of the earth overnight, and must otherwise have followed the ordinary course of development.' But in that case the ḳîḳayôn would not have a full claim to the title 'filius noctis.' Further, the verb הָיָה, as the opposite of אָבַד, must have the sense of 'factus est.' Again, the meaning of v.^{6} is that the ḳîḳayôn straightway in the early morning furnished a shade for Jonah; and in any case, according to v.^{7}, its existence was only for a single day. For at dawn of the following day (לַמָּחֳרָת) it was smitten to death, and, when the sun rose, Jonah was without his shade.

(γ) But even the legendary interpretation of the Book of Jonah has not been refuted by the representatives of the externo-historical interpretation, for they have been unable to explain away the traces of the late date at which the story of Jonah was committed to writing. Can they give an adequate explanation, e.g., of why the name of the Assyrian king is not mentioned, or why he is entitled 'king of Nineveh'? Can they prove that Jonah himself could have penned the statement, 'Now Nineveh was,' etc., or the specification of the extent of Nineveh (3^{3})? On the last-mentioned point Kaulen (Einleit, § 414) says, 'The greatness of the city is stated as of three days' journey, either as meaning that a length of three days' journey is attributed to it, or that three days are considered necessary to visit it thoroughly (!). Both meanings are perfectly correct, according as the application of the name "Nineveh" is taken.' But the expression used in 3^{3b} can, according to v.^{4}, refer only to the diameter of the city (see above, p. 748^{a}). But the diameter even of the fourfold city (Gn 10^{11}) was not equal to a three days' journey. 'The length of the road from Kouyunjik to Nimroud is only some 20 English miles. Hence the prophet after one day's journey would have been exactly at the other end of the city' (Frd. Delitzsch, art. 'Ninive' in PRE^{2} x. 598).——Instead of taking into account these indications in the text, B. Wolf (op. cit.) lays emphasis upon the fact that, according to the Arab.-Syr. History of the Prophet Jonah, God announced pardon to the Ninevites by dispersing a darkness which hung over the city. Wolf (p. 32) at once infers that this must refer to the eclipse of the sun, which, according to the Assyrian Eponym list, took place in the year B.C. 763. But that later note about the dispelling of a darkness was an addition that lay ready to hand, whereby a visible token might be given of the appeasing of the Divine wrath. In any case, there is nothing about this in the biblical Book of Jonah. Hence it is an arbitrary assertion of Wolf (p. 31) that 'in the tradition of the neighbourhood the record of the eclipse was combined with the story of Jonah.' The author of the Arab.-Syr. History of Jonah did not mean darkness caused by an eclipse of the sun. Wolf might have recognized this from the fact that Ephraem Syrus says (op. cit. p. 38) that 'the darkness overhung Nineveh during the whole period of penitential mourning.'——In 2 K 8$^{7ff.}$, which is cited by B. Wolf (op. cit. p. 13), it is recorded that Elisha was in Damascus. But it is not said that he went there as a missionary, and, besides, 2 K 8^{7} furnishes no positive basis for the reality of the details of the Book of Jonah.——Hommel (AHT p. 145) says, 'One sees from names like "Father is Aï (or Ja)" that the Israelitish tradition that Jonah preached Jahweh to the Ninevites is not so absurd as according to our modern critics it appears.' But, instead of abusing the critics, it would have been well if he had read the text accurately. The Book of Jonah says not a word about Jonah's preaching 'Jahweh' to the inhabitants of Nineveh. Rather is the name 'Jahweh' avoided, and it is said, 'They believed God' (אֱלֹהִים, 3^{5a}, so also $^{8a. 9a. 10a}$).

(δ) The NT passages involved have also frequently an incorrect meaning and an unnecessary scope attributed to them by the upholders of the externo-historical interpretation. First, it may be assumed that Jesus, in regard to the literary history of the OT, attached Himself to the notions of His contemporaries. There are certain proofs that He did so in regard to other notions that prevailed then. Not only did He speak of the rising of the sun (Mt 13^{6}, Mk 16^{2}, cf. Ja 1^{11}), not only did He call the grain of mustard seed the smallest of all seeds (Mt 13^{31} ‖ Mk 4^{31}, Lk 13^{19}), because this was then the popular opinion (Lightfoot, Horæ ad Mt 13^{31}), but in other matters too He had regard to the inferior knowledge or positive ignorance of His contemporaries. In particular, He paid the temple tax, ἵνα μὴ σκανδαλίζωμεν αὐτούς (Mt 17^{27}). That is to say, although as υἱὸς τοῦ βασιλέως (v.$^{25f.}$) He was free from the obligation, He paid the tax because the priests would not have recognized the right reason of His refusal to pay, and He would thus have given them an occasion of stumbling. For this reason He preferred to make a concession to their opinions. Now, as Christ, in astronomical, botanical, and other matters, placed Himself on the level of His contemporaries, so might He do in regard to the literary conceptions of His age. For the fulfilment of His religious mission, He required to oppose only such opinions as directly concerned the notion of the true kingdom of God—μετάνοια, πίστις, and δικαιοσύνη τοῦ θεοῦ.——Secondly, it is the great εὐσεβείας μυστήριον (1 Ti 3^{16}) of the Person of Christ that He was as much true man as true God. He advanced in wisdom (Lk 2$^{40. 52}$), He learned (ἔμαθεν, He 5^{8}), He did not know the date of His παρουσία (Mt 24^{36}, Mk 13^{32}); cf. Ph 2$^{7f.}$. These data of the NT must be taken into account, even by a believing Christian. But J. Kennedy (op. cit. p. 57 f.) mentions none of these actual testimonies of the NT.——Thirdly, we have to observe that the Evangelists differ in their report of what Jesus said about the Book of Jonah. In Mt 12$^{39-41}$ it is recorded that the Νινευῖται μετενόησαν εἰς τὸ κήρυγμα Ἰωνᾶ. It is not said in Mt that Jonah was a σημεῖον for the Ninevites, a statement which occurs only in Lk 11^{30}, ἐγένετο Ἰωνᾶς τοῖς Νινευίταις σημεῖον. Matthew's account, however, must be the original one, for Luke also adds afterwards (v.^{32}) that the Ninevites repented in consequence of the preaching of Jonah. Matthew's report, further, corresponds exactly to the narrative in the Book of Jonah, in which all that is said is that Jonah was to preach (קְרָא עָלֶיהָ, 1^{1} 3^{1}), and that by his cry, 'Yet forty days,' etc. (3^{4}), he awakened the faith of the Ninevites. But in the Book of Jonah there is not a word to the effect that Jonah exercised any influence upon the inhabitants of Nineveh by the strangeness of his garb or the wonderful experiences he had passed through. All this, again, is silently passed over by J. Kennedy (pp. 27, 50 f.), and yet he assumes as beyond question that Jonah did not come to Nineveh as 'an unknown stranger,' but that 'his entombment in the body of a great fish, and his deliverance from that prison, was known to the people.' If that was so, the narrator of the history of Jonah has omitted a most essential point.* This is not the only instance in which

---

* The same judgment must be passed on the learned essay of H. Clay Trumbull, Jonah in Nineveh (Philadelphia, 1892). He starts rightly with the question, 'Where in the OT or the NT except in the Book of Jonah is there such a seemingly unnecessary miracle as the saving of a man's life by having him swallowed in a fish, instead, say, of having the vessel that carried him driven back by contrary winds to the place of its starting?' (p. 6). But 'it is well to ask if there is anything in the modern disclosures of Assyrian life and history that would seem to render the miraculous element in the story of Jonah more reasonable and the marvellous effect of his preaching at Nineveh more explicable and natural' (p. 7). Trumbull reminds us that 'prominent among the divinities of ancient Assyria was Dagan, a creature part man part fish' (p. 7), and 'according to Berosus, the very beginning of civilization in Chaldæa was under the direction of a personage, part man and part fish, who came up out of the sea' (p. 9). Trumbull now suggests that Jonah appeared to the Ninevites as one of the 'Avatars or incarnations' of Dagan (p. 10). But this is ab initio improbable, for

J. Kennedy makes alterations on the contents of the Book of Jonah. According to the latter, God said to Jonah, 'Preach the preaching that I bid thee' (3^{1b}), and this preaching was, 'Yet forty days and Nineveh is overthrown' (v.^{4b}). But Kennedy says, 'The preaching of Jonah was not a mere wild monotone, "Yet forty days and Nineveh shall be destroyed." He could find a fresh text in every street and thoroughfare.'

7. The idea of the book.—Whatever view one takes of the formal character and origin of the book, the ideas embodied in it are the same.

(a) The main idea is the following. Israel has been intrusted by God with the mission to call the goyîm also to moral amendment, and is not to look askance or be jealous if the goyîm manifest repentance and if God takes back the threatenings which He had pronounced against them. With this principal idea the book opens, whether one regards 'Jonah the son of Amittai' as the representative of his nation or as an individual, and the same idea is reflected also in the whole course of the narrative and in the closing words of the book. The story of Jonah thus gives expression to those lofty thoughts which are uttered also in Is 40–66. For the 'Servant of J″' (Is 42^{1}) must be the same who in 41^{8} is expressly called יִשְׂרָאֵל עַבְדִּי, and of this Servant of J″ it is said, 'I have made him for a light of the goyîm' ($42^{4.\ 6f.}$ 49^{1-6} etc., cf. also Zec 8^{23}, Sir 24^{30} ἐκφανῶ αὐτὰ [the contents of the νόμος] ἕως εἰς μακράν, see above, p. 747^{a}). The Book of Jonah was meant, then, to proclaim the universality of the Divine plan of salvation, and to serve as a protest against the particularist tendencies which now and then led many members of the people of Israel to strive to narrow the boundaries of the Divine kingdom of grace. The book is thus a brilliant example of the diametrical opposite of the spirit which condemned the foreign wives (Mal 2^{11}, Ezr $9^{1ff.}$ $10^{1ff.}$, Neh $13^{23ff.}$, cf. Est 9^{13}), and exhibits a lovely dawn preparing the way for the clear day of the gospel (Jn 3^{16}, Gal 3^{28} etc.).——Similar to the above is the idea that has before now been extracted by many from the Book of Jonah. Even Ephraem Syrus discovered the primary purpose of the book to be to bring back the Ninevites to God (cf. B. Wolf, p. 36). Eichhorn (Einleit. iv. 351) expressed the opinion that 'the book is a proof that God has shown his concern also for the heathen by sending them direct messengers.' Essentially the same is the view of Alb. Rebattu (1875, p. 6), 'Docet, Deum non solum Judæis sed omnibus gentibus, dummodo gratia divina dignæ sint, benevolentiam suam præbere'; of Bleek (1878, § 229); of Reuss (Geschichte, 1890, § 408); of Renan (Hist. iii. 512, 'universalist school'); of Kaulen (Einleit., 1892, § 412); of v. Orelli (1896); of Strack (1898). With perfect correctness also G. A. Smith (ii. 501) remarks, 'The purpose is to illustrate the mission of prophecy to the Gentiles, God's care for them, and their susceptibility to His word.'

(b) Others have asserted that the theme of the book is a magnifying of the compassion of God. Already we hear Philo say (Orat. de Jona, § 2), 'Sicut in arte medicinæ peritissimi salvare ægrotos promittentes, igne et aqua regunt eriguntque, similiter sapientissimus ille, solus salvator, deperditionem indicens ac ruinam, misericordiam construit salutis.' Cf. also § 53, 'Sicut pristina vita duram merebat prædicationem, similiter pœnitentia eorum ex adverso benignitatem.' Upon this view, the Book of Jonah would be an illustration of Jer 18^{7-10}, where the conditional character of predictions is explained. This was the view accepted also by the Midrash Yalkut on Jonah, which closed with the words, באותה שעה נפל על פניו ואמר הנהג עולמך במדת הרחמים דכתיב לה׳ אלק׳ הרחמים והסליחות, i.e. 'At that moment Jonah fell upon his face, and spoke [to God], Guide thy world by the norm of mercy, as it is written,' etc. [Dn 9^{9}]. The Yalkut was followed by the above-named Arab.-Syr. History of the Prophet Jonah (Wolf, p. 27). Also D. Kimchi in his Commentary reckons it as a third aim of the book, ללמד שהאל יתברך חומל על בעלי תשובה מאיזה עם שיהיו ומוחל להם וכל שכן בשהם רבים, i.e. 'to teach that God should be praised for sparing the penitents to whatever nation those belong, and more especially, if they are many in number.' Essentially the same is the thought of the book, as given by Keil (Einleit. § 89). Hitzig (Comment. Vorbemerkungen, No. 4) laid special emphasis on the point that the book was intended to vindicate God in the matter of unfulfilled predictions. In like manner, Kautzsch (Abriss, 1897, p. 120) thinks that the narrative desired to give an illustration of the Divine question (Ezk 18^{23} 33^{11}), 'Have I pleasure in the death of the sinner?' So also Nowack (Hand-komm., 1897, p. 174). The authors just named thus fail to see that in the Book of Jonah what is pre-eminently depicted is the universality of the Divine plan of salvation, and the duty of Israel to be the missionary to the goyîm.

(c) It is not at all certain that, in addition to the principal idea, the author of the Book of Jonah desired to impress other sentiments on his readers. But Ephraem Syrus (see above, 7 a) found a second aim of the book in this, that it gave to the Israelites an example of the penitent disposition of other nations. This, in fact, was the primary tendency of the book, according to D. Kimchi (נכתבה להיות מוסר לישראל שהרי עם נכרי שאינם מישראל היה קרוב לתשובה וג׳ ועוד להודיע הפלא הגדול שעשה האל, i.e. 'The book was intended to serve for instruction to Israel, showing as it did how a foreign nation, not belonging to Israel, was ready for conversion, and how at the very first reprimand of the prophet it turned completely from its wickedness, whereas Israel, although reprimanded early and late by the prophets, did not turn from its evil ways'). Kimchi further attributed to the book the purpose 'to make known the great miracle which God wrought upon the prophet.' According to Eichhorn (Einleit. iv. 351), the story was intended also to teach that 'Jahweh rules in all places and over all elements.' Riehm (Einleit. ii. 166) says, 'The author wishes to teach that no prophet can evade the Divine commission.' He is followed by Volck (art. 'Jona' in PRE^{2} vii. 85). Again, Vatke (Einleit., 1886, p. 688) found pre-eminent in the book the thought also that 'the honour of the prophet is not impugned if a threatening is not fulfilled, nor inspiration called in question although many predictions are not realized.' Kaulen (Einleit. § 412) goes the length of maintaining that Jon 1^{12} already teaches what was afterwards expressed by the high priest Caiaphas (Jn 11^{50}), συμφέρει ἵνα εἷς ἄνθρωπος ἀποθάνῃ ὑπὲρ τοῦ λαοῦ. Finally, M. Vernes (Précis d' histoire juive, 1889, p. 810) contents himself with the words, 'Jonah is a moral tale rather than a prophecy.'

Jonah came to Nineveh not as 'a personage part man and part fish.' But the main point is the following:—If God had saved Jonah by means of a fish, in order that the inhabitants of Nineveh might take him for an incarnation of the Dagan, then God would have strengthened the Ninevites in their faith in the fish-god Dagan. This would have been an unjustifiable 'concession' (p. 16). Nor is it the case that God caused the star (Mt 2^{2}) to shine forth on account of the Magi. Besides, Trumbull's attempt (p. 14, note 1) to connect Jonah and Oannes is scarcely possible. In the event of such a connexion, we should rather have expected the form 'Ιωνᾶ to be retained. Why should the change have been made from Jonah to יוֹחָנָן (Johanan, 'Ιωανάν)? On the contrary, a more probable derivation of the name Oannes is that proposed by Lenormant (Oannes=Êa-ḫan) or by Tiele (=Êa-vannu). Finally, in his account of the place-name Nebi Yunas (p. 17), Trumbull appears to have turned his attention too little to the Jewish diaspora and the Syrian Christians (see, on Nahum and Habakkuk, König, Einleitung, pp. 333, 352).

iv. OTHER OCCURRENCES OF THE NAME JONAH. —The name 'Ιωνᾶς is found in OT Apocrypha not only in To $14^{4.8}$ and 3 Mac 6^{8} (see above, p. 749^{a}), but also in 1 Es $9^{1.}$ (B) ^{23} (see JONAS, Nos. 1. 2). In NT it occurs in Mt 12^{39-41} 16^{4}, Lk $11^{29f.\ 32}$; Βαριωνᾶ in Mt 16^{17}, 'Ιωνᾶ in Jn 1^{43} 21^{15}, but in these last two passages the reading 'Ιωάν(ν)ου has strong evidence in its favour. See JOHN (FATHER OF SIMON PETER).

JONAM ('Ιωνάμ WH, 'Ιωνάν TR, AV Jonan).—An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{30}.

JONAS.—1. (B 'Ιωνᾶς, A 'Ιωανάν, AV Joanan), 1 Es 9^{1} the son of Eliasib (B Νάσειβος), to whose chamber (παστοφόριον) Esdras betook himself to mourn over the foreign marriages contracted by the people. In Ezr 10^{6} called JEHOHANAN; cf. Neh 12^{23} JOHANAN. 2. (A 'Ιωνᾶς, B 'Ιωανᾶς) 1 Es 9^{23}. The name corresponds to ELIEZER in the parallel list of Ezr 10^{23}. A link between the two forms is given by the Vulg. Elionas; אליעיני was perhaps read for אליעזר, as was done in 1 Es 9^{32} (cf. Ezr 10^{31}), the former name occurring in the previous verse of Ezr. Elionas was then corrupted to Jonas. 3. (Jonas) 2 Es 1^{39}. The prophet Jonah.

JONATHAN (יְהוֹנָתָן, יוֹנָתָן 'J" hath given'; comp. Theodore) is a proper name met with from the time of the Judges downwards.

1. A Levite mentioned in a supplement to the Book of Judges (chs. 17. 18),* an adventurer through whom the idolatrous worship in Dan was established, and from whom the Danite priesthood was descended. The narrative in which he figures has a threefold interest, inasmuch as it throws light on the gradual conquest of Canaan, illustrates the low state of religion in the post-Mosaic age, and involves the sanctuary of Dan in discredit by tracing its institution to fraud, violence, and personal ambition.

This degenerate priest is described as the son of Gershom, the son of Manasseh (18^{30}). The Heb. text, however, indicates that the n in Manasseh is an interpolation (מְנַשֶּׁה), and that the ancestor's name, as remembered in the Jewish tradition, should be read Moses. From Bethlehem of Judah the youth went forth to push his way in the world (17^{7}), and first hired himself as house priest to Micah the Ephraimite for a wage of ten pieces of silver with food and raiment (v.^{10})—and this though Micah's household cult had the double taint that he made use in worship of a graven and a molten image (v.^{4}), and that these images had been procured from stolen money (v.^{2}). (Ewald, with support from LXX, thinks the money was originally got by trading). While living with Micah he was accosted by five Danite spies, who had been sent out by their straitened tribe to explore the northern states; and after consulting the oracle he promised the blessing of God upon their enterprise (18^{1-6}). The spies discovered at Laish a large and rich land and a people secure (v.^{10}), and on hearing their report an armed band of 600 Danites marched northward to the easy conquest (v.^{11}). Arrived at Mount Ephraim, they halted at Micah's dwelling, and, while the troop held the priest in converse, the spies entered the 'house of God' and carried off the costly furniture of the idolatrous worship (v.^{17}). It was an easy matter to induce the priest to acquiesce in the robbery, and to accompany them on their expedition. 'Go with us,' they said, 'and be to us a father and a priest: is it better for thee to be priest unto the house of one man, or to be priest unto a tribe and family in Israel'? (v.^{19}). Micah pursued the predatory band, but his following was too weak to engage them (v.^{26}). The expedition was successful; and the priestly line founded in Dan by J. continued 'until the captivity of the land' (v.^{30}). The preservation of the story is doubtless due to the fact that it lent itself to the purposes of the prophets of the Assyr. period in their opposition to the cult practised in Dan and Bethel.

2. The eldest son of Saul (1 S 14^{49}), who shared in the perils and enterprises of his father's stormy reign, and was involved in his ruin. The narratives* in which he figures successively celebrate his martial exploits and his romantic friendship with David, and they portray a character which combines in a unique degree the heroism of the Hebrew patriot with the spirit of Christian virtue.

As warrior-prince J. takes rank among the bravest captains of Israel's iron age. Like Saul, he was fleet of foot, and of great physical strength (2 S 1^{23}), and, as became a Benjamite, a noted archer (v.^{22}). In the familiar speech of the people, he may have been known for his grace and agility as the gazelle. (So Ewald, rendering v.^{19}, 'the gazelle is slain'). He comes upon the scene as the hero of a campaign against the Philistines, in which the bearing of Saul is little more than a foil to the bold initiative, the rapid movement, and the practical sense of his son. The Philistines, it would seem, had been in effective occupation of the Israelitish territory, and the force collected by Saul had not yet made any considerable impression, when a blow struck by J. (1 S 13^{3}),† to whom

* The great value and antiquity of the substance of these two chapters is generally admitted by critics. Budde's attempt to disentangle two independent narratives, of which the chief is J, is approved by Cornill, disapproved by Wellh. and Kuenen, and questioned by Driver (LOT^{6} p. 168).

* Of the two main strata in the Books of Samuel distinguished by modern critics (Budde, Driver, Cornill, etc.), the older contributes the account of J.'s military career (1 S 13. 14. 31^{2}), while the later develops the theme of the friendship (1 S 18^{1-4} 19^{1-7} 23^{16-18}). The distinctness of the two contributions would be complete if Stade is right in assigning ch. 20 (against Budde) to the later source. The Davidic elegy (2 S 1) commemorates equally the prowess and friendship of Jonathan.

† Probably the slaying of a tyrannical officer. The uncer-

Saul had intrusted a third of his following (1 S 13^{2}), loudly sounded the note of rebellion. The Philistines answered the challenge by invading the highlands with an overwhelming force. The Hebrews, on the other hand, did not respond to Saul's expectation of a general rising; some fled beyond Jordan, some hid themselves in caves, some were pressed into the enemy's service, and he was left to front the invasion with a band which had now dwindled from 3000 to 600 men (1 S 13^{15}). The two armies came face to face at the passage of Michmash, and took up their positions on opposite sides of a deep ravine*—the Philistines at Michmash on the north, Saul at Gibeah on the south side. Outnumbered though Saul was, his position at the top of the steep pass was impregnable; and the Philistines, after planting an outpost on their edge of the ravine, set about harrying the surrounding district (1 S 13^{17}). The dead-lock was ended by Jonathan. Accompanied by his armour-bearer (1 S 14^{1}), he hailed the Philistine garrison, and, having satisfied himself that their reply was a sign that the Omnipotent God was on his side (v.^{12}),† he scaled the opposing rocky rampart and fell upon the astonished garrison. As the Philistines fled he struck down twenty men, and where they lay in a row it seemed like a furrow drawn in an acre of land (v.^{14}, perhaps, originally, 'he went through them like a ploughshare'; on other possible interpretations see art. FURROW). The panic spread to the main camp, which, weakened as it was by the absence of the marauding bands, was unable to resist what seemed an attack in force. Seeing the enemy in confusion, and discovering in it the hand of J., Saul with his men also crossed the ravine, and soon the whole force of the Philistines was in headlong flight. That the Hebrews might reap the full fruits of the victory, Saul made proclamation that none should eat until the evening on pain of death (v.^{24}). Ignorant of the prohibition, J., as he passed in hot chase through a wooded district, refreshed himself by eating wild honey (v.^{27}); and, on learning of his father's vow, he warmly blamed the short-sighted order that had taken the vigour out of the pursuit (v.^{30}). In the evening the oracle revealed that a penalty had been incurred (v.^{37}), and the divination of the lot brought the transgression home to J. (v.^{42}). Saul declared his life forfeited, but the people intervened, and by a ransom (Ewald, by a vicarious sacrifice) saved their hero (v.^{45}).

If the military exploits of J. chiefly impressed his contemporaries, it is his friendship with David which has most strongly appealed to the imagination of the after-world. In truth, it gives an unrivalled example of the essential notes of friendship—namely, warmth of affection, disinterestedness, helpfulness, confidence, and constancy. The love of J. for David is represented as of sudden growth—its birthday the day when they first met after the slaying of Goliath (1 S 18$^{1-4}$). The intensity of his love is described in the language of the strongest of passions: he loved David as his own soul (v.^{1}), passing the love of women (2 S 1^{26}); and in the parting scene it finds expression in an outburst of true Oriental vehemence: they kissed one another, and wept one with another until David exceeded (1 S 20^{41}). Of its spirit, disinterestedness is the merest negative description: not only had J. nothing personally to gain from David, but he was reminded by Saul that he had everything to lose (1 S 20^{31}). The friendly services of J. were his first intercession with Saul on David's behalf (1 S 19$^{1-7}$), and his later interposition, as it appeared at the risk of his own life, by which he discovered his father's settled purpose, and conveyed to David a warning to flee from the court (1 S 20). The mutual confidences are frank and full. And, to supply the crowning grace of constancy, there is recorded a last stolen interview in a wood in the wilderness of Ziph, where J., seeking out the friend from whom he had been so long parted by his father's wrath, strengthened his hand in God (1 S 23^{16}).* The relations of J. with Saul reveal essentially the same strong and affectionate character. Of their close association in all weighty business, and of their strong mutual affection, there are various direct and indirect testimonies (1 S 19^{2} 20^{2}). Against this may be set Saul's later suspicion that J.'s friendship with David was of the nature of a conspiracy (22^{8})—the design being to set him aside in favour, either of David, or, as is much more likely, of J. himself. But while it is quite credible that David, in view of the danger to the realm of a half-insane king, may have spoken of the desirability of the father giving way to the son (Stade, Gesch. des Volkes Israel, i. 242), it is not probable that such a design was matured, or even communicated to Jonathan.

J. fell with Saul on Mount Gilboa in battle against the Philistines (1 S 31^{2}). At this time the fourth brother (1 Ch 9^{39}) was 40 years old (2 S 2^{10}), and on this basis of calculation J. may have been between 40 and 50 when he died. If 1 S 13$^{1-3}$ fixes the date of the battle of Michmash, and if Saul reigned nearly 40 years thereafter (Ac 13^{21}), J. cannot have been less than 60 at death, i.e. 30 years older than David (2 S 5^{4}). These data are, however, precarious, and it is safer to follow the general impression of the history, and regard him as a contemporary of David. His dishonoured corpse was rescued from Beth-shan by the men of Jabesh-Gilead (1 S 31^{11}). He left a son 5 years old (see MEPHIBOSHETH).

3. A nephew of David who slew a giant of Gath (2 S 21^{21}), probably the same as the 'uncle' (?) spoken of as a wise scribe (1 Ch 27^{32}). 4. A son of Abiathar the priest, who as a courier rendered service to David during Absalom's rebellion (2 S 15$^{27. 36}$ 17$^{17. 20}$), and brought to Adonijah the report of Solomon's accession (1 K 1^{42}). 5. A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned (Jer 37$^{15. 20}$ 38^{26}). 6. One of the line of the high priests in the 5th cent. (Neh 12^{11})—also called Johanan (12^{22}), referred to in Neh as introducing a change in the keeping of the genealogical records, and in Josephus (Ant. XI. vii. 1) as bringing profanation on the temple by the murder of his brother Jesus within its precincts. 7. One of David's heroes (2 S 23^{32}, 1 Ch 11^{34}). 8. One of David's treasurers (1 Ch 27^{25}) (AV Jehonathan). 9. A Levite (Neh 12^{35}). 10. The son of Kareah, a Judahite captain after tainty arises from the ambiguity of נְצִיב, an ambiguity which may be reproduced in English by saying that he destroyed a post, i.e. either a garrison, or a pillar erected in token of the Philistine supremacy (Gn 19^{26}), or an official of some kind. The last interpretation is supported by 1 K 4^{19}.

* The situation may be made clearer by an extract from Robinson, Bibl. Researches^{2}, i. 441 f. 'We left Jeba' (Gibeah) for Mŭkhmâs. The descent into the valley was longer and steeper than any of the preceding. The path led down obliquely, and we reached the bottom in half an hour. . . . In the valley (Wady es-Suweinit), just at the left of where we crossed, are two hills of a conical, or rather a spherical, form, having steep rocky sides with small Wadys running up behind each, so as almost to isolate them. These would seem to be the two rocks mentioned in connexion with J.'s adventure. . . . Crossing the valley obliquely, and ascending with difficulty for 15 minutes we came upon the slope on which Mŭkhmâs stands.'

† The sign agreed on was that he should attack only if the Philistines invited him to come up. This, it has been pointed out, was not arbitrary, as their refusing to come down indicated want of courage. There is some force in Stade's objection to this feature, that to hail the garrison was to put them on their guard, and thus endanger the chance of success.

* The passages bearing on the friendship have been somewhat roughly handled by modern critics. Ch. 20, it is alleged, is impossible after ch. 19$^{1-7}$, the story of the parting contains contradictory elements (the signal and the interview), the last interview is unhistorical, etc. In any case, David himself vouches for the main features.

JOPPA (יָפוֹ, i.e. Yāphō,* in Ezr 3^{7} יָפוֹא; Ἰόππη, Ιόπη; Arabic Yâfa; modern name Jaffa).—The town is built on a whale-back rise of rocky ground, made conspicuous by its being the only eminence of the kind along the level sandy beach which extends in a straight line from Cæsarea to Gaza. To vessels approaching from the north or south, the crest of Jaffa is the first visible object on the coast-line. On nearer approach the appearance of the town is exceedingly picturesque, the closely clustered houses, with their numerous arches and walls of blue, pink, white, and yellow ochre, rising above each other, and all sparkling in the brilliant sunlight. In the low-lying ground, part of which must have once been a marsh, immediately behind the town there are extensive irrigated gardens of orange, apricot, and peach trees, the level mass of deep green foliage being relieved by the tall stems of graceful palm trees. Beyond this, the plain of Sharon, with its rich fields of wheat and barley, stretches away to where the outline of the Judæan hills forms the background of the picture.

The whole eventful history of Joppa is explained by its connexion with the influential city of Jerusalem. Geographically, Joppa was the seaport of Jerusalem; but the distance was too great, and the line of communication too often broken, for the maintenance of established ownership. Politically, it was frequently severed altogether from Judæa; and from the religious point of view the produce of Joppa in corn, wine, and oil was considered to be contaminated by its contact with heathenism, and ceremonially unfit for use at the sacred festivals.

Joppa has owed its existence and importance to the fact that it is the only place on the coast that can offer shelter to shipping between Egypt and Mount Carmel. The harbour is formed by a low ledge of rock running out at a sharp angle in a N.W. direction from the southern end of the town. The space is very limited and the water shallow, but in moderate weather Oriental craft, usually about the size of a modern herring boat, can lie at anchor and discharge cargo near the shore. The harbour is entered either by a narrow opening in the ledge or by rounding the point; but when the sea is disturbed by the prevalent N.W. wind the gap can only be rushed on the crest of a high wave, and to round the point brings a vessel broadside-on close to the edge of the surf.

Mythology points to the rock on the southern side of the gap as the spot where Andromeda was chained when Perseus slew the sea monster and delivered the maiden. Josephus, Pliny, Strabo, Jerome, and some of the travellers in the time of the Crusades, speak of the chains still remaining visible in the rock, the earlier writers also testifying to the size of the carcase that lay or was reported to have lain there.†

The antiquity of Joppa is attested by its mention as Ye-pu on the Karnak lists among the towns of Palestine conquered by Thothmes III. It is also referred to in the journey of the Egyptian mohar (see Sayce, HCM 347). It appears as Ja-ap-pu-u in Sennacherib's annal-inscription (Schrader, *KAT*² 172 [*COT*² i. 160 f.]). In the distribution of the land under Joshua it belonged to the inheritance of the tribe of Dan (Jos 19^{46}).

It is referred to in the Bible as the place where the timber from Lebanon was beached for transport to Jerusalem (2 Ch 2^{16}, Ezr 3^{7}). Here Jonah embarked when seeking in vain to escape from the commandment to go to Nineveh (Jon 1^{3}). In Joppa, Dorcas laboured among the poor and was raised from the dead (Ac 9^{36-42}). Here St. Peter, on the roof of Simon's house, was taught that expansion of the meaning of salvation which has ever since divided the synagogue and the Christian Church (Ac 10^{1-23}). Joppa was a constant sufferer during the famous wars of the Jews with Syria, Egypt, and Rome.

In the days of Judas Maccabæus its Jewish inhabitants were invited into boats by the people of the town to join in holiday enjoyment, and about 200 of them were drowned. This treachery was speedily avenged by Judas, who attacked the harbour by night and burned the boats (2 Mac 12^{3-7}). About B.C. 148 Joppa was captured by Jonathan, brother of Judas (1 Mac $10^{75.76}$), and about six years after it was again captured by Simon, the third of the heroic brothers, who put a garrison into it to ensure its fidelity (1 Mac $12^{33.34}$). Shortly afterwards the same leader had once more to occupy it by a force under his officer Jonathan, son of Absalom (1 Mac 13^{11}). Pompey, after capturing Jerusalem in the time of Aristobulus and Hyrcanus (B.C. 63), restored Joppa and joined it to Syria (Jos. Ant. XIV. iv. 4). Sixteen years later it was given back to the Jews, being, however, exempted from the tax to Jerusalem, except what was charged on its agricultural produce and the exports to other towns on the coast (Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 6).

One of the principal disasters inflicted on the town was when Cestius Gallus took it and destroyed its Jewish inhabitants to the number of 8400 (Jos. BJ II. xviii. 10). During the Jewish wars with the Romans Joppa became a place of retreat for the lawless and those who had been made desperate by failure and suffering and the loss of relatives and property. These turned to the sea as a means of livelihood, and by their piratical outrages endangered all commerce on the Syrian coast. The town was attacked and captured (A.D. 68) by Vespasian on his way to Jerusalem. The inhabitants who had taken refuge in their ships and boats were driven on the rocks by a northerly gale, and about 4200 of them were drowned or slain by the sword (Jos. BJ III. ix. 2, 3).

During the time of Christ, Joppa was one of the eleven toparchies of which Jerusalem was the chief.

Since the time of the Romans similar vicissitudes have marked the history of this unfortunate seaport. It has often changed hands, and each change of ownership has been a time of destruction and renewal. It has belonged to Saracens, Crusaders, and the Sultans of Egypt; it was conquered and severely treated by Napoleon, and has finally found rest under the Turkish Government.

The modern town of Jaffa has about 8000 inhabitants—Moslems, Christians, and Jews. Its main street leading from the harbour is steep, narrow, crooked, dark, and dirty, with lanes still darker and dirtier leading off among the huddle of houses on each side. As might be expected in such a seaport, many types and nationalities meet and mingle together. Europeans, Egyptians, Soudanese, Northern Syrians, fellaḥîn of Palestine, and Bedawîn of the desert, are seen lounging about or noisily pushing their way among the baggage animals that throng the narrow street. The thoroughfare from the harbour meets a broad sandy road skirting the landward side of the town and running parallel to the coast-line. It was fitting that a town with such a history of changes should be the starting-point of the first railway in Palestine, by which it is now in daily communication with Jerusalem.

* Both AV and RV have everywhere Joppa, except in Jos 19^{46} where AV has Japho.

† The incident at Joppa finds a parallel at Beyrout, where for a similar purpose and on similar rocks a maiden is said to have been exposed as a sacrifice, and to have been rescued by St. George. This gives its name to the bay, and forms the beautiful design on the English sovereign. While the body of the slain dragon has been lost sight of, faith in the living beast of the sea has remained undisturbed by the lapse of centuries. A few years ago a Belgian steamer reaching Beyrout at midnight blew her siren whistle to inform the agents of her arrival. The unprecedented shriek startled the town out of sleep, and next day in the bazaars the chief topic of conversation was the visit of the sea monster during the previous night.

JORDAN, יַרְדֵּן (Yardēn), in prose always with the definite article הַיַּרְדֵּן (as an appellative), so called from descending (יָרַד). The two exceptions to the use of the article are Ps 42^{6} and Job 40^{23}. In the latter instance this arises from the name being used as a representation of any violent rush of water. (See Davidson and Dillm. ad loc.). The present Arabic name of the Jordan is esh-Sherî'ah, 'the watering-place,' to which the epithet el-Kebîr, 'the great,' is sometimes annexed to distinguish it from esh-Sherî'at el-Mandhôr or Jarmûk, the ancient Hieromax, which joins it from the east about two hours below the Lake of Tiberias. The common name of the great valley through which it thus flows, below the Lake of Tiberias, is el-Ghôr, signifying a depressed tract or plain, usually between two mountains; and the same name continues to be applied to the valley for the whole length of the Dead Sea, and for some distance beyond; it thus corresponds to the Aulon of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomasticon; Robinson, BRP^{2} i. p. 537) and 'the Arabah' of OT. The form el-Urdun was used among early Arabic writers (Abulfeda, Tab. Syr.; Edrisi, ed. Jaubert; Schulten's 'Index in Vit. Saladin,' F. Jordanes; Reland, Palest.) before the time of the Crusades.

It is scarcely ever called the 'river' or 'brook' or any other name than its own, 'the Jordan' (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, 284). Josephus always calls it the Jordan, except once when he calls it 'the river,' without any distinctive name, when describing the borders of Issachar (Ant. v. i. 22).

The derivation of the name Jordan from Jor and Dan has been traced back as far as Jerome (Onomasticon, s.v. 'Dan'), who says (Comm. in Mt 16^{13}): 'Jordanes oritur ad radices Libani; et habet duos fontes, unum nomine Jor, et alterum Dan; qui simul mixti Jordanis nomen efficiunt.' This was copied by Arculf, 8; Willibald, 16; Saewulf, 47; Will. of Tyre, 13, 18; Brocardus, c. 3, p. 172; Marinus Sanutus on his map; Andrichomius, p. 109; John of Würzburg, 20. It is also current among the Christians of the country to the present day. There is no basis, however, for this etymology, for the name Jordan is merely the Greek form (Ἰορδάνης) for the Hebrew Yardēn, which has no relation to Dan. The Arabs near Tell el-Ḳâdi (Dan) call it there ed-Dan or el-Leddân (BRP^{2} iii. 392). Jerome (Onomast. s.v. 'Dan') considers Jor equivalent to river; but G. Williams points out that יְאֹר is the Hebrew * form of 'river,' while the proper name (Jordan) is יַרְדֵּן, and never יְאֹרְדֵּן, as the proposed etymology would require.

Up to the present century most pilgrims and travellers had visited the valley of the Jordan only at Jericho, hence we had no account of its features in the upper portions. Antoninus Martyr at the close of the 6th cent., and St. Willibald in the 8th, passed down through the whole length of the valley from Tiberias to Jericho; and in 1100 king Baldwin I. accompanied a train of pilgrims from Jericho to Tiberias (Fulcher Carnot); but there is nothing more than a mere notice of these journeys. During the present century, Seetzen, Burckhardt, Irby and Mangles, Banks and Buckingham, Thomson, Porter, Molyneux, Lynch, J. Macgregor, Guérin, Liévin, Robinson, have visited and described portions of the Jordan; and in later years the officers of the Palestine Exploration Fund have thoroughly examined, surveyed, and described it (PEFSt, 1869–97, SWP).

GEOLOGICAL FEATURES.—The Jordan flows from north to south in a portion of a deep fissure or crevasse on the surface of the earth, nearly parallel to the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea, extending from the foot of the Taurus Mountains, past Antioch, up the valley of the Orontes, through Cœle-Syria, between Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon, down the valley of the Jordan and Salt Sea, and through the Wâdy el-Arab to the Gulf of 'Aḳabah, from lat. 38° N. to 30° N. This fissure appears as the most remarkable on the face of the earth, owing to its being cut off from the sea, in so dry a climate that the excessive evaporation keeps the surface of water in the Salt Sea about 1300 ft. below the level of the Mediterranean and Red Sea. It was suggested, probably first by Burckhardt, that the river Jordan originally flowed down the whole course of the depression from the Lebanon to the Gulf of 'Aḳabah; but this view has been rejected with reason by Lartet and subsequently by Hull, and the following is the theory of the formation of the valley, deduced from the observations and memoirs of the above learned geologists.

Professor Hull, in his examination of the Wâdy el-Arâbah over a distance of 120 miles from north to south, found that it had been hollowed out along the line of a main 'fault' ranging from the eastern shore of the Salt Sea to that of the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. He found numerous parallel and branch 'faults' along the Arabah Valley, but there was one main 'fault' running along the base of the Edomite mountains, to which the others are of secondary importance. This is called by him the 'Great Jordan Valley Fault.' Lartet, Tristram, and Wilson had already shown that in the Jordan Valley and Ghôr there was the evidence of a large

* יְאֹר is really an Egyptian loan-word (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. s.v.), and is the special designation in OT of the Nile.

'fault' corresponding to the line of this remarkable depression, and Hull considers that the features he observed in the Arâbah Valley are continuous with those of the Jordan. He considers that in this part of the world the Miocene period was one of elevation, disturbance, and denudation of strata, not of accumulation, the Miocene period not being represented by any strata throughout the district traversed by his expedition. To this epoch he refers the emergence of the whole of the Palestine, and the greater part of the Sinaitic, area from the sea, in which the cretaceo-nummulitic limestone formations were deposited. To this epoch also he considers the 'faulting' and flexuring of the strata to be chiefly referable, and notably the formation of the great Jordanic line of 'fault,' with its branches and accompanying flexures in the strata, which are very remarkable along the western side of the Ghôr. These phenomena were accompanied and followed by extensive denudation, and the production of many of the principal features of the region referred to.

From that epoch down to the present day these physical features appear to have changed in a comparatively small degree, as the area referred to slowly rose above from the waters of the Miocene and Pliocene oceans. For a limited time there would have necessarily been a connexion between the waters of this great gulf or valley, 200 miles in length and 10 in breadth, and the southern 'Aḳabah sea through the valley of 'Aḳabah; but, from the time that the outer waters were dissevered from those of the Jordan-Arabah lake by the uprise of the land, there is no evidence that there was any subsequent connexion by means of a stream flowing down from the north into the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. All indications appear to be against this. It would appear that, at a period coming down probably to the prehistoric, a chain of fresh-water lakes existed among the tortuous valleys and hollows of the Sinaitic peninsula. There are still fresh-water shells in the wadis Feiran and es-Sheikh, and these belong to a period when the contiguous oceans were about 200 ft. higher over the land than at present, indicating that during this later period there has been a further rise of about 200 ft. The evidence of this rise was observed also in the Gulf of 'Aḳabah. From the epoch during the Miocene period when the inland sea was dissevered from the waters of the adjoining oceans, its level would entirely depend upon the amount of rain water from rivers which poured into it, balanced against the amount abstracted by evaporation. Lartet has computed that at the present day at least 6,500,000 tons of water are evaporated daily from the Salt Sea.

The occurrence of terraces of marl, gravel, and silt, through which the ravines of existing streams have been cut at an elevation of about 100 ft. above the present level of the Mediterranean, show that the level of the inland sea at one time stood for a period without change about 1400 ft. higher than it does at present; but this can have had no connexion with the chain of lakes about Sinai, which extended to prehistoric times, as this inland sea was dissevered to the south during a remote Miocene epoch; and though there may have been a connexion for some time by way of the Mediterranean through the plain of Esdraelon, yet, as the land continued to rise, the inland sea would eventually have become entirely isolated. The lowering of the water in the inland sea from evaporation is supposed to have taken place at the commencement of the Pliocene period, so that it reached somewhere about the present level long before the prehistoric times, and there cannot have been any change in the course and character of the Jordan during historic or prehistoric times.

At the present time the level of the Salt Sea is about 1300 ft. below the Mediterranean Sea, the lower part of the floor of the Salt Sea again 1300 ft. below its surface level, and the watershed of Wâdy Arâbah 2000 ft. above the SALT SEA, and 700 ft. above the Mediterranean Sea. The plain of Esdraelon at the watershed is about 250 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean, so that on this side there may have been communication with the ocean to a much later period than on the south side; but this point does not seem to have been raised hitherto. Hull brings forward abundant evidence of a Pluvial period having existed through the Pliocene and post-Pliocene (or Glacial) period down to recent times. As it was known from the observations of Hooker, Tristram, and others that perennial snow and glaciers existed in the Lebanon during the Glacial epoch, it is assumed by Hull that the adjoining districts to the south of the Lebanon must have had at that epoch a climate approaching to that of the British Isles at the present day, and that in a region of which many parts were over 2000 ft. above the sea-line there must have been abundant rainfall. Even when the snows and glaciers of the Lebanon had disappeared, the effects of the colder climate which was passing away must have remained for some time, the vegetation must have been more luxuriant down to within the epoch of human habitation. It is considered that the outburst of volcanic phenomena commenced to occur when the waters of the inland sea stretched as far north as the Lake Hûleh, that is to say, at the time they began to be lowered by evaporation, shortly after they were dissevered from the ocean, and that the period of the volcanoes of the Jaulân and Haurân ranged through the Pliocene and post-Pliocene to the recent, when concurrently with the drying up of the waters of the inland sea the volcanic action became extinct.

It would seem, then, that during the Glacial epoch Palestine and Syria presented an aspect very different from the present. The Lebanon throughout the year was snow-clad on its higher region, while glaciers descended into some of its valleys. The region of the Haurân was the scene of some extensive volcanoes; while the district around, and the Jordan Valley itself, was invaded by floods of lava. A great inland sea, occupying the Jordan Valley, stretched from Lake Hûleh on the north to a southern margin near the base of Samrat Feddân in the Wâdy el-Arâbah of the present day, while numerous arms and bays stretched into the glens and valleys of Palestine and Moab on either side. Under such climatic circumstances, we may feel assured, a luxuriant vegetation decked with verdure the hills and vales to an extent far beyond that of the present; and amongst the trees, as Hooker has shown, the cedar may have spread far and wide. As will be shown hereafter, Tristram supposes that the inland sea, now represented by the Jordan Valley, was one of a chain of fresh-water lakes stretching down to Southern Africa. This is a very interesting subject in relation to the practical question as to the amount of salts now deposited in the Salt Sea, and to what extent an increased rainfall would be required to render the Salt Sea habitable by fish, as contemplated in the prophecies of Ezekiel, Zechariah, Joel, and other prophets.

PHYSICAL FEATURES.—The Jordan Valley may be divided into three portions—(a) The Upper Jordan, running through Cœle-Syria to Lake Hûleh. (b) From L. Hûleh to L. Tiberias. (c) From L. Tiberias to the Salt Sea.

(a) The Upper Jordan, although always accounted to have its sources at Bâniâs and Dan, has its most distant prominent source in the great fountain below Hâsbeiya (1700 ft.), running down into the Wady et-Teim, and becoming the turbid torrent of Nahr Hasbâny, receiving on its way numberless springs from the Anti-Lebanon and Hermon, and particularly the stream from Sheb'a, the great fountain of Suraiyît, at the foot of Hermon and el-Ghujar. After rushing through a deep gorge it has worn for itself in the basalt, it penetrates the marsh of Hûleh for about 5 miles, where it is joined by the united streams of the Nahr Leddân from Tell el-Ḳâḍi (which has been joined by the Wâdy Laweizâny) and the Nahr Bâniâs. Of these main branches of the Jordan, the Nahr Hasbâny is the longest by 40 miles, the Nahr Leddân is the largest, and the Nahr Bâniâs is the most beautiful. A considerable stream comes down from the plain of Ijon, the contributions of the Nahr Bareighît, west of 'Abel. Several large fountains also burst out from the hills to the west side of the marsh, and send their streams to the river or lake (Land and Book, ii. 320). At Ghujar the old road from Damascus through Bâniâs to the west crosses the Hasbâny by a bridge of three arches nearly west of Tell el-Ḳâḍi. From the foot of the mound at Tell el-Ḳâḍi (Dan or Laish) gushes out one of the largest fountains in Palestine (505 ft.), called the Nahr Leddân, which, joining the Nahr Bâniâs and the Hasbâny, forms the Jordan. Josephus speaks of the fountains of the lesser Jordan at Dan (Ant. I. x. 1; V. iii. 1; VIII. viii. 4). Speaking of Semechonitis (Hûleh), he says: 'Its marshes reach as far as the place Daphne, which, in other respects, is a delicious place, and hath such fountains as supply water to what is called "Little Jordan," under the temple of the golden calf, when it is sent into Great Jordan' (BJ IV. i. 1), thus clearly identifying Daphne with Dan.

The name Bâniâs is the Arab pronunciation of the ancient name Paneas, a city (Cæsarea Philippi) named from the grotto Panium, which seems to have been consecrated to the god Pan, though there is no historical mention of this deity (BRP^{2} iii. 406) at this spot. Josephus states (Ant. XV. x. 3; BJ I. xxi. 3) that Herod erected to Augustus Cæsar a beautiful temple of white marble near the place called Panium. 'This is a fine cave in a mountain, under which there is a great cavity in the earth; and the cave is abrupt and very deep, and full of still water. On it hangs a vast mountain, and under the cavern rise the springs of the Jordan.' There are Greek inscriptions in the votive niches here, one of which contains the designation of the person who consecrated it as the 'priest of Pan,' implying a temple of that god. The spot is now called by the people Mughârat Bâniâs, or Mughârat er-Râs en-Neba. From beneath and through the mass of rocks and stones which fill up and hide the entrance of the cavern, gushes forth the Nahr Bâniâs, a full and rushing river, twice as large as the stream from the fountain near Hâsbeiya. The water is of the purest and finest quality, limpid, bright, and sparkling. Gathering to itself the other streams just below the village, and yet itself distributing its waters over the terrace and portions of the western plain for irrigation, it rushes onward in a ravine of its own, with swift course, towards the south-west, down to the lower plain, and so to the lower Hûleh. It is the most beautiful of all the streams of the Jordan (BRP^{2} iii. 407). It may be assumed that this great fountain of the Jordan had some historical associations before Herod built the temple there, and it has been suggested (BRP^{2} iii. 409) that it is 'Baal-gad in the valley of Lebanon under Mount Hermon (Jos 11^{17} 12^{7}), and that the shrine of the Phœnician Baal ultimately gave place to the Grecian Pan' (but see Dillmann on Jos 11^{17}).

The little Birket er-Râm (the ancient lake Phiala), which Josephus (BJ III. x. 7) states is the real origin of the fountain of Jordan, and is carried to Panium by an underground channel, is situated in a bowl or crater. It is supplied by surface drainage, and has no outlet; it is on the right of the road leading from Cæsarea to Trachonitis, and its waters are dark, stagnant, and slimy.

The fountain of Bâniâs rises at an altitude of 1100 ft. (600 ft. above that of Dan). It flows as a torrent until it joins the Leddân, 4½ miles below Tell el-Ḳâḍi, and half a mile farther down union is effected with the Nahr Hasbâny.

The morass above the lake of Hûleh was explored thoroughly by J. Macgregor (Rob Roy on the Jordan) in 1869. Starting from Absîs, at the junction of the Leddân and Bâniâs, in his canoe, he passed the junction with the Hasbâny at Tell Sheik Yusûf. He reached a village about 2 miles farther to south. He estimated the river from 30 to 100 ft. wide, with steep banks of reddish clay, rising in places to 20 ft. The waters in flood were 7 ft. deep—turbid, and brown in colour. Beyond this he struggled with his canoe for another mile, only to get firmly entangled in a maze of bushes 8 ft. high, thick-set stumps, and reeds. He was obliged to return and have his canoe carried N.W. along the edge of the morass to the western side of the valley, and on to the 'Ain Melâhah, on the N.W. side of the lake. Here he again launched his canoe, and, exploring the Lake Hûleh, found the mouth of the Jordan about midway across the northern end of the lake. He explored it to the north through a channel in the floating papyrus reeds for about 4 miles, when he came to a barrier of floating jungle, which effectually stopped further progress. It would appear that all the lower portion of the morass for 4 miles is composed of this papyrus, and it is probably encroaching on Lake Hûleh. The waters of Hûleh were found to be considerably less in extent than the morass, and to measure about 3 miles from east to west, and 4 miles from north to south. The surface is about 7 ft. above the Mediterranean. From the southern end of Hûleh to the northern end of the Lake of Tiberias is about 10 miles, and the fall is 689 ft.—a rapid descent of about 70 ft. a mile over a rocky bed.

(b) The Jordan on issuing from Hûleh is about 60 ft. broad and 15 ft. deep. About 2 miles down is the Jisr Benat Yâḳob, the first bridge over the complete Jordan, built of black basalt and with three arches, over which the great caravan route goes from Akka to Damascus. It appears to be of later date than the Crusading period. The canoe was unable to follow this portion of the Jordan, as it partakes of the nature of a torrent, and flows through a rocky glen, shut in by hills, forcing its turbid waters far into the Lake Tiberias, without apparently commingling them with those of the lake for some considerable distance. This has given rise to the legend that the river Jordan passes through the lake intact. It affects the level of the lake somewhat, which stands in the wet season about 6 in. higher than in the dry season.

(c) The Ghôr or lower Jordan Valley.—The Jordan between L. Tiberias and the Salt Sea lies in a deep depression, sloping nearly uniformly from north to south, at about 9 ft. to 1 mile. On either side are the mountains of Western and Eastern Palestine, rising to heights of over 3000 to 4000 ft. (2000 to 3000 ft. above the Mediterranean), and separated by the comparatively flat Jordan Valley, called the Ghôr by the Arabs, the Arabah of the Hebrews, Aulon of the Greeks, which is 3 miles wide at L. Tiberias, 12 to 16 miles wide at the Salt Sea, contracting to a width of 2 miles south of the plain of Beisan. The Ghôr has a very gentle slope on either side down to the lower plain (the Zôr), in which the Jordan runs, of about five degrees.

The banks of the Ghôr leading down into the Zôr are not regular, but are fretted away by the fervid sun, the strong winds, and occasional heavy rains in January and February. They are very ragged, and during the rainy season are covered with lovely flowers and verdure, but during most seasons of the year are a scene of utter desolation. Towards the lower portion of the Jordan Valley, where the streams (en-Nweimeh, Faseil, el-'Aujeh, Kelt, and others) on the west run into the Zôr, the plain of the Ghôr is broken up into a series of valleys, the original plain being left in outline here and there isolated and forlorn. These broken valleys have very steep sides, are about 100 to 200 ft. deep, and at first sight it seems impossible that the small streams which meander through them—at the best not 3 ft. deep or 6 ft. wide—can have scooped out these banks over 150 ft. in height, whose irregularities often extend more than a mile from the stream itself. From the ruins which exist about the plain, it is obvious that this work of denudation has proceeded exceedingly slowly, the features having scarcely altered during the last 2000 years. A heavier rainfall in early days would, however, readily account for a more rapid degree of change.

The plains of the Jordan are sterile only at the southern end for a few miles north of the Salt Sea over that depressed portion, which probably in early days, when there was a greater rainfall, was covered by the Salt Sea. The soil is not impregnated with salt at a height of 200 ft. above the level of the Salt Sea, and will bear plentifully provided there is any rainfall, so much so that during the rainy season the Jordan plains for miles, as far as the eye can reach, are vast meadows, abounding in grasses and flowers. Those who see the country after the sun has burned up the pasturage may well conceive the idea that nothing will grow there, for when the hot winds spring up in May the grasses are broken up and blown away, and there is little left but a few dried stumps in a howling wilderness. During January and February and part of March, flocks are brought down from the mountains to feed on the rich pasturage on the plains of Jordan, and browse within a mile of the river. In February 1868 between Jericho and Jisr Damieh the country was green everywhere, the weather was chilly, flowers of every hue lay in the path, and the lower Jordan plain or Zôr was covered with an early crop of barley, with here and there branches of the overflowing Jordan meandering through it. The plain of Beisan at this time was abundantly watered and covered with verdure.

In the plain of Beisan three distinct levels can be seen—the Zôr, the Ghôr, and an upper plain which is about 300 ft. above the Ghôr at Beisan. Here the Ghôr is cultivated with corn and indigo, watercourses and canals irrigate the crops and supply the mills with water.

At Beisan the Jordan Valley is 8 miles wide, but immediately to the north it is only 1¼ miles wide, and to the south it contracts again to about 2 miles, the hills on the west closing right down to the river. The Ghôr varies in width until at Jericho it is about 16 miles across, the foot of the hills being about 400 to 500 ft. above the Salt Sea.

It is quite evident from the number of aqueducts in all directions that the Jordan Valley about Jericho was once very highly cultivated, and that with a little care and a good government it might again be brought under cultivation, and its malarious and pestilential marshes removed.

The Jordan Valley on the eastern side, between the Zerḳa and Nimrin, is only barren because there are no streams or fountains led out to water it. North of the Zerḳa, where streams are numerous the valley is clothed with wheat fields and vegetation. South of the Zerḳa there are traces of ancient canals, showing that that portion of the valley between the Zerḳa and the road leading from es-Salṭ to Nablûs was formerly under cultivation, though it is now a desert. Perhaps more than half the Jordan Valley on the east is now reached by irrigation canals, and in those sections not occupied by wheat fields the thistles and weeds are rank, and form such dense jungles that it is almost impossible to get through them. 'Every square mile not now under irrigation could be watered from the Jordan, and the expense for a dam and canals would be small compared with the large number of square miles of valuable land that would be made productive . . . we should have 180 square miles of land as fertile as any prairie, and which at 20 to 25 bushels of wheat per acre would produce between 2 and 3 million bushels of wheat. Give these plains and deserts water, and you can transform them into gardens' (PEFSt, 1877, 153). The portion of the valley between the Zerḳa and the Mandhôr in February and March resembles New England (U.S.) in the month of June. The soil is then burdened with its own productions. By the last of May the weeds, thistles, and wild mustard have formed an almost impenetrable jungle.

From Wâdy Nimrîn to the Salt Sea, a distance of 15 miles, lies the great Shittim plain, watered by three copious streams, which make it a rich and beautiful oasis. This position is assigned by some authorities for the site of the cities of the Plain.

The Zôr or depressed plain through which the Jordan flows.—The Jordan issues from the Lake Tiberias gently for a mile and then becomes more rapid; although it has a nearly uniform descent throughout its course, yet it is found to have a great number of small rapids, and its descent is not quite so great about the middle. It has through many ages worked out a passage through the floor-bed of the valley or Ghôr (Aulon), which passage is called by the Arabs the Zôr. The Zôr varies from ¼ mile to 2 miles in width, and is a depressed plain about 20 ft. below the Ghôr at the northern end, and 200 ft. below towards the Salt Sea. It appears to have been formed by the changing of the river bed from side to side, breaking down the banks of the Ghôr and carrying the silt into the Salt Sea. The Jordan itself varies in width from 30 to 70 yards. The level of the surface of the Zôr is uniform with the banks of the Jordan, so that in January and February, when the waters overflow the banks, the Zôr is covered, and the total width of river in flood is ½ to 2 miles. The soil is for the most part very rich (except towards the southern end, where it is full of salts), and is highly cultivated, bearing heavy barley crops and vegetables.

The Zôr above the Jisr Mijâmia is not continuous; below the bridge the Ghôr is from 50 to 100 ft. above the Zôr. The cliffs of the Zôr are here of white soft marl, about half a mile apart below the bridge, but just above the bridge the hills close in on the west, and the Ghôr disappears. Near the plain of Beisan the crops in the Zôr were being reaped in April (1873). Near the river the soil was covered with gigantic thistles 10 to 15 ft. high. The whole region round about the plain of Beisan is volcanic, and all the rocks and stones about are black and basaltic in their character. This probably accounts for the number of fords across the river in these parts.

From Wâdy Mahleh south of the plain of Beisan to Wâdy Fârah the mountains on the west close in upon the Jordan, narrowing the Zôr, which again widens out opposite to Wâdy Fârah, and gradually increases to 2 miles as it approaches the Salt Sea. The river is hidden for a great portion of its course by the jungle of cane and tamarisk on either side: all rank vegetation except reeds ceases about 2 miles from the Salt Sea. On entering the sea the waters form a muddy marsh covered with driftwood, too soft to be crossed by man or beast. Although the land for a few miles above the Salt Sea is a veritable desert, having at times been covered by the Salt Sea itself, yet such is the power of the sun that immediately after heavy rain in January and February small green plants and flowers spring up at once all round, even on the edge of the Salt Sea, and flourish so long as the rainy season lasts, but wither in a few hours after the rain ceases.

From L. Tiberias to the Salt Sea the direct distance is 65 miles, and the fall is 610 ft., viz. betwixt − 682 ft. at L. Tiberias to − 1292 ft. at the Salt Sea; a fall of 9·3 ft. per mile.

The Dee of Aberdeenshire runs 72 miles, with fall of 16·5 ft. per mile. The Tweed runs 96 miles, with fall of 16 ft. per mile. The Clyde 98 miles, with fall of 14 ft. per mile. The Thames runs 215 miles, with fall of 1½ ft. per mile. The sinuosities of the Jordan, however, are so great that in the 65 miles' direct course it travels 200 miles at least (Lynch, Narr. p. 265), so that the actual fall is not more than 3 ft. per mile, if this estimate can be accepted.

Molyneux surveyed the Jordan from L. Tiberias to the Salt Sea in a boat in 1847, and Lt. Lynch did the same in 1848. Molyneux found the river when not in flood upwards of 100 ft. broad and 4 to 5 ft. deep near the Jisr Mijâmia; for seven hours they scarcely ever had sufficient water to float the boat for 100 yards together. In many places the river is split into a number of small streams, which consequently have not much water in any of them. Occasionally the boat had to be carried upwards of 100 yards over rocks and through thorny bushes; and in some places they had high, steep sandy cliffs all along the banks of the river. In other places the boat had to be carried on the backs of camels, the stream being quite impracticable. Lynch met with equally difficult experiences. He states, 'we have plunged down twenty-seven threatening rapids, besides a great number of lesser magnitude.' Only one straight reach of any length was noticed. The passage of the 200 miles of twists occupied 8½ days. The width varied with the depth and current, but 70 to 80 yards seems to have been an average width, with a depth of 2 to 3 ft., and current varying from 2 to 8 knots, according to circumstances. The greatest width was 180 yards at the Jordan's mouth, with a depth of 3 ft., and a very slow current.

Almost the only description of the Jordan banks from the river itself is given by Lynch in the account which he has written of his adventurous boat journey. The following are the most important passages.

'The river . . . curved and twisted north, south, east and west, turning, in the short space of half an hour, to every quarter of the compass, seeming as if desirous to prolong its luxuriant meanderings in the calm and silent valley, and reluctant to pour its sweet and sacred waters into the accursed waters of the bitter sea. . . .

'For hours in their swift descent the boats floated down in silence, the silence of the wilderness. Here and there were spots of solemn beauty. The numerous birds sang with a music strange and manifold; the willow branches were spread upon the stream like tresses, and creeping mosses and clambering weeds, with a multitude of white and silver little flowers, looked out from among them; and the cliff swallow wheeled over the falls, or, at his own wild will, darted through the arched vistas, shadowed and shaped by the meeting foliage on the banks; and above all, yet attuned to all, was the music of the river, gushing with a sound like that of shawms and cymbals. The stream sometimes washed the banks of the sandy hills, and at other times meandered between low banks, generally fringed with trees and fragrant with blossoms. Some points presented views exceedingly picturesque — the mad rushing of a mountain torrent, the song and sight of birds, the overhanging foliage, and glimpses of the mountains far over the plain, and here and there a gurgling rivulet pouring its tribute of crystal water into the now muddy Jordan. The western shore was peculiar from the high calcareous limestone hills, which form a barrier to the stream when swollen by the efflux of the Sea of Galilee during the winter and early spring; while the left or eastern bank was low, fringed with tamarisk and willow, and occasionally a thicket of lofty cane, and tangled masses of shrubs and creeping plants, giving it the character of a jungle. At one place we saw the fresh track of a tiger [nimr or cheetah ?] on the low clayey margin, where he had come to drink. At another time as we passed his lair, a wild boar started with a savage grunt and dashed into the thicket; but for some moments we traced his pathway by the shaking cane and the crashing sound of breaking branches. . . . Many islands, some fairy-like, and covered with a luxuriant vegetation, others mere sandbars and sedimentary deposits, intercepted the course of the river, but were beautiful features in the grand monotony of the shores—the regular and almost unvaried scene of the high-banked alluvial deposit and sandhills on the one hand, and the low swamp-like shore, covered to the water's edge with the tamarisk, the willow, and the thick high cane, would have been fatiguing without the frequent occurrence of sandbanks and verdant islands. High up in the sand bluffs the cliff swallow chattered from his nest in the hollow, or darted about in the bright sunshine in pursuit of the gnat and the water fly' (Lynch, Narrative, pp. 211–215).

The Plains. — The words principally used in the OT in connexion with portions of the Jordan Valley are 'ărābāh, midbār, ciccār, gĕlīlōth, jĕshīmon, sādeh, shĕdēmōth, biḳ'ah.

The 'Arābāh. Without the definite article 'Arābāh refers to any desert or wilderness; but with the definite article it is used only for that part of the Jordan Valley which is a desert extending from some miles above Jericho to 'Aḳabah, and including the Salt Sea, which is often called 'the Sea of the Arabah' (Dt 3^{17} 4^{49}, Jos 3^{16} 12^{3}). It is used 21 times in this extended sense, and is usually tr^{d} in AV 'the plain' or 'the plains': in RV it is invariably tr^{d} 'the Arabah.' In the plural ('ărābōth) it occurs 19 times in the historical books, and with one exception it refers to a definite spot, viz. the uncultivated land at the northern end of the Salt Sea, the steppes of Jericho (Jos 4^{13} etc.), or the steppes of Moab (Nu 22, etc.). The exceptional case is 2 S 15^{28}, tr^{d} in AV as 'the plain of the wilderness.' It is probable, however, that RV, 'the fords of the wilderness,' is correct (reading עברת, not ערבת). See ARABAH.

Midbār, 'wilderness' (pasture land). With the article this word is generally used for the wilderness of Arabia, but sometimes for tracts of pasture land about Palestine, particularly in respect to the wilderness or pasture country east of Jerusalem. and the passing to it is 'the way of the wilderness' (Jos $8^{15.20}$ 16^{1}, Jg 11^{22} 20^{42}. 2 S $15^{23.28}$ 17^{16}).

Ciccār, ‘round,’ ‘circle,’ a tract of country (when the article is generally used). The word is used for denoting—(a) the floor of the valley through which the Jordan runs, with reference to the cultivated parts; (b) the oasis which formerly existed in the lower part of the valley around the cities of the Plain. In the former sense it is used 5 times. In 2 S 18^{23} it is used to denote the direction taken by Ahimaaz ‘by the way of the plain.’ In 1 K 7^{46}, 2 Ch 4^{17} it refers to the plain of the Jordan, where was the clay ground between Succoth and Zeredah. In Neh 3^{22} 12^{28} it refers to the country about Jerusalem, ‘men of the plain.’ In its restricted sense it is used 8 times to denote the oasis where the cities of the Plain were situated, Gn 13^{10} 19^{17}, Dt 34^{3}.

Gĕlīlōth, ‘circle,’ is used to denote the borders of Jordan in two cases. Jos $22^{10.\ 11}$ (see GELILOTH).

Jĕshīmon, ‘wilderness,’ refers to a wilderness generally, and not to any particular portion of the Jordan Valley so far as can be judged (see, however, Dillm. on Nu 33^{49} and art. JESHIMON).

Sādeh, ‘field,’ is generally used to denote cultivated ground. It is used for the ‘field of Moab,’ Gn 36^{35}, but it is not certain whether this is in the Jordan Valley or upper levels. Stanley (SP 491) suggests that the ‘Vale of Siddim’ is the ‘valley of the cultivated fields.’

Shĕdēmōth, ‘fields,’ is used for highly cultivated ground. The ‘fields of Gomorrah,’ Dt 32^{32}; of Kidron, 2 K 23^{4}; of Heshbon, Is 16^{8}.

Biḳ'ah, a broad plain between two mountain ranges, like that of Cœle-Syria. It is used once in apposition with ciccār, ‘the Round, even the plain (בִּקְעָה) of Jericho’ (Dt 34^{3}). ‘All the region round about Jordan’ (Mt 3^{5}, Lk 3^{3}) does not appear to be capable of geographical location.

Tributaries of the Jordan.—From the west (1) the Wâdy el-Bireh, rising about Tabor, a mountain torrent; (2) Nahr el-Jalûd, which rises near Jezreel (250 ft.), and passes down the valley of Esdraelon past Beisan to the Jordan. This is the valley by which the inland sea in the valley of Jordan would have been connected with the Mediterranean after the connexion by the Gulf of 'Aḳabah was cut off, supposing that the rise of the ground was uniform. (3) The Wâdy Fârah, which rises on the east of Ebal and Gerizim, flows in a beautiful perennial stream, fringed with oleanders, to the Jordan. The springs about the plain of Beisan and the Wâdy el-Mâleh—the wâdis Fuscil, el-'Aujeh, en-Nweimeh, and el-Kelt—run for a great part of the year.

On the east are (1) the Sheri'at el-Mandhôr, Jarmûk, or Hieromax, which flows into the Jordan past Gadara and the hot springs of Amatha, mentioned by Pliny, Strabo, Josephus, and the Talmud, but the name does not occur in the Bible. It is a large river, running through a deep gorge into the Jordan, and has its sources in the Haurân. (2) The Wâdy el-'Arab, a mountain torrent, the Nahr es-Zerḳa or Jabbok, which rises at 'Amman (Philadelphia), and falls into the Jordan near Jisr ed-Damieḥ. (3) The wâdis Nimrîn, Kafrein, and Hesbân, the last of which rises in the hills near Heshbon.

Communication.—Roads, bridges, and fords. There is an ancient road on the western bank of the Jordan which, apparently coming from Jerusalem, passes Neby Mûsa near the north-western end of the Salt Sea, passes 'Ain es-Sultân (Jericho) and Fûseil (Phasaelus), near which place one branch passes to the west up Wâdy Kerâd to Nablûs (Shechem), and the other skirts Ḳurn Surâbeh to the east, and at Tell el-'Abied again divides, one branch to the west going up Wâdy Fârah to Nablûs, the other passing along the Umm ed-Deraj, a steep and rocky ascent just above the Jordan, passes through Beisan, and, keeping near to the Jordan, skirts the L. Tiberias to the village Tabarîya (Tiberias). At Khan el-Kerak there is a ruin which was a fort protecting the lake district, at Jisr Mijâmia a branch of this road crosses the Jordan and goes through Gadara to the Haurân, and another branch to Irbed, and probably to Jerasa. This is a Roman road, and the old foundation stones and pavement are visible in many parts.

A good road from Akka passes down the Sahel el-Aḥma, and, emerging by the pass at its mouth on to the Jordan, crosses at the Jisr es-Sidd a little below L. Tiberias and passes east to the Haurân; it is used by the Bedawîn and Druses to bring barley to Akka by camel. A branch of this road also on crossing the Jordan to the east runs down along the foot of the hills bounding the Ghôr, and passing Fâhil (Pella) crosses the Zerḳa at a point where it is a foaming torrent, goes to Nimrîn, and thence by Kafrein to Hesbân.

The road along the coast of the lake from Tiberias also crosses the Jordan near Tarichæa, where there is a ruined bridge, and passes up the east side of the lake and also by a great Roman road to Hippos and the north-east. The Jisr Mijâmia is 6 miles south of L. Tiberias, the point where the old important Roman road from Nablûs and Beisan to Damascus crosses the Jordan: it has one large pointed arch and three small ones.

At Jisr Damieh, below the junction of the Jordan and Zerḳa, the road from Neapolis (Shechem) runs to es-Salṭ, Amman (Philadelphia), and the east. This bridge is still in a good state of preservation (one arch), but the Jordan has left it and now passes down another portion of the Zôr; here is a good illustration of the change in direction of the river in a few hundred years. This bridge is said by Conder to be Saracenic: it appears to have been originally of Roman work, with extensive repairs by Moslems or Crusaders. On the east side the bank is quite low, and the wide flat at that point is often overflowed; hence a causeway at great expense and labour has been made across the low ground. 450 ft. of this causeway on the eastern side still remains, supported on arches of which nine still exist. The bridge itself could not have been less than 100 ft. in length (PEFSt, 1879, 139).

No remains of bridges mark the old roads from Jerusalem and Jericho to the east of Jordan, but there are still the remains of the roads which now cross to Nimrîn by the el-Mandesi and Umm Enkhôla fords to Kafrein and Hesbân by the el-Ghôraniyeh ford, and to Hesbân and the east of Salt Sea by the Makhadet Hajlah ford. These are the principal fords in the southern 25 miles of the Jordan's course. In the 40 miles to the north there are enumerated no fewer than fifty fords: probably this difference is owing to the more stony character of the Jordan bottom in the northern portion. Molyneux says of the upper part of its course (p. 115): ‘I am within the mark when I say that there are many hundreds of places where we might have walked across without wetting our feet, on the large rocks and stones.’ This must have been during a very dry season.

CLIMATE: FAUNA AND FLORA.—For many years past, meteorological observations have been taken at various points in Palestine, and have been tabulated and commented on annually by Glaisher. There are three distinctive climates in Palestine: (1) that of the seashore, which corresponds to other Mediterranean climates in similar latitude; (2) that of the hill-country, which is more hot and oppressive than the hill-country in other parts of the Mediterranean, owing to the vicinity of the Arabian Desert on south and east; and (3) that of the valley of the Jordan and Salt Sea.

The climate of the hill-country, Jerusalem for example, is pleasant in the winter, but hot and trying for six months in the summer. During the heat of summer in a house in Jerusalem the temperature day after day will for two or three hours reach 104° F., and it sometimes does not go below 80° F. all night. The published returns, however, give much lower readings in the air, with a mean temperature for August of 75° F. In the Jordan Valley in summer-time the heat is intense, the temperature being 110° F. after sunset, and scarcely falling during the night when in the vicinity of rocks with a southern aspect. During the first two months of the year the temperature in the Jordan Valley is very pleasant, hot in the daytime and cool at night, often going down to 40° F. except close to the Salt Sea. Much depends, however, upon the direction of the wind. In the month of March there is often snow on the hills. The climate of the Jordan Valley is tropical; that of the region of the Salt Sea is equatorial, probably the most heated in the world, owing to the depressed character of the plain, hemmed in east and west by high mountains. There is a difference of elevation between the summit of Mount Hermon and the level of the Salt Sea of over 10,000 ft., and the difference of temperature and of climate allows of a great variety of animal life. That on the seashore generally is Mediterranean, while that in the Jordan Valley, especially in the lower parts, is principally Ethiopian or Indian, though these parts are cut off from each other by the deserts of Arabia.

The following observations concerning life in the Jordan Valley are extracted principally from SWP, Fauna and Flora (Tristram). Here is a patch of tropical character, containing southern forms so peculiar and unique that their presence cannot be connected with any existing causes or other transporting influences. As it has been found by Humboldt that zones of elevation on mountains correspond to parallels of latitude, so here we find a zone of depression, the only one known to us, producing similar phenomena, and exhibiting in generic correspondence the fauna and flora of much lower latitudes: an Ethiopian flora identical with that now existing in Ethiopian regions in the midst of a Mediterranean district.

Tristram considers that the whole of Syria and Arabia Petræa must have emerged from the Miocene ocean while the coast of the Mediterranean was the bed of a Miocene sea, and that during this period Palestine was connected with Ethiopia; that during the Miocene and Pliocene periods the Jordan basin formed the northernmost of a long system of fresh-water lakes, extending from north to south, of which, perhaps in the earlier part of the epoch, the Red Sea and Nile basin, Nyanza, Nyassa, and Tanganyika lakes were members.

During that warm period, fluviatile ichthyological fauna were developed suitable to its then conditions, consisting of representative and perhaps frequently identical species, throughout the area under consideration. The advent of the Glacial period was, like its close, gradual, and, while many species may have perished, the hardiest would have survived, and have gradually modified to meet the changed conditions. But however severe the climate may have been, that of the Lebanon with its glaciers probably corresponding to the Alps at a proportional elevation (due regard being had to latitude), the fissure of the Jordan lay, as we know, as much depressed as at present, and there must have been an exceptionally warm temperature in its waters in which the existing ichthyological fauna could survive.

According to Slater's definition of boundary lines laid before the Linnæan Society in 1858, Palestine forms an extreme southern province of the Palæarctic region. An analysis of each class of its fauna and of its phanerogamic flora shows that while an overwhelming majority of its species in all cases belong to the Palæarctic region, there is in each class a group of exceptions and peculiar forms which cannot be referred to that region, and the presence of many of which cannot be explained merely by the fact of the Palæarctic infringing on the Ethiopian region, and not very distantly on the Indian, but can be satisfactorily accounted for only by reference to the geological history of the country. These species are almost all strictly confined to the area of the Jordan Valley and Dead Sea basin.

Of the mammalia, 55 are Palæarctic, 34 Ethiopian, 16 Indian, and 13 peculiar out of 118. The Indian include 9 which are also Ethiopian, and the Ethiopian 9 which are equally Indian. Of the 13 peculiar forms, 3 are modifications of Palæarctic types and 6 are Ethiopian in their character. One species, Lepus judææ, the hare of the Dead Sea basin, differs from either the European or Syrian species in the form of its skull. The Hyrax syriacus belongs to a strictly Ethiopian genus, and no theory of immigration or dispersion can account for its presence. Fish of small size abound in the Jordan and its tributaries down to the entrance to the Salt Sea; they bear a strong affinity to many of the species of the Nile, though with far less admixture of species than is found in other rivers of the Eastern Mediterranean. Out of 35 species, 2 are Nilotic, 1 Mediterranean, 7 common to the Tigris and Euphrates, 10 common to Syria and the Damascus lakes, and 16 peculiar to the Jordan. There is a great affinity between these fish and those of the rivers and lakes of tropical Africa. These fishes probably date from the earliest times after the elevation of the country above the Eocene ocean, and they form a group more distinct and divergent from that of the surrounding region than can be found in any other class of existing life. The affinity is very close to the forms of the rivers and fresh-water lakes of east Africa, even as far south as the Zambesi; but while the genera are the same, the species are rather representative than identical. The solution lies in the theory of the Jordan basin having been one of a system of fresh-water lakes, extending from north to south as already proposed. There are no fish in the Salt Sea.

The Avifauna of Palestine, out of 348 known species, present 271 Palæarctic, 40 Ethiopian (10 of these also Indian), 7 Indian, and 30 peculiar to Syria. But they are not equally diffused over the whole area. The Palæarctic species almost all belong to the coast area, and the highlands east and west of Jordan, while the Ethiopian and Indian types are almost exclusively confined to the deep depression of the Jordan and Dead Sea basin, which, with the exception of some winter migrants, affords us very few Palæarctic species. There are 11 species belonging to as many different genera peculiar to the Jordan and Dead Sea basin, and not yet traced beyond its limits. Some of these belong to genera exclusively Ethiopian, most of them common to the Ethiopian and Indian regions. The avifauna of the Jordan and Dead Sea basin is decidedly distinct and typical in its species, revealing sometimes Indian, more generally African affinities.

Of the 3000 species of phanerogamic plants, the larger proportion consists of the common Mediterranean forms. Sir J. Hooker has remarked that though a vast number are common to the whole country, yet there is a great and decided difference between the floras of such localities as the tops of (1) Lebanon, (2) Carmel, and (3) the hills bordering the Jordan. Of 162 species of plants in Wâdy Zuweireh (S.W. corner of Dead Sea), 27 are common European forms extending to Northern India, the remaining 135 are African. Although the Dead Sea flora bears a very strong general similarity to that of Arabia Petræa, yet there can be no question of its distinctness from the adjacent floras of the same latitudes east and west of it.

In the Jordan Valley the Cyperus papyrus is locally abundant, and covers many acres in the marshes of Hûleh, though long since extinct in Egypt, and not known in Africa farther north than on the White Nile, lat. 7° N. Calotropis procera and Salvadora persica are never found except close to the Dead Sea, at En-gedi, Safieh, and Seisaban, and are separated by many degrees of longitude and latitude from their other known habitats.

The flora of the Salt Sea area is remarkable for a small average number of species distributed through a large number of orders. We may infer that in this borderland of Europe, Asia, and Africa, the more hardy and accommodating plants of each area hold their own, while those more readily affected by variation of soil or climate disappear.

The following plants and trees of the Jordan Valley are most common: the Zyzyphus Spina Christi, or nubk or dôm tree of the Arabs (which seems to correspond to the 'wait a bit' bushes of South Africa in its power of detaining the unwary traveller). It has a small sub-acid fruit like a thorn apple, very agreeable to the taste. The Retm or Genista Rœtem, broom plant, grows freely on the plain. There is also the Balanites Ægyptiaca, a thorny tree with large olive-like fruit, which affords the oil called zukkûm or Zuk by the Arabs, supposed to be balm of Gilead, and sold to the pilgrims as such. It is highly prized among Arabs and pilgrims as a remedy for wounds or bruises; the latter call it 'Zaccheus oil' (BRP^{2} i. 560). The castor-oil plant and the oleander flourish about Jericho. Tamarisks grow everywhere, on the banks of the streams and in the dry desert; and the Agnus Casti, a large flowering bamboo. The acacia tree grows in great variety, also the Populus Euphratica on the banks of the Jordan. The caper plant hangs down from the rocks, with its delicate white blossoms, and the Solanum Sodomœum or Dead Sea apple, with its bright yellow fruit, is very conspicuous. Numbers of thoroughly tropical plants and trees abound—the Zygophyllum coccineum, Bœrhavia, Indigofira; also on the shore of the Salt Sea the Calotropis procera ('ösher among Arabs), a beautiful green fruit the size of a peach, with nothing inside but the silky coma of the seeds; it reaches a height of 15 ft., and grows freely in Upper Egypt, Nubia, and Arabia Felix.

The principal larger wild animals of the Jordan Valley are the jackal, fox, hyæna, boar, ibex (beden), and leopard. The leopard (nimr, felis pardus) is found in the Jordan jungle; the writer sent one to England from the banks of the Jordan in 1867. The cheetah (felis jubata) is found among the hills, and is tamed by the Moslems of Syria and used in hunting gazelles. Lions are said not to exist in Palestine, though they are found not far to the east in the desert and in the jungle of the Euphrates. They are still, however, supposed by the inhabitants of the Anti-Lebanon to pay visits periodically to the neighbourhood; and in 1869, owing to the loss of four children, one by one, at the village of Burkush, search was made for the supposed lion by the inhabitants without avail (PEFSt, 1870, 226). The lion coming up from the thickets of the Jordan is spoken of in Jer 49^{19} 50^{44}.

The birds in the Jordan Valley vary very much according to the time of year, those of the hill-country being driven down there for a short time in the cold season. During a winter visit of Chichester Hart (PEFSt, 1879, 286), the following were seen at Jericho: a few sun birds, 'hopping thrush,' shrikes, palm dove, collared turtle, English robins, jays, chaffinches, wheatears, blackbirds, wagtails. The larger birds, such as eagles, vultures, bustards, flamingoes, water birds of various kinds, belong to Palestine or to a larger area, and not particularly to the Jordan Valley.

A review of the botany as well as the zoology of the Jordan basin reveals the interesting fact that in this isolated spot, comprising but a few square miles, a series of forms of life are found differing decidedly from the species of the surrounding region, to which they never extend, and bearing a strong affinity to the Ethiopian region, with a trace of Indian admixture.

Cultivation.—The plains about Lake Hûleh are highly cultivated, and yield heavy crops of wheat, barley, Indian corn, sesame, and even rice. The plains about L. Tiberias wave with corn, and the plains of Beisan and valley of Jezreel are very productive, and stand thick with corn or indigo. Stunted palms grow wild, but no large ones now exist, except the single large date palm at Jericho. There are many cucumber and vegetable-marrow gardens at the foot of the hills, irrigated by fountains. In the Zôr, barley and simsim flourish. The olive, figs, bananas, oranges, sugar-cane, tobacco, grapes, millet (dhurah), cotton, indigo, melons, cucumbers, and marrows are cultivated at Jericho, and the soil for miles around if supplied with water is yet, as of old, capable of the highest cultivation: all that is wanted is irrigation and weeding. The harvest in the Jordan Valley is fully a month in advance of that in the highlands.

JORDAN AS A BOUNDARY. — Stanley remarks (Sin. and Pal. 286): 'The tropical temperature to which its whole plain is thus exposed, whilst calling out into almost unnatural vigour whatever vegetation receives the life-giving touch of its waters, withers up every particle of verdure that is found beyond their reach. As a separation of Israel from the surrounding country, as a boundary between the two main divisions of the tribes, as an image of water in a dry and thirsty soil, it played an important part; but not as the scene of great events or the seat of great cities. Its contact with the history of the people is exceptional, not ordinary, confined to rare and remote occasions, the more remarkable from their very rarity.' This is the general view taken at the present day, with Palestine under a feeble government and an enervated race inhabiting the Jordan Valley. The valley was, however, once 'well watered everywhere as the garden of the LORD, and like the land of Egypt,' and this may very well occur again under a stable government and a more energetic race of people. The levels about Jericho and Kafrein are about 200 ft. below that of Lake Tiberias, so that the whole of the Jordan Valley might be irrigated by the Jordan waters if the matter were taken in hand as a Syrian national enterprise.

The terms 'this side Jordan,' or 'the other side Jordan,' are of constant occurrence in the early history, denoting that the Jordan was regarded as a physical feature of demarcation or boundary. The original boundary of the Promised Land was to reach 'unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward. And the boundary shall go down to Jordan, and the extremity shall be at the Salt Sea' (Nu 34^{12}). But the tribes of Reuben and Gad and half Manasseh saw that the eastern side of the Jordan, as now, was good for cattle, and they acquired their inheritance there (Nu 32^{19}), outside the Promised Land, on condition of going armed over Jordan and fully assisting the people of Israel to conquer the land. On the completion of this work they were permitted to return to the eastern side with a blessing, after building an altar by Jordan, 'a great altar to see,' that might be a witness between them that they were one people, and that the tribes living west of Jordan should not in the future say to those on the east, 'What have ye to do with the Lord God of Israel? for the Lord hath made Jordan a boundary between us and you, ye children of Reuben and children of Gad' (Jos $22^{10f.}$). See ED.

THE CITIES OF THE PLAIN.—The earliest account of the Jordan Valley describes it as very different in appearance from its aspect at the present time. From the high ground near Bethel, 'Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain (ciccār) of Jordan, that it was well watered everywhere, before the LORD destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the LORD, like the land of Egypt, as thou comest into Zoar. So Lot chose him all the Plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east' (Gn $13^{10f.}$). This would indicate a position for the cities of the Plain at the northern end of the Salt Sea, as proposed by Sir George Grove. The Arab geographers, however, place these cities at the southern end of the Salt Sea; and recently M. Clermont-Ganneau (PEFSt, 1886) has taken the same view, giving identifications for the several cities (see SODOM). On the other hand, Strabo (Judæa) in relating that Judæa is full of fire, places these cities on the western side of the Salt Sea within a radius of 60 stadia, close to Masada, and refers to the rocks there bearing the marks of fire, with a soil like ashes, pitch falling in drops from the rocks, rivers boiling up and emitting a fetid odour to a great distance; dwellings in every direction overthrown,—a description very suitable to this spot at the present day, where there are hot sulphur springs and every appearance of volcanic energy near at hand. Strabo describes the overthrow of the cities as due to shocks of earthquake, eruptions of flames, and hot springs, containing asphaltus and sulphur, causing the lake to break its bounds and the rocks to take fire. Josephus states that the country of Sodom bordered upon the Lake Asphaltitis (Salt Sea), and that the cities were burnt by lightning, in consequence of which there are still the remainders of that divine fire, and that the traces of the five cities are still to be seen (BJ IV. viii. 4; V. xiii. 6; Tac. Hist. v. 6; Diod. ii. 48, xix. 98; Curt. v. 16). He would appear (BJ IV. viii. 2) to place Sodom at the western side of the Arabah, near 'the utmost limits of the Asphaltitis southward,' and to place Somorrhon (Gomorrah?) on the eastern side, on the bounds of Petra in Arabia. Sir W. Dawson (Egypt and Syria) supposes that the overthrow of these cities may have been due to underground reservoirs of inflammable gases, and petroleum escaping through a fissure along an old line of 'fault,' causing bitumen and sulphur to rain upon the cities. There is no indication that the overthrow of these cities was accompanied by any earthquake or displacement of the level of the Salt Sea (Gn $14^{3.8.10}$), though the passage 'in the vale of Siddim, which is the Salt Sea,' would appear ambiguous. The reference to the whole land which 'is brimstone, and salt, and burning, that it is not sown, nor beareth, nor any grass groweth therein, like the overthrow of Sodom' (Dt 29^{23}), etc., would appear to apply more to the southern end of the Salt Sea than the generally accepted site on the northern end. Assuming, however, that there was no disturbance affecting the level of the Salt Sea, it may be questioned whether the physical effect of the substitution of arid plains in lieu of the well-watered district which existed previously may not have seriously affected the fertility of the Jordan Valley. It is known that the level of the Salt Sea varies yearly many feet, according to the rainfall in the adjacent district, as is attested by the lines of driftwood which can be seen at successive levels around the Salt Sea. A change from moisture to dryness over a large area in the valley would essentially affect the surrounding country, and reduce the rainfall, lower the surface of the sea, and expose more and more dry soil. Now, supposing the effects of the overthrow of the cities of the Plain resulted in a fall of 50 ft. in the level of the waters of the lake, it is interesting to remark that the whole of the mud flat at the south of the Salt Sea for about 10 miles (Anderson, Official Report, p. 182) would have been covered with water, also a considerable portion of the peninsula of Lisan and the low-lying portions of the shore on the western side, while to the north the Zôr would have been covered over nearly as far as the Makhadet Hajlah. If this is so, the area over which the cities of the Plain can be found is very much circumscribed (Anderson, Official Report, p. 182). Assuming that the cities of the Plain were situated at the N.E. end of the Salt Sea, it is suggested (PEFSt, 1879, 144) that the following tells on the Abel-shittim plain were the five cities of the Plain: (1) Tell Kafrein (Abel or Abila), (2) Tell er-Rama (Beth-ramtha or Beth-haran, Julias or Livias), (3) Suweimeh (Beth-jesimoth or Besimoth), (4) Tell el-Hamman, (5) Tell Ektanu ('the little one,' or Zoar). Ganneau (PEFSt, 1886), however, identifies Jebel Usdum as Sodom, and Gomorrah with 'Ain Ghamr, at the entrance of Wâdy Ghamr, about 20 leagues south of the Salt Sea, and Zoar in Wâdy es-Safi. This would appear closely to agree with the traditional sites given by Josephus, already mentioned.

PASSAGES OF THE JORDAN.—It was at the northern extremity of the Jordan that Abram (Gn $14^{13f.}$), in his pursuit of Chedorlaomer, came up with him at Laish (Dan), and rescued his kinsman Lot.

The first record of a passage of the Jordan is that by Jacob (Gn 32^{10}). On the return journey (Gn 33^{17}) he crosses on his road from Succoth to Shalem (RVm; but there can be little doubt that RV 'in peace' is the correct translation), a city of Shechem; but as Succoth has not been satisfactorily identified, the ford of passage cannot be conjectured. The passage of Elijah (2 K 2^{8}) and the return of Elisha (2^{14}) over the Jordan took place over against Jericho; but there is nothing further to indicate the position, though there is a traditional spot on the east of Jordan from which the ascent of Elijah is said to have been made. The point of the Jordan where David crossed when warring against Helam (2 S 10^{17}) also cannot be conjectured. Again, when a fugitive to Mahanaim (2 S 15^{28} 17^{16} 19^{18}), he probably escaped by the quickest route over the Jordan; but this depended upon the road he took from Jerusalem, and whether he wished to avoid Jericho. The two fords which would be most suitable would be that of el-Ghôranîyeh, which would necessitate his passing by Jericho, and the Makhadet Hajlah ford, which he could have reached by the road passing the present M. Neby Mûsa.

The number of fords between Jisr Damieh and Lake Tiberias exceeds 50, and it would be futile to suggest any particular one which may have been used in that portion of the Jordan, in the passings over between the east and west. There was the ford or passage of the Jordan (Jg $12^{5f.}$), taken by the Gileadites, when the Ephraimites were discovered by the pronunciation of the word 'Shibboleth.' There was Beth-barah ('even Jordan,' RV), which the Ephraimites (Jg 7^{24}) took possession of when they slew the Midianites, and which may be the ford 'Abarah discovered by Conder (SWP ii. 89). The occurrence probably took place near this ford, as 'Ain el-Helwah (Abel-meholah) is on the southern end of the plain of Beisan (Bethshean).

Passage of the children of Israel over Jordan.—This is the most important event recorded in the Bible connected with the passage of the Jordan. The people were gathered together in the plains ('ărābōth) of Moab, extending from Abel-shittim ('the meadow of the acacia'), now probably Kafrein, to Beth-jesimoth ('house of the wastes'), now probably 'Ain Suweimeh near the Salt Sea (Nu 33^{49}). And they came to Jordan and lodged there for three days. The plains of Moab, where they had been staying, were from 200 to 400 ft. above the Salt Sea, and the ground which they had occupied for the last three days was probably somewhat on a lower level, but certainly not the Zôr or lower terrace of the Jordan as it was in flood, 'overflowing all his banks at the time of the barley harvest' (Jos $3^{1f.}$), probably about the month of April. The description states that the waters which came down from above stood and rose up upon a heap very far from the city of Adam, that is, beside Zaretan; and those that came down toward the sea of the Arabah, even the Salt Sea, were wholly cut off (Jos 3^{16}). The RV has 'at Adam,' and Stanley (304 note) has 'high up the river, very far, in Adam, the city which is beside Zaretan.' The site of Adam is not sufficiently identified, but it is supposed by some to be represented by Tell Damieh, near the bridge of that name. Conder has pointed out (SWP ii. 14) that somewhat higher up, where the mountains come down and overhang the Jordan, a landslip could readily block up the Jordan for a period, and T. Drake (PEFSt, 1874, 182; 1875, 30) suggests that Adam ('red earth') may be Khan el-Hamrath, the Red Ruin, situated opposite Fâhil (Pella), on the west side of the Jordan in the plain of Beisan, and that adherents of the theory that the waters of the Jordan were suddenly dammed by a landslip might perhaps point to the present appearance of the banks at this point and the curious bends of the river here to support their idea. M. Clermont-Ganneau has brought to notice that the historical stoppage of the Jordan in A.D. 1257, while the bridge Jisr Damieh was being repaired, is to be found in the history of Sultan Bibars. A landslip in the narrow part of the valley, some miles above Jisr Damieh, kept the Jordan dammed up for several hours, allowing the bed of the river to become dry by the water below running off to the Salt Sea. Stanley (Sin. and Pal. 304 n. 6) mentions that the appearance of the drying up of the Jordan seems to be described by Antoninus Martyr in the 6th cent., as if it occurred yearly at the visit of the pilgrims. See also King, Morsels of Criticism, i. 281.

THE MOUNDS IN THE JORDAN VALLEY.—All over the Jordan Valley mounds or 'Tells' are found, of artificial formation, from 50 to 100 ft. in height. They stand at the entrance to every wâdy where there is a passage for traffic, and appear in these cases to have been placed there to guard the dwellers in the plain from marauders from the hill-country. They appear usually to be formed of remains of sun-dried bricks, probably in some cases the ruins of ancient walls and castles, and in other cases the sites where the bricks were moulded and dried. Near Beisan alone there are 20 of these tells, apparently of the same character as those at Jericho. They usually occur in the vicinity of water.

The mounds of Jericho were examined by the present writer in Feb. 1868. Nine mounds were cut through—two at Wâdy Kelt, three at 'Ain es-Sultân, and four within a short distance of the spring head. The trenches were cut across from east to west to get shelter from the sun as much as possible. During the daytime the sun was scorching, at night it was bitterly cold. After the trenches were cut 8 ft. deep, the work was continued by shafts 8 ft. square at intervals of 4 to 6 ft., as the clay composing the mounds would not stand the cutting of one deep trench. Very little was found except pottery jars, and stone mortars for grinding corn. The general result was that the mounds were artificial, of sunburnt brick in a very friable condition, abounding in fragments of pottery. A few solid-looking jars were found (now in the PEF Museum). The pottery in the upper portion of these mounds was Roman and later (SWP iii. 225).

SCENE OF OUR LORD'S BAPTISM.—When John the Baptist was preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, 'Then went out to him Jerusalem and all Judæa, and all the region round about Jordan, and were baptized of him in the river Jordan. Then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John to be baptized of him.' 'These things were done in Bethabara (RV Bethany, in some MSS Betharabah *), beyond Jordan, where John was baptizing' (Jn 1^{28}). 'Then was Jesus led up of the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil' (Mt 4^{1}). 'And straightway the Spirit driveth him forth into the wilderness' (Mk 1^{12}).

There is not sufficient information here to fix the position on the Jordan of the scene of the baptism, but it leads to the inference that it was on the east side of the Jordan opposite to the desert of Judæa, and not so far north as Samaria. This place, Bethabara [which see] (or Bethany), beyond Jordan, was again visited by our Lord, and He abode there (Jn 10^{40}). The word 'ăbārāh occurs in the OT in connexion with the Jordan. In 2 S 19^{18} EV tr. it 'ferry-boat' (Gesenius 'a ferry-boat' or 'raft'); 2 S 15^{28} 17^{16} AV reading (ערבת) 'in the plains,' RV reading (עברת) 'at the fords,' Ewald, Gesenius, Grätz, 'at the fords'; Jg 7^{24} Beth-barah, 'house of passage,' (?) Gesenius. There are also three cases in which the word ma'bārāh ('a ford'; Gesenius, from the root 'ābar, 'to pass over') is tr^{d} 'the fords' (of the Jordan), Jg 3^{28} 12^{5}, Jos 2^{7}. The inference is that Beth-abarah is the resting-place on the other side.

Stanley (Sin. and Pal. p. 311) gives 'the house of a ship' (אֳנִיָּה) as the meaning of Bethania (Bethany); the meaning given by Simonis is preferred by many, viz. בֵּ' עֲנִיָּה, locus depressionis, which seems to agree exactly with the conditions, a depressed plain beyond the fords of Jordan. The other word is Beth-arabah (the name of a town west of Jordan, Jos 15^{6} etc.). The Arabah, however, is the term used for the desert plain of the Jordan, extending from near Jericho to the Gulf of 'Aḳabah (Gesen.) and Arabah=desert. Conder proposes (PEFSt, 1876-77) to identify Bethania (Bethany) with Batanea or Bashan, and the ford of the Jordan east of Beisan called 'Abâra with Bethabara, or at least with the place of baptism, and points out that among the fifty fords of the Jordan this is the only one retaining the ancient name.

This ford of 'Abara is north of the Samaritan border, about 16 miles south of Lake Tiberias and a day's journey from Nazareth, and 22 miles from Kefr Kena (Cana). It does not, however, fulfil the conditions of being near to the wilderness of Judæa, and so placed as to be accessible to the multitudes from Jerusalem and the parts about Judæa.

The line of route taken by king David in his passage from Jerusalem across Jordan to Mahanaim and back does not give much assistance, but is certainly against the 'Arabah ford site. It appears probable, however, that he would pass over Jordan, when in flight, by the very nearest ford, viz. that over against Jericho, either the Makhadet Hajlah or the Ghôranîyeh; in coming back he may have used any crossing most convenient, and thus have had recourse to the ferry-boat. There appears therefore to be nothing against the traditional site of our Lord's place of baptism being placed on the Jordan near Kasr el-Jehûd, and not far from the 'Ain el-Kharrar on the eastern side of the Jordan, as has been current since 4th cent. Beth-nimrah ('house of the panther'?), Nu 32^{36}, identified as Nimrîn, lies about 8 miles to the east of the Ghôranîyeh ford, and is supposed by some to be the site of Bethabara: in the LXX (B) it takes the form Βαιθαναβρά, and Eusebius calls it Βηθναμβρις; he also speaks of a town called Nabara (or Abara) as identical with Nimrah near Heshbon. Epiphanius reads Bethamara for Bethabara (Rel. Pal. p. 627). The Bordeaux Pilgrim (A.D. 333) places it east of Jordan, 5 miles north of the Salt Sea, close to the hill where Elijah was caught up to heaven (Itin. Hieros.). Jerome (Per. S. Paulæ) identifies the place of baptism with the spot where the priests that bare the ark of the covenant of the Lord stood firm on dry ground in the midst of Jordan (Jos 3^{17}), and also the spot where Elijah and afterwards Elisha smote the waters and passed over dry-shod. The following also speak of the place of baptism at this spot: Theodosius, Antoninus, and Arculf.

* Βηθανια ℵ* ABC*EF al^{pl} latt syrr$^{pesh\ hcl\ txt\ hier}$ arm me codd$^{pl.}$ ap Orig: Βηθαβαρα C^{2}KT^{b} (V) (Λ) Π^{corr} syrr$^{sin\ cu}$ 1, 22. 33 (69), al^{nonn}: Βηθαραβα ℵ$^{c.\ b}$ syr^{hclmg}.

In later years the knights of St. John built a monastery here in order to enable them to carry out one of their threefold duties, viz. escorting pilgrims down from Jerusalem to Jordan. This duty is still carried out once a year by the Turkish governor of Jerusalem, who, on Monday in Passion week, escorts thousands of pilgrims to the Jordan to bathe.

ANCIENT WRITERS ON THE JORDAN VALLEY.—The Antiquities and Wars of Josephus are full of references to this valley. (Ant. I. x. 1 and I. xi. 1) The spring of Jordan called Dan is spoken of, and the destruction of the cities of the Plain. (Ant. IV. viii. 1) Moses gathered the congregation together near Jordan where the city Abila now stands, a place full of palm trees. (Ant. V. i. 1) Abila to Jordan 60 furlongs. (Ant. V. i. 2) Joshua was in fear about their passing over, for the Jordan ran with a strong current, and could not be passed over by bridges, as there never had been any bridges laid over it hitherto, and ferry-boats they had none. (V. iv. 3) The Israelites seize the ford of the Jordan (Jg 3^{28}). (VII. xi. 2) A bridge of boats laid over Jordan to enable king David to return from Mahanaim to Jerusalem. (IX. ii. 2) Elijah disappeared from among men, and no one knows of his death to this very day. (Ant. XV. x. 3, V. v. 1, III. x. 7; BJ IV. i. 1, I. xxi. 3) The Jordan's sources at Dan and Panium described. The lake Semechonitis (Hûleh) is 30 furlongs in breadth and 60 in length; its marshes reach as far as the plain Daphne, under the temple of the golden calf at the lesser Jordan. Jordan's stream from Panium divides the marshes and fens of the lake Semechonitis; when it has run another 120 furlongs it first passes the city Julias, and then passes through the middle of the Lake Gennesaret, after which it runs a long way over a desert, and then makes its exit into the lake Asphaltitis. Around Gennesaret the soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees are grown upon it, particularly walnuts; also palm trees, fig trees, and olives; it supplies men with figs and grapes 10 months in the year. Some have thought it to be a vein of the Nile, because it produces the coracine fish as well as that lake does which is near Alexandria. (BJ IV. viii. 2. 3. 4, V. xiii. 6) The Jordan and Jericho are described. Jericho is situated on a plain, with naked and barren mountains overhanging it; these mountains extend from Scythopolis in the north to Sodom in the south at the utmost limits of the Salt Sea. Somorrhon is also spoken of, the Great Plain, the Salt Sea, and the plantations of palm trees near the Jordan. He speaks of the fountain of Jericho being healed by Elisha; and also of the excellent gardens of Jericho, 70 furlongs long and 20 broad, abounding in palm trees, yielding honey and bees, the balsamum, that most precious of all fruits, the cypress tree, and myrobalanum. He states that it is not easy to light on any country in the world equal to it. The lake Asphaltitis is also described. (BJ IV. viii. 4) He describes the aqueduct from Nerea to water the palm trees of Jericho.

Strabo (XVI. ii. 16, c. A.D. 19) gives a short account of the Jordan and Jericho. Cœle-Syria, a hollow plain between the mountains of Libanus and Antilibanus. Rivers run through it, the largest of which is the Jordan, which waters a country productive and fertile of all things. It contains also a lake, which produces the aromatic rush and reed. In it are also marshes. The name of the lake is Gennesaritis. It produces also balsamum. The Lycus and the Jordan are navigated upwards chiefly by the Aradii, with vessels of burden. At Jericho is the palm plantation, which contains various other trees of the cultivated kind producing excellent fruit, but its chief production is the palm tree; it is 100 stadia in length; the whole is watered with streams, and filled with dwellings. Here also is a palace and the garden of the balsamum. Strabo has not only given a confused account of the Jordan, but he has mixed up together the account of the Salt Sea with that of the Lacus Serbonis, and he places Tarichæa on the Salt Sea instead of on L. Tiberias.

Tacitus (Hist. v. 6, A.D. 97) sums up the Jordan in a few words: 'Nec Jordanes pelago accipitur: secundum atque alterum lacum integer perfluit: tertio retinetur.'

Galen (A.D. 164) and Pausanias (V. vii. 4, A.D. 174) speak of the disappearance of the Jordan in the bitter lake.

Pliny (Hist. Nat. v. 15, A.D. 74) speaks of the rise of Jordan at Panium fountain, 'qui nomen dedit Cæsareæ.'

Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s.v. 'Dan') describe Dan as being 4 R. miles distant from Paneas on the way to Tyre; and here, too, they say the Jordan breaks forth.

The Targum of Jerusalem writes, 'Dan of Cæsarea' (Targ. Hieros., Gn 14^{14}).

The name of the Salt Sea adopted by Josephus (Ant. I. ix.), viz. Asphaltitis Lacus, is first found in Diodorus Siculus (ii. 48, B.C. 45). He gives an account of the neighbourhood: 'It is, however, well fitted for the cultivation of palms wherever it is traversed by serviceable rivers or fountains available for the purpose of irrigation. In a neighbouring valley grows the plant called balsam, which yields an abundant income, as the plant grows in no other part of the world. It is much used by physicians as a medicine.'

Justin (XXXVI. iii. 6) and Pausanias (V. vii. 4) call it θάλασσα ἡ νεκρά, 'the Dead Sea.'

'As the Jordan in the time of harvest' (Sir 24^{26}; Aristeas, Epist. ad Philocratem).

Josephus, BJ IV. vii. 6, speaks of Ἄβιλα, Ἰουλιάς (Julias), Βησιμώ, near the lake Asphaltitis.

In the LXX (B) of Jos 13^{27} the name Beth-nimrah is given as Βαιθαναβρά, and the LXX (A) of Jos 13^{20} gives Βηδιμούθ for Beth-jesimoth.

JOSEPH (יוֹסֵף, in Ps 81^{6} יְהוֹסֵף 'May [God] add'; cf. Gn 30^{24}).*—The second youngest son of the patriarch Jacob, Rachel's firstborn, and ancestor of the two northern tribes Manasseh and Ephraim.

Sources.—The history of Joseph is contained in Gn 30^{23} (E), ^{24} (J); and in Gn 37. 39–50. In these chapters the body of the narrative is derived from J and E, the parts which belong to P being only 37^{1-2a} 41^{46} 46^{6-27} $47^{5-6a.\,7-11.\,27b-28}$ 48^{3-6} $49^{1a.\,28b-33}$ 50^{12-13}.

The structure of JE, in the parts where the distinction of sources is most important, will appear most clearly from the following table:—

J	37^{21}		25-27		28b *		31-35		39 †
E		37^{22-25} (to bread)		28a (to pit)		28c-30		36

J		42^{38}–44^{34} ¶		46^{28}–$47^{4.\,6b}$ ††
E	40 ‡ $41^{1-45.}$ § 47-57 42^{1-37} ‖		45^{1}–46^{5} **

J		$47^{13.\,27a}$ (to Goshen) 29-31.

For the grounds of this analysis, reference must be made to the Comms., or, more briefly, to LOT p. 16 f. (^{6}17 ff.). The history of Joseph must have been told at length in J and E alike, in substantially the same form in both, but with occasional variations in details; and the method mostly followed by the compiler, esp. in chs. 39–47, has been to excerpt long passages from J and E alternately, and at the same time to incorporate in each short notices embodying the characteristic differences of the other. It may assist the reader to place here a synopsis of the principal differences between the two narratives. According to J, Joseph, when his brethren plot to kill him, is rescued by Judah, and then sold by his brethren to Ishmaelites, who in their turn sell him to an Egyptian of position, whose name is not given: after the charge brought against him by his master's wife, he is thrown into the state-prison; and the keeper of this makes him overseer of the other prisoners. In the sequel, the brethren only tell Joseph about their younger brother in answer to his inquiry (43^{7} 44^{19}); nothing is said about Simeon being detained as a hostage in Egypt; the brethren open their sacks and discover the money in them, at the lodging-place by the way; Judah offers to be surety to his father for Benjamin's return; and Goshen is named as the district allotted to Jacob and his sons. According to E, Joseph is rescued from his other brethren by Reuben, and thrown into a pit, from which he is drawn up by Midianites without his brothers' knowledge: he is sold by them to Potiphar, captain of the guard, who appoints him to wait on the prisoners confined in his house: the brethren, when taxed with being spies, volunteer the information about their younger brother ($42^{13.\,32}$); Simeon is left in Egypt as a hostage; the brethren open their sacks at the end of their journey home; Reuben offers to be surety for Benjamin's return; and there is no mention of Goshen.* Thus, while both versions bring Joseph into relation with a prison, he is a prisoner himself only in J; in E he is merely appointed to wait on the prisoners: further, while in J the keeper of the prison (who is distinct from Joseph's master, $39^{20.\,21}$) commits the other prisoners into his charge, in E his own master, the 'captain of the guard' (37^{36} $40^{3a.\,4}$), appoints him to wait upon the prisoners. In the existing (composite) narrative the two versions are harmonized (though imperfectly) by Potiphar being represented as both Joseph's master and also 'captain of the guard.'

After the account of his birth ($30^{23f.}$), the next notice of Joseph's life which occurs is when he has grown into a lad, and (according to P) is 17 years old (37^{2a}). His father's favourite,† he excites the envy of his elder brothers, which is increased by his imprudence in communicating to them the dreams,—both too manifestly suggestive of future greatness (37^{3-11}),—of his brethren's sheaves bowing down to his, and of the sun, moon, and eleven stars making obeisance to him. Shortly afterwards, his brethren are keeping their father's flocks at Shechem; and Joseph is sent by his father from the broad 'vale,' in which Hebron lay (37^{14}; cf. 35^{27}), to inquire after their welfare. He finds them at Dothan (2 K 6^{13}), now Tell Dothan, about 15 miles N. of Shechem, where the pasturage is still even richer than it is at Shechem (Robinson, BR iii. 122). As they see him approaching in the distance, they plan to kill him, and so to frustrate for ever the, to them, unwelcome future portended by his dreams. At this point ($37^{21ff.}$) the composition of the narrative becomes apparent, and there are two divergent accounts of the manner in which Joseph was rescued from their hands, and came to be sold into Egypt.‡ According to J, Judah dissuades his other brethren from carrying out their purpose, and induces them to sell Joseph to a caravan of Ishmaelites, who happened at the time to be passing by, on their way from Gilead to Egypt; § and the Ishmaelites, upon their arrival in Egypt, sell him

* This last distinction agrees with that which appears in Exodus, where similarly it is only J who describes the Israelites as living apart in Goshen (8^{22} 9^{26}).

† The כְּתֹנֶת פַּסִּים (also 2 S $13^{18f.}$, as worn by princesses), the 'coat of many colours' of AV (so LXX ποικίλος, Vulg. polymita), was more probably (Pesh. Aq. Symm.; also LXX Vulg. in 2 S [χιτὼν καρπωτός; tunica talaris]) a tunic having sleeves for the arms, and reaching to the feet (cf. RVm), lit. (if the Aram. sense of פס may be adopted, for the word does not occur otherwise in the Heb. of the OT) a tunic of palms (of the hands) and soles (of the feet),—the tunic ordinarily worn having no sleeves, and reaching only to the knees.

‡ See, above, the parts which belong to the two narratives.

§ Dothan, it is to be observed, lies upon the caravan-route leading from Beth-shean and Jezreel to Ramleh and Egypt (Rob. l.c.); it was thus a natural spot for the Ishmaelite dealers, travelling from Gilead, to pass.

as a slave to an Egyptian of rank. According to E, Reuben,[*] Joseph's eldest brother, dissuades the others from carrying out their plan; at his suggestion they cast Joseph into a pit, and Midianite merchantmen, passing by,[†] draw him up out of the pit, without his brothers' knowledge, and sell him into Egypt to Potiphar, the 'captain of the guard.'[‡] Reuben upon returning, after the meal (v.^{25a}), to the pit, in the hope, no doubt, of being able now to send Joseph home secretly, is disconsolate to find it empty. His father's grief, upon receiving the blood-stained coat, which his brethren bring to him, as evidence of Joseph's death, is graphically portrayed (vv.$^{32-35}$ J).

How Joseph meanwhile fared in Egypt is recounted by J in ch. 39, and by E in ch. 40 (in each case, with the exceptions noted above). The Egyptian, to whom the Ishmaelites sold him,[§] finding him to be quick and trustworthy, appoints him 'over his house,'—i.e. makes him superintendent of his establishment, or his major domo,—and intrusts to him the whole of his domestic arrangements, so that 'with him—i.e. beside him—he knew not ought, save the bread that he did eat,' which, on account of religious scruples, would not in Egypt be naturally intrusted to the care of a foreigner (cf. 43^{32b}). Under Joseph's administration, everything prospered in his master's house; and the blessing of heaven rested visibly upon it (39^{1-6}). But Joseph was 'comely and well-favoured,' and attracted the notice of his master's wife: she makes advances to him, which he rejects, saying nobly that he will neither betray the trust which his master reposes in him, nor sin against God. The advances are repeated, but still meet with no response. In the end, enraged at what she considers as a slight received at Joseph's hands, she brings a false accusation against him before her husband; and he is cast into the state-prison.[‖] There, however, J″ is still with him: he wins the favour of the keeper of the prison, who finds he can place in him implicit confidence, and even commits the other prisoners to his charge (39^{7-23}).

Shortly afterwards (ch. 40 E), two of the Pharaoh's officers, the chief of his cupbearers, or butlers, and the chief of his bakers, offended the king, and they were placed in custody[¶] in the house of the 'captain of the guard,'—i.e. Potiphar, who, according to 37^{36} (also E), had bought Joseph of the Midianites. Joseph is appointed to wait upon them (40^4);[] and, coming in to them one morning, he hears from them about their two dreams. Unable to interpret them themselves, they recount them to him; and he interprets them correctly. Three days after, on the Pharaoh's birthday, the chief butler, as Joseph foretold, is restored to his office, and the chief baker is hung (40^{5-23}).

Ch. 41 (with the exceptions noted, E) tells the story of Joseph's elevation in Egypt. After two years, during which time his position remained unaltered (the chief butler having forgotten his promise to mention him to the king), the Pharaoh had his two dreams, of the fat and lean kine, and of the full and withered ears; and much significance being attached in Egypt to dreams, he was disturbed to find no one able to interpret them. The chief butler, reminded by the occurrence of Joseph's skill in his own case, mentions him to the Pharaoh. He is sent for; and, being brought before the king,[*] declares to him what his dreams signify, viz. seven years of plenty, to be succeeded immediately by seven years of famine: in view of the future, he further suggests the practical measure of making provision for the years of famine by storing up in advance a fifth of the produce of each of the years of plenty. The Pharaoh, impressed by his sagacity, and recognizing it as of God ($41^{38f.}$), forthwith invests him with authority over the entire land of Egypt, for the purpose of giving effect to this proposal, and confers upon him other signal marks of the royal favour (41^{40-44}): he further, as a mark of his admittance into the Egyptian bureaucracy, bestows upon him an Egyptian name, Zaphnath-paʻaneaʼḥ, and marries him to Asenath, a daughter of Potiphera, priest of the great national temple of the sun (Ra), at On (Heliopolis, 7 miles N.E. of the modern Cairo). A notice from P (41^{46}) states that Joseph, at the time of his elevation, was 30 years of age. During the 7 years of plenty, Joseph amassed corn in the granaries of every city from the surrounding district: in the 5th of these years, we are told, Asenath bore him two sons, who were named, respectively, Manasseh in allusion to his forgetting now his past troubles, and Ephraim on account of his fruitfulness in the land of his affliction. When the years of famine began, the Egyptians all came to Joseph to buy corn (41^{54-56}).

Famines in Egypt are due commonly to the failure of the annual inundation of the Nile. The famine in which Joseph is concerned is stated, however, to have extended to all the earth (41^{57}); and this circumstance is the fact upon which the entire sequel of the story hinges. 42^{1-37} (E, except vv.$^{27.28}$) tells how, as the famine became severe in Canaan, Jacob sends all his sons except Benjamin to buy corn in Egypt. Introduced into Joseph's presence, they prostrate themselves before him (cf. the dreams, 37^{7-9}), but do not recognize him: during the years of separation[†] he has grown from a youth into a man, and his Egyptian dress and shaven face further disguise him. He receives them roughly, and accuses them of being spies, sent to discover the 'nakedness of the land.' The charge throws them off their guard; and they seek to disarm his suspicions by volunteering information[‡] about their family, of which Joseph at once takes advantage: desirous, namely, of ascertaining the truth about Benjamin, he insists that one shall be left bound in Egypt, while the others go home, and bring back their youngest brother with them. Their conscience, the narrator remarks, smites them: they recognize in their misfortunes a nemesis for their treatment of Joseph; and Reuben—who regularly takes the lead in E—reminds them how he had sought to divert them from their purpose. Joseph understood all the time what they were saying, and was much moved by it: he adheres, however, to his terms, and retains as hostage, not indeed Reuben, his former protector, but the next eldest of his brethren, Simeon. Having secretly given orders for each man's money to be restored into his sack, and having given them provision for the way, he lets the others go, and they return to Canaan. Arrived there, they report to their father what had befallen them: the surprising discovery of the money in their sacks * adds to their and his anxiety; and he bitterly reproaches them for their inconsiderate treatment of him. Reuben steps forward, and offers his two sons as surety for the safe return of Benjamin from Egypt.

[*] At least, if (as most critics suppose) 'Judah' stood originally in v.^{21} (J) for 'Reuben' (as the text stands, v.^{21b} and v.^{22a} are tautologous). But even if that be not the case, we have 'Reuben' in vv.$^{22.29}$ (E), and 'Judah' in v.^{26} (J).

[†] In v.^{28} the absence of the art. before 'Midianites' shows that the reference cannot be to 'the Ishmaelites,' mentioned specifically in v.^{27}.

[‡] Properly, 'captain (or superintendent, chief) of the slaughterers' (of animals [not 'executioners']), a Heb. title, though always, as it happens, applied to foreigners (elsewhere only, with רַב for שַׂר, of Neb.'s 'captain of the guard' Jer $39^{9ff.}$ 41^{10} 43^6 $52^{12ff.}$, 2 K $25^{8ff.}$, and Dn 2^{14}). The royal butchers came in some way to form the royal bodyguard; cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 262 f. LXX ἀρχιμάγειρος,—in itself a perfectly possible rendering (see 1 S $9^{23.24}$), but not probable in view of Jer 39, etc.

[§] Identified in the existing text with Potiphar (37^{36}) by the harmonizing insertion in 39^{1b}.

[‖] The expression is a peculiar one (not the ordinary Heb. term for 'prison'), and is found only here (39^{20-23}) and $40^{3.5}$. Understood as two Heb. words, it might mean 'house of roundness,' i.e. a circular tower, such as might be used as a prison; but sōhar is perhaps the Hebraized form of an Egyp. word [cf. Ebers, Aeg. u. die Bb. Mos. 318 f.: the very special character of the suhan at Thebes (see Maspero, Struggle, 271 n. 5) is an objection to Sayce's view (EHH 87) that it may be this word].

[¶] According to the insertions in vv.$^{3b.5b.15b}$ (J), in the state-prison, where Joseph was bound. In vv.$^{14b-15a}$, according to E, Joseph prays to be released, not from imprisonment, but only from servitude in a foreign land, after having been 'stolen away' from his native country (in agreement with E's representation in $37^{28a.c}$).

[] Cf. 41^{12} (also E). In 39^{22} (J) Joseph is made overseer of the other prisoners; and he receives this appointment, not from his master (as here), but from the keeper of the state-prison.

[*] According to the notice from J, inserted in v.^{14}, from the dungeon, in which J represents him as imprisoned (40^{15b} 39^{21-23}).

[†] According to E, more than 9 ($41^{1.48}$); taking account of the additional dates given by P (37^3 41^{46}), more than 20 (13 + the 7 of 41^{48}).

[‡] 41^{13}, cf. v.^{32}. In the parallel narrative of J, this information must have been given in answer to Joseph's express inquiry: see 43^7 44^{19}.

The narrative is now continued by a long extract from J (42^{38}–44^{34}, with the exceptions noted). The famine continuing in Canaan, Jacob is obliged a second time to send to Egypt for corn: he is reluctant at first to let Benjamin go as well: but after the representations of Judah,—who takes the lead in J (cf. 37$^{26f.}$), as Reuben does in E,—and his offer to be surety for his safe return (cf. the similar offer of Reuben in E, 42^{37}), he consents, sending at the same time a present, to conciliate, if possible, the favour of the great Egyptian governor. Joseph, seeing Benjamin with his other brothers, and perceiving thus that they have spoken the truth, prepares to show them friendliness, and invites them to a feast in his house. E mentions at this point that Simeon was released to them. They make ready their present for Joseph; and as he comes in, a second time (cf. 42^{6b}) fulfil unconsciously his dreams (37$^{7.9}$): he inquires tenderly for his father, and expresses his satisfaction at seeing Benjamin. At the feast, they are surprised to find themselves seated according to their ages, and Benjamin honoured with a 'mess,'—or honorary portion (cf. 2 S 11^{8}),—five times as large as any of theirs.

The dénoûment now approaches. The brethren depart, with their sacks filled with corn, Joseph having privately given orders for his divining-cup to be hidden in Benjamin's sack. Before they can have gone far, he sends messengers after them, who overtake them, and tax them with the theft. Their consciences are clear; and they voluntarily offer the offender to justice. Dismay and despair seize them, when the cup is found in Benjamin's sack. With affected indignation, Joseph reproaches them with what they have done: Judah, in reply, speaking on behalf of them all, attempts no excuse; for no excuse seems to be possible: a just retribution has overtaken them (cf. 42^{21}); they will all remain bondmen in Egypt. But Joseph presses his advantage home: he will only retain Benjamin. Judah now steps forward, and in a speech of striking beauty, remarkable not less for grace and persuasive eloquence than for frankness and generosity, intercedes on Benjamin's behalf: explaining how all had happened from the beginning, he entreats Joseph to have compassion on the feelings of an aged father, and to allow him to remain as bondman himself in his brother's stead (44$^{18-34}$). Overcome by the pathos of Judah's appeal, and convinced at last of his brethren's altered mind, Joseph discloses himself to them (ch. 45 E*). His first inquiry is for his father. For a while they can give no answer for amazement; but he reassures them, and allays their fears: in what they have done, they have been, after all, the unconscious instruments of Providence, for 'God did send me before you to preserve life' (45$^{5.7.8}$). And he sends an affectionate message to his father, to come and settle in Egypt, and be supported by him there.

Upon Jacob's arrival in Egypt, Joseph hastens to meet his father in Goshen (46$^{28-30}$ J). He presents five of his brethren to the Pharaoh, who upon learning from them that they are shepherds, agrees to grant them an abode in GOSHEN (wh. see), a pastoral district about Saft el-Ḥenneh, some 40 miles N.E. of Cairo (46^{31}–47$^{4.6b}$ J; cf. 47^{5-6a} P).† (According to P (47$^{7-11}$) Jacob himself is introduced by Joseph to the Pharaoh; and Joseph assigns him, at the Pharaoh's command, an abode in the 'land of Rameses,'—probably a name for the E. part of the Delta, which Ramses II., the Pharaoh of the oppression, beautified by many new buildings, and often made his residence.) ‡

There follows a paragraph (47$^{13-26}$ J), describing a permanent change in the Egyptian system of land-tenure, which was attributed to Joseph. The famine continuing in Egypt, the people first gave away all their money for corn, then they gave away their cattle, finally they offered themselves and their land. The result was that all the land in Egypt, except that of the priests (who received a fixed revenue in kind from the crown, and thus had no occasion to sell their possessions for food), became the property of the Pharaoh, the previous owners becoming tenants of the king, paying him, as it were, an annual rent of $\frac{1}{5}$ of the produce.

According to P (47^{27b-28}) Jacob lived with Joseph in Egypt 17 years. As the time drew near for him to die, Joseph hearing of his sickness, brought in his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim to see him. Upon hearing that they were there, the aged patriarch blessed them, giving Ephraim, the younger, against their father's desire, the first place, in view of the future greatness of the tribe descended from him (vv.$^{1-2.8-20}$ JE), at the same time (vv.$^{21.22}$ E) conferring upon Joseph, as a special gift, 'one shoulder—or mountain-slope—above his brethren' (with allusion to Shechem; see JACOB, p. 532). A parallel text of P (48$^{3-7}$) describes Jacob's adoption of his two grandsons, in virtue of which he places each on the same level with his own sons.

After Jacob's death, Joseph, as was natural, made suitable provision for his burial (50$^{1-11.14}$ JE, probably J; 50$^{12.13}$ P). His brethren fear now that he will exact retribution for their past treatment of him, and send accordingly to crave his forgiveness. He replies generously that he is not in God's place, viz. to exact vengeance for actions which, however intended, have been overruled by God's providence for good ('to save much people alive'), and that he will continue to make provision for their nourishment and welfare (50$^{15-21}$ E).§ He lived, we read, to the age of 110, surviving even the birth of his great-grandchildren.‖ Before his death he expressed his assurance that God would ultimately bring up the children of Israel out of Egypt, and gave solemn directions for his bones to be brought up with them (50^{22-26} E). The fulfilment of this injunction is described in Ex 13^{19}, Jos 24^{32} (both E); in the latter place it is added that Joseph's bones were buried finally in Shechem, in the plot of ground bought there by Jacob (Gn 33^{19}) in the centre of the territory owned by his descendants, the 'children of Ephraim.'

* In J (see 43^{21}) this discovery is made at the lodging-place by the way; and 42$^{27.28}$ is an extract from J's account of it (notice האחד 'the one,' implying others to follow, not אחד. Observe also that the unusual word אמתחת sack, occurring 13 times in ch. 43–44 (J), occurs also twice in 42$^{27.28}$, and not elsewhere in the OT).

* Except the clauses in vv.$^{4.5}$ referring to Joseph's having been sold by his brethren; v.^{10} as far as Goshen; and perhaps v.^{28}.

† The sequence in 47$^{5.6}$ is much better in LXX than in the Heb. text.

‡ The expression is thus proleptic, even if it be not actually an anachronism.

§ The terms of v.^{21a} (cf. 47^{12}), and the expression, 'as it is this day,' in v.^{20}, seem to show that the writer pictured the famine as still continuing (cf. 45^{11}). E must have placed Jacob's death earlier than P (47^{28}).

‖ V.^{23} 'the sons of Machir, son of Manasseh,' are specified, on account of the importance attaching later to the corresponding clans of the tribe of Manasseh, on the E. of Jordan (see

The character of Joseph is one that is singularly amiable and free from faults. He is the true son, the true brother, the true servant. Loyal and faithful, disinterested and sincere, modest and considerate, he wins the esteem of all right-minded persons with whom he has to do. He is obedient to duty in whatever position he finds himself—whether feeding his father's sheep, or attending to his master's house, or acting for the keeper of the prison, or invested by Pharaoh with authority over Egypt. 'J" was with him' is the significant phrase by which the narrator indicates the Divine approval of his conduct ($39^{2.\ 3.\ 21.\ 23}$). In misfortune he is resigned, and does not complain. He resists temptation. In his elevation he neither presumes upon his position nor forgets his humbler relations: in spite of their cruel treatment of him, he bears his brethren no grudge; even after his father's death he is as generous and magnanimous as before (50^{17-21}). He has deep and true affection: his younger brother and his father are ever foremost in his thoughts.* His attitude towards his other brethren, and the humiliation which he imposes on them, are, of course, dictated by the desire to prove them, and bring them to acknowledge their sin; as soon as they have done this (cf. $42^{21.\ 22}$ 44^{16}), and he is satisfied that they are treating his father and Benjamin with genuine affection, he discloses himself, excuses them for what they had done (45^{5-8}), and, to assure them of his forgiveness and goodwill, makes provision for their residence near himself in Egypt. He has a lively sense of dependence upon God and of his duty towards Him (39^{9} 41^{16} 50^{24}). He is conscious that he is in God's hands, who overrules evil that good may come, and effects His purposes even though it may be without the knowledge and against the wishes of the actual agents (50^{20}, cf. $45^{5.\ 7.\ 8}$). As a righteous man, persecuted and sold by his brethren, wrongfully accused and humiliated, but afterwards exalted, and using his position for the good of others, submissive, forgiving, and tender-hearted, it is not surprising that he should often have been regarded as a type of Christ. Only the measures adopted by Joseph for the relief of the famine might be thought to strike a discordant note in his character. To appropriate the surplus produce of the seven years of plenty, and then to compel the Egyptians to buy back, even to their own impoverishment, what they had themselves previously given up, does not seem consistent with our ideas of justice and equity. It must, however, be remembered, that, in this respect, Joseph was not, and could not be expected to be, in advance of the public morality of his age. The economic conditions of Egypt are, and always have been, peculiar. The fertility of the soil is dependent upon a system of irrigation, which can only be kept in proper order by the central government; and the cultivator falls into a state of dependency and indebtedness to it at the same time. Moreover, the Egyptian fellah lacks inherently the spirit of independence, and, even to the present day, is content to enrich others by his labour rather than himself. Of course such considerations as these do not justify in the abstract the oppressions to which Egypt has habitually been exposed at the hands of Oriental viceroys and pashas; but they tend to show that Joseph did not do more than was consistent with the condition of the country, with the age in which he lived, and with the position in which he found himself placed at the time.* Nevertheless, as Delitzsch observes, the remark of Niebuhr remains true: 'the history of Joseph is a dangerous precedent for designing ministers.'

Joseph was the reputed ancestor of the two tribes Manasseh and Ephraim, the latter being the most powerful and important in Northern Israel. In the blessings of Jacob (Gn 49^{22-26}) and Moses (Dt 33^{13-16}), 'Joseph' manifestly represents these two tribes, though no doubt in each the poet is thinking more particularly of Ephraim; in each he descants upon the blessings of soil and climate, of populousness and military strength, enjoyed by the tribe; and in each Joseph bears the title נְזִיר אֶחָיו 'the separate (or crowned) one of his brethren,' i.e. the tribe distinguished from the others by the possession, in a pre-eminent degree, of such distinctions as wealth, and influence, and political and military power. The terms of these blessings, and the enthusiasm which in each the poet displays for 'Joseph,' show that both spring from the period during which Ephraim was the leading tribe in Israel.† The two tribes are also grouped together elsewhere under the same common designation: not only in the expression 'children of Joseph,' Jos 16^{1} $17^{14.\ 16}$ (J), Nu $1^{10.\ 12}$, Jos 14^{4} 18^{11} al. (P), but also in 'house of Joseph,' Jos 17^{17} 18^{5}, Jg $1^{22.\ddagger\ 23.\ddagger\ 25}$ 2 S 19^{20}‡ 1 K 11^{28}, and (like Ephraim in Hos) à potiori of Northern Israel generally, Am 5^{6}, Ob ^{18} (‖ 'house of Jacob'), Zec 10^{6}, and in 'Joseph' alone (sometimes representing N. Israel generally), Dt 27^{12} $33^{13.\ 16}$, Am 5^{15} 6^{6}, Ezk $37^{16.\ 19}$ 47^{13} 48^{32}, Ps 77^{17} ('the sons of Jacob and Joseph') 78^{67} 80^{1} (‖ 'Israel'), 81^{5}.

Date of Joseph.—The period of Egyptian history at which the events of Joseph's life are to be placed, cannot be determined except inferentially. As in the Book of Exodus, the name of the Pharaoh is not mentioned; and in view of the general fixity of Egyptian institutions, the allusions to Egyptian manners and customs, as Dillm. remarks, are not sufficiently distinctive to constitute a clue to the age in which he lived.§ The biblical dates, both of the Exodus and of the patriarchal age (which is dependent upon it, Ex 12^{41}), are too uncertain to form a secure basis for further chronological calculations (see CHRONOLOGY, vol. i. p. 398). There are, however, strong reasons for supposing Ramses II. of the 19th dynasty (B.C. 1275-1208, Petrie) to be the Pharaoh of the oppression (Ex $1^{8ff.}$); and arguing back from this datum, it is probable that Joseph's MACHIR and MANASSEH). 'Born upon Joseph's knees,' i.e. recognized by him as his descendants; cf. 30^{3}, Odyss. xix. 401.

* Gn 41^{51} end is naturally not to be taken au pied de la lettre. It is an old difficulty that Joseph did not, immediately after his elevation, take steps to inform his father of his welfare; but perhaps separations of this kind were taken in those days more as a matter of course than they would be by us; and certainly, if Joseph had done this, both the interest and the moral of the narrative would have been greatly impaired.

* Cf. the remarks and quotations illustrative of the economic condition of Egypt in the work of Vigouroux, cited below (p. 772 n.*), ii. 183-189; also Ebers, Gosen, 486-8 (ed. 2, 498 f.).

† In 2 S $19^{43\ (44)}$ LXX (בְּכוֹר for בְּדָוִד), 'I am also the firstborn more than thou,' the men of Israel claim the birthright—no doubt on account of the prestige enjoyed by Ephraim; cf. 1 Ch $5^{1.\ 2}$: Ew. i. 422.

‡ Including here Benjamin (in 2 S 19^{20} Shimei, a Benjaminite, speaks). Cf. Stade, Gesch. i. 160 ff.

§ Sayce's statement (EHH 90, cf. 83), that the Egypt which the narrative brings before us is that of the Hyksos age, is not warranted by the facts: not one of the illustrations quoted by him is distinctive of the Hyksos age, and the great majority are not drawn from that period at all.

elevation in Egypt is to be placed under one of the later Hyksos kings.[*] The Hyksos (i.e. Hyk-shasu, 'prince of the Shasu,' or 'spoilers,' i.e. desert-hordes, or Bedawis) were a race of Asiatic invaders, who (according to Manetho) held possession of Egypt for 511 years (B.C. 2098–1587, Petrie), at first devastating and destroying, but afterwards settling down, and assimilating much of the culture of the conquered Egyptians (cf. vol. i. p. 659 f.; Maspero, Struggle of Nations, 50 ff., 72 ff.). Zoan (Tanis), in the N.E. of the Delta.[†] (as excavations have shown) was one of their chief cities. George the Syncellus speaks of a general consensus of chronographers to the effect that the Pharaoh of Joseph was Aphophis,[‡] i.e. Apepa (II.), the last important Hyksos king.[§] As it happens, if we place the Exodus at about B.C. 1204 (Petrie), this would agree with the date given in Ex 12^{41} (1204 + 430 = 1634 B.C.).

Historical Character of Joseph.—Taken in the abstract, it cannot be said that there are serious historical improbabilities in the substance of Joseph's biography. Certainly the narrative contains many dramatic situations. Both Joseph and his brethren pass through a series of crises and adventures, any one of which might readily have closed the drama, though all, in fact, lead on happily to the final dénoûment. Truth is, however, proverbially stranger than fiction. There have been many remarkable biographies in history, and we must beware of making probability too absolutely the test of credibility. In the general fact of a foreigner, by a happy stroke of cleverness, winning the favour of an Eastern despot, and being in consequence invested by him with high powers, there is nothing unprecedented; and in the case of Egypt, in particular, the monuments supply explicit evidence of foreigners rising there to positions of political distinction. The question assumes, however, a different aspect when account is taken (1) of the fact that the narratives about Joseph are plainly not the work of a contemporary hand,[‖] but were in all probability only committed to writing 700–800 years afterwards, and (2) of the further curious fact that 'Joseph' (like many of the other patriarchal names) is also a tribal name, the name of that subdivision of the nation which was also called after his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. The first of these facts at once destroys all guarantee that we possess in the Joseph-narratives a literal record of the facts. The outline, indeed, may still be historical, but for details or particular episodes popular imagination will very probably be responsible: the improbabilities which certainly attach to some of the details connected with the famine and the measures by which it was relieved (41$^{47-49. 54. 56. 57}$ 47$^{14-26}$)[*] may thus, for example, be accounted for. The second fact raises the further question whether the figure of Joseph, in part or even as a whole, is a reflection of the history and characteristics of the tribe, projected upon the past in an individual form.

According to Ewald (cf. above, p. 534), the twelve sons of Jacob represent corresponding subdivisions of the nation: the smaller part of it, distinguished in the extant tradition by the name and fame of Joseph, and consisting essentially of the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh (which afterwards separated), migrated into Egypt first; Joseph, who was a real person, was a leader or distinguished member of the immigrants; he rose to power in Egypt, and conferred there great benefits hoth upon his own people and upon the country, and in the end also attracted the remaining and stronger part of his people to the E. frontier of Egypt. His personality was a remarkable one; and in after ages it was transfigured in the memory of his people: under the influence of Israel's religion it became an ideal of filial and fraternal affection, a high example of goodness, devotion to duty, sincerity, and love. The fundamental idea of the story consists in the happy reunion in Egypt of the long-separated members of Jacob's family, at the call of the son and brother who has risen there to high station; this, in the narrative of Genesis, as we possess it, has heen gradually elaborated by successive writers until it attained 'the mature and attractive form in which it was worthy to become an heir-loom of the human race.'[†] The view of Dillm. (introd. to ch. 39) and Kittel (i. 168 f.) is similar: behind the individual, Joseph, there stands the tribe (Dillm.); the tribe, migrating to Egypt, acquired there power and pre-eminence over its 'brethren,' and its leader is known to tradition by the same name, Joseph (Kittel). It is an objection to this view that it duplicates the name at one and the same time: 'Joseph' denotes both an individual and a tribe, not at different times, but in Egypt itself. Stade and others see in Joseph (as in his brethren) merely the imaginary eponymous ancestor of the tribe, in whose life and experiences are reflected the political and other relations of a later age.

Any judgment upon a question of this kind must be more or less 'subjective'; but to the present writer the amount of personal incident and detail in the narrative appears, as in the case of JACOB (p. 534^{b}), to be an objection to both these views. It seems to him to be more probable that there was an actual person, Joseph, afterwards—rightly or wrongly—regarded as the ancestor of the tribe, whose biography, during the time that it lived only in oral tradition, may have been embellished and made more dramatic in details, but who underwent substantially the experiences recounted of him in Gn, and who, having risen to power in Egypt, succeeded in obtaining for his fellow-tribesmen a home in the pastoral land of Goshen. This view, amongst other things, does justice to the Egyptian colouring of the narrative (see below). This colouring, it is true, is seldom specific; it is never of a character to prove close and personal cognizance of the facts described;[‡] nevertheless, its presence in the narrative — as indeed the entire Egyptian episode in Joseph's life — is difficult to account for, if the whole were nothing but a legend, woven by popular fancy upon the hills of Ephraim.

From 47$^{13-26}$, however, more cannot be inferred than that the agrarian conditions described prevailed in the age of the narrator: the details of the narrative, such as the connexion with the seven years of famine, the exhaustion of the Egyptians' money, etc., will, as Dillm. remarks, 'belong merely der naiven Sage.' The benefit derived in consequence by the crown must have been attributed popularly to Joseph's statesmanship; but if it be true that he rose to power under Aphophis, at the very time when the native Theban princes were beginning the war of independence, it is difficult to think that an innovation of this kind, introduced by him, could have survived the expulsion of the Hyksos Pharaohs.

It is, moreover, important to observe, as Kittel has pointed out, that this colouring is common to both J and E: as it is improbable that two writers would have added it independently, it may be inferred that it was inherent in the common tradition which both represent. This is a circumstance tending to show that in its origin the Egyptian element was considerably anterior to either J or E, and increases the probability that it rests ultimately upon a foundation in fact. At the same time, it is difficult to deny that the narrative (like those of ISHMAEL and JACOB) has been coloured in some of its details by later events, and even that particular episodes may have originated in the desire to account for the circumstances and relations of a later age. The hostility of the brethren to Joseph, the leadership in one narrative (E) of Reuben, in the other (J) of Judah, the power and pre-eminence of Joseph as compared with his father and brothers, the fact that Benjamin, afterwards the smallest tribe, is the youngest brother, the 'adoption' of his two grandsons by Jacob (i.e. their elevation to the same rank as his own sons), and the priority so pointedly bestowed by him upon the younger, are, for instance, points at which it is very possible that popular imagination has thus been at work, colouring or supplementing the historical elements of the Joseph-tradition by reference to the facts and conditions of later times. And naturally the literary form of the narrative, with its charms of style and other characteristic traits, will be due to the different writers, who, severally, cast the original tradition into a written shape.

[†] Zoan would be not more than about 35 miles from Goshen; and it is true that the court of the Pharaoh in Gn is represented as being not far from Goshen (for Joseph was near to both: 45$^{10. 16}$ 46$^{29-34}$ 47^{7}), whereas the residence of the Pharaohs, both before (12–14 dyn.) and after (18–20 dyn.) the Hyksos period, was far up the Nile, at Thebes. However, an argument in support of Joseph's Pharaoh being one of the Hyksos kings could be based upon this coincidence, only if it were already certain that the narrative was the work of a contemporary hand, which might be trusted to reproduce accurately geographical facts of this kind.

Maspero, Struggle of Nations, 71) has made it probable that this date was arrived at by a combination of the 430 years of Ex 12^{41} with Egyptian data.

The acquaintance shown by the authors of the Joseph narratives, esp. J and E, with Egyptian customs and institutions has been long observed;[*] and the principal instances deserve to be noticed here, references being added to authorities where the subject may be more fully studied.

37^{25} (cf. 43^{11}). There would be demand in Egypt for resinous substances, such as 'gum tragacanth,' 'balm,' and 'ladanum' (the exudation of the Cistus or Rock-rose),[†] partly for medicinal purposes, partly for the composition of incense to be used in religious rites, and partly for embalming; see Ebers, Aeg. 289-293. For Syrian trade with Egypt (in the 18th dyn.), including slaves, see ib. 292 ff., Erman, Life in Ancient Egypt, 516 ff.

39^4 'and he appointed him over his house.'[‡] Such a position can hardly be regarded as distinctively Egyptian (see note ‡): nevertheless the monuments show that large Egyptian households were organized with superintendents of their different departments (the fields, the cattle, the kitchen, etc.), the mer-per, or 'superintendent of the house,' being in particular often mentioned.[§] The 'bread which' his master 'did eat' (39^6) would not be left in Joseph's hand, on account of the scruples which the Egyptians had against eating food prepared by foreigners (cf. 43^{32}). To the story of Joseph and his master's wife ($39^{7ff.}$) there is a remarkable parallel (which has been often compared) in the Egyptian romance, commonly called 'The Tale of the Two Brothers,' written for Seti II. (19 dyn.), and preserved in the d'Orbiney Papyrus. Two brothers, Anpu and Bata, lived together in one house: the elder, Anpu, one day sent Bata back from the fields into the house to fetch some seed; Anpu's wife there made advances to him, which he repelled: when Anpu returned home in the evening, his wife accused Bata to him falsely. Anpu, enraged, at first sought to slay his brother, but in the end he was convinced that he was innocent and had been accused falsely, and he thereupon slew his unfaithful wife.[*]

$40^{1ff.}$ A 'butler,' or 'cupbearer' (the word in the Heb. is the same, מַשְׁקֶה, lit. the one giving to drink), was, naturally, not an institution peculiar to Egypt, being found also in Persia (Neh 1^{11}, cf. 2^1), and elsewhere (cf. οἰνοχόος): we meet, however, with a very similar title in lists of Egyptian court officials; Chabas, for instance (Mél. Égypt. 3rd ser. 131 ff.), publishes such a list, including 'le grand des appartements ou grand supérieur de la maison' (the major domo, mentioned above), 'le saigneur de bœufs, le boulanger, le cuiseur de mets, le conducteur des contrôleurs (abu-u), qui goûtent le vin,' etc., the last of whom is considered by Chabas and Ebers to have corresponded to the 'chief of the butlers' here.[†] In the tomb of Ramses III. (20 dyn.) there is a representation of a royal bakery, showing a number of figures employed in various processes of bread-making, and amongst them one carrying a tray containing rolls of bread upon his head (v.^{16}).[‡] A 'superintendent of the bakery,' corresponding to the 'chief of the bakers,' is mentioned by Erman, pp. 105, 187 (cf. Ebers, 333 bottom). The custom of squeezing grapes into a cup (v.^{11}) is illustrated by Ebers[§] from a text published by Naville from the temple at Edfu, where it is said that grapes squeezed into water formed a refreshing beverage, which was drunk by the king. The birthday of the Pharaoh (v.^{20}), at least in the Ptolemaic period, as we learn from the Canopus and Rosetta decrees (B.C. 239 and 195), was celebrated with a great assembly of priests of all grades, and a granting of amnesties to prisoners.[||]

In ch. 41 Pharaoh's dreams, both in themselves and in their subject-matter, are appropriate to the country. In Egypt (as in Babylon, and indeed in other ancient countries) much importance was attached to dreams. Thothmes IV., while sleeping under the shadow of the great Sphinx, was commanded by Râ Harmakhis to clear away the sand by which it was encumbered. A vision of the god Ptah, appearing in a dream, encouraged Merenptah to attack the Libyans. On the 'Dream-stele' discovered among the ruins of Napata, the ancient capital of Ethiopia, it is related how the Ethiopian king, Nût Amen, saw in a dream two serpents, one on his right hand and the other on his left, which were explained to portend that he would conquer Egypt, and wear on his head the two crowns, of the north as well as of the south.[¶] Strange nostrums were even in vogue for the purpose of obtaining significant dreams.[] Egypt is dependent for its fertility upon the annual rising of the Nile: the cow-headed goddess Hat-hor,[††] the personification of fruitfulness (with whom Isis, the goddess of the fertile soil of the Delta,[*] was often identified), is described in inscriptions, cited by Ebers, as 'causing the Nile to appear in its season,' 'giving life to the living with her hands,' 'pouring forth fruitfulness upon the land,' etc.[†] The cow being sacred to both these deities, kine emerging from the Nile would be a natural emblem of fruitful seasons. Seven was also a sacred (and magical) number in Egypt.[‡] Among the priestly classes[§] in Egypt were the 'writers of sacred writings' (saχ-u neter šat: in the Greek text of the Canopus decree, πτεροφόραι,—depicted on the monuments with a feather [quill] on their heads, and a book in their hand[‖]), and the 'knowers of things' (reχ χet-u), or, as we might say, 'wise men' (in the Greek, ἱερογραμματεῖς, or 'sacred scribes'), of whose superior knowledge the Egyp. king would avail himself in any difficulty.[¶] To these correspond, no doubt, the ḥarṭummim[] and 'wise men,' summoned by Pharaoh to interpret his dreams.

Joseph's shaving himself, and changing his raiment (41^{14}), before appearing in the presence of Pharaoh, is in agreement with Egyptian customs: all respectable Egyptians shaved themselves: on the monuments, only foreigners, and natives of inferior rank, are represented as wearing beards; cleanliness of clothes, as well as of person, was also de rigueur.[††] With the reference to God in 41^{16} (cf. v.^{39} 40^{8}), comp. Herod. ii. 83. Joseph's plan for laying up corn in storehouses ($41^{34f.}$) at least falls in with Egyptian institutions: in all important cities granaries were established, partly for the reception of the corn-tax (an important item in the revenue), partly to provide maintenance for soldiers and other public officials: the 'superintendent of the granaries' was one of the highest officers of the state; it was his duty to see that they were properly filled, and to report to the king annually on the harvests.[‡‡] On 41^{40} ('over my house,' i.e. palace), cf. p. 772 note ‡, and Erman, pp. 69, 77: the terms of 41^{41} suggest the important office of T'ate, or governor, ib. 69, 87–89 ('the second after the king in the court of the palace'), 473. The signet-ring (41^{42}) was in other countries also a mark of authority (Est 3^{10} 8^{2}, Tob 1^{22}, 1 Mac 6^{15}); but it was notably so in Egypt, where the 'keeper of the seal' (mer chetam) was the king's deputy.[*] The golden collar put round Joseph's neck (ib.) was a peculiarly Egyptian form of decoration: it was called 'receiving gold';[†] Ahmes, the captain-general of the marines, who freed Egypt from the Hyksos, 'received gold,' on seven different occasions, for various acts of valour.[‡] Linen was prized in Egypt as a material for dress, especially for men of rank;[§] but the plural 'garments of fine linen' makes it doubtful whether (as Ebers supposes) there is a specific reference to the shendi-t, or shend'ot, the royal apron-garment, worn under the Old Empire only by royal personages, but under the Middle and New Empires, by other dignitaries as well.[‖] Horses and chariots are first represented on the Egyptian monuments under the 18th dyn.: it is probable, therefore, that they were introduced into Egypt during the Hyksos period; the words for both chariot (merkobt) and waggon ('agolt) are palpably of Semitic (Canaanite or Hebrew) origin (מֶרְכָּבָה, עֲגָלָה).[¶] The king in earlier times was carried by soldiers on a sedan-chair.[] Erman (p. 64) describes a scene from a tomb at Tel el-Âmarna, in which Amenôphis IV. (18 dyn.), his queen and daughters, and the ministers in attendance, appear riding in chariots of state; but it throws no light on the expression, 'the second chariot which he had.' The monuments supply illustrations, at least in and after the 18th dyn., of foreigners (including slaves from Syria) rising to positions of political importance in Egypt, and adopting there a change of name: Mery-Rē̂ ('beloved of Rê'), the armour-bearer of Thothmes III., and the priest, User-Min ('Min is strong'), were sons of a foreigner, the judge Pa-'Emer'eu (the Amorite); and under Merenptah, a Canaanite, Ben-Mat'ana, son of Jupa'a, from D'arbasana,[††] holds the office of 'first speaker of His Majesty' (who acted as an intermediary between the king and his attendants), and receives the name of Ramses-em-per-Ra, 'Ramses in the temple of Ra.'[‡‡] In fact, 'change of name was usual with parvenus whom the king wished to honour' (Ebers). On (ib.) is well known to have been the chief centre of the worship of the sun-god (Rê or Râ), possessing a famous temple, and a large body of priests (cf. Herod. ii. 3).

Famines of long duration, due to the Nile failing to overflow, are not unknown in Egypt: not only is one attested by El-Makrizi, the Arabic historian, for A.D. 1064–1071,[§§] but the sepulchral inscription of one Baba, found at El-Kab in Upper Egypt, represents the deceased, in an enumeration of his virtues, as saying, 'I collected corn, as a friend of the harvest-god. I was watchful at the time of sowing. And when a famine arose, lasting many years, I distributed corn to the city each year of famine.'[*] The age of Baba (end of the 17th dyn.) would coincide approximately with that of Joseph; and it has even been supposed that the famine referred to may be the same. Ameni (or Amony), governor of the 'nome of the Gazelle,' under Usertesen II. (12 dyn.), tells us that he made provision for his people, very much as Joseph did: 'In my time there were no poor, and none were hungry. When the years of famine came, I ploughed all the fields of the nome, I kept the inhabitants alive, and gave them food, so that not one was hungry.'[†]

42^{9}. The charge of being spies was a natural one: Egypt was exposed on its E. side, and liable to be invaded by Asiatics; under the 12th dyn. fortresses had been erected along the Isthmus of Suez, and under the 19th dyn. officers were stationed there to take the names of all passing in either direction.[‡] The oath 'by the life of Pharaoh' (42^{15}) is known from Egyptian monuments: in an account of criminal proceedings (20th dyn.), a thief has administered to him an oath by the king's life, to prevent him speaking falsely:[§] in a similar document, published by Chabas, the expression 'il fit un Vie du Seigneur royal' occurs more than once.[||]

43^{16}. The expression 'steward of his house' (אשר על ביתו) is explained above, on 39^{4}. Every great man in Egypt had such an overseer for his establishment. On Egyptian feasts, cf. the Plates in Erman, opposite pp. 250, 255, or Wilk.-B. i. 431: the guests did not sit round a table, as with us, but on rows of chairs, facing a sideboard; the viands, interspersed with rich floral decorations, were arranged on this, and carried round to the guests by servants. On Egyptian houses, which were often on a large scale, Erman, 174 ff. In explanation of v.^{32b}, see ABOMINATION, No. 1; and cf. (Ebers) how it is said, after Pianchi's conquest of Egypt (B.C. 766), that the defeated kings 'did not enter the king's house, because they were unclean (i.e. uncircumcised), and they ate fish, which is an abomination to the king' (Brugsch, p. 404, l. 150 f.).

43^{21} 'in full weight' (lit. in its weight). Egyptian money consisted of rings of gold (probably unstamped), which were weighed by scribes who made this their business (Erman, 109, 464; Wilk.-B. i. 285, 286). However, the practice of 'weighing' money was also usual among the Hebrews, even to a late date (Jer $32^{9.10}$, Zec 11^{12} etc.).

45^{8} 'a father ('āb) to Pharaoh,' v.^{9} (cf. $42^{30.33}$) 'lord ('ādōn) of all Egypt.' Brugsch has pointed out that both 'āb and 'ādōn were official titles in Egyptian.

Āb (or ābū) does not mean 'father' in Egyp., but denotes primarily the overseer of a kitchen, wine-cellar, bakery, etc.; then in the 19th dyn. the ābū of the king becomes an important person in the state, and takes part in judicial investigations, etc.: see Brugsch, Hist. (1891), 101, 357, Steininschrift, 82; and esp. Dict. Hiérogl. v. 37–39, Aegyptologie, p. 225 f., and Erman, who represents ābū by the peculiar term Truchsess, rendered in the Eng. tr.—as badly as possible—by 'slave,' p. 105, l. 11, 10, 7, 6, 4 from bottom, p. 106, l. 1, 11, 14, 18, by 'vassal,' pp. 131–136, 141, 143, 144 (cf. Z. f. Aeg. Spr. 1879, pp. 73 ff., 148 ff.), by 'serfs,' p. 187 f. (3 times), and by 'vassal' again, p. 475.

'Ādōn (or Aten) was the title given to the viceroy (of the Pharaoh), or the deputy of a governor or other official (like the Arab. wakil): thus we read of the 'ādōn of a city, of a district, of a regiment, of a treasury, of the grand-chancellor, etc., and even of the whole country. See Brugsch, Rev. Égypt. i. (1880) 28 ff. (many examples cited); also Hist. 101, 124, 125 (Ḥor-em-ḥeb (18 dyn.) was 'Adon of the whole land' for some years before he became king: see p. 231), 281, 290, 339 bottom, 344 bis, 347, 348; and Virey in Records, 2nd ser. iv. 3 ff. (where the same word is spelt 'tennu').

In view, however, of the fact that both 'āb and 'ādōn are common Heb. words (with 45^{8} cf. esp. Is 22^{21}), it must be regarded as exceedingly doubtful whether, in using them, E had really in mind the Egyptian offices to which Brugsch has referred.

On 46^{34b} see ABOMINATION, No. 1: there is independent evidence that cow-herds and swineherds (Herod. ii. 47) were looked down upon by the Egyptians, but not that shepherds were. 47^{6} 'overseers of cattle over that which I have.' Much attention was paid to cattle-rearing in Egypt; and there were many fine breeds.[*] The Pharaoh possessed large herds; and the mer, or superintendent, of the royal cattle is often mentioned in the inscriptions.[†] There are parallels for parties of foreigners receiving permission to settle in Egypt: see Z. f. Aeg. Spr. 1889, p. 125, or Tomkins, p. 81 (Mentiu, or nomads, expelled from their homes, appeal to Ḥor-em-ḥeb, of the 18th dyn., and receive permission to settle in a prescribed locality); and the remarkable inscription cited by Brugsch, ch. v. (p. 100), from the reign of Merenptah (Shasu or Bedawis, allowed to pass a border-fortress of Egypt, and to settle on the property of the Pharaoh). In 47^{14} the 'house' meant is, according to Ebers, the treasury, usually called per-ḥet, the 'house of silver': the head-treasurer was a high officer of state, having many subordinate officials under him.[‡] The peculiar system of Egyptian land-tenure, which (47^{26}) is attributed to Joseph, is so far in accordance with the evidence of the monuments, that, whereas in the Old Empire the nobility and governors of the nomes possessed large landed estates, in the New Empire (which followed the expulsion of the Hyksos) 'the old aristocracy has made way for royal officials, and the landed property has passed out of the hands of the old families into the possession of the crown and the great temples.'[§] The monuments do not, however, furnish any explanation of the origin of the new system: there is a conjecture in Erman, p. 102 f.[||]

$50^{2.26}$. Embalming the dead is, of course, well known to have been an Egyptian custom; for descriptions of the process, see Herod. ii. 86–89; Budge, The Mummy (1893), 160 ff.; Wilk.-B. iii. 470 ff. Egypt was famous for its physicians (Od. iv. 229; Herod. ii. 84, iii. 1. 129), and Egyptian treatises on medicine have come down to us:[¶] but here 'physicians' seems to be used improperly for embalmers (who belonged in fact to a distinct profession). Seventy days appears to have been a more usual period for the entire process than forty; but, in point of fact, it varied.[*] In 50^{7-9} a considerable funeral procession is described, such as are often represented on the tombs,—only (Ebers) without 'horsemen': see Plates LXVI. LXVII. LXVIII. in Wilk.-B. (iii. 444, 446, 449), or Erman, p. 320 f. The 'coffin' of 50^{26} is the mummy-case, or sarcophagus: the same word (אָרוֹן) is used in Phœn. of a sarcophagus.[†] It is remarkable that 110 (ib.) appears to have been regarded in Egypt as the ideal age for a man, and as the most perfect age to be desired. 'In the most ancient MS we possess, the Papyrus Prisse,[‡] a life of 110 years is declared to be the best; and in the Papyrus Anast. iv. (T. iv. l. 4) we read "Fulfil 110 years on the earth, whilst thy limbs are vigorous."' On a granite statue at Vienna there is a prayer to Isis to grant health and happiness for 110 years. 'Many similar passages speak of 110 years as the most perfect age to be desired, and therefore by the number 110 is inferred an especially blessed and prosperous life' (Ebers).

On the Egyptian names found in 41^{45}, see above, vol. i. 665^b; the same explanations are accepted, and cordially approved, by Ebers (*DB*² 1798 f.).[§] It is singular that the three types of name are otherwise not common till an age much later than that to which Joseph must be referred: those of the type Zaphenath-pa'aneaḥ appear first at the end of the 20th dyn. (one instance), and are frequent only in the 22nd (the dyn. of Shishak); of those of the type Potiphera,[||] Mr. Tomkins cites one (though not borne by a native Egyptian)[¶] in the 18th dyn., but otherwise they appear first in the 22nd, and are frequent only in the 26th dyn. (B.C. 664–525); those of the type Asenath are found now and then earlier, but are frequent only in the 21st dyn. and become common afterwards.[] It is, of course, unwise to build too much upon a negative argument; but the combination of names, otherwise all either rare or unknown at an early period, is certainly remarkable; and Steindorff, Brugsch, and Ebers all agree in inferring from the facts mentioned that the names in question did not originate before the 9th cent. B.C.[††] On ABRECH (41^{43}), see vol. i. p. 18: the explanation of Renouf, there given, is likewise that of Brugsch (Steininschrift, 83 f.).[‡‡]

There are also four or five Egyptian words in this part of Gn: but they are all words which were naturalized in Hebrew; they occur in other parts of the OT, and consequently afford no clue to the date of the narratives in which they are found. They are 'Pharaoh'; יְאֹר $41^{1.2.3.17.18}$, the common Heb. name for the Nile (Is 7^{18} and frequently); אָחוּ reed-grass, $41^{2.18}$ (also Job 8^{11}†); שֵׁשׁ fine linen, 41^{42} (also Ex 26^1 etc. [P], Ezk $16^{10.13}$ 27^7, Pr 31^{22}); and perhaps סַחַר (p. 773^a, note ), and חרטמים (p. 768^a, note ||).[*]

JOSEPH THE HUSBAND OF MARY.

I. IN THE NEW TESTAMENT.—(1) He is not mentioned by name in Mk,[†] and only indirectly in Jn 1^{45} 6^{42}. (2) Nor are the meagre accounts in Mt and Lk easy to reconcile. Both evangelists state that he was a descendant of David (Mt 1^{20}, Lk 2^4 [‡]), and that the Virgin Mary was already espoused to him when she became with child of the Holy Ghost (Mt 1^{18}, Lk $1^{27.35}$), and that he lived at Nazareth after the birth of our Lord (Mt 2^{23}, cf. 13^{55}, Lk 4^{22}, cf. ^{16}); but they treat each of these details differently.

(a) The Davidic Descent.—Mt, making Joseph the son of Jacob, traces his relation to David through kings, Lk through Heli and private persons (Mt 1^{1-17}, Lk 3^{23-38}).

(b) The Conception.[§]—Lk tells us of the Angelic Annunciation, and of Mary's meekness and faith (1^{26-38}); Mt begins at a later period (1^{18}), and lets us see Joseph's character under a sharp trial. He was a man who strove to conform to the precepts of the law (δίκαιος, cf. Lk 1^6 2^{25}), and had a keen sense of personal honour, yet was not so bound by law as to be unmoved by kindly feelings. He did not 'proclaim' Mary (δειγματίσαι), though it seemed to be his duty, but resolved to divorce her in as quiet and secret a way as possible.[||] Yet though he had already come to this decision, the appearance to him, in a dream, of an angel of the Lord, with the assurance of the true origin and the work of the Child, fully in accordance as the former was with the words of prophecy ('Quod si dubitas Isaiam audi,' Ephraem on Tatian, cf. Iren. iv. 23. 1, ed. Massuet), convinced him of his mistake. He therefore took Mary, and in full faith 'was dwelling in holiness with her' (Tatian's Diatess.) until she bare a son.

(c) Nazareth.—Lk tells us in $1^{26f.}$ that Mary lived in Nazareth, and was espoused to Joseph; and in 2^4 that Joseph went up out of Nazareth to Bethlehem with her. He therefore presumably (not quite necessarily) also himself lived in Nazareth before the birth of our Lord. Yet Mt $2^{22.23}$ gives no hint that Joseph had had any relation with Nazareth before his return from Egypt, and implies that he would have settled in Judæa but for fear of Archelaus and the direct warning that he received by dream. Assuming the truth of the inference from Lk's language, we must suppose that Mt was not concerned with matters of merely private importance, and that in accordance with his scheme of showing publicly the Messianic character of Jesus, he omitted everything that did not illustrate this. The significance of the birth being at Bethlehem (in the relation of that town to David and to the prophecy of Micah, and in its nearness to Rachel's tomb, Gn 35^{19} 48^{7}, with the midrashic application of Jer 31^{15}), and the interest of the removal to Egypt, make it natural that Nazareth should not be mentioned until this town in its turn affected the public life of Jesus. Mt then, in reference to our Lord's familiar name ('Jesus the Nazarene') being derived from it, characteristically connects it with prophetic words (2^{23}, Is 11^{1}).

[*] רָבִיד collar, 41^{42} (also Ezk 16^{11}†) is not the Egyp. name of the decoration mentioned on p. 773^b; and whether it is Egyptian at all is extremely doubtful: Harkavy (Journ. As. Mars-Avril, 1870, p. 182 f.) suggested 'sous toutes réserves' that it might be the Egyp. repit, 'image qu'on porte sur le cou, collier en forme d'image,' which occurs in ch. 162 of the Book of the Dead,—in Budge's tr. p. 290, '[This chapter] shall be recited over the image (repit) of a cow, which shall be made in fine gold, and placed at the neck of the deceased' (cf. Budge's Vocab. p. 194). This is slender evidence that repit (or erpit) means a 'collar.' There is a Sem. root, Arab. rabada, one meaning of which is to tie.

[§] Canon Gore (Bampton Lects., 1891, p. 78) points out that Mt narrates everything from Joseph's side, Lk from Mary's, and adds that this suggests that the narrative of Mt is ultimately based on Joseph's account, Lk on Mary's. If this be true we may conjecture that Mt's was derived mediately through James the Lord's brother.

[||] Dr. G. Dalman writes to the author of the present article as follows: 'Edersheim (Life and Times of Jesus, i. 154) is wrong in stating that Joseph had a choice in legally divorcing her either publicly or privately. Divorce has always been a private act. No public act of divorce exists. The gêt (bill of divorce, which is given solely in the woman's interest), never contains reasons for the divorce. Two witnesses are only necessary that they may state that the gêt was really handed over by this man to this woman. Keth. 74^b, 75^a, quoted by Edersheim, does not refer to divorce itself, but to doubts about the formal legality of an act of divorce which arose afterwards, and could become a reason for hearing the decision of a court of justice. Some Rabbis believed that no husband would be likely to resort to a measure which would expose his former wife to the shame of having to do with a court of justice.'

(3) We further learn from Lk that Joseph was present when the shepherds came to Bethlehem (2^{16}); that he as well as Mary brought up the Babe to present Him to the Lord, and marvelled at the things that were being said about Him ($2^{22.\ 33}$); that he used to go every year to Jerusalem at the passover ($2^{41.\ 42}$), certainly with Mary, and perhaps with the Child; and that when the Boy was twelve years old and stayed on after the days of the feast were over, he shared with Mary in the anxiety, and, like her, did not understand the naive wonder of Jesus at their searching for Him (2^{41-50}); yet his and Mary's authority remained unquestioned in the daily life of the home at Nazareth (2^{51}).

(4) We gather from the remaining references to Joseph that (a) our Lord was commonly known as Jesus ben-Joseph, Jn 1^{46} (? at Bethsaida), Lk 4^{22} at Nazareth, and Jn 6^{42} at Capernaum; and (b) Joseph was known, or remembered, as the carpenter (Mt 13^{55}).

(5) Nothing is said about Joseph's death. But the command to St. John at the Cross (Jn $19^{26.\ 27}$), and the reference to 'Mary the mother of Jesus, and His brethren' (Ac 1^{14}) immediately after the Ascension, imply that his death took place at least before the Crucifixion. Further, the fact that he is not mentioned with Mary and His brethren when they sought Him (Mt 12^{46} and parallels), suggests that he was already dead before the middle of our Lord's ministry. Probably the usual opinion is right, viz. that he was dead before our Lord's ministry began.

II. THE LIFE OF JOSEPH FROM APOCRYPHAL SOURCES.[*]—The account of Joseph is put into our Lord's mouth as He sat on the Mt. of Olives with His disciples (Death Jos., Boh. § i.). He is from Bethlehem, and marries his first wife when 40 years old, living 49 years with her in wedlock (ib. § xiv.). He has four sons and two daughters, his wife dying when James is still young. He and his two sons work as carpenters (Death Jos., Boh. § ii.). They, however, and his two daughters are married, and he dwells with James his youngest son (ib. Boh. § xi. 1). He is one year alone before Mary is given to him (ib. Boh. § xiv.). The priests seek a widower to whom they may espouse Mary (who has been in the temple from the age of three to twelve, to fourteen according to others); the heralds proclaim this through all Judæa, and Joseph, throwing away his axe, goes to meet them. The high priest takes the rods of all, enters into the temple, and prays, and returns the rods to each. There is no sign till Joseph receives his rod, the last of all, when a dove comes out of the rod and flies upon his head. The priest says, 'Thou hast been chosen by lot to take into thy keeping the virgin of the Lord.' But he refuses, saying, 'I have children; and I am an old man, and she is a young girl. I am afraid lest I become a laughing-stock to the sons of Israel.' But he receives her (Protev. §§ 8, 9). After two years (Death Jos. § xiv.), or four months (Niceph. Call. ii. 3, cf. Forbes Robinson, p. 187), the Annunciation takes place. The 'righteous old man,' coming in from his house-building in districts near the seashore (Pseudo-Matt. § 10), wishes to put her away privily, but on Mary's statement of her innocence hesitates, and is assured by the angel in a dream (Protev. §§ 13, 14). Yet both he and Mary are accused by Annas the scribe, and by the priest, and are tried by the ordeal of drinking water and going to the hill-country. But they return to the priest unhurt (Protev. §§, 15. 16) and go home.

Having heard of the order for enrolment, Joseph sets Mary upon an ass; his son leads it, and he himself follows (Protev. § 17). On arriving at Bethlehem he writes his name by a scribe, 'Joseph the son of David, and Mary his wife, and Jesus his son are of the tribe of Judah' (Death Jos., Boh. § vii.). He brings her to a tomb (Lord Crawford's MS), an inn (Death Jos., Sah. vii.), a cave (Protev. § 18), where he leaves her while looking for a midwife. He sees all nature stand still in wonder (Protev. § 18). He is mentioned as being present at some of the many miracles performed during the flight to Egypt and the sojourn there (Pseudo-Matt. § 19 sqq.; Arab. Gosp. §§ 10-35). Also after returning to Nazareth he is necessarily an actor in the painful tricks and precocious miracles ascribed to our Lord. He lives by his daily toil, 'never eating bread for nought, but doing according to the law of Moses' (Death Jos., Boh. § ix.). When he was an hundred and eleven years old his body was that of a youth, and he works at his trade of carpenter till the last day of his life (Hist. Jos. Carp. § 29), yet he is told that he is to die that year.[*] He goes up to Jerusalem, into the temple, repents before the altar, and prays. He returns to Nazareth, and laments. He is in great fear of death, and confesses to Jesus his sin in doubting Mary at the first, and in rebuking Him for His childish behaviour. Mary pleads with Jesus that Joseph may not die. While he himself is making the same request, his soul comes up to his throat. His children come and weep over him. Death comes with devils, who depart, rebuked by Jesus. Death is afraid (in Death Jos., Sah. III. § xxiii. Jesus is obliged to go out before Death will come in). Jesus prays. Angels take Joseph's soul (on Epepi 26=July 20), putting it into silk napkins of fine texture. Michael and Gabriel watch it; the angels sing before it till they give it to God. The inhabitants of Nazareth and Galilee gather together and mourn for him till the 9th hour, when they are put forth by Jesus, who pours water on the body and anoints it with oil. At Jesus' prayer two angels shroud the body. The body becomes incorrupt even until the banquet of the thousand years (Hist. Jos. Carp. § 26). Jesus promises blessing to those who commemorate each anniversary of Joseph's death, give bread in his name to the poor, and wine to strangers and others on the day of his commemoration; who write out the book of Joseph's going-forth from the body, or, if they are too poor, call their sons by the name of Joseph (Death Jos., Boh. § xxvi.). The great ones of the city coming to bury Joseph find his shroud already fastened to his body. They dig at the door of the cave to place his body there. Jesus prays and embraces Joseph, who is then buried.

[*] These are especially The Book of James (Protevangelium), The Life of the Virgin (Sahidic Fragments, published in Forbes Robinson's Coptic Apocryphal Gospels, 1896), The Death of Joseph (Bohairic and Sahidic, do.) which = The History of Joseph the Carpenter (Arabic), Liber de Infantiâ (Gospel of Pseudo-Matt.), The Gospel of the Nativity of Mary, The Arabic Gospel of the Childhood, The Gospel of Thomas.

For the dates of these see Lipsius in Dict. Christ. Biogr. ii. 700. The Protevangelium dates in its present form from perhaps the latter part of the 3rd cent. The rest from perhaps the 4th to the 6th cent. Many of these narrate the same incident, but one reference seemed to be sufficient here. It did not seem necessary to mention all minute variations of the legend.

[*] From here onwards the Death of Joseph (Boh.) is almost the sole authority.

III. THE CULT OF ST. JOSEPH.—Any notice of Joseph can in these days hardly be complete without some mention of his Cult, which has of recent years attained to such an extraordinary development.

(1) The latter part of the preceding section shows that to some writers, especially to those who lived in Egypt and occupied themselves with religious romances, Joseph's attractive personality afforded scope for religious devotion. But very little, if any, trace of this is to be seen in the Fathers.* St. Bernard of Clairvaux is the first writer to show it clearly. He says (if Mgr. Ricard's quotations may be trusted), 'Joseph alone among all men was, here below, the faithful co-worker of her who was the greatest of the works of God';† and again, 'Remember the ancient patriarch who was sold into Egypt, and know that this man (Joseph) not only inherited his name, but possessed, moreover, his chastity, his innocency, and his grace.'‡ Thomas Aquinas also writes strongly.§ But the Roman Church has given much credit to the writings of female mystics, who from the 14th cent. onwards have spoken much of the veneration with which St. Joseph is honoured. Thus Gertrude the Great († 1310) saw in her revelations, when the name of Joseph was pronounced 'all the saints bowed their heads with respect, as a sign of honour to that glorious patriarch, and congratulated him, and rejoiced with him on his incomparable dignity.'‖ St. Bridget of Sweden († 1373), Marie d'Agreda († 1665), Catherine Emmerich († 1824), give innumerable details of Joseph's life seen by them in visions, which are combined in popular lives of St. Joseph for Roman Catholic use to-day. Even Gerson at the Council of Constance (1414) says of Joseph's powers of intercession, 'non impetrat sed imperat.' St. Teresa († 1582), St. Francis de Sales, and Bossuet vie in exalting him.

(2) Further, the growth of the Cult may be seen in the public honours allotted to his feast, and in the status that he holds among the saints by the express decree of the pope. 'In Western Martyrologies of the 9th cent. the name of Joseph is found, and from the same time the Greeks commemorated him along with other saints of the Old Testament on the Sunday before Christmas, and along with Mary, David, and James the Less on the Sunday in the Octave of Christmas' (Cath. Dict. s.v. 'Joseph'). In the breviary of Sixtus IV. (1471–1484) the feast of St. Joseph (Mar. 19) is a simple rite; in that of Innocent VIII. (1484–1492) a double rite. Pius V. (1566–1572) ordered that the office of St. Joseph should be in that of confessors who were not popes. Gregory XV. in 1621 made it a feast of obligation for the whole world.* Urban VIII. in 1642 renewed this order. Clement XI. (1700–1721) arranged the hymns and all the parts of the office peculiar to St. Joseph, and raised it to the double degree of the second class. Much discussion was held as to the place in the Litany of the Saints which Joseph's name ought to take; but it was decided by Benedict XIII. in 1726 that it should precede the names of the Apostles and Martyrs, and follow immediately that of St. John the Baptist.

Two other feast days were added in honour of St. Joseph. One is the day of the Patronage of St. Joseph, which was fixed for the 3rd Sunday after Easter by the Congregation of Rites in 1680, and after being observed in a gradually increasing number of places was established throughout Roman Catholic Christendom by Pius IX. in 1847. The other is that of the betrothal or marriage of Mary and Joseph (for which an office was drawn up by Gerson), and allowed (with a different office) by Benedict XIII. in 1725 to be observed in all churches on Jan 23. 'The feast is kept in England as a greater double.'†

Lastly, Pius IX. in 1871 proclaimed St. Joseph Patron of the whole Church as follows: 'Our most Holy Lord, Pius IX., Pope, moved by recent deplorable events, was pleased to comply with the desires of the Prelates, and to commit to the most powerful patronage of the Holy Patriarch, Joseph, both Himself and all the faithful, and solemnly declared him Patron of the Catholic Church, and commanded his festival, occurring on the 19th day of March, to be celebrated for the future as a double of the first class, but without an octave, on account of Lent.'‡

But however much we may respect the faith of Joseph, and gladly recognize, not only Paul the tent-maker and Peter the fisherman, but also Joseph the carpenter, as confessedly high examples of the dignity of work, and of the spiritual reward that it receives, we can have little sympathy with teaching that stands in such lurid contrast to the reticence of the Gospels and of the early Church.

A. LUKYN WILLIAMS.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHÆA (Ἰωσὴφ [ὁ] ἀπὸ Ἀριμαθαίας).—A wealthy Israelite and member of the Sanhedrin (βουλευτής); a 'good man and a righteous' (Lk 23^{50}), who 'was looking for the kingdom of God' (Mk 15^{43}). On the situation of his native place, see ARIMATHÆA and ARUMAH. He was 'Jesus' disciple' (Mt 27^{35}), 'but secretly, for fear of the Jews' (Jn 19^{38}). He had not consented to the judgment of the Sanhedrin against Jesus (Lk 23^{51}), having either absented himself from the meeting (as Mk 14^{64} suggests) or refrained from giving a vote. After Christ's death, the approach of sunset made it difficult for the apostles—unprepared as they were, even if they had recovered their courage—to arrange duly for His reverent interment before the Sabbath began. Joseph, hitherto faint-hearted, rose to the occasion. He appears to have been present at the crucifixion, and his possession of a tomb, new and yet unused, hewn out of a rock in a neighbouring garden, suggested to him the thought of himself obtaining and burying the body of Jesus. The spectacle of the crucified Saviour had quickened his faith and love, and combined, doubtless, with his shame for past faint-heartedness, to raise him above the fear of man. His boldness is the more notable, because, to all human appearance, he was showing sympathy with a ruined cause, at the risk of persecution to death.* His request for the body from Pilate was successful, and he took or saw it taken down from the cross. According to the Acts of Pilate, Joseph sought the favour with tears and entreaties; but even if Pilate's humanity were not stimulated by a timely bribe, he would be disposed to show his sympathy with a councillor who had taken no part in constraining him to condemn Christ.† Joseph's example, presumably, moved Nicodemus to similar courage. Together they received the body and laid it in the tomb, Joseph providing the fine linen (σινδών) and grave-bands (ὀθόνια), Nicodemus the abundant spices (Mt $27^{57f.}$, Mk $15^{42f.}$, Lk $23^{50f.}$, Jn $19^{38f.}$, Gosp. of Pet. 3 f., 23 f., Acts of Pil. 11. 12).

* Roman Catholic writers (e.g. Mgr. Ricard, St. Joseph, sa vie et son culte, Lille, 1896) mention Irenæus, Origen, Eusebius, Epiphanius, Gregory of Nazianzus, Gregory of Nyssa, Hilary of Poitiers, Ephraem the Syrian, Cyril of Jerusalem, Chrysostom, Jerome, Augustine, Cyril of Alexandria, and Hilary of Arles as supporting the Cult of St. Joseph. But they seldom give references or distinguish between genuine and spurious works. Thus Augustine is quoted as saying, 'Rejoice, Joseph, that by the merit of the virtue of the angels you live so angelically as to be justly called the father of the Saviour.' This is doubtless from a spurious sermon in Migne, v. p. 2110. Irenæus says Joseph 'served Jesus with a continual joy' (adv. Hær. iv. 40, ed. Grabe, = 23. 1, ed. Massuet); but Irenæus really says, 'Joseph joyfully yielded obedience [to the angel] in regard to all the rest of the education of Christ' (Joseph et Mariam accepit et in reliqua universa educatione Christi gaudens obsequium præstitit).

The minuteness of the Gospel record, its preservation by all the four evangelists, and its later apocryphal expansion, are due not so much to the fulfilment of Is 53^{9}, still less to the growth of a myth (Strauss, New Life of Jesus, ch. xcvi.) based thereon (for the parallel, obscured by the Sept., is noted by no writer either of the apostolic or of the sub-apostolic age),‡ but to the desire, probably, (1) to signalize the adherence of a member of the hostile Sanhedrin; (2) to render prominent an incident so closely connected with Christ's Resurrection. None the less the correspondence with 'They made (or appointed) his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death,' if not exact, is striking; and even if a different original reference be adopted, it is difficult to regard as accidental the fresh significance given to the verse by the circumstances of our Lord's burial.§

A legend, which first appears in William of Malmesbury (de Ant. Glast. Eccl. i.), represents Joseph as sent by St. Philip from Gaul to Britain, along with eleven other disciples, in A.D. 63; as obtaining from a British king a small island in Somersetshire (afterwards the site of Glastonbury) engirt by the river Brue; and as building there, 'with twisted twigs,' the earliest Christian oratory in the land. Malmesbury, however, introduces the narrative with an 'ut ferunt,' in marked contrast to his reference of other statements in the same chapter to earlier historians. The absence, also, of any allusion to Joseph's advent in the histories of Gildas and Bede is significant. Probably some other Joseph, who founded Glastonbury, has been confounded with Joseph of Arimathæa. The story of Joseph bringing the Holy Grail to England dates from about 1200 A.D., and was probably composed by Walter Map. Ussher (Ant. Eccl. Brit. c. 16) mentions a tradition that Joseph freed Ireland from poisonous reptiles, a service usually attributed to St. Patrick.

JOSEPH BARSABBAS (AV Barsabas), surnamed Justus; one of the two disciples who had been followers of Jesus during the whole of His public ministry, and were therefore deemed suitable candidates for the apostolic office vacant by the treachery and death of Judas Iscariot (Ac 1^{23}). Barsabbas means 'son of Sabba.' It has been variously interpreted 'son of an oath,' 'son of an old man,' 'son of conversion,' 'son of quiet' (see Lightfoot, Hor. Heb.; Winer, Realwörterb.); but it was probably a patronymic, Joseph's father being named Sabba. If so, we must reject Lightfoot's suggestion, that he and Judas Barsabbas (Ac 15^{22}) were brothers of James the son of Alphæus. His Roman surname Justus was doubtless assumed after the manner frequent among the Jews at that time (cf. Ac 12^{12} 13^{1}). We have no information concerning him beyond what is implied in the one passage where he is mentioned. He is certainly to be distinguished from Joseph Barnabas (Ac 4^{36}) and from Judas Barsabbas (Ac 15^{22}); though it is not improbable, from the identity of the patronymic, that he and Judas were brothers. Eusebius (HE i. 12) makes him to have been one of 'the Seventy' (Lk 10^{1}), and this is not improbable. Eusebius (3^{39}) also relates from Papias a legend that Joseph Barsabbas 'drank a deadly poison and yet, by the grace of the Lord, suffered no harm.'

JOSEPH, PRAYER OF.—A lost Jewish apocryphon, mentioned in several catalogues of extra-canonical books. For information as to its contents we are indebted almost exclusively to a few quotations in the writings of Origen. In all the extant passages Jacob (not Joseph) is the speaker. He narrates a conversation he held with the wrestling angel Uriel; and claims to have read the tablets of heaven, and thus to know what is about to befall mankind. The work is said by Origen to have been in use παρ' Ἑβραίοις, and his quotations show it to have had an antichristian animus. It is a representative of a remarkable trend in Jewish theology, which led the Jews to claim for the three great patriarchs the same sublime and supernatural characteristics as the Christians claimed for the Lord Jesus. For instance, Jacob claims to be 'an angel of God and a ruling spirit'; 'the first-begotten (πρωτόγονος) of every creature animated by God'; 'an archangel of the power of the Lord'; and 'the first servant in God's presence.' The wrestling angel, whom Christians claimed to be the Messiah, is told by Jacob that he is only eighth in rank among the angels, Jacob himself being first of all; and in the same strain Abraham and Isaac are said to have been 'created before every (other) work.'

The correct text as adopted by WH and RV is Ἰησοῦ, so that this Joses gives place to Jesus). 2. One of the 'brethren of the Lord' (Mk 6^{3} $15^{40.47}$, Mt 27^{56}). In Mt 13^{55} where AV has Joses, RV adopts WH text Joseph (see Dalman,

* Similar intervention nearly cost Tobit his life (To 1^{19}), and actually led to the martyrdom of Porphyrius, a slave of Pamphilus, in the persecution of Diocletian (Eus. Mar. Pal. 11). The apocryphal Acts of Pilate and Narrative of Joseph represent the latter as imprisoned with a view to his execution.

† The Gospel of Peter represents Pilate as first asking Herod for the body. Keim's assertion (Jes. of Naz. vi. p. 256) that Jn 19^{38} contradicts $19^{31.32}$, is hypercritical; Joseph arrived, presumably, before the soldiers had completed their work.

‡ Justin Martyr twice quotes Is 53^{9} in connexion with the fulfilment of prophecy (1 Ap. 51, Dial. 97); but in neither case is there any reference to Joseph.

§ Gesenius and Knobel, following Jewish commentators, interpret 'rich' as=proud, ungodly, vicious (against which see Urwick, Servant of Jehovah, p. 145); Ewald, Cheyne (Introd. to Is. p. 429), and Duhm adopt, without MS authority, textual emendations, and read עָשׁוֹק oppressor (Ew.) or עֹשֵׁק defrauder (Ch. and Du.); in each case the word being referred to the Babylonians, among whom the 'Servant of the LORD' would die. The Bible Annotée paraphrases, 'He has been interred with criminals, but after his death he has been put by the Eternal (in Sheol) in the ranks of the most honourable.' Delitzsch⁴, Urwick, etc., retain the meaning 'rich' (literally), and emphasize the similarity between OT prophecy and NT history. The interpretation, 'his sepulchral mounds,' instead of 'in his death' (adopted by Lowth, Ew., Duhm, Ch. in Intr.), renders the parallel more conspicuous, but is not essential to its maintenance; 'in his death' may='when he died.'

JOSHBEKASHAH (יָשְׁבְּקָשָׁה).—A son of Heman, 1 Ch $25^{4, 24}$. There is reason to believe that this and five of the names associated with it are really a fragment of a hymn or prayer (see GENEALOGY, III. 23 n.; and cf. Kittel in SBOT, and W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 143 n.).

JOSHEB-BASSHEBETH (יֹשֵׁב בַּשֶּׁבֶת) occurs in RV of 2 S 23^8 as a proper name in place of the utterly meaningless 'that sat in the seat' of the AV. It is evident that the text is corrupt, and that the original name Jashobeam must be restored from the parallel passage, 2 Ch 11^{11}, just as the 'Hachmonite' must be substituted for the 'Tahchemonite.' (Cf. Driver, Heb. Text of Sam., ad loc.). Budde and others would go further. In Jashobeam itself they find a corruption of the original name, and they recover the latter by the following steps. In B we find Ἰεβόσθε, and in Luc. Ἰεσβάαλ, from which it is inferred that ישבבשבת= ישבעל=ישבשת (אשבעל), so that the name of David's commander was really Eshbaal. (See notes on 2 S 23^8 in Haupt's Sacred Bks. of OT, and in Kautzsch's AT). J. A. SELBIE.

JOSHIBIAH (יוֹשִׁבְיָה 'J" causeth to dwell'; Oxf. Heb. Lex. compares Phœn. ישבעל perhaps=ישבבעל).—A Simeonite chief, 1 Ch 4^{35}. See GENEALOGY.

i. THE NAME.—1. The English form Joshua is an abbreviation of the Heb. יְהוֹשׁוּעַ (only in Dt 3^{21}, Jg 2^7) or יְהוֹשֻׁעַ (the usual form, e.g. Ex 17^9, Dt 1^{38} etc., 1 K 16^{34}), later abbreviated to יֵשׁוּעַ (of Joshua himself, Neh 8^{17}) in order to avoid, it is said, the sequence of the vowels ô, û (SK, 1892, 177, 573; WZKM iv. 332 ff.). In Nu $13^{8, 16}$, Dt 32^{44} the form is הוֹשֵׁעַ, the same as that of the king of N. Israel (2 K 15^{30} etc.) and the prophet (Hos $1^{1, 2}$); but Dt 32^{44} is probably a textual error for יהושע, so Sam., Gr., Vulg., and Syr. (cf. Driver, in loco), and on Nu $13^{8, 16}$ (P) no reliance can be placed. The LXX give it as Ἰησοῦς, and so it occurs in the NT both as Joshua's own name (Ac 7^{45}) and that of our Lord (Mt $1^{21, 25}$). The name, Stade (Gram. 93) suggests, may be a Hiphil. More probably it is a compound 'J" is salvation.' The parallel forms אבישוע and אלישוע favour this (on this and the antiquity of the name see Gray, Heb. Proper Names, 155, 259). Cf. the Heb. אֱלִישָׁע, still more אֱלִישׁוּעַ and יִשְׁעִי, the Phœn. ישע, and the Himyarite יהשע, which Derenbourg transliterates Yuhashi.

Joshua the son of Nun, the successor of Moses in the leadership of Israel, is mentioned several times outside the Book of Joshua; but as the traditions concerning him are mainly found in the latter, it will be more convenient to examine its contents and composition before treating of his life.

ii. CONTENTS OF THE BOOK. — The Book of Joshua consists of twenty-four chapters, of which the first twelve take up the history of Israel from the point reached by the end of Deuteronomy, the death of Moses, and continue it through the conquest of Western Palestine; while the next nine record the division of the land among the tribes (12–21). An appendix gives Joshua's speech to Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh, his dismissal of them to E. Palestine (22^{1-9}); the controversy about the altar of Ed (22^{10-34}); the last days of Joshua and his death (23–24^{31}); the burial of Joseph's body (24^{32}), and the death of Eleazar son of Aaron (24^{33}).

iii. RELATION TO THE PENTATEUCH.—The Book of Joshua thus proves to be the necessary supplement and completion of the Pentateuch, of whose promises and obligations it records the fulfilment in the settlement of Abraham's descendants in Canaan (cf. Gn 12^7 etc.); in the execution (told in Deuteronomic language) of the Deuteronomic commands to Israel to take possession of the land and extirpate the Canaanites; and even in such details as the burial of Joseph's bones, which the patriarch made Israel swear they would carry up with them from Egypt (Gn 50^{25}).*

Notwithstanding this continuity of historical material and of plan, the Heb. Canon sharply separated the Book of Joshua from the Pentateuch: the Pentateuch comprises the first and earliest part of the Canon—the Torah; the Book of Joshua heads the later Canon of the Prophets, more especially the series of historical works, concluding with the Books of Kings and known as the Former Prophets. Besides, the book in its present form is an independent whole, with a definite beginning and conclusion; its orthography differs in several important details from that of the Pentateuch (e.g. it does not continue the epicene הוא and נַעַר of the Pentateuch, nor the form האל for האלה, and spells Jericho יְרִיחוֹ not as always in the Pentateuch יְרֵחוֹ); while in consequence of its later adoption into the Canon its text (cf. the numerous deviations of the LXX) is in a less certain form. For some time, therefore, the book was not brought under the methods of criticism and analysis to which the Pentateuch was subjected in the end of last and beginning of this century. But in 1792 the Scotsman, Father Geddes, in his translation of the Bible, wrote (vol. I. Preface, p. xxi): 'To the Pentateuch I have joined the Book of Joshuah (sic), both because I conceive it to be compiled by the same author, and because it is a necessary appendix to the history contained in the former books.'† But it was de Wette, Bleek, and Ewald who were the first to extend to Joshua the documentary theory of the composition of the Pentateuch. De Wette (see list of literature below), after vacillating, in successive editions of his Introduction, between the fragmentary and documentary hypotheses of the composition of the Pentateuch, finally adhered to the latter, and traced through Joshua the Elohist and Deuteronomic documents. In 1822 Bleek distinguished the basis of the book as Elohist, additions to it as by the Jahwist, and its final redaction as from the hands of the Deuteronomist. Soon after Bleek began his criticism, Ewald traced up to the end of Joshua all the documents into which he had already analysed the Pentateuch. The work was continued by other critics, the most prominent of whom have been Knobel, Schrader, Nöldeke, Hollenberg, Wellhausen, Vatke (whose results appear in his posthumous lectures on OT Introduction), Budde, Albers, Driver, Bennett, and Addis. Amid many varieties of opinion as to details, the analyses of this long list of scholars reveal a wonderful agreement, not only as to the presence in Joshua of all the Pentateuchal documents, but even as to the approximate proportions in which they stand to each other.* It is because of these results that OT criticism prefers to speak of the Hexateuch rather than of the Pentateuch.

* Cf. Jos $1^{1ff.}$ with Nu $27^{15ff.}$, Dt 3^{28} $31^{1-8. 23}$; 1^{12} with Nu 32, Dt $3^{18ff.}$; $8^{30ff.}$ with Dt $11^{29ff.}$ $27^{1-8. 11-14}$; 13 ff. with Nu 34; 14^{6-15} with Nu 14^{24}, Dt 1^{36}; 17^{1-6} with Nu 27^{1-11} 36^{1-12}; 20 f. with Nu 35.

† Hollenberg, in his account of the criticism of Joshua (SK, 1874, p. 463), is, therefore, so far wrong in naming de Wette as the first to recognize that the analysis of Joshua must follow the lines of that of the Pentateuch.

iv. THE CONSTITUENT DOCUMENTS. — Critics, then, agree that all the chief documents of the Pentateuch are present in Joshua, and indeed this is obvious to any reader of the original who is familiar with the characteristic style and favourite topics of these documents. But the documents are present with certain ambiguities and complications, and these present a number of problems unsolved and perhaps insoluble, which are peculiar to the criticism of Joshua, as contrasted with that of the Pentateuch.

In the following analysis we start with the Deuteronomic elements, the spirit and style of which are so readily recognized. We have seen that the book is faithful to the spirit of the Deuteronomic code—even to the extent of idealizing the facts—in so far as Deuteronomy commands Israel to take full possession of the land and extirpate the native inhabitants. But the Deuteronomic dialect is also frequently observed. The following is a list and analysis of the Deuteronomic passages. They are found chiefly in chs. 1–12, and in the Appendix, chs. 21–24.

(a) The Deuteronomic Passages in Joshua.—It is not without significance that the introduction is one of the most plainly Deuteronomic passages of the Book. Ch. 1 is not only written in manifest continuation of the end of the Bk. of Deuteronomy (as completed, critics now take for granted, by a Deuteronomic editor), but it is composed almost throughout in the Deuteronomic style. Vv.$^{3-5a}$ are expanded from Dt $11^{24.\ 25a}$; Dt 31^{23} is echoed in vv.$^{5b.\ 6.\ 17b.\ 18b}$; Dt 4^{6} 29^{8} (Heb.) in v.^{7}; Dt $1^{29.\ 30}$ 20^{3} 31^{6} in v.^{9}; Dt 11^{31} in v.^{11b}. Terms used only in Dt, or in the meaning in which they are employed in Dt, are scattered through the chapter (e.g. the intransitive ערץ, and שטרים in the sense of officers who communicate the orders of the chief to the people). The appeal to the Law and the Book of the Law are also Deuteronomic, and so, too, the number of the tribes settled E. of the Jordan as 2½ (cf. v.^{12} with Dt 3^{13-21}), while JE (Nu $32^{1-5.\ 20f.}$) states them as 2. At the same time there are complications. The phrases משרת משה (v.^{1}), חמשים and גבורי החיל (v.^{14}), are not phrases of the Dt style, which has other terms for the two latter; the details in v.^{11a} might have been stated by any writer. These facts have led some to conclude that a JE narrative underlies this Dt introduction to the Book. It should be observed that the Dt parallels and echoes in the chapter are all taken from the historical and parenetic portions of the Bk. of Dt which most critics now assign to another hand than that which drew up the legal kernel of the Book, chs. 12–26. 28.

In ch. 2, vv.$^{10.\ 11}$ (and perhaps v.^{24}) are not only Deuteronomic in language, but express a favourite thought of the Deuteronomist—the fear which Israel and the wonderful deeds of J″ produced on the inhabitants of W. Palestine. Chs. 3 and 4, on the Crossing of Jordan, are obviously compiled from several sources, for they contain not only differences of style, but of substance. There are, firstly, clauses in the Dt dialect deducing from the events described the Dt doctrines (3^{7} 4^{14} the magnifying of Joshua in the eyes of Israel; $4^{21.\ 24}$ the duty of teaching future generations the meaning of the events, and the impression of these on the Canaanites); and, secondly, in other parts of the narrative, characteristic Dt phrases occur (3^{2-4} הכהנים הלוים, etc.); but, thirdly also, there are traces of an original Dt account of the monument raised to commemorate the passage ($4^{2.\ 3a.\ 8}$, cf. vv.$^{21.\ 24}$), which differs from the two JE accounts of the same (see below), in so far as it makes the monument to consist of 12 stones brought by 12 men from the bed of Jordan, and places it at Gilgal. In chs. 5 and 6 (the Taking of Jericho), 5^{1}, the fear of the Canaanites has an echo of Dt, as also $6^{2.\ 27}$ are supposed to have (cf. v.^{2} with Dt 2^{24} 3^{2} etc., and v.^{27} with Dt 2^{7-25}). In ch. 7 (Achan's Trespass) no Dt elements can be detected with certainty (though some seem to occur in vv.$^{12b.\ 14.\ 15}$) till the obvious Dt redaction of v.$^{24f.}$, on which see below among the JE passages. In 8^{1-29} (the Taking of Ai) touches of the Dt style may be detected in vv.$^{1.\ 2.\ 27b}$.

Ch. 8^{30-35} is a passage of peculiar difficulty. The linguistic evidence proves it to be in the main from the hand of a Deuteronomist editor, but besides containing, as the Dt redaction sometimes does, a trace of the priestly writer (in the phrase כגר כאורח v.^{33}), it records a fact, the building of an altar at Mt. Ebal, which conflicts with the principal law of Dt, that there shall be only one sanctuary in the land. It apparently refers to two passages in Dt ($11^{29.\ 30}$ which orders blessing to be set on Gerizim, but cursing on Ebal, and the very composite 27^{1-13}, which enjoins the erection of plastered stones, when Israel crosses Jordan, and the inscription on them of the Torah vv.$^{2.\ 8}$; that this shall be at Ebal v.^{4}, and that an altar of unhewn stones shall be raised there for sacrifice to Jehovah; and that the tribes shall be divided to bless opposite Gerizim and curse opposite Ebal), yet it does not wholly agree with either of these (for it records a reading of the whole law where 11^{29} speaks only of the blessing and cursing, and 27^{1-13} speaks only of the writing of the Law). Jos 8^{30-35} appears therefore not to have been composed with the mere view of recording the fulfilment of the aforesaid Dt injunctions (and indeed it ignores Dt 27^{14-26} altogether), but to be an independent* writing based on documents, part of which, the building of the Ebal altar, cannot be Deuteronomist, but is more likely to belong to E, whose interest in northern sanctuaries is constant.† (It is to E that the corresponding passage Dt $27^{5.\ 6}$ is assigned: on the historical questions raised by the passage, see below).

In ch. 9 (the Guile of Gibeon) the introduction

---

* In opposition to these analyses, defenders of the unity of the book, and (to a greater or less degree) of its independence, have appeared in J. L. König (1836), and Keil in his Commentary. See also Lex Mosaica, and Principal Douglas in his handbook on Joshua.

* The Dt passages, the first of which is an interpolation, the second an extraordinarily composite paragraph (in parts contradictory of itself), may, indeed, have been inserted in Dt subsequent to the appearance of the passage in Joshua.

† The description of the altar is very like Ex 20^{25}.

(vv.$^{1.2}$, cf. Dt 1^{7}, Jos 1^{4}) and the closing words (v.^{27b} the Dt formula 'the place which He shall choose') are Deuteronomic; so, too, vv.$^{9b.10}$ (the reference to Sihon and Og) and vv.$^{24.25}$ (cf. Dt 20^{10-18}). In ch. 10 (The Victory of Gibeon and Conquest of the South), which is covered by the Dt introduction $9^{1.2}$, there are many fragments of the Dt style, vv.$^{8.12a.14b}$ (the introduction and close of the story of J which is gathered round the quotation from the Bk. of Jashar: the phrase in v.^{12a} 'in the day . . . Israel' is used 9 times in Dt, and nowhere else in the Pent.; the phrase in v.^{14b} יהוה נלחם לישראל is also Dt, but there is no reason why it might not have been used by another writer), and vv.^{19b} (perhaps), ^{25}; besides vv.$^{28-43}$, the summary of the Conquest of the South, which by other documents, Jos 15^{14-19}, Jg 1^{10-15}, is attributed to Judah and Caleb. Ch. 11 (the Conquest of the North) is also treated in the summary arrangement of the Deuteronomist, and mainly in Dt language; while ch. 12 is assigned by virtually all critics to a Deuteronomic hand on the ground that vv.$^{1-6}$ follow Dt $3^{9-12.14-17}$ rather than the parallel Nu 21^{1-31} (Og is again joined with Sihon), and that Dt touches appear in the following verses. The list of kings vv.$^{9-24}$ might be from any source.

In the Second Section of the Book, the Division of the Land, chs. 13–21, the Dt passages are few. Here again the introduction is one of them, 13^{1-14}, a summary description of the land still unconquered, and a charge to divide what is conquered among the 9½ tribes; and a description of E. Palestine studded not only with phrases but facts peculiar to the Deuteronomist (e.g. v.^{14} ‖ Dt 18^{1}; v.^{7} 2½ tribes; v.^{12} Og; cf. also vv.$^{7-14}$ generally with the Dt passage Jos 12^{1-6}). There are, too, signs of an attempt to harmonize two differing accounts of the conquest (cf. Wellh. Comp. des Hex. p. 129; Kuenen, Onderz. i. 1, § 7, n. 27). Ch. $14^{6.7}$ is Deuteronomic; so, too, chs. $18^{7.10b}$ 21^{41-43}, which represent the conquest of the Holy Land as in complete fulfilment of the Divine promise: a representation not consistent with other passages nor borne out by the subsequent history, but in harmony with the Deuteronomist's ideal treatment of the subject. It is remarkable that in ch. 20 the Dt additions do not occur in the LXX. In the Appendix chs. 22–24, Joshua's charge to the 2½ tribes (ch. 22^{1-8}), and his last charge to the nation (23^{1-16}), are in the well-known hortatory style of Dt.

(b) The Priestly Writing in Joshua.—It is most convenient to take this next. In the First Section, chs. 1–12, the passages from P are few and fragmentary, and consist either (a) of additions to the narrative of dates and statistics (about which, however, there is this difficulty, that, though such things are characteristic of P in the Pentateuch, they do not in Joshua always agree with other statistics given by P, and being but bare figures cannot be proved on evidence of language to belong to P); or (b) of the substitution of characteristic terms of P for the corresponding terms of other documents; or (c) of statements with regard to the ritual and enforcement of the Law. Of the first of those three classes are 3^{4} (?) $4^{13.19}$; of the second 5^{4} הזכרים כל אנשי המלחמה (6^{4}), and the evident expansion of 7^{24} and 7^{25} וירגמו אתו כל ישראל אבן, 10^{27} עד עצם היום הזה (11^{13}); of the third class 5^{10-12} the account of the Passover, 6^{22b} 7^{1} 9^{17-21} 11^{13}.

In the Second Section, on the Division of the Land, the bulk is from P (all, in fact, except the Dt passages already cited, and a few from JE which will be cited immediately). This is clear from the presence of the characteristic marks of P's style, and the agreement of the injunctions with those laid down in the Priestly Legislation in the Pentateuch. Besides the bulk of the contents, the opening and closing formulas of the various paragraphs of this section are from P. In short, in this section, as in the Pentateuch, P furnishes the framework. In the Appendix, ch. 22^{9-34} (which emphasizes the centralization of the worship by the account of the altar that was 'by Jordan') displays many of the characteristic marks of P's style. There are, however, other features which suggest an independent author.

(c) The Jahwist-Elohist Documents in Joshua.—As in the Pentateuch, the bulk of the narrative in Joshua belongs to the double document, known to critics as JE. To the trained eye the style is easily distinguished from that of Dt or P. When, however, we seek to discriminate its two constituents, which in the Pentateuch are so often discernible from each other, we receive little or no assistance from the style or the language. It exhibits, however, another and far more decisive difference. Again and again in the JE portions of Joshua it becomes evident that two accounts of the same event have been welded together, for the statements not only repeat each other with a redundancy utterly foreign to the crisp style of either of the two documents J and E, but in details often conflict with each other. In ch 1 there are only fragments of JE. Ch 2 is all JE, except vv.$^{10.11}$. So, too, chs. 3. 4, the Crossing of Jordan, except the Dt fragments noted above. But when these have been put aside, the remainder reveals the presence of two narratives (as Wellhausen was the first to point out); according to one of which a monument to commemorate the Passage was built at Gilgal with stones taken from the river's bed by the people, but according to the other was set up in the river's bed, and consisted of 12 stones carried by 12 representatives of the tribes. This difference (in addition to the 3rd story of the Deuteronomist referred to above) is apparent not only from the statements in $4^{8.9}$, but from the fact that while 3^{17} describes the people as having all passed over, $4^{4.5.10b}$ treat them as still about to cross. Again, 3^{12} and 4^{2} cannot belong to the same narrative, for they are simply 'doublets'; yet 3^{12} is presupposed by 4^{4}. The two narratives may be thus distinguished—(1) $3^{1.5.10.11.13-17}$ $4^{1-3.8}$; and (2) 3^{12} $4^{4-7.9-11a}$. Of these two accounts it is not easy to say which is J and which E.

Ch. 5 (events between Jordan and Jericho) is one of the most complicated parts of the text of Joshua. V.^{1}, as we have seen, is Dt. Vv.$^{2.3.8.9}$ (the record of the circumcision of the people by Joshua), are from JE. But into v.^{2} words have been inserted—they are not found in the LXX—implying that Joshua did this a second time; and vv.$^{4-7}$ (the LXX here offers a widely different reading) interpolate an account of the reasons of the operation, which is not consistent with JE's statement in v.^{9}, that it was undertaken for the purpose of 'rolling away the reproach of Egypt.' These words are in themselves an obviously wrong interpretation of the term Gilgal, i.e. 'stone-circle,' and can only mean that in the opinion of the writer Israel had been uncircumcised in Egypt, and that this neglect, which had excited the reproach of the circumcised Egyptians, was now at last repaired. In contradiction to this, vv.$^{4-7}$ declare that the Israelites while in Egypt were circumcised, but that generation had all died, and those who were born after the Exodus had not been circumcised, which neglect Joshua now made good. The phraseology of these four verses is partly P's, but most critics take them, along with the words interpolated in v.^{2}, to be the addition of a later writer, who was anxious to harmonize JE's account with previous reports of P about circumcision. The end of ch. 5 (vv.$^{13-15}$) also presents a difficulty. It is generally assigned to JE; but some critics, on the alleged ground that the phrases צבא יהוה and שר as applied to an angel are found only in late writings, take the passage to be one of the very latest additions to the Bk. of Joshua. So Kuenen. This reason is not conclusive. It was an early belief that Jehovah had a heavenly host (cf. 1 K 22^{19}), the belief in individual angels with special functions was also early, and we need not take שר in the special sense in which it is intended when applied to angels in the Bk. of Daniel, but simply in its early signification of a military officer. Vv.$^{13-15}$ may therefore very well be left to JE.

The whole of ch. 6 (the Fall of Jericho), except vv.$^{2 \text{ and } 27}$, belongs to JE, but we meet in it the same phenomenon as in chs. 3 and 4, the presence (again first detected by Wellhausen) of two differing accounts—one (vv.$^{3. 7a. 10. 11}$ partly $^{14. 15a}$ 'and it came to pass . . . manner,' $^{15b. 20}$ 'and the people shouted') which relates that Israel marched round Jericho on 7 successive days, the first 6 silently, but on the 7th they shouted at the word of Joshua, and the walls fell; and the other (vv.^{4} partly, $^{5. 7b. 8. 9}$, parts of vv.$^{13. 15}$, vv.$^{16a. 20b}$) which relates that a portion of the armed men marched round the city 7 times on one day, having in their midst the ark and priests with trumpets, and that at the 7th round the people shouted at the signal of the trumpets, and the walls fell. Cf. especially vv.$^{16 \text{ and } 20}$; in the latter the people shout both before and after the trumpets, though v.^{16} enjoins them not to shout till the trumpets give the signal. As in chs. 3. 4 it is not easy to assign these double accounts, present in ch. 6, respectively to J and E.

In ch. 7 (the Defeat before Ai and Achan's Sin and Doom) all is from JE except v.^{1} and parts of vv.$^{24. 25}$. The latter verses afford so instructive an example as to how the original JE narrative has been worked upon by subsequent editors that it is worth examining their details. To begin with, the LXX omits in v.^{24} the words ואת־הכסף—הזהב, and in v.^{25} וירגמו—באש. Moreover, in v.^{24} the term 'and all Israel' has been separated from its fellow-nominative 'Joshua' at the beginning of the verse * by the words omitted in the LXX, and by the rest of the catalogue of Achan's property, while in v.^{25} not only does the phrase beginning וירגמו 'and they stoned him with stones,' which is in the language of P, form a mere doublet to the phrase introduced by ויסקלו 'and they stoned them with stones,' but when we remove the former, the latter is still preceded by the words 'and they burned them with fire,' an impossible order: we cannot conceive of Achan and his property as first burned and then stoned. Besides, while v.^{26}, which is JE, speaks of a cairn being raised over Achan alone, v.^{24} describes them as brought up to the valley of Achor, and v.^{25} describes them as being burned and stoned. Of this confusion Albers has given the following reasonable explanation. The original JE narrative recorded the punishment only of Achan, but a Deuteronomic editor, wishing to bring the process into conformity with Dt 13$^{16. 17}$, which enjoins that goods subject to the Ḥerem or Ban shall be burned, has added to v.^{24} the catalogue of Achan's property, which we have already seen to be an evident intrusion, and to v.^{25} the notice of the burning which we have seen to be impossible before that of the stoning. This editor must have also changed the 'him' of both these verses into 'them'; it is remarkable that in both the LXX has 'him.' If, now, we take out of the verses those intruded elements of Dt and P, the JE remainder reads consistently: 'And Joshua, and all Israel with him, took Achan the son of Zerah, and brought him (LXX A) to the valley of Achor; and Joshua said, "Why hast thou brought trouble upon us? Jehovah will bring trouble upon thee." And they stoned him (LXX BA; αὐτούς F) with stones.'

In ch. 8$^{1-29}$ (the Taking of Ai) everything except the Dt fragments already noticed is from JE. But as in chs. 3. 4. 6, two accounts appear to have been fused (though it is not certain how we are to divide them between J and E). This is clear not only from the reduplication of certain details (vv.$^{14. 18}$ etc., see below), and awkward connexions (v.^{14}, and v.^{18} with v.^{19}), but still more from a double and contradictory story of the ambush, as well as from an attempt in the Massoretic text to reconcile these, and from the omission by the LXX both of the attempt and of the contradictory data. The first of the two accounts starts with v.^{3} (perhaps earlier, for though vv.$^{1. 2}$ are mainly Dt, they contain other elements). According to this, after Joshua and all the army started from Gilgal for Ai, he chose and sent forward * 30,000 (? 3000) men by night to conceal themselves on the opposite or western side of Ai, and charged them to wait there till the army should pretend to flee from Ai, and drawing its inhabitants out of it, leave it empty, when the ambush were to take possession. The men chosen go forth and effect this movement, while Joshua passes the same night in the valley (in v.^{9} for עם read with Ewald עמק). At this point the second account starts from v.^{10}, or at least from v.^{11}, which relates that all the people (omit for grammatical reasons the words 'of war') which were with him came over against Ai,† and (v.^{12}) Joshua took about 5000 men and 'set them as an ambush between Bethel and Ai, westward of Ai.' Then comes the difficult v.^{13}, which seems an attempt to combine and summarize the two accounts. The Greek translator, or the editor of the texts he used, feeling that the combination was impossible, has substituted for 8^{11b} the word 'eastward,' and for ^{12b}, with its contradictory data, the words 'the ambushes of the city from the sea (i.e. westward)'; and has omitted all v.^{13}. To this explanation the only alternative is that the data in v.^{12}, which conflict with those of the previous account of the ambush, and v.^{13} have been added to the Massoretic text after the LXX translation was made, which is hardly possible. V.^{14} alike by its repetitions, in different words, of the same actions and the awkward grammar by which they are combined, is obviously the fusion of two accounts—one: 'And it came to pass, when the king of Ai saw, that he and all his people hastened to the . . .‡ in front of the Arabah, not knowing of the ambush against them behind (to the west of) the city'; the other: 'And the men of the city rose up early, and came forth to meet Israel in battle.' The Israelites flee, and draw the men of Ai § after them. Here, again, in vv.$^{16. 17}$ there are small doublets, and so, in fact, to the end of v.^{29} (e.g. in v.^{20b} the people fleeing to the wilderness 'turn on their pursuers,' omitted by LXX; yet in v.^{21} 'Joshua and all Israel see that the ambush have taken the city, and that smoke goes up, and turn and smite the men of Ai'; and in v.^{24} במדבר בשרה). These are quite enough (without supposing that a different use has been imputed to Joshua's javelin in v.^{18} from that in v.^{26}) to prove the fusion of two tales of the same event. V.^{27} is of course Dt. In the Dt passage vv.$^{30-35}$ the part that must have been taken from E has been already pointed out.

* Though in AV they have been brought together.

* V.^{3a}. Some scholars think that according to this first account Joshua sent his ambush ahead from Gilgal. This can be maintained only by denying that v.^{3a} belongs to the first account. But there is no cause in the clause itself for separating it from what follows. And it is not probable that any account would have made Joshua send the ambush ahead from Gilgal, for this place is 6 or 7 hours distant from Ai, and if the main body had remained there during the night in which the ambush took up its position west of Ai, starting next morning, it would not have reached Ai till the ambush had been exposed for several hours to the daylight. Take v.^{3a} with what follows it, and we find the first account imply that the ambush was not chosen and despatched till the whole army had gone up towards Ai, which does not contradict the second and more detailed account, that it started after Joshua and the army had arrived in the neighbourhood of Ai.

† This still may be, though not probably, the first account.

‡ לַמּוֹעֵד 'to the appointed place.' Dillmann's theory, that one of the two narratives had previously described this tryst, is surely impossible, for the men of Ai did not know of Israel's arrival. Bennett emends למורד 'to the descent.'

§ Heb. adds 'and Bethel,' but LXX omits; it must be the addition of a late scribe inserting an allusion to Jg 1.

In ch. 9 (the Guile of Gibeon), after the Dt introduction in vv$^{1.\,2}$, the JE narrative commences independently in v.^{3}. Its style is distinguishable from the Dt portions, vv.$^{9b.\,10.\,24.\,25.\,27b}$; and both in style and substance it differs from the P account, vv.$^{15b.\,17-21}$. But even within JE a double account is as discernible as it was in the JE portions of chs. 3. 4. 6 and 8: cf. the doublets in vv.$^{6-9a}$.* In ch. 10$^{1-27}$ we have the JE account of the defeat by Joshua of the kings of Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Debir, all with territories that afterwards became Judah's. Vv.$^{1-11.\,16-27}$ read continuously, and relate fully how God smote the Canaanites before Israel by a great hailstorm. Vv.$^{12-15}$ break into this with a story suggested by an ancient verse of poetry, a prayer of Joshua for a day long enough to slay his foes; they add that this prayer was answered by God commanding the sun to stand still for a whole day in the heavens, and that Joshua and his force returned to their camp; while vv.$^{16\text{ff.}}$ relate that they continued the pursuit of the 5 kings whose forces had been beaten by the hailstorm recounted in v.^{11}. Vv.$^{12-15}$ are plainly an interpolation by another, who finding in the Bk. of Jashar this poetical ejaculation of Joshua for a day sufficient for his big task, prosaically added, vv.$^{13b.\,14}$, that this actually happened. This account of the defeat of the southern kings is not compatible with that in ch. 15$^{13\text{ff.}}$ and in Jg 1$^{1\text{ff.}}$ (see below, § vii.). In ch. 11$^{1-10.\,13}$ we have the JE account of the conquest of N. Canaan.

In the Second Section, chs. 13–21, on the Division of the Land, the portions by JE are comparatively few, some of them mere fragments: in ch. 13, vv.$^{1-18}$, in ch. 15, vv.$^{14-19.\,63}$ (see below, § vii.), in ch. 16, vv.$^{1-3}$, the boundary of Joseph; v.^{10} the Canaanite enclaves at Gezer and in Ephraim, the latter assigned to E; in ch. 17, vv.$^{1-2}$ details on Manasseh, and vv.$^{10b-18}$ Manasseh's difficulties with the Canaanites and Joshua's treatment of the house of Joseph; in ch. 18, vv.$^{2-6.\,8-10}$ Joshua's allotment of land to 7 tribes, by casting lots; in ch. 19^{9} a detail about Simeon, vv.$^{47.\,48}$ the removal of Dan to Laish (see below, § vii.), and vv.$^{49.\,50}$ the tribes take possession and Joshua gets Timnath-serah.

In the Appendix (chs. 22–24) the whole of ch. 24, except a few insertions from Dt and P, is assigned to E.

v. Problems of the Relation and Composition of the Documents.—The evidence thus collected from the text itself of the Bk. of Joshua, may be ambiguous in this or that detail; but its cumulative force and its main direction are unmistakable. Were it only by the 'doublets' it contains on the various episodes of the conquest, and by the different degrees of completeness to which various passages describe the division of the land to have been carried, the Bk. of Joshua is amply proved to be a compilation from several sources. Of these, the oldest, which supplies the bulk of the narrative of the conquest in chs. 1–12, and gives the conclusion of Joshua's history in ch. 24, but also supplies some details concerning the division of the land, belongs by linguistic evidence to the document entitled by critics JE. This document is itself composed from two narratives; for, as we have seen, in those parts of it which run through chs. 3, 4, 6 and 8, two accounts of the same episodes, the crossing of Jordan and the taking of Jericho and of Ai, have obviously been combined;* and in chs. 13–21, later passages (18$^{2-6.\,8-10}$ and perhaps others) have been added to it, whether by the hand that combined its constituents it is impossible to say. Alongside these written traditions in JE of the Conquest and Division of the Land, there appears to have existed, either in whole or part, at least one other written tradition, and perhaps two. The passages in chs. 1–12, which on linguistic evidence are assignable to P, seem to have been taken from a Priestly narrative of the Conquest, and there was certainly a Priestly account of the Division of the Territory from which the bulk of chs. 13–21 is taken. But there are also accounts of some events of the Conquest, notably that of the monument at Gilgal (4$^{2.\,3a.\,8}$, cf. vv.$^{21-24}$), and the summary of the Conquest of the South (9$^{28-43}$), which seem to imply that there was, in addition to the two other accounts just noted above, one independent Deuteronomic account of the Conquest.

But if the existence of an original Dt narrative of the facts of the Conquest be uncertain, there was another hand at work of the same spirit and style of language. In chs. 1–12 the great majority of the Dt passages do not give evidence of belonging to an independent account of the same events as are described in JE, but consist of introductions to the various sections, the bulk of the narrative in which is JE, and of connexions and transitions; or they point out how the events related in JE illustrate the favourite doctrines of the Deuteronomic writers and enforce the Deuteronomic legislation. All these passages are easily separable from the narratives to which they have been added, and sometimes (as in ch. 7$^{24.\,25}$) it is clear that their insertion has not been accomplished without the modification of the original text. And, besides, single phrases characteristic of the Dt style have been scattered over most of the chapters. All this points to one conclusion. A Deuteronomic writer has 'edited,' not only chs. 1–12, but the whole book. His is the framework of the whole, his its connexion with the Bk. of Deuteronomy, the modification of the JE narratives, and the lessons deduced from them. Who he was, whether he can be identified with the author of the original Dt law-book (which is improbable), or the author of the historical supplements to the latter, or was another writer of the same spirit and style, are questions that divide critics, and depend on the still unsettled problems as to the composition of the Bk. of Deuteronomy itself.† It would be misleading, however, to take for granted that this Deuteronomic redaction was completed by one hand at one time. The reasons for supposing that various strata (though all in the Deuteronomic spirit and style) are represented in it will appear from the next paragraph.

The question of the relation of this Deuteronomic redaction (or redactions) to the elements of P which appear in Joshua is a very difficult one. Was the Dt redaction (or redactions) completed upon JE and the independent Dt traditions (described above), and was the whole only then combined with the passages from P? Or did the Dt redaction take place subsequently to P? The former of these alternatives is accepted by Driver (Introd.^{6} p. 104). But there is important evidence in favour of the latter. In the Bk. of Joshua, P does not occupy the regulative position, nor supply the framework, as it does in the Pentateuch. And in the Massoretic text of Joshua portions of P have apparently been subjected to the Dt revision; in ch. 20, for instance, the substance is from P, the additional matter is Deuteronomic (see vv.$^{4-6}$). Again, while most of the Dt passages appear in the LXX translation, and are therefore to be regarded as prior to it, a number are not found in it. For example, in ch. $7^{24.\ 25}$ we saw that the LXX reproduces only some of the Dt modifications of the JE account of Achan's punishment, and the verses ch. 20^{4-6} (just cited), in which Deuteronomic additions are manifest, are not found in the LXX (B). It is also probable that ch. 22^{9-34} was written subsequently to the Priestly Code (cf. W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 413, and Bennett, Primer, 90). Throughout the book, too, we find some words from a very late stage of the language (Dillmann, p. 442). All this implies that what Bennett (Bk. Jos. p. 22) calls 'very probable' is a certainty: the Deuteronomic redaction of the Bk. of Joshua is from more than one hand. Some of it, according to the evidence of the LXX, must be very late. Accordingly we understand why no author's name has been assigned to the Bk. of Joshua:* it takes its title from its subject and is an anonymous work. The points upon which an early author, or even one contemporary with the events described, has been assumed, are either illusory (e.g. the reading of 5^1 עברנו should be עברם), or can only prove the date of one or other of the constituent documents. The final redaction affords no historical allusion by which its date might be fixed.

* The attempt by Budde, p. 50, to get rid of the differences by emending the text, has not convinced critics.

* We have also seen that it is not possible to assign these, on linguistic evidence, respectively to J and E.

† See the discussions in the works, cited below, of Hollenberg, Kuenen, Dillmann, and Kittel. Hollenberg's conclusion is that not the original Deuteronomist, but the Deuteronomic editor who combined Deuteronomy with the rest of the Pentateuch and added to it chs. 1–4. 27. 29–31, is the writer of these passages in Joshua. Dillmann assigns them in the main to the author of the Bk. of Deuteronomy; Kuenen, either to a writer or writers akin in spirit and style to the author of Dt 1–4, etc.; so virtually Kittel, to a D^{2} whom (not certainly but on the whole) he takes to have been different from D^{1}. There is a curious difference between the Dt passage Jos 1$^{3-5}$ and Dt 11$^{24.\,25a}$; but it is not very great, and does not carry us far in the discussion of the question.

vi. Separation from the Pentateuch, and Date.—Another set of problems is raised by the relation of Joshua to the Pentateuch. Most critics have held that the Bk. of Joshua was separated from the rest of the Pentateuch after JE, D, and P had been combined, but Bennett (A Primer of the Bible, 1897, p. 90) thinks that the JE, D, and P portions of Jos were combined by another and later editor than the editor who combined the same documents in the Pentateuch. This is certainly borne out by the different rank, alluded to above, which is assigned to P in the Pentateuch and in Joshua. But, whatever be the answer to these questions, the reason of the separation of the Book of Joshua from the Pentateuch when the latter became canonical in Israel in Ezra's time is very intelligible. The legislation really closes with Deuteronomy and the account of Moses' death, and it was legislation which Ezra and Nehemiah were anxious to enforce. That the Bk. of Joshua was not regarded in Israel as what we call canonical till long after the Torah or Five Books of Moses had reached that rank, is clear from the difference between it and them in the LXX translation. While it is evident, from the comparatively few discrepancies between the Massoretic text and that of the LXX, that the text of the Torah had long been guarded with care before the LXX translation was made, the many discrepancies in the Bk. of Joshua, the freedom with which the Greek translator or translators allowed themselves to omit and to modify, prove that when the LXX translation of it was made Joshua was not regarded as of canonical rank. The admission to the Canon of the Prophetical Books, to which it belongs, is generally held to have been about 200 B.C.

vii. Relation to the Book of Judges.—But the problems of the analysis of the Bk. of Joshua cannot be fully stated without some comparison of its data of the Conquest with those furnished in the opening chapters of the Bk. of Judges. We have seen that in the Bk. of Joshua there are two different conceptions of how the Conquest was achieved. One is that shared by both D and P: that the Conquest of the Land was completed and the inhabitants exterminated by Joshua, and thereupon the various territories were occupied by the tribes to which he allotted them. The other, very evident from the fragments of J, in the second half of the book, takes the Conquest to have been gradual and partial. This, the older conception, is that which is supported by the Bk. of Judges. In Jg 1–2^5 we have fragments of an account of the Conquest, which an editor has found irreconcilable with the conception that dominates the Bk. of Joshua, and has therefore, by an introductory clause, Jg 1^{1a}, transferred to the days after Joshua's death. This, however, is impossible: we cannot conceive that Israel having gained full possession of Western Palestine and exterminated the Canaanites, was after Joshua's death driven back upon Jericho and began a second series of campaigns which gradually restored the country to them. In itself this is impossible; and that the campaigns in Jg 1 happened in Joshua's lifetime is implied not only by the account of his death which follows them in Jg 2 ff., but proved by the fact that the same episodes (e.g. Hebron and Caleb, Debir and Othniel) which are related in Jg 1 as happening after Joshua's death are in the Bk. of Joshua itself related as happening while he still directed the allotment of the territories. Omit Jg 1^{1a} and several other verses in the same chapter which are obvious insertions by an editor and some of which flatly contradict verses that stand next them, and what is left affords an account of the Conquest which is in harmony (as already said) with the older of the two conceptions, contained in the Bk. of Joshua.*

The relation to each other of these parallel passages in the Bk. of Joshua and in Jg 1 has been differently estimated by critics. Yet the facts appear to shut out all the alternatives but one. Not only do the parallels agree (as has just been said) in their general conception of the conquest—that it took place through the efforts of separate tribes, and with incomplete results rather than (as the view of P and D which prevails in the Bk. of Joshua conceives it) by all Israel acting together and with a complete extermination of the 'inhabitants of the land'; but in parts the parallels agree word for word, and they both contain the same characteristic terms and phrases.

The following table represents the agreements and differences:—

Jg $1^{1.}$ (except the first clause)$^{2.\ 3.\ 5.\ 6.\ 7}$: The beginning of Judah's and Simeon's campaign, and their defeat of Adoni-bezeḳ. Jos $10^{1\text{ff.}}$: After Joshua's capture of Ai and treaty with Gibeon, Adoni-zedeḳ (LXX Adoni-bezeḳ; the reading Adoni-zedeḳ has perhaps arisen as some echo of another ancient king of Jerusalem, Melchi-zedeḳ), king of Jerusalem, with the kings of Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon, having attacked Gibeon, is defeated by Joshua and all Israel in the battle of Beth-horon, and afterwards slain.

Jg $1^{19.\ 20.\ 10-15}$: After Judah receives the hill-country for an inheritance, Caleb in obedience to a command by Moses receives Hebron, and takes it, slaying its Anakite lords;

* That Joshua is the author is asserted in the Talmud, 'Baba bathra,' 14^2. It has been maintained by a few Rom. Cath. and Protestant scholars, and even in this century by, e.g., J. L. König, AT Stud. i. 1836. But see Calvin's sane words in his Argt.

* On Jg 1 f. consult Wellhausen, Comp. d. Hex. 213–215; E. Meyer, ZATW i. p. 135 ff.; but especially Budde, both in ZATW vii. p. 94 ff., and Richt. u. Samuel, pp. 2 ff., 84–89; and Moore, Judges, in the Internat. Crit. Comm. p. 3 ff. The verses to be eliminated from Jg 1–2^5 are $^{1a.\ 4.\ 8.\ 9.\ 18.\ 36}$ $2^{1b-5a.\ 8}$. Of these 1^4 is redundant in face of vv.$^{5-7}$; v.^{8}, intimating the capture of Jerus. is contradicted by later history and the rest of the narrative.

he offers his daughter to the conqueror of Ḳiriath-sepher. This is ʻOthniel. ʻOthniel receives Achsah, Caleb's daughter, and with her the 'upper and lower Guloth.' Jos $15^{13ff.}$: Caleb, in obedience to a divine command by Joshua, receives Hebron, slaying its Anakite lords; then from v.^{16} the story of Debir, ʻOthniel, and Achsah follows exactly as in Jg $1^{12ff.}$.

Jg $1^{16.17}$: The settlement of the Kenite and conquest of Simeon's land find no parallel in Joshua.

Jg 1^{21}: The continued hold of the Jebusite upon Jerusalem, the sons of Benjamin do not drive him out. Jos 15^{63}: The same, but it is the sons of Judah who are said not to have been able to drive out the Jebusite.

Jg 1^{22-26}: The house of Joseph go up to Bethel, and with them Jehovah (an unusual expression, and not found in the relation of the other campaigns; for Jehovah LXX reads Judah; Budde reasonably conjectures Joshua as the original reading); the house of Joseph takes Bethel. To this there is no parallel in the Bk. of Joshua; but a reminiscence of the capture of Bethel crops up in the story of the taking of Ai, Jos 8^{17} 'Ai and Bethel' (but this is omitted by the best MSS of LXX).

Jg $1^{27.28}$: Manasseh did not dispossess the inhabitants of Beth-shan, Taanach, Dor, Ibleam, Megiddo, and their subject villages. But the Canaanite resolved to dwell in that land. When Israel grew strong they forced Canaanites to work for them. Jos $17^{12.13}$: The Bene-Manasseh were not able to dispossess the inhabitants of Beth-shan, Ibleam, Dor, En-dor, Taanach, Megiddo, but the Canaanite resolved to dwell in this land; when the Bene-Israel grew strong they forced the Canaanites to work for them.

Jg 1^{29}: Ephraim did not dispossess the Canaanite of Gezer, but the C. dwelt in his midst in Gezer. ‖Jos 16^{10}: And he (Ephraim) did not dispossess the Canaanite who dwelt in Gezer, but the C. dwelt in the midst of Ephraim to this day, and 'had to take up the forced service of a labourer.'

Jg 1^{30-33}: Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali did not dispossess the Canaanites of certain towns. No parallels to this in Jos.

Jg $1^{34.35}$: The Amorites forced the Bene-Dan into the hill-country, and did not allow them to come down into the ʻ*emeḳ*. And the Amorite resolved to dwell in Mt. Heres in Aijalon and in Shaʻalbim, and the hand of the house of Joseph was heavy, and they were reduced to forced labour. Jos 19^{47}: And the Bene-Dan went up and fought with Leshem and took it, and smote it at the edge of the sword, and took possession of it, and dwelt in it, and called Leshem Dan after Dan their father. From these two passages Budde proposes to restore the full text of the original in this order: Jg 1^{34}, Jos $19^{47a.}$ (LXX) ^{47b}, Jg 1^{35} (cf. the LXX additions to Jos 19^{47b}).

This comparison, besides revealing the similarity of general conception and identity of several passages and characteristic phrases, shows that the passages in Jg 1, besides being set under a wrong date (v.^{1a} 'after the death of Joshua'), have been 'edited' to serve the purpose of the compiler of this part of the Bk. of Judges, which as revealed in ch. 2^{1b-4} is that the failure to dispossess all the Canaanites is the reason why Jehovah proceeded now to punish Israel. For instance, the passages in Joshua generally declare that the tribes were not able to drive out certain Canaanite communities; in Jg 1 the words in italics are omitted.[*] And in v.^{21} the Benjamites have been substituted for Judah, which is given in the parallel Jos 15^{63}. From all this it is clear that in the Bk. of Joshua we have the more original text of these passages; it is impossible that the editor of that book took them from Jg 1. Nor is the converse probable; for in the Bk. of Joshua, as we have seen, these passages have been inserted in a setting, the whole tendency of which is to give a conception of the conquest different from that to which they testify. There remains possible, therefore, only this conclusion, as Budde has clearly exhibited, that the editors, both of the Bk. of Joshua and of Jg 1 f., have taken them from a common source. This source, with its conception of the conquest so different from that of D and P, must, in our ignorance of any other sources of the Hexateuch, be assigned to JE. Can we decide whether it belongs to J or E? It so happens that in ch. 24 we have a piece which, for very obvious reasons, critics are agreed in assigning to E. But its conception of the conquest approaches too nearly to that of the Deuteronomic redaction of Joshua to allow us to assign to its author the passages in question. We have therefore no alternative but to regard them as the work of J, or at least of the series of writers designated by that letter. So, for instance, Kittel, Driver (in Smith's Dict. of the Bible^{2}, vol. i. pt. ii. p. 1816), and especially Budde (ZATW vii. 155 ff.), who assigns them, not to the original J, but to the Jahwistic redactor. And to the same hand we must assign, of course, a number of other passages in the Bk. of Joshua which, though they are not found among the parallels present in Jg 1, plainly supplement the latter, and are ruled by the same conception of the conquest, viz. that it was partial, for there were many Canaanite communities and groups of communities whom the tribes could not drive out. These are Jos 13^{13} 17^{14-18}, and probably the simpler forms of the doublets in the JE portions of chs. 1–12, and among them we must also include the additional matter which ch. 19^{47} contributes to the story of Dan as related in Jg $1^{34.35}$. See, further, art. JUDGES (BOOK OF), where on several points a different view is maintained from that represented in the present article.

viii. THE HISTORICAL VALUE OF THE BOOK OF JOSHUA. — We have seen — upon evidence afforded by itself, philological and textual—that the final redaction of the book must be placed very late in the history of Israel: certainly after Ezra's time, perhaps not till the 3rd cent. B.C. We have seen, too, that this redaction includes widely differing accounts of how the conquest and division of the land were accomplished: a Deuteronomic writer and the Priestly writer represent it to have been thorough, and effected in one generation by the whole nation acting together; the Jahwistic document (with ch. 1 of the Bk. of Judges) represents it as the work of separate tribes, and to have been far from complete. When we accept the latter alternative, not only as that of the older record, but as the only one in harmony with the data of the subsequent history under the Judges and Kings, our difficulties are not at an end. For, first, the Jahwistic document cannot be proved to be earlier than the 9th cent. B.C.; and, second, before being used by the editor of the whole book, it has been combined with the Elohist document in a form which contains such varying accounts of the different episodes of the Conquest as were likely to arise in the many centuries of tradition between the Conquest and the dates of the two constituent documents. These present, too, other difficulties. They are defective: it is remarkable that neither says a word about the conquest of the midlands of Western Palestine, the lands afterwards occupied by Manasseh and Ephraim, although one of them (E) appears to have related the celebration of a solemn service at Shechem, the centre of that region, soon after the crossing of Jordan and in obedience to a word of Moses; while both of them appear to contain a few data that could not have been inserted till long after Israel's settlement in W. Palestine.[*] All these facts, presented to us, be it observed, by the biblical record itself, oblige us to subject the JE narrative to examination upon the ordinary principles of historical criticism. The first question we have to ask is: are there any signs in JE of the employment of older documents? In the early books of the OT such ancient material is usually found in the citation of poetical fragments. Of such the Bk. of Joshua contains only one ($10^{12.13}$)

[*] In v.^{19b} the omission of the words is very plain; the infinit. להוריש cannot be construed without them.

[*] e.g. in the history of the treaty with Gibeon, though, as we shall see, there is no reason for denying the main fact of such a treaty in the time of Joshua. The contradiction with later history, which is alleged by some to exist in Jos 6^{26}—the abandonment of the site of Jericho (cf. Jg 3^{13}, which represents Jericho as an inhabited town)—may be explained by a change of site.

which may be assigned (though this is not the opinion of all critics) to J. 'Thus Joshua spake to Jehovah . . . and said in presence of all Israel—

> Sun stay upon Gibeon, and moon on the valley of Aijalon.
> And the sun stayed, and the moon stood till the people took vengeance of their enemies.

Is it not written in the Book of Jashar?'[*] This ancient fragment witnesses to two facts: (a) that Israel had to fight at this particular point of their advance into W. Palestine, and (b) the presence there of Joshua. But the fragment stands alone in the book; on all other points we have to argue upon considerations of a general kind.

The first point which appears to be sufficiently established is the national unity of Israel, before and when they crossed the Jordan. This, it is true, has been denied. Stade (GVI i. 134 ff.) and others suppose that the Israelite occupation of W. Palestine proceeded gradually and peacefully —by the drifting across Jordan, one by one, of various Israelite clans, before the pressure of their increasing numbers and in desire for room and food. But the theory of a peaceful invasion is contradicted no less by the general force of tradition than by the historic probabilities; while the national unity is certified, not only by the earliest memories of the people (Bk. of Jg, passim) and the unanimous voice of later tradition, but by the fact that the great cause and reason of such a unity, the possession by the tribes of a common faith and a common shrine, had already been achieved by the labours of Moses. The later unity of Israel, accomplished among the separating influences of W. Palestine, geographical, social, religious, would not have been possible unless Israel had already been united before entering these. Nor do the accounts in the Bks. of Jos and Jg relate, before the capture of Jericho, anything contradictory to the theory of such a unity; it is only from Jericho onwards that J describes the tribes as separately undertaking the conquest of their respective territories. Moreover, although J represents separate conquests after Jericho, it assumes, and even explicitly states, that these were preceded by a common understanding of how the work of conquest was to be divided and the territories assigned (Jos 15^{13} $17^{14\text{ff.}}$, Jg 1^{1}). If we accept this evidence of J (as against Dt and P), that the conquest was achieved by separate tribes, we should surely receive its testimony that the direction and plan proceeded from a common centre; especially when the unity of Israel, at the time of crossing Jordan, is rendered so probable by the considerations quoted above. (See Smith, HGHL, Appen. II.; McCurdy, HPM ii. 112).

ix. The Person of Joshua.—We are now able to consider the person of Joshua himself. The attempt has been made to relegate, not only the deeds, but the personality of this great leader to the domain of legend and myth. Stade (GVI i. p. 135) and others[†] have fastened on the undoubted fact that in each successive stratum of the tradition Joshua is made to play a more active and regulative part in the allotment and conquest of the territory. They assert that he is not mentioned by J, and that we can trace the origin of him to E. E is an Ephraimitic document, Joshua an Ephraimitic hero. And the inference is drawn by these critics, that, to begin with, Joshua is no more a person than, say, the 'Judah and Simeon his brother' of Jg 1^{3}; but only the personification of a Josephide clan, whose centre was Timnath-serah (Jos 19^{50} 24^{30}) or Timnath-heres (Jg 2^{9})[*] in the S.W. of the hill-country of Ephraim.[†]

But, as Kuenen says, the fact that Joshua appears with increasing importance through the later strata of tradition, so far from being a proof that he did not appear in the earliest stratum, strongly supports the presupposition that he was present there. And, as a matter of fact, Joshua does appear in J (Jos $17^{14\text{-}18}$), not merely as the leader of Ephraim or of a part of that tribe, as E represents him, but as the arbiter over all Israel to whom the tribes appeal when they are disappointed with the territory allotted to them. Nor is it possible to deny that Joshua appears in the simpler form of the double JE narratives of the taking of Jericho and Ai, and of the treaty with Gibeon; which form Budde has very successfully argued to belong to J (ZATW vii. pp. 134–146, 155–157). Budde has also proposed the restoration of Joshua's name to Jg 1^{22} 'And the house of Joseph went up to Bethel, and Joshua with them.'[‡] Moreover, Joshua is the speaker in the ancient poetical fragment (ch. $10^{12.\,13}$). And in conformity with these descriptions of all Israel acting under one leader, at least up to the taking of Ai, ch. 10^{6} states that the army returned to Gilgal after Ai was taken, and, similarly, v.^{15} brings them there again after the battle of Beth-horon. These verses probably belong to E.

There is, then, no point in the development of the tradition at which we can say, Here Joshua was added for the first time to the story. So far back as we can trace it, Joshua is part of the tradition, and he appears upon that line of it, the Judæan J, in which there was no temptation to create him as a tribal hero, for he does not belong to Judah but to Ephraim. On the other hand, the rest of the data of the tradition and the historical probabilities require Israel to have been under one head. In the absence of contemporary evidence, these are all the proofs of his historical reality which it is possible to obtain. But surely they are sufficient. If, as is probable, the poetical fragment is genuine, Joshua's existence as the Captain of all Israel is put beyond doubt.

x. Joshua's Work.—Joshua, then, was the successor of Moses, and led all Israel across Jordan. All the documents appear to agree that the crossing took place opposite to Jericho,—appear, for even here a difficulty arises. As we have seen, one of them, E, makes a statement, found both in Dt and Jos, to the effect that Israel were summoned by Moses to celebrate their arrival in W. Palestine by setting up a monument, with the law written upon it, at Shechem. Now Shechem, besides being the centre of the land, would naturally be the first goal of any invasion of W. Palestine from the other side of Jordan. No one can doubt this who is familiar with the aspect which W. Palestine presents to an observer from the site occupied by Israel in the N. of Moab. A wall of mountain, broken only by narrow gorges, runs far N. of Jericho; the first break in it, the first invitation to invade W. Palestine, is the great pass, the Wady Fera'a, which leads up from Jordan to Shechem; and it is at its mouth that the fords across Jordan are most easy. Take this geographical fact along with the evidence furnished by E, and at first sight it is hard to resist the inference of at least the probability of an invasion by Israel of the midlands of W. Palestine by the fords near Tell Adami and up the Wady Fera'a. Such a conclusion, too, would fill the great gap which yawns in all the other records: the absence of all account of the conquest of Ephraim and Manasseh.

[*] The rest of v.^{13} is a prose statement that the prayer of Joshua for a long day in which to complete the rout of the enemy, was fulfilled by the literal halt of sun and moon in their courses.

[‡] MT and B read the meaningless 'and Jehovah with them'; A has 'and Judah with them.' See Budde, op. cit. p. 144. The substitution of another name for Joshua's in this verse and the omission of his name elsewhere in Jg 1 was necessary to the editor, when he removed the events described in Jg 1 from their proper setting and placed them all after Joshua's death. see v.^{1a}.

But, attractive as this conclusion appears, there are many objections to it. The crossing of all Israel opposite Jericho is not only confirmed by the earliest traditions, one of which is E itself, but is supported by historical probabilities. The centre of Israel's power in E. Palestine was immediately opposite Jericho.* Nor was the crossing in face of the one fortified city which the Jordan Valley contained south of Beth-shan so improbable as it seems. Jericho, as we shall presently see, was never able to resist a siege; and many subsequent invaders of W. Palestine from the E. have even gone out of their way to take the city before attempting the hill-country behind her, even by the open passes to the N. Their strategy is intelligible. Once captured, Jericho became a well-stocked and well-watered base for campaigns in the comparatively barren hills to the west of her. The oldest traditions assert that Joshua made himself acquainted with the defencelessness of this single fortress on the W. bank of Jordan, by a means of espionage frequently employed by commanders of invading armies. His spies were aided by a harlot among the enemy. The same documents, and P, record that Israel were demoralised by the vicious women of the land (Nu $25^{1ff.}$); JE ascribes to the same frailty the land's betrayal to Israel.

Joshua, then, led Israel across Jordan opposite to Jericho. All the traditions assign the passage to a miracle, similar to that by which the people escaped from Egypt across the Red Sea. The waters of the river were stopped in a great heap, not at the place of the passage, but, as appears from a somewhat corrupt text (3^{16}), higher up, where the valley of Jordan is narrower, and where it is not without interest to remember that an Arabic chronicler records the sudden damming of the river by a landslip in A.D. 1267.† The miracle was commemorated by a stone monument, according to three lines of tradition which, however, vary as to where it was erected (see above, § iv. a, c). On the story of the Circumcision see above, § iv. c. Soon after this, Jericho became an easy prey to the invaders; and here again, as we have seen (§ iv. c), the traditions differ as to details. But the fact on which they agree, that the city fell to the mere challenge of her besiegers, is an issue singularly in harmony with the fate of Jericho before every subsequent attack which history records, and is also very explicable by the effeminate character of her inhabitants (see Historical Geogr. pp. 266–268). The city was razed, the site cursed, and Israel's camp continued to be at Gilgal, which is represented as the starting-point and return of the subsequent campaigns (see above, § ix.).

The Bk. of Joshua represents these as undertaken by Joshua in person with all Israel behind him; but, as we have seen, the oldest traditions describe the invasion as prosecuted from this point by different tribes in different directions. Jg 1 indicates these directions as two, in uniformity with the geographical position of Jericho and Gilgal, from which there are roads, S.W. into what was afterwards Judæa, N.W. into what became the territory of Manasseh and Ephraim. According to Jg 1, Judah and Simeon followed the first of these; and the double tribe of Joseph, still under the leadership of Joshua, the second. But the independent action of Judah and Simeon is not incompatible with Joshua's continued headship over all Israel; for, as we have seen, the same document, J, which relates their campaign, still sees in him the arbiter of the tribes, and assigns to him the allotment of their spheres of conquest (Jos 17^{14-18}). Ai and Bethel, both of them on the easiest road from Jericho to the backbone of the range, were taken by Joshua, and his army returned to Gilgal (10^{6}).

At this point, the most natural in the course of events, occurs the narrative of the service at Shechem (ch. 8^{30-35}), founded on E, which event, however, presupposes the conquest or occupation of the hill-country of Ephraim and Manasseh; and about this not a word, as we have seen, is said. It has been supposed that the story was missing in the documents; and if so, this would be an argument in favour of the reliability of the later tradition and redactions, which abstained from inventing a story, even if the event had happened, when they had no materials for it. But why was this one event missing on all the lines of tradition? The problem is one for which no satisfactory solution has yet been offered. It is to the same point in the course of conquest that the Bk. of Joshua assigns the treaty with Gibeon. That this treaty was made in Joshua's time has been denied by many critics on the evidence of the later history. There is, however, nothing in the latter which makes so early a treaty with Gibeon an impossible thing. Budde (ZATW vii. p. 135 ff.) marks the fact that in Deborah's time Judah was cut off from the tribes to the N. of her by a belt of territory in possession of the Canaanites, and argues that Gibeon's independence of Israel was necessary to make that belt continuous between Jebus and Gezer.* But the geographical data do not make this a necessary conclusion; the northern Israelites may very well have been in alliance with Gibeon and still unable to maintain connexion with Judah; and Kittel (Gesch. i. p. 272 ff.) has plausibly argued that the story of Joshua fighting the Canaanites near Gibeon, if historical, renders his treaty with Gibeon extremely probable. But, as we have seen, there is ancient evidence in the poetical piece, ch. 10^{12-14}, for the battle of Beth-horon and Joshua's defeat of the Canaanites there. The oldest tradition, which makes him return after it to Gilgal, is of course to be preferred to the Deuteronomic summary, which follows and assigns to him the conquest of the south: this must rather be assigned, as J assigns it, to Judah and the Calebites, who undertook it independently from Jericho, while Joshua himself led the house of Joseph against Ai, Bethel and the midlands. To Joshua are also assigned by fragments of E a campaign and victory in the N. of the Jordan Valley, and against the probability of this there is no conclusive argument: the narrative as it stands, however, in ch. 11 is largely the work of the Deuteronomist. For details of the question see Dillmann's Comm.; Budde, ZATW vii. p. 149 ff.; and Moore's Comm. on Jg 4.

xi. THE RELIGIOUS TEACHING OF THE BK. OF JOSHUA.—As was to be expected, the religious teaching of the book is mainly found in its later strata—the Deuteronomic and the Priestly. We have seen how they fulfil the scheme of the destiny of Israel on the lines laid down in the Pentateuch, and how the Deuteronomist enforces the law as prescribed in the Bk. of Dt, or records instances of its execution. But it is also to the Deuteronomist sections that we owe the fervent religious exhortations to Joshua and the people, which are the portions of the book most frequently employed in Christian preaching and teaching. The story of Achan, as it has passed from the hand of the latest redactor, is a lesson of great power, on the possibility of individual selfishness and avarice wrecking the enterprises of the whole community. But to one of the earlier sources, probably E (see above, § iv. c), we owe the finest religious conception in the book, that of the appearance of the Angel to Joshua (ch. 5^{13-15}). It is a noble illustration of the truth, that, in the great causes of God upon the earth, the leaders, however supreme and solitary they seem, are themselves led. There is a rock higher than they; their shoulders, however broad, have not to bear alone the awful burden of responsibility. The sense of supernatural conduct and protection, the consequent reverence and humility which form the spirit of all Israel's history, have nowhere in the OT received a more beautiful expression than in this early fragment.

G. A. SMITH.

JOSIAH (יֹאשִׁיָּה, יֹאשִׁיָּהוּ, 'J″ supports').—1. A king of Judah. He was the son of Amon and grandson of Manasseh. His mother's name is given as Jedidah, the daughter of Adaiah (2 K 22^1). His father was killed by conspirators after a brief reign of two years. His murderers were brought to justice, and Josiah placed on the throne at the age of eight (2 K 21^{24}). The date of his accession was probably B.C. 639, and his reign lasted thirty-one years, till B.C. 608. During the early part of his reign matters seem to have gone on much as before, the king being too young to introduce any change, if he had been disposed to do so. It was not till the eighteenth year of his reign that the reformation took place which marked an epoch in the history of the national religion. The prophetic party, which had attained great influence under Hezekiah, had lost it under Manasseh, who carried his fanatical attachment to lower forms of religion to the point of persecuting the pure faith. The reformers could only work for the future, and wait till their opportunity came. It is not unlikely that the Scythian invasion gave it them. Hordes of Scythians burst into Western Asia about B.C. 630. The prophets (Jer 6^1, Zeph 1^{14-18}) saw in them the instruments of God's judgment on sinful Judah. They invaded Palestine, and came down the sea-coast towards Egypt. Contrary to expectation, they did not attack Judah. In the relief at so great a deliverance, the reformers found themselves once more in favour. The first sign of this was a movement for the repair of the temple (2 K $22^{3ff.}$). Money was collected from the people, and the work was begun in the eighteenth year of Josiah's reign. Very soon the high priest Hilkiah announced to Shaphan the scribe that he had found the Book of the Law in the temple. Shaphan read it, and informed the king of its discovery. On hearing it read, J. was so alarmed at the threats made against disobedience to its commands, and the knowledge that they had been so often transgressed, that he sent an influential deputation to the prophetess Huldah. As her prophecy is given in 2 K 22^{15-20}, she predicted that the threats against Jerus. should be fulfilled, but that the king should not live to see it, but be gathered to his grave in peace.

The next step was to bring the religious practice into conformity with the law. This could be accomplished only through a drastic reformation. The elders and people of Judah and Jerusalem were summoned to a meeting in the temple, and the law was read to them (2 K $23^{1ff.}$). The king made a covenant to obey the law, and all the people assented to it. The reform consisted in the cleansing of the temple from idolatry, in the suppression of idolatry throughout the kingdom, and, most important of all, in the abolition of the high places or local sanctuaries. After it had been carried through, a great passover was celebrated. It is difficult to overrate the importance of this reformation. The abolition of the local sanctuaries centralized the worship. This in itself was a death-blow to idolatry. Even where J″ alone was nominally worshipped at the local shrines, heathenish elements both in belief and practice inevitably crept in. One temple implied one God. Then, as a corollary of centralization, radical changes took place throughout the cultus, while the priests of the local sanctuaries were degraded into inferior ministers, without the rights of priests. Nor was this all. The acceptance of a written code as binding law was the first step in the formation of a Canon of Scripture, which was to have such immense developments later. Then for the first time Judah became a people of the law.

Critics are agreed that the law on which the reformation was based was the Deuteronomic Code, but how much of our present Book of Deut. was discovered by Hilkiah is a question on which they are divided (see DEUTERONOMY). In one respect it was found impracticable to carry out the Deuteronomic law. The priests of the high places were not admitted to the same privileges as the priests of the temple (2 K 23^9, contrast Dt 18^{6-8}). It is probable that J. found it impossible to carry through this reform on account of the opposition of the Jerus. priesthood. It has been inferred from this that Hilkiah the priest can have had no share in the composition of the work.

We know scarcely anything of the thirteen years that followed the reformation. But it seems to have been a period of peace and prosperity. One very significant fact that comes out in the narrative of J.'s measures to enforce the new law is that they were extended to Samaria, which was not strictly part of his kingdom. The explanation is that the Assyr. empire, though not yet overthrown, was so much weakened that J. was not only practically independent himself, but could interfere in an Assyr. province. And we must probably start from this in solving the riddle why he opposed the advance of the king of Egypt against Assyria. In 608 Cyaxares and Nabopolassar joined in an attack on Assyria. This gave Egypt the opportunity of seizing Syria. J. saw in this a menace of subjection to the Egyp. yoke, and naturally was unwilling to lose his independence. He was no doubt ill-advised in taking the initiative, but he probably expected that Judah would be victorious, now that it had become a people of the law. This ill-grounded confidence cost him his life and Judah her freedom. He fell in the battle at Megiddo (2 K 23^{29}).

J.'s character is very highly estimated by the editor of the Book of Kings, on account of his earnestness in the work of reform; and the ferocity with which it was carried through (2 K 23^{20}) need not, in that age, be urged against him. Jeremiah contrasts his equity in the administration of justice with Jehoiakim's oppression of the weak and shedding of innocent blood (Jer 22^{15-17}).

The account in Chronicles (2 Ch 34. 35) varies in some respects from that of Kings. It places Josiah's religious reforms almost entirely before the discovery of the law, no doubt because it seemed strange that so good a king should have waited till the eighteenth year of his reign before rooting out idolatry. It also states that the Egyp. king warned J. not to oppose him, since God had sent him against Carchemish (2 Ch 35^{21}). This was perhaps intended to account for the death of so righteous a king: he had refused to obey God's warning.

2. A son of Zephaniah (Zec 6^{10}) living at Jerus. in the time of Zechariah. The text of this passage appears to have been tampered with and to need radical correction. See Wellh., Now., and G. A. Smith, ad loc. A. S. PEAKE.

JOSIAS (B Ἰωσείας, B^{b}A -σίας).—JOSIAH king of Judah. 1 Es $1^{1. 7. 18. 21-23. 25. 28. 29. 32-34}$, Bar 1^{8}.

JOSIPHIAH (יוֹסִפְיָה 'J″ adds,' Ezr 8^{10}).—The father of one of Ezra's companions. The name of the son is not given in MT, which reads 'and of the sons of Shelomith, the son of Josiphiah'; but the text may be corrected by the help of LXX (ἀπὸ υἱῶν Βαανί A; 1 Es 8^{36} ἐκ τῶν υἱῶν Βανί A, Βανιάς B, Βαναιάς Luc.), and we should read 'and of the sons of Bani, Shelomith,' etc., בָּנִי having fallen out after וּמִבְּנֵי. See GENEALOGY.

JOT.—Tindale rendered the ἰῶτα ἕν of Mt 5^{18} 'one iott' (perhaps under the influence of the Vulg. iota unum), and his rendering was accepted by all subsequent translators (Cov., Cran., 'iott'; Gen., Rhem., Bish., AV 'iote'; RV 'jot,' which is the mod. spelling in AV also). The ἰῶτα is the smallest letter in the Gr. alphabet; but the corresponding letter in Heb. (י yod) is more distinctly the smallest, so that an argument is found in this verse in favour of Aramaic as our Lord's tongue. (See also TITTLE). After Tind. 'jot' was used to denote any minute thing, and Shaks. uses it even of a drop of blood, Merch. of Ven. IV. i. 302—

> 'This bond doth give thee here no jot of blood.'

Wyclif's tr^{n} (1380) is, 'oon i, that is lest lettre.' The Germ. tr^{n} is still (Stuttgart Bible Soc. ed. 1898) that of Luther, 'der kleinste Buchstabe'; but Weizsäcker has 'ein Jota'; and the Fr. translators give 'un (seul) iota.' J. HASTINGS.

JOTBAH (יָטְבָה 'pleasantness').—Named only in 2 K 21^{19}, where we are told that king Amon's mother was 'Meshullemeth, the daughter of Haruz of Jotbah.' It was probably in Judah, but the site is unknown.

JOTBATHAH (יָטְבָתָה, Jotbath in AV of Dt 10^{7}, where the Targ. has the same form. LXX has in Nu Σετεβάθα corrected to Ἐτέβ- in B, Ἰεταβάθαν A; in Dt Ταιβάθα B, Ἰετάβ- A, Ἰτέβ- F; Vulg. Jetabatha).—A station in the journeyings of the Israelites mentioned only in Nu $33^{33f.}$, Dt 10^{7}, and described as 'a land of brooks of waters.' Its position is unknown, but cf. § iv. of art. EXODUS (ROUTE OF). Whether it should be identified with Jotbah, or with Ἰωτάβη, the seat of a bishopric in the 6th cent. (cf. Reland, Pal. p. 533) whose site is unknown, is doubtful. A. T. CHAPMAN.

JOTHAM (יוֹתָם 'J″ is perfect,' or possibly 'solitary one,' Ἰωθάμ).—1. The youngest son of Gideon (Jg $9^{5. 7. 21. 57}$). The citizens of Shechem were met in assembly to make Abimelech king, when Jotham suddenly appeared on a spur of Gerizim, and delivered in their hearing a parable with a pointed application. The parable is not consistently applied; the author had several points in his mind, such as these: (a) the contrast (though this is not fully worked out) between Gideon's refusal of the kingship ($8^{22f.}$) and the arrogant claim of the worthless son of his concubine. The other sons had qualities which might have given them the right to rule; it was left to the mean and useless 'bramble' to claim the rank of king (cf. 2 K 14^{9}). (b) A warning to the Shechemites of the dangerous character of their upstart chief. Not only was his protection worthless if they trusted him, but he would bring destruction on them if they did not. (c) A rebuke of the Shechemites for their base ingratitude towards the house of Gideon. The application of the fable is most inconsistent at vv.$^{15. 16}$. The point in v.^{15} is the relation between the Shechemites and Abimelech, but in v.^{16} between the Shechemites and the family of Gideon. Such inconsistencies are not uncommon in fables of this kind; they are found in the parables of the NT. There is no need, therefore, to suppose that Jotham's parable was borrowed from some earlier popular collection, where it had quite a different moral. Jotham's 'curse' was accomplished when Abimelech burnt down the tower of Shechem and met with a violent death himself (vv.$^{56. 57}$ [RJE]).

It is worth noticing that there is nothing distinctively religious in Jotham's parable. Judgment is passed upon Abimelech and the Shechemites on purely moral grounds; and the consequences of their deeds are predicted, not in the form of a prophecy or a message from God, but by the moral sense of a private individual.

2. King of Judah, son of Uzziah and Jerushah (2 K 15^{32-38}, 2 Ch 27^{1-9}). He is said to have reigned 16 years in Jerusalem (751–735); but during the greater part of his 'reign' he was regent in the lifetime of his father (2 K 15^{5}, 2 Ch 26^{21}). He was sole king from about 737 to 735. The historians represent his character in a favourable light. In 2 K it is recorded that he built the upper gate of the temple. The formidable combination of N. Israel and Syria began to show the first signs of hostility against Judah in this reign. According to 2 Ch, Jotham waged a successful war against the Ammonites. The great prophets Hosea, Isaiah, and Micah prophesied in his days.

3. A Calebite (1 Ch 2^{47}). G. A. COOKE.

JOURNEY.—See SABBATH DAY'S JOURNEY.

JOURNEYINGS OF ISRAELITES.—See EXODUS AND JOURNEY TO CANAAN.

JOY.—The following are the principal Heb. and Gr. words of which 'joy' is the trⁿ in AV:—

גִּיל, גִּילָה (vb. גִּיל or גּוּל, very common), the primary meaning of which, judging from the cognate Arab. jāl, may be to go round or about, be excited to levity, etc. (see Oxf. Heb. Lex. p. 162ᵃ). It would be difficult to differentiate exactly the similar terms מָשׂוֹשׂ and שָׂשׂוֹן (both from root שׂוּשׂ), רִנָּה, שִׂמְחָה. In general, it may be said that they all include not only a mental emotion but some outward expression of this, such as shouting, singing, leaping, dancing, sometimes with the accompaniment of musical instruments (e.g. Ps 132⁹, Is 49¹³, 2 S 6¹⁶, 1 S 18⁶, Is 24⁸).

In NT we have the verb ἀγαλλιάω (-άομαι), in LXX=גִּיל, עָלַץ, רִנָּה, שׂוּשׂ, and the noun ἀγαλλίασις. The latter is unknown to classical Greek but frequent in LXX, and occurs in NT in Lk 1¹⁴· ⁴⁴, Ac 2⁴⁶, Jude ²⁴, He 1⁹ (quoted from Ps 45⁸ where it renders שָׂשׂוֹן). This word expresses vehement joy or exultation (cf. Lk 1⁴⁴). The common NT word for 'joy' (noun) is χαρά (in LXX used for שִׂמְחָה and שָׂשׂוֹן); the verb (see next art.) is χαίρω (in LXX for שָׂמַח, גִּיל, and שׂוּשׂ).

It is important to recognize the identity as well as the difference in religious experience between OT and NT believers. The difference is in circumstantials, the identity in essentials. If joy is not as prominent in OT as in NT, it is still prominent. Its presence is implied in the numerous beatitudes of the Psalms, such as 1¹ 32¹. Such passages imply conscious possession of the blessings mentioned. But explicit references to the subject are numerous and emphatic, especially in the book of Psalms. A striking point of similarity between OT and NT piety is that, in both cases, God Himself is the object and ground of the believer's joy: 'My soul shall be joyful in the Lord, it shall rejoice in his salvation' (Ps 35⁹, see also 43⁴, Is 51¹⁶ etc.). Here religious joy reaches its highest, purest expression. With this may be compared NT passages like Ph 3¹ 'Rejoice in the Lord'; 4⁴, Ro 5¹¹ 'We also rejoice in God through our Lord Jesus Christ.' A suggestive parallel is found in Ph 3³ 'We . . . glory in Christ Jesus.' Among the subordinate aspects or grounds of joy OT significantly emphasizes the divine law or word: 'His delight is in the law of the Lord' (Ps 1² 19¹⁰ 119¹⁶² etc.). As we might expect, NT is richer in its exposition of the several aspects of religious joy. Faith is a source of joy (Ph 1²⁵, Ro 15¹³); so also hope (Ro 5² 12¹²); the testimony of a good conscience (2 Co 1¹²). Christian joy is 'in the Holy Ghost' (Ro 14¹⁷), i.e. 'in connexion with, under the indwelling and influence of the Holy Ghost' (Alford); the Holy Spirit is the sphere or element in which it lives and moves; see also 1 Th 1⁶. It is also a participation in Christ's own joy (Jn 15¹¹ 17¹³). Persecution and suffering for Christ's sake, instead of hindering, enhances it (Mt 5¹¹· ¹², Ac 5⁴¹, Ph 1²⁹). A Christian rejoices in tribulation because of the fruit it bears (Ro 5³· ⁴). For the same reason, temptation may be an occasion of joy (Ja 1²). The repentance of sinners causes joy in heaven (Lk 15⁷· ¹⁰). The joy of Christians should be unbroken (1 Th 5¹⁶). The power, permanence, and exuberant fulness of a believer's joy here and hereafter are often dwelt on (Ps 4⁷ 16⁹, Is 35¹⁰ 51¹¹ 61⁷, Jn 15¹¹ 17¹³, Ac 13⁵², 1 P 1⁸, Jude ²⁴). The Redeemer's joy in the certain prospect of the success of His work is mentioned in He 12². The final reward of the Christian is participation in that joy (Mt 25²¹): 'that joy of the Lord arising from the completion of his work and labour of love, of which the sabbatical rest of the Creator was typical (Gn 1³¹ 2²), and of which his faithful ones shall in the end partake; see He 4³⁻¹¹, Rev 3²¹' (Alford). As believers rejoice in God, so God rejoices in His people (Ps 147¹¹ 149⁴, Zeph 3¹⁷)—a sentiment re-echoed by a modern Christian psalmist: 'He views His children with delight.' If the reading in RV be accepted, the same sentiment is found in Lk 2¹⁴. Rejoicing in the good of others is mentioned as the distinctive feature of Christian sympathy (Ro 12¹⁵). The 'joy of the godless' (Job 20⁵) is 'not so.'

JOY.—As a verb 'joy' is used by Shaks. both transitively [=(1) gladden, as Rich. III. I. ii. 220, 'Much it joys me to see you are become so penitent'; (2) enjoy, as II Henry VI. IV. ix. 1, 'Was ever king that joyed an earthly throne?'] and intransitively; but in AV it is always intransitive, with the meaning 'rejoice.' Sometimes 'joy' and 'rejoice' come together, as Ph 2¹⁷· ¹⁸ 'I joy, and rejoice with you all. For the same cause also do ye joy, and rejoice with me' (χαίρω καὶ συνχαίρω . . . χαίρετε καὶ συνχαίρετε), there being no difference in meaning.

In most places of its occurrence, Tindale translated καυχάομαι, to boast, by the verb to rejoice, and he was followed by AV in Ro 5², Ph 3³, Ja 1⁹ 4¹⁶. Once (Ro 5¹¹) he rendered it 'joy,' and was again followed by AV as well as by Cran. and the Bishops, though the Vulg. is glorior (Wyc., Rhem., and RVm 'glory,' the others having 'rejoice'). Even RV gives 'rejoice,' which is plainly inadequate. If 'boast' was felt to be unsuitable, 'exult' would have served.

JOZABAD (יוֹזָבָד, another form of יְהוֹזָבָד, Jehozabad, wh. see).—1. 2. 3. Three of David's heroes, 1 Ch 12⁴· ²⁰· ²⁰. 4. The eponym of a Levitical family, 2 Ch 31¹³ 35⁹. 5. A priest who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10²². 6. A Levite, Ezr 8³³ 10²³, Neh 8⁷ 11¹⁶. See GENEALOGY.

JOZABDUS (Ζάβδος B, Ὠζάβαδος A), 1 Es 9²⁹=ZABBAI, Ezr 10²⁸.

JOZACAR (AV Jozachar) is mentioned only in 2 K 12²¹, where we are told that Joash, king of Judah, was murdered by his servants 'Jozacar ben-Shimeath and Jehozabad ben-Shomer.' According to 2 Ch 25³ Amaziah put to death his father's murderers. MSS of MT vary between יוֹזָכָר Jōzākhār, יוֹזָבָד Jōzābhādh, יוֹזָבָר Jōzābhār (1 MS of Kenn. cited by de Rossi), and (one of de Rossi's) יוֹזָכָד Jōzākhādh; LXX, B Ἰεζειχάρ (Swete; Tisch. gives B's reading as Ἰεζιρχάρ), A and Luc. ᴸᵃᵍ· Ἰωζαχάρ; Vulg. Josachar; Syr. Jozabar. The parallel 2 Ch 24²⁶ has 'Zabad ben-Shimeath the Ammonitess, and Jehozabad ben-Shimrith the Moabitess.' LXX, B has Ζαβέλ, A Ζαβέθ for Zabad. In 2 K Oxf. Heb. Lex., Kautzsch (AT), Baer, etc., read יוֹזָכָר Jōzākhār, as AV. [יוזכר in Ginsburg's Heb. Bible is stated by the editor to be a misprint for יוזבר—S. R. D.]

Kittel (on Chronicles in SBOT) not only reads Jōzākhār in Kings, but emends 2 Ch 24²⁶ to Zakhar on the strength of the parallel in Kings. The various readings turn upon the very slight differences between ב and כ, ד and ר, which in some MSS are practically imperceptible; especially in the case of ד and ר, where Raphe is not used. The proximity of the very similar Jehozabad would facilitate corruption of the text. But the Ch text—which here, as often elsewhere, may be based on an older reading than that in our text of Kings—suggests that, in the original, there was only one name; that this was accidentally written twice over; and that, in process of further copying, the present readings in K and Ch grew out of this doublet.

Jōzākhār='J″ remembers,' Jōzābhādh='J″ bestows gifts,' must be a simple error. See also ZABAD.

JUBILEES, BOOK OF, or LITTLE GENESIS (τὰ Ἰωβηλαῖα, ἡ κλεινὴ Γένεσις, ἡ λεπτὴ Γένεσις; Leptogenesis; in Ethiopic Kufâlê).—Under these names there is extant one of the most curious and interesting of the OT Apocrypha. It is preserved complete only in an Ethiopic translation (first edited by Dillmann in 1859), but a considerable portion of a Latin version has been published by Ceriani from an Ambrosian MS, and fragments of the Greek are contained in the Byzantine chronologists, who made large extracts.

The book contains the narrative of Genesis, rewritten from the point of view of the age of the author. It gives the narrative as a later Jew might imagine or desire that it should have happened. The chief characteristics of this rewriting of the book are—(1) the narrative is put into the mouth of the 'angel of the face,' who is represented as telling Moses on Mt. Sinai all that they (the angels) had done, and the legends of Creation, and of the Lord's dealings with mankind. (2) The narrative is arranged throughout in a chronological system of years, weeks of years, and jubilees. Every event is dated; as, for example, 'and in the first week of the third jubilee Cain slew Abel.' (3) Many legends of the class known as Midrashim are added to the narrative. (4) Great stress is laid on all the Jewish feasts, and their institution in patriarchal times is asserted (the Feast of Weeks, the Feast of Tabernacles, the Day of Atonement, and the Passover). For example (ch. 16), Abraham institutes the Feast of Tabernacles, 'on this account it is ordained in the tablets of heaven concerning Israel that they shall celebrate the festival of the tabernacles seven days in joy.' (5) Great stress is laid on ordinances of the Mosaic law, which are written in the 'tablets of heaven' and connected with events in the life of the patriarchs—such are new moon and sabbath, the offerings, the laws concerning blood and fornication and war. The sun was created for the sake of enabling the feasts to be calculated. (6) Some passages very derogatory to Edom are introduced.

The date of the book may be approximately fixed by the fact that it is used in the Testimony of the XII Patriarchs, and makes no mention of the fall of Jerusalem. On the other hand, it apparently makes use of the Book of Enoch. The reference to Edom shows also that it was written after the rise of the house of Herod. Ewald placed it towards the end of the 1st cent. B.C.; but hatred of Edom could exist just as well at a later date, and other indications seem to suggest a time when troubles that preceded the fall of Jerusalem were beginning, the chief eschatological passage seeming to refer to them (ch. 23).

The author was not a Herodian, not a Sadducee (for he believes in the resurrection), not a Pharisee (for he lays no stress on the written tradition), not an Essene (for he does not condemn the sacrifices), not a Hellenist (for he attacks the laxity of Hellenism). He was a Jew who, in a time of laxity and of falling away, tries to restore the authority of the fundamental principles of his faith, and represents the evils which are crowding on his people as the punishment for disobedience. He has quite clearly in his mind a definite falling away from Jewish ordinances, 'they have deserted the ordinances which the Lord had covenanted between them and him.' These ordinances particularly which they had neglected were probably the ones on which stress is laid—the sabbath, the feasts, circumcision, avoiding fornication (i.e. mixed marriages). It may be suggested that 'they' are really the Christians, and that the book is written by a fervent opponent of the new faith between the years A.D. 50 and 60, when disorder is beginning to break out, and the effect of the people's falling away is, as he thinks, apparent.

In any case, the book is of great value in illustrating, partly by resemblance, partly by contrast, the New Testament. We have an example of the 'Law given by angels.' The theology of the book is exactly what St. Paul protests against when he condemns 'days and months and seasons and years.' There is a curious resemblance to three out of the four points insisted upon in Ac 15, and it may be noted, as perhaps helping to throw some light on that passage, that fornication is used of 'mixed marriages.'

JUCAL.—See JEHUCAL.

JUDÆA (Ἰουδαία) was the most southern of the three districts—Galilee, Samaria, and Judæa—into which Palestine west of Jordan was divided in the time of Christ (Mt 2^{1}, Lk 2^{4}, Jn 4$^{3.\ 4.\ 47.\ 54}$, Ac 8^{1} 9^{31}). In several passages (Mt 4^{25}, Mk 1^{5} 3^{7}, Lk 5^{17}, Jn 3^{22}, Ac 1^{8}) Judæa is distinguished from its capital, Jerusalem, which, according to the Talmuds (Neubauer, Géog. du Talmud, p. 56), formed a division by itself (cf. Neh 11^{3}).

After the Captivity the tribal possessions of Judah, Benjamin, Dan, and Simeon were reoccupied by Israelites. Most of the 'children of the captivity' who returned from Babylon belonged to the tribe of Judah, and the limits of the reoccupied district were almost the same as those of the old kingdom of Judah. Thence the district was called Judah, and the people received the name of Jews (Jos. Ant. XI. v. 7). Afterwards the two names were used in a wider sense. All Israelites were called Jews, and Judæa, or 'the land of Judah,' sometimes stood for the three districts of Western Palestine (Lk 4^{44} [?]* 23^{5}, Ac 10^{37} 26^{20}. See art. CHRONOLOGY OF NT, vol. i. p. 406^{b} f.).

Under the Persians, Judah was a district (OT 'province,' מְדִינָה) of the 5th satrapy of the Empire (Herod. iii. 91), administered by a governor (פֶּחָה) who was generally, at least, a Jew, and was apparently assisted by a council of Jewish elders. The governor and elders dwelt at Jerusalem, the seat of government (Hag 1$^{1.\ 14}$ 2^{2}, Ezr 5$^{1.\ 8}$,† Neh 11^{3}).

The name Judæa first occurs in To 1^{18}, where it is applied to the old kingdom of Judah. The later Judæa (1 Mac 3^{34} 10^{38}, 2 Mac 1^{10}), or 'land of Judah' (1 Mac 10$^{30.\ 33.\ 37}$, cf. Is 19^{17}), extended from Samaria on the north to the desert of Arabia Petræa on the south, and from the Mediterranean on the west to the Jordan Valley on the east. Its limits, which varied at different periods, cannot be more clearly defined. In the time of Judas Maccabæus, Hebron was in the hands of the Edomites (1 Mac 5^{65}); and in the time of his brother Jonathan, three nomes, or toparchies of Samaria—Aphærema, Lydda, and Ramathaim—were added to Judæa (1 Mac 10$^{30.\ 38}$ 11^{34}). According to Josephus (BJ III. iii. 5), Judæa extended from Anuath-Borkeos ('Aina-Berkit) on the north to Iardas, a village on the confines of Arabia (perhaps Tell 'Arâd) on the south, and from Joppa to the Jordan. The sea-coast as far as Ptolemais (Acre), and the coast towns, with the possible exception of Cæsarea, also belonged to it. The country was divided into toparchies—a division recognized by Pliny (HN v. 14), though his list does not completely agree with that of Josephus. There is some authority for the view that certain districts east of Jordan were included in Judæa. Strabo describes Judæa as being 'situated above Phœnicia, in the interior between Gaza and Antilibanus, and extending to the Arabians' (XVI. ii. 21). Tacitus (Hist. v. 6) says the borders of Judæa on the east were formed by Arabia. Josephus (Ant. XII. iv. 11) countenances an extension beyond Jordan, and so does the NT in Mt 19^1 ('the borders of Judæa beyond Jordan'). In Mk 10^1, where AV (following TR) reads 'the coasts of Judæa by the further side of Jordan,' RV (following WH, etc.) has the 'borders of Judæa and beyond Jordan.' In the time of Ptolemy (V. xvi. 9) some places east of Jordan belonged to Judæa. Possibly the boundary included the valley, and the slopes of the hills east of Jordan. The Talmudists allude to the 'mountain,' or 'king's mountain,' the Shephēlah, or 'low hills,' and Daroma, or 'the south,' as different portions of Judæa. Daroma was divided into Upper and Lower (Neubauer, p. 62).

* The reading Ἰουδαίας instead of Γαλιλαίας is accepted by WH (text) on the authority of ℵBCL, etc. (see 'Notes on Select Readings,' ad loc.).

† In Ezr 5^{8} AV reads 'Judea,' RV correctly 'Judah.' See art. JEWRY.

On the division of the country after the death of Herod the Great, Judæa was given to Archelaus with the title of ethnarch. A few years later, on the deposition of Archelaus, it was added to the province of Syria, and administered by a procurator subordinate to the governor of Syria. The procurator resided at Cæsarea (Ant. XVII. xiii. 5, XVIII. i. 1, ii. 1), which, according to the Talmuds, was not in Judæa. This view is said to have been held by St. Luke, but it seems doubtful whether his intention is to do more than draw a distinction between Judæa and the seat of government, Cæsarea (Ac 12^{19} 21^{10}, cf. 'Judæa and Jerusalem,' as above). In the division of Palestine at the beginning of the 5th cent. Judæa formed part of Palestina Prima.

The physical features of Judæa are described in the art. on PALESTINE. It will suffice to say here that the Romans covered the country with a network of roads.

JUDÆA, THE WILDERNESS OF (ἡ ἔρημος τῆς Ἰουδαίας, desertum Judææ).—The district in which John the Baptist made his first appearance as the Forerunner of Christ (Mt 3^1). In Mk 1^4, Lk 3^2, it is called simply 'the wilderness.' It is prob. the same as the wilderness of Judah (Jg 1^{16}, Ps 63, title), in which were situated En-gedi and five other cities (Jos $15^{61.\ 62}$)—the Jeshimon or desert tract west of the Dead Sea. It perhaps included the western bank of the Jordan to the north of the Dead Sea (Jos. Ant. III. x. 7, IV. viii. 2, 3).

JUDAH (יְהוּדָה yĕhûdâh, 'praised' (?), Ἰούδας, Juda; in Assyr, inscriptions Ia-u-du, Ia-u-dai, see Jastrow, JBL xii. (1893) 61 ff.).—1. The fourth son of Jacob and Leah. He was born in Paddan-aram (Gn 29^{35}). In J he is very prominent. He suggests to his brethren that they should sell Joseph to the Ishmaelites (Gn $37^{26f.}$), pleads for Benjamin to be sent into Egypt, and becomes surety for his safety ($43^{8f.}$). He thus takes the place corresponding to that assumed by Reuben in E ($37^{21f.}$ 42^{37}). So in Gn 44^{14} we read of Judah and his brethren, and it is he who makes the impassioned appeal to Joseph for Benjamin's release (Gn 44^{18-34}). In consequence of Reuben's misconduct (Gn 35^{22} 49^4) and the treacherous violence of Simeon and Levi (34. $49^{5ff.}$), Judah receives the firstborn's privilege ($49^{8ff.}$). According to Gn 38 he went to Adullam and married the daughter of a Canaanite, Shua. By her he had three sons, Er, Onan, and Shelah. Er married Tamar, but died without children, as did his brother Onan, who refused to perform the duty of raising up seed to his brother. As she was not given to Shelah, she by artifice became the mother of two children by Judah, Perez and Zerah.

This narrative reveals very clearly what is true in part at least of the others, that Judah is the eponymous ancestor of the tribe of Judah, and that the history of the tribe has been thrown into the form of a personal history. Gn 38 thus becomes of great value for its information on the composition of the tribe. Under the metaphors of marriage and paternity the union and origin of various stocks are expressed. The most important fact that emerges is that the tribe of Judah, as we know it in the historical period, was largely of Can. origin. After the Hebrews entered Canaan, Judah left the main body, and struck out in a southerly direction to conquer a district to settle in (Jg 1^{1-20}). In consequence of its union with Hirah and Shua, and later with Tamar, clans near Adullam, five Judahite clans were in course of time formed, but the two oldest of these, Er and Onan, became extinct. But Gn 38 does not exhaust our information as to the composition of Judah. In Jg 1^{16} we find that the Kenites accompanied Judah into the wilderness of Judah, and then went on and dwelt among the Amalekites (reading 'the Amalekite' for 'the people'), where at a later period we find them (1 S 15^6, cf. Nu 24^{20-22}). Perhaps they were of Amalekite origin. Generally they are regarded as Midianites, but this rests on a combination of J and E. Besides the Kenites we find two Kenizzite clans, Caleb and Othniel (Jg $1^{12-15.\ 20}$, Jos 14^{6-15} 15^{13-19}). As Kenizzite, they would appear to have been originally Edomite tribes (Gn $36^{11.\ 15.\ 42}$). Caleb remained a distinct tribe till the time of David (1 S 30^{14}). It lived in the hill-country of Judah, and Hebron was its chief town. It seems to have been the most powerful clan of Judah. Nabal is regarded as a typical Calebite (1 S 25^3). The chief town of Othniel was Kiriath-sepher or Debir. Closely connected with Caleb was Jerahmeel, who in the highly important lists 1 Ch 2 appears as his brother. According to Wellhausen, who investigated these lists and those in 1 Ch 4^{1-23} in his de Gen. et Fam. Jud., Jerahmeel was older than Caleb, dwelt farther south, and adopted a less settled mode of life. It will be clear that Judah not only absorbed Canaanite, but, to a still greater extent, Edomite and kindred elements. These perhaps imparted the fanaticism which was later so characteristic of the tribe.

Originally, Judah seems to have been a smaller tribe than Reuben, Simeon, and Levi. But Reuben began to dwindle at an early period, and Simeon and Levi were broken up in consequence of a treacherous attack upon the Canaanites, with whom they had made an alliance (see SIMEON). Partly as a result of this, partly through the fusion with other clans already mentioned, and probably with the remnant of Simeon, Judah obtained the premier position among the Leah tribes. After the Jordan had been crossed, J. was accompanied by Simeon alone on its invasion of its portion. A victory was gained over Adoni-bezek, and Hebron and Kiriath-sepher were captured (Jg $1^{8ff.}$). We are also told that Jerus. was taken (v.^{8}) and burnt, and three Philistine cities captured by Judah (v.^{10}). But these latter statements are inconsistent with others in the same narrative, and do not well agree with the subsequent history. Judah found it impossible to make good its claim to the 'valley' (i.e. probably the coast plain), since it could not cope with the war-chariots of the natives. The extent of Judah's 'lot' is given in Jos 15 (P), but this chapter teaches us much less than it seems to do, partly because a very large number of the places it mentions have not been identified, partly because the description is ideal, and at no time corresponded, even approximately, with the actual facts. According to this account, Judah was bounded on the E. by the Dead Sea, on the N. by the southern boundary of Benjamin (see BENJAMIN for details), on the W. by the Mediterranean, on the S. by a line drawn from the southern tongue of the Dead Sea to the brook of Egypt, and passing through or by the ascent of Akrabbim, Zin, Kadesh-barnea, Hezron, Addar, Karka, and Azmon. Judah never reached the Mediterranean; the Phil. lay between, and so did Simeon, till the latter tribe was exterminated. As to the southern border, apart from the difficulty of fixing some of the sites mentioned, it must be observed that the territory of Judah shades off imperceptibly into the desert to the south. The portion of Judah is divided into four districts, the Negeb (RV South), the Shephelah or Lowland, the Hill Country, and the Wilderness of Judah. The Negeb is the largest portion. It is dry and barren, except in the brief spring-time; thinly populated, chiefly by nomads. The Shephēlah is undulating country, fertile and beautiful, separated from the sea by the Phil. plain. It was the most valuable district; but Judah could not hold it against the Philistines, who kept it in their own hands through a great part of the history. The Hill Country belongs to the great Central Range of Pal., and is separated by a valley from the low hills of the Shephelah. It was, historically, the most important part of Judah—rugged and barren, but with fertile valleys, and, owing to the system of terrace-cultivation, more productive than it could be now. The Wilderness of Judah (Jeshimon) lies between the Hill Country and the Dead Sea, a waste of unspeakable dreariness and desolation, 35 miles long by 15 broad. See, further, arts. HILL COUNTRY, and JESHIMON.

Judah was far more inaccessible than the Northern tribes. Protected on the E. by the Wilderness, on the S. by the Negeb, itself more or less of a wilderness, on the W. by the low hills of the Shephelah, by the valley that divides it from the Central Range and the slopes of the Central Range itself, on the N. by Benjamin with its fortresses, it lay far less open to invasion. When it was held by real defenders, it was necessary that the invaders should first master the surrounding country, and then deliver their attack across three of its borders (G. A. Smith, Hist. Geog. ch. xiv.). Judah was not impregnable, indeed, for it lay comparatively open from the N., and the Negeb could be crossed from the S., while passes led up to the central tableland from both E. and W., though very difficult to force against opposition. But the very poverty of the country combined with the natural difficulties of invasion to secure it, since it offered little prize to tempt an attack. It was a very little province. Even if it had reached its ideal boundaries, it would have covered no more than 2000 square miles; actually its usual extent was nearer 1300, of which about half was desert.

The isolation of the territory was reflected in that of the tribe. After it had settled in its lot, it had but little to do with the Northern tribes. It is not even mentioned in the Song of Deborah, as if it were not recognized as belonging to Israel; and it appears in the story of Samson as surrendering him to the Philistines (Jg $15^{9\text{ff.}}$). It seems to have drawn more closely to Israel in the time of Saul, as we see from the history of David. But Saul's persecution of David must have strained the loyalty of the tribe, and it is not surprising that on his death a kingdom of Judah was formed with David at its head, in opposition to the kingdom of Ishbaal, Saul's son (2 S $2^{4.8}$). Both of these kingdoms seem to have been tributary to the Philistines. The union of the two was due to the evident fact that David was the only man who could hope to lead Israel in successful revolt from the Phil., and was only hastened by the defection of Abner and the murder of Ishbaal (2 S $3^{12\text{ff.}}$ $4^{5\text{ff.}}$). Judah, as the king's own tribe, was more closely attached to Israel than when the king belonged to another tribe. One of David's greatest and most far-sighted acts was the selection of Jerus. as his capital and the home of the ark ($5^{6\text{ff.}}$ 6^{12}). Jerus. did not actually lie in Judah, except possibly to a slight extent, but it was on the border, and the possession of it, with the ark and temple, guaranteed the survival of the Southern kingdom, after the loss of the Northern tribes. But in the latter years of David it is Judah, perhaps because it profited less by its connexion with the king than it expected, that seems to have been foremost in supporting Absalom, whose rebellion broke out in Hebron, the old capital of the tribe (2 S 15^{7}). After its suppression Judah hung back, till its allegiance was won by the ill-timed appeal of David to its kinship with him ($19^{11\text{ff.}}$); ill-timed because David's favouritism to Judah provoked jealousy in the Northern tribes, and the abortive rising of Sheba (19^{41}–20^{22}), which anticipated the successful revolt of Jeroboam. Solomon also showed an unwise partiality to Judah, as we see from the fact that it was excluded from the division into twelve districts for purposes of taxation (1 K 4). It is, accordingly, not wonderful that Judah remained loyal to Rehoboam, while the Northern tribes rejected him ($12^{16\text{f.}}$).

The Kingdom of Judah seems to have consisted simply of the tribe of Judah with very little of Benjamin (see BENJAMIN), and not of Judah and Benjamin. Only a brief outline of its history is here necessary; for fuller details the articles on the individual kings may be consulted. After the disruption caused by the senseless folly of Rehoboam, war was carried on between the two kingdoms (1 K 14^{30}), but not in a very energetic way. In fact the treasure which Solomon had accumulated was taken by Shishak of Egypt when he invaded Judah ($14^{25\text{ff.}}$), and the superiority in wealth of the Southern kingdom would thus be lost. War continued through the reign of Abijam (15^{6} RVm), but it seems not to have been prosecuted with vigour till Baasha succeeded Nadab the son of Jeroboam. He pressed Judah so hard that Asa took the unhappy step, fraught with future mischief, of calling in the aid of Syria. A diversion was thus effected in his favour, and Asa employed the materials of Baasha's fortress, Ramah, in erecting fortresses of his own ($15^{17\text{ff.}}$). It was possibly with the accession of Omri that the relations between the two kingdoms were changed. He perhaps formed an alliance with Judah, as with Tyre (16^{31}), probably in view of the dangers that threatened from Damascus. Ahab and Jehoshaphat were certainly allies (1 K 22), and Jehoshaphat's son, Jehoram, married Athaliah the daughter of Ahab (2 K $8^{18.26}$). Jehoshaphat's reign was probably prosperous, though his trading vessels were wrecked (1 K 22^{48}). The relations between Judah and Edom after the reign of Solomon are obscure. Edom seems to have been subject to Judah, at any rate in Jehoshaphat's time (2 K 3^{9}), but it revolted from his son Jehoram

(2 K 8^{20}). The good understanding with Israel continued while Omri's dynasty was on the throne, but Jehu murdered Ahaziah, Jehoram's son, and forty-two of his brethren (9^{27} 10^{14}). Thereupon the queen-mother, Athaliah, massacred all that remained of the royal family, except the infant Joash, and reigned six years. She was put to death by Jehoiada the priest, who made Joash king (2 K 11). Apparently, towards the end of his reign, Hazael, king of Syria, who had severely crippled the Northern kingdom, threatened Jerus., but was bought off by Joash, who perhaps in consequence of this was murdered ($12^{17\text{ff.}}$). His son Amaziah, after a successful war with Edom, challenged Joash of Israel, who inflicted a disastrous defeat upon him ($14^{1\text{-}14}$). Amaziah's son Azariah, or Uzziah, had a more successful reign. Syria had been exhausted in wars with Assyria, and now Assyria itself had a half-century of inactivity, and this left both Israel and Judah time to build up powerful states. Azariah recovered the port of Elath (14^{22}), and from the early chapters of Isaiah we can see how wealthy Judah had become. But the signs began to be ominous before his death. Assyria resumed her old career of conquest, and Syria and Israel formed a coalition against her. When Ahaz refused to join it, they sought to compel the adhesion of Judah; whereupon Ahaz, in a panic and against the earnest warning of Isaiah, took the fatal step of calling in Tiglath-pileser, the king of Assyria (2 K 16, Is 7). The latter suppressed the coalition, but Ahaz paid too dearly for the relief, since he became tributary to Assyria. The heavy yoke was borne till Hezekiah thought himself strong enough, in alliance with other revolting states, and on the promise of help from Egypt, to throw it off (18^{7}). Although the overthrow of Sennacherib saved Jerus. from capture, and the religion of Israel from destruction, yet Judah sustained very heavy loss and had to pay an enormous tribute. The reign of Manasseh seems to have been externally prosperous, so far as this was possible after the exhaustion of Judah in the Assyr. war; but it was marked by fierce reaction against the reforms of Hezekiah and the prophetic policy as a whole, by religious syncretism, and by gloomy and superstitious fanaticism ($21^{1\text{-}18}$). But Josiah instituted a reform on the basis of Deuteronomy, the people being prepared for it by their deliverance from the dreaded Scythian invasion. His happy reign was cut short by Pharaoh-necoh, whose invasion of Syria he had opposed, probably because it threatened the loss of the independence that the decrepitude of the Assyrian Empire gave him (2 K 22. 23). After a brief reign Jehoahaz was removed by Egypt ($23^{31\text{ff.}}$), and Jehoiakim put in his place. He changed masters, Egypt for Babylon, but revolted (24^{1}), and, in consequence of this, his son, who succeeded him, was taken captive to Babylon with the flower of the nation ($24^{14\text{ff.}}$). His successor, Zedekiah, might have reigned in peace as the vassal of Babylon, but revolting, in defiance of Jeremiah's warning, he saw his capital besieged and captured ($24^{18\text{ff.}}$). Jerus. and the temple were destroyed, and a large part of those who remained were taken into exile, where they remained for fifty years. So fell the kingdom of Judah, B.C. 586. Many of those who were still left went down into Egypt, in fear of vengeance for Gedaliah's murder (25^{26}), and thus in Babylon and Egypt Jewish colonies were planted, which were destined to be of immeasurable importance.

As compared with the Northern kingdom, Judah was through most of its history of little account. When it held Edom in subjection its power was strengthened, yet even then the scornful fable, in which Joash set Judah against Israel as a thistle against a cedar, was not without justification. In other things than size and strength the advantage lay with Israel. Life was richer, fuller, and deeper, and that not only social but, what is more important yet less recognized, religious life. It was not in Judah but in Israel that the great prophets Elijah and Elisha did their work, the schools of the prophets flourished, and the earliest (?) history of the Hebrews was written. Amos, it is true, belonged to Judah, yet even he prophesied to Israel, and his junior contemporary, Hosea, was a Northern prophet. It was not till Israel went under that Judah attained its great significance. Yet Judah had advantages of its own. The prestige of the Davidic monarchy secured a permanence of dynasty that was of untold blessing, and saved it from the frequent revolutions and usurpations that tore Israel asunder. Further, while Judah was poorer in great religious teachers, its religion was probably simpler and less corrupt than that of Israel, though its superiority may be easily exaggerated. Its possession of the temple made for greater purity of worship. Yet it was rather the respite granted after the captivity of the Northern tribes, than any religious superiority of Judah, that left it the sole depositary of the higher religion of the prophets. This had not struck its roots deep enough into the life of Israel to survive the transplanting to Assyrian soil. But between 722 and 586, under the fostering care of Isaiah and his successors, it had grown strong enough not merely to survive, but to benefit from the shock, and thus Judah became especially the people of revelation.

On the character of the tribe little need be said. It was profoundly modified by its comparative isolation and the independence this conferred, and by the large foreign elements that it had absorbed. It was narrow and provincial, fanatical and tenacious. To slay the prophets and build monuments to them was characteristic of it, as of so many other peoples; for while it was slow to learn and hostile to new truth, yet the truth when learned was changed into hard dogma and erected as a barrier against fresh revelation. The obstinacy with which an old doctrine was insisted on, when no longer applicable, and new truth opposed for its inconsistency with the old, is shown in the opposition to Jeremiah's teaching that Jerus. would be captured and the temple destroyed, based on Isaiah's doctrine of the inviolability of Zion. Yet Judah had this qualification for its task,—it produced many who were fit vehicles of revelation; it was, in fact, surprisingly rich, especially in its later history, in religious genius, a lovely flower springing, indeed, from a dry and unattractive root.

In NT the tribe of Judah is mentioned in Lk 1^{39} (?), He 7^{14}, Rev 7^{5}.

2. Judah, an overseer at the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 3^{9}) = HODAVIAH of 2^{40} and HODEVAH of Neh 7^{43}. 3. A Levite who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10^{23}), possibly the same as the Judah of Neh $12^{8.\,36}$. 4. An overseer of Jerus. (Neh 11^{9}).

JUDAH 'upon (AV) or at (RV) Jordan' is named in Jos 19^{34} in the statement of the boundaries of the tribe of Naphtali. The MT בִּיהוּדָה is unrepresented in the LXX, and Bennett (SBOT, ad loc.) remarks, 'The clause is apparently an unintelligible gloss which has crept into the text. The context implies that the tribe of Judah is referred to, and this is geographically impossible.' Ewald suggests (Gesch. ii. 380) that the passage is corrupt, and that 'Chinneroth,' or some other word, originally occupied the place of ‘to Judah.’ Conder (PEFSt, 1883, p. 183) suggests an interchange of ד and ר, and of ה and ח, so as to read חוּרָה for הוּדָה, when the passage would run ובחורה הַיַּרְדֵּן, the ‘Hollow of (?) Jordan,’ equivalent to the Ghôr, or valley of the Jordan. Thomson (Land and Book, i. p. 389) suggests that the tomb of Seîd Yehûda (supposed by Arabs to be son of Jacob) marks the ‘Judah on Jordan, toward the sun-rising.’ It is suggested in Speaker's Comm. that the Havvoth-jair were colonized by men of Judah, and might be called ‘Judah upon Jordan.’ Von Raumer (Pal. p. 405 ff.) had contended strongly for this identification of ‘Judah’ with Havvoth-jair; and Keil (Bib. Comm.) adopts the same theory, pointing out that, according to 1 Ch 2$^{5. 21}$, Jair on his father's side was descended from Judah through Hezron. It cannot be said that any of the last mentioned theories has the slightest probability. Dillm. (ad loc.) thinks Ewald's view is the best, but allows that it leaves the origin of the present text unexplained.

JUDAH (AV Juda), Lk 1^{39}.—See JUTAH.

JUDAISM.—See RELIGION.

JUDAS (Ἰούδας, Judas), the Greek equivalent of the Hebrew name יְהוּדָה JUDAH.

1. The third son of Mattathias, called Maccabæus (1 Mac 2^{4}, Jos. Ant. XII. vi. 1). See MACCABEES.

2. The son of Chalphi, one of two captains (ἄρχοντες τῆς στρατιᾶς) who stood by Jonathan when the main part of his army had been scattered by an ambush at the beginning of a battle against the Syrians at Hazor (1 Mac 11^{70}, Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 7).

3. A Jew holding some important position at Jerusalem, who is named in the title of a letter sent from the Jews of Jerusalem and Judæa and the Jewish Senate to their brethren in Egypt and to a certain Aristobulus (2 Mac 1^{10}). The latter, who is termed the teacher (διδάσκαλος) of king Ptolemy, is doubtless to be identified with a Peripatetic philosopher who lived at the court of Ptolemy VI. Philometor (B.C. 180–145); so Clem. Alex. Strom. v. xiv. 97; Euseb. Præp. Ev. viii. 9 fin. This Judas is often supposed to be Judas Maccabæus; so Grimm, Rawlinson, Zöckler. The purport of the letter (2 Mac 1^{10}–2^{18}), which is probably not genuine, is to invite the Egyptian Jews to keep the Feast of the Dedication. Like the preceding epistle (ib. 1$^{1\text{-}10a}$), it stands in no connexion with 2 Mac, and seems to have been prefixed to this book by a later hand. See Schürer, HJP II. iii. 213.

4. A son, probably the eldest, of Simon the Maccabee (1 Mac 16^{2}). He, with his brother John Hyrcanus, took the command against the Syrian army under Cendebæus, and was wounded in the engagement (ib. 16$^{1\text{-}10}$, cf. Jos. Ant. XIII. vii. 3). In B.C. 135, he, with his father and another brother named Mattathias, was murdered at the little fortress of Dok by Ptolemy, the son of Abubus (ib. 16$^{11\text{-}17}$). According to the representation of Josephus, Judas was not murdered at the same time as his father, but made prisoner, and subsequently put to death, when Hyrcanus raised the siege of Dagon (? Dok); see Jos. Ant. XIII. viii. 1; Wars, I. ii. 3–4. 5. 1 Es 9^{23}=Judah of Ezr 10^{23}. 6. An ancestor of Jesus, Lk 3^{30}. 7. One of the brethren of the Lord, Mt 13^{55}, Mk 6^{3}. See art. JUDE THE LORD'S BROTHER. H. A. WHITE.

JUDAS BARSABBAS (AV Barsabas) is mentioned in Ac 15$^{22. 27. 32. 33}$ as one of the two prominent members of the Jerus. Church who were sent to Antioch with Barnabas and Saul, bearing the letter of the apostles and elders to the Gentile Churches. The personal presence of these brethren was intended to give additional weight to the assurances of fellowship which the letter contained. Judas and Silas his companion are described as chief men among the brethren (ἡγουμένους: no doubt presbyters; see He 13$^{7. 17. 24}$). They were also prophets, i.e. men whom the Spirit inspired to communicate His truth and will to the Church. Judas, with Silas, remained in Antioch to strengthen the brethren there, and then returned to Jerusalem (v.^{34} in AV is spurious). We hear no more of Judas Barsabbas. Barsabbas is a patronymic (see JOSEPH BARSABBAS). He may have been a brother of Joseph (Ac 1^{23}). He is not to be identified with Jude the author of the Epistle, because the latter's brother James (see JUDE) was either the son of Joseph, the foster-father of Jesus, or the son of Alphæus. Neither can he have been the Apostle Judas, ‘not Iscariot,’ both because he is in Acts clearly distinguished from the apostles, and because the Apostle Judas was ‘the son of James’ (Lk 6^{16} RV).

JUDAS OF DAMASCUS.—In Ac 9^{11} Ananias is told to go to the street called ‘Straight,’ and seek in the house of Judas a man of the name of Saul, of Tarsus. Nothing further is known of Judas. Tradition has found a house for him in Damascus, not, however, in the street called Straight, but only a few paces out of it, in a lane to the right, as one goes from west to east.

A. C. HEADLAM.

JUDAS OF GALILEE, mentioned by Gamaliel (Ac 5^{37}) as the leader of a popular revolt ‘in the days of the taxing’ (RV ‘enrolment’), which ended, however, in his destruction and the dispersion of his followers. The ‘enrolment’ was the one conducted by Quirinius (which see), when in A.D. 6 or 7 he was a second time (cf. Lk 2^{1}) made governor of Syria. It was intended to be a basis of Roman taxation, and excited fierce opposition among the Jews, which was quieted only by the influence of the high priest Joazar (Jos. Ant. XVIII. i. 1). Judas, however, with a certain Pharisee, Saddoc, called the people to defend their liberties, bidding them acknowledge no Lord but God. Josephus (Ant. XVIII. i. 1, 6, XX. v. 2; BJ II. viii. 1, xvii. 8, 9, VII. viii. 1), like Gamaliel, usually calls him a Galilæan, but in one passage (Ant. XVIII. i. 1) a Gaulonite from Gamala, which lay east of Galilee. It is not clear whether the insurrection broke out in Judæa and the title ‘Galilæan’ was given to Judas because Gaulonitis was loosely identified with Galilee, or whether it broke out in Galilee and thus the title ‘Galilæan’ was attached to him. That it was a considerable movement appears both from Gamaliel's notice of it and from the frequency with which Josephus refers to it. According to the latter, from it there arose ‘the Zealots,’ the most fanatical and patriotic of the Jewish sects, whose violence under Gessius Florus (A.D. 64–66) hastened the war with Rome. Josephus mentions them, after the Pharisees, Sadducees, and Essenes, as the fourth sect of the Jews, and as founded by Judas. He does not mention, however, the death of Judas, or the fate of his insurrection. Gamaliel agrees with Josephus in the date and in the strength assigned to the revolt; nor is there any sufficient reason to question his statement that the leader perished and his followers were dispersed.

Descendants of Judas were also conspicuous for their fanatical violence. Two of his sons, James and Simon, were crucified by Tiberius Alexander (A.D. 46 ?–48). Another son, Menahem, a leader of the ‘Sicarii’ in Jerus. shortly before the war with Rome, acquired for a time much power, but was finally slain by the high priest's party.

Still another descendant was Eleazar, who, after the fall of Jerus., defended the fortress of Masada, and persuaded his followers to die by their own hands rather than submit to Rome (BJ VII. viii. and ix.).

Schürer (HJP I. ii. 4, 80) identifies Judas with the person of the same name who, after the death of Herod the Great, raised an insurrection near Sepphoris in Galilee (Jos. Ant. XVII. x. 5; BJ II. iv. 1); but Josephus does not identify them, and the earlier Judas appears to have been simply a marauder. G. T. PURVES.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.—This is his usual designation in the Synoptic Gospels: Ἰούδας Ἰσκαριώτης (Mt 26^{14}), Ἰούδας ὁ Ἰσκαριώτης (Mt 10^{4}), Ἰούδας ὁ καλούμενος Ἰσκαριώτης (Lk 22^{3}), Ἰούδας Ἰσκαριώθ (Mk 3^{19} 14^{10}, Lk 6^{16}). St. John calls him 'the son of Simon' (Σίμωνος), thrice giving the epithet 'Iscariot' to Judas (12^{4} 13^{2} 14^{22}), and twice (according to the best texts) to Simon (6^{71} 13^{26}). All four stigmatize him as ὁ παραδοὺς αὐτόν (Mt 10^{4}), or ὃς καὶ παρέδωκεν αὐτόν (Mk 3^{19}), or ὃς ἐγένετο προδότης (Lk 6^{16}), or ἔμελλεν παραδιδόναι αὐτόν (Jn 6^{71}), when they mention him for the first time. At the actual time of the treachery they use ὁ παραδιδοὺς αὐτόν, 'who was betraying him' (Mt $26^{25.\,46.\,48}$, Mk $14^{42.\,44}$, Lk 22^{21}, Jn 13^{11} $18^{2.\,5}$). See Ac 1^{16}.

Besides (1) his names, we are told (2) that he was called with the rest of the Twelve to be an apostle; (3) that he was covetous and dishonest, and sold his Master to the hierarchy; (4) that he effected the betrayal immediately after the Last Supper; and (5) that on realizing the consequences of his act he destroyed himself.

Every one of these points has given rise to a large amount of discussion, and the real or apparent uncertainty thus produced has led some to the desperate expedient of rejecting the whole story as a myth. Judas is a Christian fiction to represent the treacherous Judaism which put Jesus to death; and no one among the Twelve was really guilty of this enormity (Volkmar, Noack). Keim justly remarks that it is incredible that Christians should invent such a crime for an apostle. From Celsus onwards the foes of Christianity have made capital out of the sin of Judas (Orig. c. Cels. II. xii.); and to prove that he never committed it, would remove a weight from the heart of Christendom. The statements in the Gospels and Acts are inexplicable, however, if Judas, 'one of the Twelve,' never betrayed the Christ.

1. The name Ἰούδας is a common one, being the Gr. form of the Heb. name Judah. There are six persons before the time of Christ who bear this name, and six in the NT. But there is no confusion respecting the traitor. Discussion has been frequent merely as to the meaning of 'Iscariot,' and this question is practically settled. All other explanations may be rejected in favour of the view that it means 'man of Karioth' or 'Kerioth'; 'ish Keriyoth becoming Ἰσκαριώτης, as 'ish Tob becomes Ἴστοβος or Ἴστωβος (Jos. Ant. VII. vi. 1). This explains how both father and son have this name, Kerioth being the home of the family. This also explains the reading ἀπὸ καρυώτου which ℵ* and some other authorities have in Jn 6^{71}, and which D has in Jn 12^{4} $13^{2.\,26}$ 14^{22}. (See papers on 'Iscariot' by Nestle and Chase in Expository Times, December 1897, and January, February, and March 1898). Kerioth (LXX Καριώθ) in Judah (Jos 15^{25}) is commonly assumed to be the place referred to in 'Iscariot.' It is generally identified with the ruins el-Ḳarjetein south of Hebron. See KERIOTH-HEZRON. In any case Judas is of S. Palestine, while the other eleven were of Galilee; and this may have been one cause of estrangement between him and the rest. Judæans had a tendency to look down on Galilæans.

The life of Judas previous to his call, like that of all the Twelve, is hidden from us; and it is remarkable that the apocr. gospels make so little use of this attractive field of speculation. The Arabic Gospel of the Infancy makes the boy Judas a demoniac who bites (? the kiss), and the demon takes flight when Judas comes into contact with the boy Jesus (xxxv.); but this passage stands alone.

2. The Synoptists indicate that Judas was called with the remainder of the Twelve, and in all their lists his name stands last in the last group of four, while in Ac his place is vacant (Mt 10^{4}, Mk 3^{19}, Lk 6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}). Mt and Mk place him next to Simon the Cananæan, Lk next to the other Judas; and it is possible that one of these was the traitor's companion when the Twelve were sent out two and two (Mk 6^{7}). Like the others, he received power to cast out demons and heal diseases (Mt 10^{1}, Lk 9^{1}); and, like them, he seems to have been successful (Mk 6^{13}, Lk 9^{6}). Lange conjectures that the enthusiast who said, 'I will follow thee whithersoever thou goest' (Lk 9^{57}), was Judas. But Mt calls this man 'a scribe' (8^{19}), and it is most improbable that he was one of the Twelve, who seem to have been chosen before this took place.

But it is in connexion with their election that the chief difficulty respecting Judas is found. Why was such a man chosen to be an apostle? Unless we are prepared to throw aside the express statements of St. John, we cannot here have recourse to the limitation of Christ's knowledge. He tells us, not only that Jesus 'knew all men, and . . . himself knew what was in man' (2^{24}), but that 'Jesus knew from the beginning . . . who it was that should betray him' (6^{64}), and that a year before the Passion He said, 'Did not I choose you the Twelve, and one of you is a devil?' (6^{70}) The parable of the Barren Fig-tree suggests that Christ wished to give Judas every opportunity of bearing good fruit. Or, He may have desired to prevent him from becoming even worse; or, to lessen his powers of mischief; or, to prove to all that no one is safe or constrained, and that even an apostle can rebel to the uttermost; electus enim a Christo suâ libertate et vitio corruit (Toletus). Some maintain that Christ selected Judas because He knew that he would betray Him and thus fulfil the divine decrees. None of these suggestions removes the difficulty, which runs up into the insoluble problems of the origin of evil, and of divine omniscience combined with human free-will. See Westcott, Add. Note on Jn 13^{18}.

3. We may assume that Judas had some good qualities which led to his admission to the apostolic body. Among these, practical ability and energy seem to have been found. Hence, when the company begins to have funds (Lk 8^{3}), he is selected to administer them (Jn 13^{29}). This he did dishonestly (Jn 12^{4-6}); and the same greed led him to betray his Master to the priests for thirty shekels (Mt 26^{15}, Mk 14^{11}, Lk 22^{5}). His pilfering from the money-box is the one thing to his discredit that is told us previous to his great crime, and the Synoptists are silent as to this preparatory course of sin. But, no doubt, he yielded to other forms of temptation; and it has been much debated *whether covetousness was the sole or the chief cause of his treachery. It was certainly a cause. He sought the priests, not they him; and his question is, 'What are ye willing to give me?' But disappointed ambition probably helped. He looked, like the rest of the disciples, for an earthly kingdom with profits and honours, and he may have been the first to see that nothing of the kind was in store for him. Jesus had refused to be made a king (Jn 6^{15}); and it was soon after this that the presence of a diabolical character among the Twelve was announced (6^{70}). The triumphal entry into Jerusalem led to nothing; and then the compact with the hierarchy was made. Resentment probably contributed something, at any rate as the end drew near. During the last year Judas would feel that to some extent his conduct was suspected or known. Christ's strong warnings against avarice, and His denunciations of hypocrisy, would seem at times to be aimed at him, and no doubt were in part meant specially for him. Such passages as Mt 6^{19-21} 13^{22}, Mk 10^{25}, Lk 16^{11-13} acquire additional meaning when we remember that Judas was among the hearers. His hypocrisy after the pilfering began must have been conscious, and seems to have been successful; for to the last the other apostles did not suspect him (Jn $13^{22.\,28}$). But Christ declared that hypocrisy is always exposed in the end (Lk 12^{2}). It was 'to the disciples first of all,' and (we may believe) to Judas most of all, that He said, 'whatsoever ye have spoken in the ear in the inner chambers shall be proclaimed upon the housetops' (Lk $12^{1.\,3}$). And who more than Judas needed the warning, 'Look whether the light that is in thee be not darkness'? (Lk 11^{35}). His chagrin at the 'waste' of the ointment, and Christ's public rebuke of his hypocritical lament, seem to have been among the incidents which completed his determination to betray Christ. Constant contact with a goodness to which he would not yield had generated a fierce hate. See Swete on Mk 14^{10}.

* We must not argue that so small a sum as thirty shekels could not have induced him to commit such a crime. Matricide has been committed for a few shillings. Thirty shekels was the price of a slave (Ex 21^{32})=about £4 according to the present value of silver, but in purchasing power perhaps double that amount. The power of avarice is almost limitless.

Attempts have been made both to darken and to brighten what is told us of Judas. Was he a plotter from the first? May he not have sought admission to the inner circle of Christ's disciples in order to overthrow this revolutionary Teacher? But even St. John, whose horror of him is most clearly expressed, gives no hint of this; and, if it were true, it would be amazing that Judas should share in the general success of the Twelve as preachers and workers of miracles. On the other hand, may not his motive have been much less evil than is commonly supposed? Some would represent him as a brave man who believed that patriotism required him to deliver Jesus to the rulers. Others, with more plausibility, suggest that, like the Baptist, he may have been impatient at the slow progress of the Messiah; and he may have intended merely to precipitate a crisis. If the hierarchy were encouraged to arrest Jesus, His miraculous power would defeat them, the populace would declare for Him, and His triumph would be complete. The Passover was an opportunity which must not be allowed to pass. In arguing and acting thus, Judas was presumptuous and wrongheaded, but he was not a sordid traitor. This view also, which is advocated by De Quincey and Whately, has no support in Scripture, not even in the record of his remorse. If there was nothing worse than this, would Christ have denounced him as devilish, and called him a 'son of perdition'? And granting that διάβολος in Jn 6^{70} is not much stronger than Σατανᾶ in Mt 16^{23} and Mk 8^{33}, yet of no one but Judas did He say, 'Good were it for him if that man had not been born' (Mt 26^{24}). After this it is hardly necessary to point out that both Luke and John regard Judas in the last stages of his career as becoming the abode of Satan (Lk 22^{3}, Jn $13^{2.\,27}$), who then 'entered into him,' an expression which is unique in Scripture in this spiritual sense. With Keim we reject these hypotheses in defence of Judas as impossible and unworthy inventions which have nothing noble to excuse them.

The enormity of the sin of Judas consisted in its being against all bonds of discipleship and friendship; against light, against mercies, affection, trust, and warnings; against his own promises and preaching. And it was committed deliberately, not under sudden strain, like Peter's denials, but with skilful and persistent calculation. He was not surprised by a violent temptation, but he carefully sought an opportunity, which he used with unswerving pertinacity, in spite of the tenderness of the feet-washing, the solemnity of Christ's public condemnation of the traitor, and the proof given to him privately that Christ knew who the traitor was. The demonstrative kiss (κατεφίλησεν) has no parallel in history, and could hardly have been invented; all the less so, because the narrative tells us that by going forward to meet His captors, and declaring Himself to be the person whom they were seeking, Jesus rendered the signal unnecessary. But the sin of Judas is unique only in its opportunity and its form; in kind it may be repeated. It is possible to 'crucify the Son of God afresh' (He 6^{6}), and therefore it is possible to betray Him afresh.

4. All the Gospels represent the traitor as effecting his purpose immediately after the Last Supper, at which he was present; but the point at which he left the upper room is much disputed. Did he, or did he not, receive the eucharistic bread and wine? The first two Gospels seem to imply that Judas received with the rest; but they are indefinite, for they do not mention his exit. St. John is equally indefinite; for he omits the institution of the Eucharist, and we do not know where it should be inserted. St. Luke places the words, 'But behold the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table,' after the distribution of the eucharistic bread ($22^{19.\,21}$), and apparently after the eucharistic cup also, whether or not we accept as original the disputed words ($^{19b.\,20}$). It is possible to hold that Judas went out between the partaking of the eucharistic bread and that of the eucharistic cup (Westcott on Jn 13); but the view mentioned by Theophylact, that Judas partook of the cup, but concealed his portion of the bread to show to the hierarchy, need only be mentioned. The majority of patristic and mediæval commentators, with some Reformation writers, adopt the view taken in the Anglican Liturgy, that Judas partook of the Eucharist (see Bynæus, de Morte Christi, i. pp. 443–448, Amst. 1691; Cornelius a Lapide and Maldonatus on Mt 26^{20}). The majority of modern commentators hold that he did not.

5. The perplexities respecting the career of Judas continue to the end. We have two accounts of his death in Scripture, and they differ both from one another and from a third which is obviously legendary. Can we accept any as historical?

In Mt 27^{3-10} we are told that Judas, on learning that Jesus was condemned to death, was stricken with remorse: perfecto demum scelere magnitudo ejus intellecta est, as Tacitus says of Nero's murder of his mother (Ann. XIV. x. 1). He took back the thirty shekels to his employers, saying, 'I have sinned in that I have betrayed innocent blood.' But they had no further interest in the vile instrument which they had used. 'What is that to us? See thou to it.' There are several remarkable words in what follows: καὶ ῥίψας τὰ ἀργύρια εἰς τὸν ναὸν ἀνεχώρησεν—he hurled the silver pieces into the Holy Place and went into solitude. Into the ναός the priests alone might go (Lk $1^{9.\,21}$, Mt 23^{16} 27^{40}, Mk 14^{58}, Jn 2^{19} etc.). It included both the Holy Place and the Holy of Holies (Mt 27^{51}, Mk 15^{38}, Lk 23^{45}). It is never used like ἱερόν for the whole temple. Either this is a strange exception, or Judas in his desperation rushed into the sanctuary, or (most probably) he hurled the money from a distance. The use of ῥίπτειν εἰς and not βάλλειν ἐν points to this, but is not conclusive. Again, ἀνέχωρησεν means more than 'departed'; it is commonly used of those who shun company, retire from observation (Mt $2^{14.\,22}$ 4^{12} 12^{15} 14^{13} 15^{21}, Mk 3^{7}, Jn 6^{15}, Ac 26^{31}). So also in LXX (Ex 2^{15}, Jos 8^{15}, Jg 4^{17} etc.). Yet it is putting a great deal of meaning into it to interpret, 'he lived as a solitary, became a hermit.' But, if this be adopted, then ἀπελθὼν ἀπήγξατο means, 'he left his place of retirement and hanged himself.'

It is from this point that we can compare Matthew's account with that put into the mouth of Peter in the Acts, and with the legend. Matthew seems to mean that Judas hung himself before his betrayed Master was hanged on the cross. He plainly states that Judas left the money, and that the priests, with characteristic scrupulosity about trifles after unscrupulous breach of the gravest commandments (cf. Jn 19^{31}), would not put the polluted silver into the sacred treasury,* but bought with it the potter's field, to bury aliens in. This field was afterwards known as 'the field of blood,' because it was bought with blood-money. Thus a prophecy of Jeremiah (? Zechariah) was fulfilled.†

The narrative in the Acts (1^{16-20}) is strangely different. Nothing is said about the priests or the restoration of the money. On the contrary, Judas himself is said to have 'procured a field with the reward of his iniquity.' There he fell headlong in such a way that 'his bowels gushed out'; and hence the field was called 'the field of blood.' Thus a prophecy of David (Ps 69^{25} 109^{8}) was fulfilled. It is possible to harmonize the two modes of death. Judas hung himself over a precipice, the rope broke, and he was dashed to pieces. The Vulgate of Ac 1^{18} suggests this method: suspensus crepuit medius. But why should Matthew give only one half of the tragedy, and Luke only the other? And even so there still remain grave discrepancies between the two narratives. In the one Judas restores the money, in the other he keeps it; in the one he procures the field, in the other the hierarchy do so; in the one the name of the field comes from the blood-money, in the other from his bloody death. Moreover, in the one he plainly commits suicide, like Ahithophel (2 S 17^{23}), in the other his death may be accidental. In the Middle Ages two different spots were pointed out, one as 'the potter's field,' and the other as Akeldama; and the 'tree of Judas' is still shown.

c. + Ac.

It is better to recognize the fact that we have here two different traditions, of which that in the Gospel is nearer in time to the event, and probably nearer to the truth; but even that may have been influenced by the desire to harmonize facts with a supposed prophecy. The tradition learned by St. Luke is later; and popular fancy has guessed at the meaning of 'the field of blood.' But it is an excess of scepticism to say that nothing is known about the end of Judas. We may safely affirm that he came to a violent end, probably by his own hand. And the story of the return of the money and of the priests' treatment of it has every appearance of truth. But it may be admitted that, in the absence of evidence, a horrible end would inevitably have been invented for Judas. We may compare the cases of Dositheus the heretic and his successor Simon Magus, both of whom are represented as perishing by a violent death, and, like Judas in the Acts, by a fall (Clem. Hom. II. xxiv.; Apost. Const. VI. ix.). The accounts of the death of Arius exhibit a similar feeling (Socrates, HE I. xxxviii.; Sozomen, II. xxx.).

This tendency is seen still more clearly in the legendary account of the end of Judas, preserved in a fragment from the fourth book of Papias (Theophylact on Ac 1^{18}, Catena ad Acta S. App.; Cramer, Oxford, 1838, p. 12; Patr. Apostolic Opp., Gebh., Harn., Zahn, I. ii. app.; Suicer, Thesaurus, s.v. ἀπάγχω). This story is an amplification of ἐλάκησεν μέσος καὶ ἐξεχύθη πάντα τὰ σπλάγχνα αὐτοῦ (Ac 1^{18}), with details which seem to be borrowed from the death of Antiochus (2 Mac $9^{4\text{ff.}}$). Papias had heard that Judas became so enlarged by inflammation that where a waggon could easily pass he could not;—not even his head, which was so swollen that even the physician could not find his eyes. Worms and corruption proceeded from his body, and he suffered horrible torments until he died ἐν ἰδίῳ χωρίῳ. The spot was shunned by every one, and for years afterwards an offensive smell tainted the neighbourhood, intolerable to all who passed by. Another addition makes the narrative more harmonious with Ac 1^{18}, by stating that he was crushed by a waggon, ὥστε τὰ ἔγκατα αὐτοῦ ἐκκενωθῆναι (Oecumenius, ad loc.). But we can hardly say that the story without this detail shows that Papias knew the Acts. He knew a story which seems to have grown in part out of the narrative preserved in the Acts. But, in any case, here, as often, we are able to contrast the sobriety and probability of the Gospel narrative with the grotesque and revolting exaggerations in non-canonical sources.

It is not necessary to enlarge on the contrast between Peter and Judas in their fall and in their repentance. The one yielded to a sudden temptation, was at once touched by his Master's reproachful look of love, and returned to his Lord in affectionate confidence at the earliest opportunity. Judas deliberately sought and persisted in evil in defiance of all loving influences, and, in his dismay at the results of his act, tried to ease his conscience, without turning to Christ or to God for forgiveness. He thus ended, not in repentance, but in despair. See Euthymius Zigabenus on Mt 27^{5}.

But as early as Origen quite another view was taken of the suicide of Judas. He was hurrying to do in the other world what he failed to do in this. Knowing that Jesus would soon be in Hades, and that He was the source of salvation, he determined to be there before Him, and with bared soul to meet Him and implore His forgiveness (Origen, Tract. in Matt. xxxv., Migne, xiii. 1767. Suicer, s.v. Ἰούδας, quotes the same idea from Theophanes, Hom. xxvii. p. 202. See also Theophylact on Mt 27^{5}).

The impious sect of the Cainites had a small composition which they called the Gospel of Judas. They regarded him as the true Gnostic, who with supreme insight accomplished the excellent work of overthrowing the power of the Demiurge by causing the death of Christ (Iren. I. xxxi. 1; Epiphan. Hær. I. xxxviii. 1; Theodoret, Hær. Fab. I. xv.; Pseudo-Tert. adv. omn. Hær. ii.).

Representations of Judas are rare in ancient art. Kraus knows of only three of the traitor's kiss. These are a sarcophagus at Verona (Maffei, Verona illustr. iii. 54), a sarcophagus of southern Gaul (Faillon, Monum. de S. Madeleine, i. 462), and a mosaic of the 6th cent. in S. Apollinare at Ravenna, of which Kraus gives a sketch. In Smith's Dict. of Chr. Ant. i. 891 is a drawing of Judas hanging from a tree. This is from the Syriac MS of Rabula, A.D. 586. Kraus gives another from an ivory in the British Museum, which is perhaps of the 5th cent. The crucifixion is part of the same picture, so that Judas hangs side by side with Christ (Real-Enc. d. Christ. Alt. ii. 74, 75).

* They were perhaps arguing by analogy from Dt 23^{18}. The wages of sin could not be offered to God. But if Judas had sinned, how could they be guiltless?

† The difficulty about the prophecy is not solved by assuming that by a slip of memory St. Matthew has written 'Jeremiah' for 'Zechariah' (cf. 'Barachias' for 'Jehoiada,' 23^{35}). Zec $11^{12.\,13}$ does not agree with the evangelist's quotation. Hebrew, LXX, and Matthew differ widely; but there must be some connexion, and perhaps through a Targum.

JUDAS (Ἰούδας), 'NOT ISCARIOT,' one of the twelve (Jn 14^{22}), who is also described as 'Judas of James' (Lk 6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}). His identification with the disciple who is also called Lebbæus (Mt 10^{3} AV) and Thaddæus (Mt 10^{3} RV, Mk 3^{18}) is generally accepted, although it has been suggested that Judas really took the place of Thaddæus, who had died during the ministry of our Lord. He is not to be identified with Judas or Jude, the Lord's brother. Nothing whatever is known about him or his ultimate career, except the question recorded by St. John, who is careful to distinguish him from his namesake the traitor. See, further, JUDE, LEBBÆUS, THADDÆUS.

W. MUIR.

JUDE THE LORD'S BROTHER.—A Judas is named as one of the Lord's 'brethren' in Mt 13^{55}, Mk 6^{3}. He has commonly been identified by tradition with the Apostle Judas, 'not Iscariot' (Jn 14^{22}). But the latter is described by St. Luke (6^{16}, Ac 1^{13}) as the son (AV has improperly the brother) of James. Those who deny that the 'brethren' included any apostles, of course reject this identification also, and regard Judas the brother of Jesus as the son of Joseph either by a former wife or by Mary (see BRETHREN OF THE LORD). Assuming the latter view, we know of Judas merely that he belonged to the Nazarene household, and, like the rest of his brethren (Jn 7^{5}), did not believe in Christ till after the resurrection (Ac 1^{13}). He was doubtless also the author of 'the Epistle of Jude,' styling himself in v.^{1} 'a servant of Jesus Christ and brother of James' (i.e. James the Lord's brother, Gal 1^{19}). This indicates that his spiritual relation to Jesus was felt to be more important than the fleshly one; also that Jude was less known in the Churches than James was. In v.^{17} he apparently distinguishes himself from the apostles. The Ep. indicates that he was familiar with the OT and Jewish tradition, and specially indignant against those who introduced immorality under cover of the gospel.

The only mention of Jude in ecclesiastical history is the story related from Hegesippus by Eusebius (HE iii. 19, 20, 32), that Domitian, having commanded the descendants of David to be slain, certain heretics made accusation against the grandchildren of Jude,* 'said to have been the Lord's brother according to the flesh'; but that, when they were brought to the emperor, he found them to be poor, hard-working men, who described Christ's kingdom as heavenly, and destined to appear at the end of the world; so he dismissed them with contempt. The historian adds that they afterwards ruled the Churches, being both witnesses (i.e. for the faith) and relatives of the Lord; and that they lived until the time of Trajan. Nicephorus Callisti (c. A.D. 1350, Hist. Eccles. i. 33) reports a tradition that Jude's wife was Mary the mother of James and Joses, and (ib. ii. 3) that his mother was Salome; but the statements of Niceph. are inconsistent with respect to these relationships, and his testimony to them is of small value.

* That Jude was married may be inferred from 1 Co 9^{5}. The names of his grandchildren are said to have been Zoker and James (Hegesip. ap. Phil. Sedet., TU v. 169).

1. TRANSMISSION OF THE TEXT.—The authorities are (1) MSS (a) Uncial: ℵABC ('primary' MSS, Hort, Introduction, p. 192) $K_2L_2P_2$; the relative character of all these MSS has been elaborately investigated by B. Weiss, Die Kath. Briefe, in 'Texte u. Untersuchungen,' viii. 3; (b) Cursive: the chief are 13 (=33 evv.), 40, 44 (=221 Scriv.), 137: (2) Versions: (a) Latin: vg. (on Old Latin texts see below under 'Fathers'): (b) Syriac: Harklean; the Syriac Vulgate (Peshiṭta) did not contain 2 P, 2 3 Jn, Jude; in modern editions they are supplied after a text taken from a Bodleian MS printed by Pococke in 1630: (c) Egyptian: Bohairic (Memphitic), Sahidic (Thebaic): (d) Ethiopic: (e) Armenian: (3) Fathers: (a) Greek: the chief are Clem. Alex., Origen, Didymus (chiefly Latin trans.), Ephraem (not Syriac works), Cyril Alex., the commentators Œcumenius and Theophylact, the Fragments in Cramer, Catena: (b) Latin: Tertullian does not quote from, but refers to, Jude (de Cult. Fem. i. 3, 'Enoch apud Iudam apostolum testimonium possidet'): his words seem to imply that the Ep. was known to his readers, and therefore current in a Latin translation. There are important quotations in Lucifer of Calaris, de non Conv. cum Hær. xv. (p. 33 f. ed. Hartel)—vv.$^{1-3.\ 5-8.\ 11-13.\ 17-19.}$; in Priscillian, Tract. i. iii. v. (pp. 29, 32, 44, 64, ed. Schepss)—vv.$^{12f.\ 14f.\ 23}$; also in the Speculum commonly known by the symbol m (pp. 455, 647, ed. Weihrich)—vv.$^{6.\ 7.\ 12}$. These quotations supply relics of pre-Hieronymic texts. An examination of them shows (1) that Lucif. and m give substantially the same text in vv.$^{6f.\ 12}$, Lucif. being rather fuller and slightly nearer to the Greek; (2) that Lucif. and Prisc. give different texts. Sabatier quotes also from Jerome, Augustine, Vigilius, and Fulgentius small fragments of Latin texts. The whole subject needs further investigation.

The text in several places seems uncertain, and 'primitive' errors are probable. On vv.$^{1.\ 5}$ see WH, Introduction, Notes on Select Readings, p. 106 f. In v.^{12} (οὗτοί εἰσιν οἱ . . . σπιλάδες συνευωχούμενοι), unless the writer himself after οἱ changed his construction, the οἱ appears to be an early insertion (see the two types of sentences in vv.$^{16.\ 19}$). In v.^{22} either the first ἐλεᾶτε is intrusive (cf. WH), or (in view of St. Jude's fondness for triplets) οὓς δέ should be inserted before σώζετε (so ℵ). In the latter case the three clauses rise to a climax, and each has its characteristic idea—hopeful compassion, desperate effort, compassion paralyzed by fear of contamination.

2. RECEPTION IN THE CHURCH.—Little or no stress can be laid on supposed coincidences with this Ep. in sub-apostolic writings—Ep. Barn. 2^{10} (cf. 4^{9}), Jude$^{3f.}$; Ep. Polyc. iii. 2, iv. 2, Jude$^{3.\ 20}$; Mart. Polyc. xx. (doxology), Jude$^{24f.}$. The similarity, however, of Didaché ii. 7 (οὐ μισήσεις πάντα ἄνθρωπον, ἀλλὰ οὓς μὲν ἐλέγξεις, περὶ δὲ ὧν προσεύξῃ, οὓς δὲ ἀγαπήσεις κ.τ.λ.) to Jude$^{22f.}$ in thought and still more in form is too striking to be accidental (cf. iv. 1 ἡ κυριότης, Jude^{8}); it need not, however, imply direct borrowing, for on other grounds it seems likely that the two documents had their origin within the same circle of Christian thought, and it is conceivable that parts of the Didaché are ultimately the work of the author of the Epistle.

There is clear evidence that at the end of the 2nd and at the beginning of the 3rd cent. the Ep. was accepted as authoritative in three important Churches. (1) Alexandria. Clement quotes it as the work of Jude in Pæd. iii. 8 (p. 280, ed. Potter), Strom. iii. 2 (p. 515); he cites words from it (v.$^{22f.}$) as a 'commandment' in Strom. vi. 8 (p. 773); his Hypotyposes contained 'short explanations' of this as of other Catholic Epistles (Eus. HE vi. 14. 1, Photius, Biblioth. 109; see at end of this art.). The witness of Clement is carried on by Origen. If in one place he hints at doubts about its reception (in Matt. tom. xvii. 30, εἰ δὲ καὶ τὴν Ἰούδα πρόσοιτό τις ἐπιστολήν), yet in another (in Matt. tom. x. 17), speaking of Jude as one of the Lord's brethren, he commends the Epistle as 'full of strong words of heavenly grace though it be but a few lines in length,' and he repeatedly quotes from or alludes to it (in Joh. tom. xiii. 37, in Matt. tom. xv. 27, in Rom.* lib. iii. 6 [Scriptura sacra], in Rom.* lib. v. 1 [J. Apostolus in epistola catholica], in Ezek.* hom. iv. 1, Ep. ad Alexandrinos*, xvii. p. 7 f. (ed. Lommatzsch), de Princip.* iii. 2. 1; the passages marked * are extant only in a Latin translation). It was also commented on by Didymus (Migne, Pat. Gr. xxxix. 1811–1818). (2) Carthage. It was accepted by Tertullian (see above, under 'Text'). (3) Rome. It is included in the Muratorian Canon, not improbably the work of Hippolytus (Lightfoot, Clement, ii. p. 405 ff.).* The writer mentions certain writings which cannot be 'received into the Catholic Church: for gall may not be mixed with honey.' He then continues, 'Epistola sane iude et superscrictio iohannis duas in catholica habentur.' The context and the introduction of the sentence by sane ('to be sure') imply that doubts existed which he expressly puts aside (cf. Zahn, Gesch. des NT Kanons, II. i. p. 93). The evidence then justifies Zahn's verdict (ib. I. i. p. 321) that at the meeting-point of the 2nd and 3rd cent. the Epistle was accepted 'in the Catholic Church, the Church of all the countries round the Mediterranean,' a verdict with which Harnack (NT um Jahr 200, 79, 86) substantially agrees. On the other hand, the following facts must be noticed. (a) Though accepted by Tertullian, the Ep. does not appear to be quoted by Cyprian. Like He and Ja, it is omitted in the Canon Mommsenianus (an African list of the middle of the 4th cent.), unless we accept the somewhat precarious suggestion of Harnack (Theol. Ltzg. 1886, col. 173) that a reference to the Epp. of St. James and St. Jude is intended in the una sola which stands after the mention of the three Epp. of St. John and again after that of the two Epp. of St. Peter (see Zahn, Gesch. II. i. p. 155 n.; Sanday in Studia Bibl. et Eccles. iii. p. 243 ff.). It is not unlikely that after the time of Tertullian the Ep. fell out of use in the N. African Church. It should be added that it has no place among the Books contained in the Latin Antiqua translatio referred to by Cassiodorus (de Instit. Div. Lit. xiv.). (b) It was not included in the Syriac Vulgate (cf. Amphilochius, Iambi ad Seleucum (Migne, Pat. Gr. xxxvii. 1593)), nor is it quoted in the Homilies of Aphraat or in the Syriac works of Ephraem (cf. Stud. Bibl. et Eccles. iii. p. 138). None of the Catholic Epistles is mentioned in the Doctrine of Addai (ed. Phillips, p. 44) among the Books publicly read in the Syrian Church. (c) There is no evidence that it was accepted in the School of Antioch. The passage commonly quoted from the Letter of the bishops who condemned Paul of Samosata (τοῦ καὶ τὸν θεὸν τὸν ἑαυτοῦ [καὶ κύριον] ἀρνουμένου καὶ τὴν πίστιν, ἣν καὶ αὐτὸς πρότερον εἶχε, μὴ φυλάξαντος, Eus. HE vii. 30. 4) can hardly be considered as a decisive reference to Jude $^{3f.}$, especially if, according to the best MSS, the words in brackets are omitted. In later times the Ep. does not seem to be quoted in the voluminous works of Chrysostom or Theodoret, and the phrase used (τῶν καθολικῶν ἐπιστολαὶ τρεῖς) in the Synopsis (Migne, Pat. Gr. lvi. 313 f.) which bears the name of the former appears to show that Jude, 2 P, 1 Jn, 2 Jn were known and deliberately excluded. Theodore of Mopsuestia (who made his view of the character of a Book a criterion of canonicity), according to Leontius of Byzantium (Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxvi. 1365), rejected (ἀποκηρύττει) this Epistle, as also Ja, 2 P, 2 Jn, 3 Jn (see especially Kihn, Theod. von Mops. pp. 67, 75 f.). This is confirmed by the fact that Junilius (Instit. regularia, 6, 7), whom Kihn (p. 358 ff.) shows to represent Theodore's views as to the Canon, reckons these Epistles as mediæ auctoritatis.

We learn from Didymus, though his words in the Latin translation in which they reach us are somewhat obscure, that the Ep. was questioned by some on account of the strange reference to the dispute about Moses' body. We learn from Jerome (de Vir. Illustr. 4) that it was rejected by many ('a plerisque') because it quoted from the Book of Enoch. Eusebius (HE iii. 25, cf. ii. 23), reflecting the average opinion of his time, ranks it among 'the disputed Books, which yet are known and acknowledged by most.' The Ep. has a place in the list of Canonical Scriptures set forth by the Third Council of Carthage in A.D. 397. This Canon, supported by the authority of Jerome and Augustine, gained universal acceptance in the W. Church.

To sum up: considering the brevity of the Ep. and its special character, it had received, by the beginning of the 3rd cent., a remarkably wide acceptance in the Church. This early acceptance, representing the voice of tradition, supports its authenticity. From the beginning of the 3rd cent., when tradition was to some extent checked by criticism, and when (in view of the Gnostic controversies) all apocryphal writings were regarded with suspicion, the internal character of the Ep., its quotation from Enoch, and its reference to the Assumptio Moysi, tended to become a bar to its recognition as an authoritative document of the apostolic age. Even when the question of the NT Canon was virtually settled by the general opinion of the Church, such doubts and suspicions, based on internal evidence, found occasional expression.

3. VOCABULARY, STYLE, LITERARY INDEBTEDNESS.—In the vocabulary of Jude there are three elements. (a) There is the obvious Christian element. A Christian dialect has arisen. Certain words, e.g. κλητοί, σωτηρία, πίστις, have attained, largely through the teaching and the writings of St. Paul (see below), a fixed and recognized meaning among Greek-speaking Christians. (b) The writer is steeped in the language of the LXX. In this short Ep. occur several words and phrases derived from the LXX which are not used independently by other NT writers—ἐκπορνεύειν, ἐμπαίκτης (2 P), ἐνυπνιάζεσθαι, θαυμάζειν πρόσωπα, λαλεῖν ὑπέρογκα. Moreover, it should be noted that he uses words which do not occur in the canonical books, but are found in the Book of Wisdom, ἀΐδιος (Wis 7^{26}, cf. 4 Mac 10^{15} var. lec.), ἄλογα ζῷα (Wis 11^{15}, cf. 4 Mac $14^{14.18}$), σπιλοῦν (Wis 15^4). Further, with Jude $^{6f.}$ compare 3 Mac $2^{4f.}$. (c) He has at his command a large stock of stately, sonorous, sometimes poetical words, e.g. ἀποδιορίζειν (Aristot.), ἄπταιστος (Xen., adverb Plat.), ἐκχυθῆναι (Aristoph., Polyb.), ἐπαφρίζειν (Moschus), ζόφος (Hom., Hes., Pind., Polyb.), παρεισδύεσθαι (Hippocr., Plut., Philo), σπιλάδες (Hom., Anthol., Joseph.), συνευωχεῖσθαι (Aristot., Joseph., Lucian), φθινοπωρινος (Aristot., Polyb., Plut.). Moreover, such phrases as πᾶσαν σπουδὴν ποιεῖσθαι (Herod.), προκεῖσθαι δεῖγμα, δίκην ὑπέχειν (Herod., Soph., Eur.), κρίσιν ἐπιφέρειν, have a true Greek ring about them. It is interesting to note that more than once he adopts and presses into the service of Christian thought a recognized Greek phrase—ἡ κοινὴ σωτηρία ('the safety of the state,' see Wetstein's note), οἱ προγεγραμμένοι ('the proscribed,' Polyb.).

The vocabulary then of the Ep. proves that the author, though a Jew, was yet a man of some culture and, as it would seem, not without acquaintance with Greek writers. Writers, however, of the 'common' dialect, embodying older strata of the language, would suffice to supply him with his vocabulary.

From vocabulary we turn to style. Here we mark an entire lack of flexibility. There is indeed in the Ep. a strong rhetorical element. But the writer is never carried away. There are no rugged, broken sentences (v.^{16} is no exception to this statement) as in St. Paul's Epistles. We miss entirely the power of epigram which is so strong a weapon with St. James, and the oratorical persuasiveness of the Ep. to the Hebrews. The powerful effect of the Epistle is due entirely (on the literary side) to the writer's ability πυργῶσαι ῥήματα σεμνά. The richness of the writer's vocabulary stands in marked contrast to his poverty in ways of connecting and manipulating sentences. The general structure is characterized by a certain formality and stiffness. His fondness for triplets (vv.$^{2.\ 5\text{-}7.\ 8.\ 11.\ 12.\ 19.\ 22f.\ 25}$) has often been noticed. The reiteration of οὗτοί εἰσιν (οἱ) at the beginning of sentences (vv.$^{12.\ 16.\ 19}$, cf. $^{8.\ 10.\ 14}$) is especially marked.[*] As the Ep. draws towards its close, there is a twice-repeated contrast between the false and the true members of the Church; in either case over against a οὗτοι is set a ὑμεῖς δέ (vv.$^{16f.\ 19f.}$), an arrangement unfortunately obscured in WH. Thus the writer's Greek is a strong and weighty weapon over which, however, he has not a ready command. The elaborate and balanced doxology (cf. also v.^{4} καὶ μόνον . . . Χριστόν) recalls passages in the Epistle of the Roman Clement, and suggests that the writer's words took that liturgical form which was familiar to him in his ministrations in the Christian assembly. Indeed, the impression produced by the carefully-compacted arrangement of the whole Epistle is that in it we not improbably have a résumé of words spoken by an elder in the assembly which, often repeated and pondered over, gradually formed themselves into the elaborate denunciation and exhortation of this Epistle.

The literary affinities of the Ep. are important both for the light which they throw on its history and also for purposes of interpretation.

(i.) We have seen that the writer was familiar with the LXX. There are one or two indications, hardly perhaps decisive, that he was acquainted with the Hebrew OT. In v.^{12} ἑαυτοὺς ποιμαίνοντες probably comes from Ezk 34^{2} cf. ^{8}, but it is closer to the Heb. (הָרֹעִים . . . רֹעִים אוֹתָם) than to the LXX μὴ βόσκουσιν οἱ ποιμένες ἑαυτούς.[†] In v.^{12} νεφέλαι ἄνυδροι ὑπὸ ἀνέμων παραφερόμεναι may be a reminiscence of Pr 25^{14} (נְשִׂיאִים וְרוּחַ וְגֶשֶׁם אָיִן), but the LXX has no resemblance to Jude. In v.$^{22f.}$ it is not improbable that the two phrases ἐκ πυρὸς ἁρπάζοντες and τὸν ἀπὸ τῆς σαρκὸς ἐσπιλωμένον χιτῶνα are derived from Zec 3$^{2f.}$, from which passage the phrase ἐπιτιμήσαι σοι Κύριος (v.^{9}) is clearly taken (perhaps through the medium of the Assumptio Moysi). But there are no points of contact between Jude and the LXX rendering. On the other hand, the Hebrew word (צֹאִים) used here, meaning 'filthy,' is connected with the words צֹאָה, צוֹאָה, both meaning 'excrements,' and thus Jude's phrase alludes to the associations of the Hebrew word. The probability of these references taken together is greater than their probability when each is taken separately. So far as they go, they suggest that the writer of the Ep. was a Jew of Palestine.

(ii.) The discovery of the text of the Greek version of the Book of Enoch (1–32) among the Akhmîm fragments has supplied new and important material for the criticism of Jude. As this material does not appear as yet to have been fully utilized for this purpose, no apology is needed for the subjoined table giving coincidences of thought and language. On the quotation in v.$^{14f.}$ from Enoch (1^{9}), see the art. on ENOCH IN THE NT.

(iii.) There is every reason to believe the assertion of Clement, Origen, and other Patristic writers (see the passages conveniently collected together in Charles, The Assumption of Moses, p. 105 ff.), that the writer derived the legend referred to in v.^{9} from a document called The Assumption of Moses. This document was indeed, as Charles shows, part of a book whose true title was probably The Testament of Moses, a fragment of which is known to us in a Latin translation under the title of The Assumption of Moses; and this Testament, as Burkitt has shown (Guardian, June 1, 1898), is probably the epilogue of the Book of Jubilees, which claims to be the record of a revelation made to Moses on Sinai by the Angel of the Presence. In view of Jude's use of this Mosaic literature the number of allusions in so short an Epistle to matters connected with Moses is noteworthy: the deliverance and punishment of Israel (v.^{5}), the murmuring (v.^{16}, cf. 1 Co 10^{10}), the episodes of Balaam and of Korah (v.^{11}).

Between the Latin fragment of the Assumption (cf. Charles, p. 62) and Jude there are coincidences in thought and (to some extent) in language. With Jude^{3} compare Assump. iv. 8, 'permanebunt in præposita fide sua.' With Jude^{12} cf. Assump. vii. 4, 'qui erunt homines dolosi, sibi placentes, ficti in omnibus suis et omni hora diei amantes convivia, devoratores, gulæ.' With Jude^{16} cf. Assump. vii. 9, 'et manus eorum et mentes immunda tractantes, et os eorum loquetur ingentia'; v. 5 'mirantes personas locupletum et accipientes munera.' With Jude^{24} cf. Assump. i. 10, 'ut facias quemadmodum sine querellam sis Deo' [MS est ideo].

(iv.) There can be no doubt that the writer was acquainted with and influenced in language and thought by St. Paul's Epistles. In the salutation to τοῖς ἐν θεῷ πατρὶ ἠγαπημένοις we have parallels in 1 Th 1^{4} 2 Th 2^{13}; the κλητοῖς here is precisely similar to the κλητοῖς of Ro 1^{7}, 1 Co 1^{2}. In v.^{20} the words ἐποικοδομοῦντες . . . πίστει recall Col 2^{7}. To different points in the closing doxology (v.$^{24f.}$) we have a remarkable series of parallels in St. Paul—Ro $16^{25ff.}$ (τῷ δὲ δυναμένῳ ὑμᾶς στηρῖξαι . . . μόνῳ σοφῷ θεῷ διὰ Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ), Eph 3^{20}, 1 Th 5^{23}, 2 Th 3^{3}, 1 Co 1^{8}, Eph 1^{4}, Col 1^{22}. Besides these verbal coincidences there is a close parallel to 1 Co $10^{1\text{-}13}$ in the prominence given (vv.$^{5.\ 11.\ 16}$) to the deliverance and punishment of Israel regarded as a warning to the Christian body.

The investigation, then, under this head has shown that the writer was influenced in vocabulary, style, and thought by the OT (certainly by the LXX, probably also by the original Hebrew), by the Book of Enoch to a remarkable degree, by another apocryphal document embodying the history of Moses, and lastly by Epistles of St. Paul (including probably Col and Eph). His vocabulary, moreover, proves him to have had at least some acquaintance with the literature of the 'common' dialect, while at the same time his stiffness in the manipulation of sentences seems to stamp him as a man whose knowledge of Greek was acquired in later rather than in earlier life.

4. THE RELATION OF JUDE TO 2 PETER.—That there is a close literary connexion between the two Epistles is clear when the following passages are compared: Jude^{3} ‖ 2 P $1^{5.\ 15}$; ^{4} ‖ $2^{1\text{-}3}$; ^{5} ‖ $1^{12f.}$ 3^{1}; ^{6} ‖ $2^{4.\ 9}$; ^{7} ‖ $2^{6.\ 10}$; ^{8} ‖ 2^{11}; ^{9} ‖ $2^{11f.}$; ^{10} ‖ 2^{12}; ^{11} ‖ $2^{15f.}$; $^{12f.}$ ‖ $2^{13.\ 17}$; ^{16} ‖ 2^{18}; $^{17f.}$ ‖ $3^{2f.}$. The hypothesis that both writers borrowed from a third document, though it has found stray advocates, may be put aside at once, as being destitute of any shred of external evidence, and as having no support in the peculiar phenomena of the two Epistles. The direct question therefore remains—which of the two writers is the borrower?

The priority of 2 P has found within the last few years an intrepid and resourceful champion in F. Spitta (Der Zweite Brief des Petrus u. der Br. des Judas, 1885).* The considerations are of three kinds: (i.) The general alleged historical connexion. Spitta supposes that 2 P was written by St. Peter shortly before his death; that according to his promise (1^{15}) he made provision for his correspondents being reminded of his teaching; and that St. Jude wrote his Ep. by way of carrying out St. Peter's undertaking. Accordingly, in Jude, Spitta finds direct references to 2 P. In v.^{5} πάντα, and in vv.$^{4.\ 12}$ the article (οἱ), refer respectively to facts and persons well known to St. Jude's readers through 2 P † (but on the phrase οὗτοί εἰσιν οἱ see above). Lastly, he holds that in Jude$^{17f.}$ there is a specific reference to 2 P 3^{3}. In regard to this last, the crucial, point, it is incredible that St. Jude, writing with the special purpose of reminding his readers of St. Peter's Epistle, should smother his reference to the words of that Epistle in an appeal to the habitual oral teaching (ἔλεγον) of the apostles generally (τῶν ἀποστόλων), and that he should omit the chief count of his master's indictment.

* Spitta (Zur Geschichte u. Litteratur des Urchristentums, ii. pp. 409–411 (1896)) has lately reaffirmed his position as to the relation of Jude and 2 P, and supported it by a fresh argument. He holds that the Shepherd of Hermas is a Christian recension of an older Jewish work. Of that Jewish work Jude and 2 P contain reminiscences. But he urges that investigation shows that the echoes of it in Jude must be derived through the medium of 2 P. On Zahn's position see footnote to Literature.

† In v.^{19} there is a similar article, but no reference to 2 P can be made out. Spitta therefore supposes that the allusion is to St. Paul's Epistles.

(ii.) Connexion of thought. It must suffice to apply this test to two pairs of passages :—

(a) In 2 P 2^{11} (ὅπου ἄγγελοι κ.τ.λ.) we have an example of forbearance answering to that adduced in Jude^{9} from the Assumptio. It has often been pointed out that the reference in 2 P is so general that it has no meaning until it is interpreted in the light of Jude. Spitta, however, maintains that Jude has mistaken the allusion in 2 P. Adopting the reading παρὰ Κυρίου, he supposes that 2 P refers to Enoch ($10^{4\text{ff.}}$ 12^{4} 13^{1}), where God is described as sending Raphael to the fallen angel Azazel, and Raphael and his fellows as executing the commission by sending Enoch to Azazel with a message of judgment. The objections to this ingenious suggestion are many, and, it seems, insuperable. It necessitates the adoption of the inferior reading παρὰ Κυρίου.* Again, the allusion could not have been surmised by the original readers of 2 P. Its discovery was reserved for a scholar, who, studying 2 P with Jude, had Enoch brought prominently before him. Again, no stress is laid in Enoch on the message being sent through the patriarch; and indeed there is something grotesque in finding an example of forbearance in the angels sending a man to do what, ex hypothesi, they shrank from doing themselves. Lastly, a message of judgment from God could not be described as βλάσφημος κρίσις. The passages, therefore, remain decisive witnesses against the priority of 2 P. (b) An argument of a different kind is supplied by Jude^{10} ‖ 2 P 2^{12}. The verse in Jude fits into the context (see v.^{8}), and is itself well compacted, the μὲν . . . δέ marking a simple and forcible contrast (cf. v.^{8}). The phrase φυσικῶς ἐπίστασθαι is a very natural phrase,† and the word φυσικῶς is necessary to limit the kind of knowledge. The clause ὡς τὰ ἄλογα ζῷα (note art.) stands after φυσικῶς, which it further defines. Lastly, φθείρονται answers to μιαίνουσιν in v.^{8}, just as βλασφημοῦσιν of v.^{10} to βλασφημοῦσιν in v.^{8}. The Petrine verse, on the other hand, is but loosely connected with the previous context; there is something artificial in the paronomasia φθοράν, φθορᾷ, φθαρήσονται (cf. 1^{4} 2^{19}), and the use of the adjective φυσικά is, to say the least, strange. All the expressions in Jude (except ὅσα . . . ἐπίστανται) have something corresponding to them in 2 P, and it is almost impossible to conceive that the ill-compacted and artificial sentence of the latter should have been the original of the terse, orderly, and natural sentence of the former. The investigation of other parallels would lead to the same conclusion; see especially Jude^{13} ‖ 2 P 2^{17}, the phrase οἷς ὁ ζόφος, κ.τ.λ. in Jude referring to the stars, and being a reminiscence (see above) of passages in Enoch.

(iii.) Vocabulary and style. (a) Positive arguments. The verdict must be arrived at not by drawing up statistics as to words, but by estimating the naturalness of the use of words and phrases in the parallel passages.

In 2 P we find elaborated expressions, containing sometimes favourite words of the author, corresponding to forcible, simple expressions, sometimes echoes of Enoch, in Jude. Thus, for example, εἰδότας ἅπαξ πάντα (cf. Enoch), Jude^{5}‖ καίπερ εἰδότας κ. ἐστηριγμένους (cf. 3^{17} 2^{14} 3^{16}) ἐν τῇ παρούσῃ (1^{9}) ἀληθείᾳ (2^{2}), 2 P 1^{12}; ὑπὸ ζόφον (cf. Enoch), v.^{6}‖ σειροῖς ζόφου, 2^{4}; ἐν ταῖς ἀγάπαις ὑμῶν σπιλάδες (the meaning 'hidden rocks' being certified by the fact that it is followed by a series of images from the natural world), v.^{12}‖ σπίλοι καὶ μῶμοι (cf. 3^{14}) ἐντρυφῶντες (cf. τὴν . . . τρυφήν, just above) ἐν ταῖς ἀπάταις αὐτῶν (the addition of αὐτῶν confirming ἀπάταις as against the reading ἀγάπαις), 2^{13}.

(b) Negative arguments. It must be remembered that, on the hypothesis of the priority of 2 P, Jude had the whole of 2 P before him. St. Jude wrote, according to Spitta's theory, to St. Peter's correspondents to remind them of the apostle's teaching in his letter. It is strange, therefore, that he does not refer explicitly to St. Peter or to his letter, especially as St. Peter had in that letter referred explicitly to St. Paul's letters; strange that, since he must have regarded the whole letter with peculiar reverence, there are large tracts of it which had no influence at all over him; equally strange that he does not in any way catch the strongly marked literary style of his master; and further, that words which would fix themselves in the mind of an attentive student of 2 P are not found in his letter.

These words are such as the following:—ἄθεσμος, 2^{7} 3^{17}; ἀποφεύγειν, 1^{4} $2^{18.20}$; ἀστήρικτος, 2^{14} 3^{16} (cf. στηρίζειν, 1^{12}; -γμός, 3^{17}); διό, $1^{10.12}$ 3^{14}; εἰ γάρ, $2^{4.20}$; ἐντολή, 2^{21} 3^{2}; ἐπάγγελμα, 1^{4} 3^{13} (ἐπαγγέλλεσθαι, 2^{19}); ἐπάγειν, $2^{1.5}$; ἐπίγνωσις, $1^{2.3.8}$ 2^{20} (verb 2^{21} bis; γνῶσις, $1^{5\text{f.}}$ 3^{18}); ἐπιχορηγεῖν, $1^{5.11}$; εὐσεβής, 2^{9}, -σέβεια, $1^{3.6.7}$ 3^{11}; ἡγεῖσθαι, 1^{13} 2^{13} $3^{9.15}$; ἡττᾶσθαι, $2^{19\text{f.}}$; ὑπάρχειν, 1^{8} 2^{19} 3^{11}; οὐ φείδεσθαι, $2^{4\text{f.}}$

To sum up: If Jude wrote first, then the author of 2 P, with the Ep. of Jude in his mind rather than actually before him, altered the sequence of its imperfectly remembered thoughts and expressions, elaborated and, with the aid of a phraseology peculiarly his own, made variations on phrases which clung to his memory. If, on the other hand, Jude wrote with the express purpose of recalling his master's letter to his readers, we must yet suppose that with rare skill he eliminated harsh and tortuous phrases, brought together scattered ideas, infused reminiscences of Enoch, and wrought the whole into natural compact and harmonious paragraphs. It is not too much to say that to have composed under such conditions a letter so forcible, so clearly and neatly expressed, and so bound together by interdependence of thought and phrase as is St. Jude's Epistle, would have been little short of a miracle of literary skill.

These various lines of argument converge and, so far as demonstration is possible in literary questions, demonstrate the priority of Jude.

5. DATE OF COMPOSITION AND AUTHORSHIP.—A convenient statement of the dates assigned to the Ep. by German critics is given in Holtzmann, Einleitung, p. 329. The older critics of the Tübingen school, regarding the letter as a forgery of the Judaists against the Paulinists, placed it late in the 2nd cent. More recent critics place it about the middle or in the first half of the 2nd cent. Thus Pfleiderer (Urchristenthum, p. 835 ff.) holds that it was written against the Carpocratians of Alexandria, and therefore not before A.D. 150. Jülicher (Einleit. p. 147) gives the limits as 180 and 100, and urges that, since the writer's tone of wonder and anger implies that he is dealing with a new form of error, it must not be placed very late in this period. With this verdict Harnack (Die Chronologie, p. 466) substantially agrees.

The superior limit is fixed by the evidence as to the reception of the Epistle; the inferior by internal evidence. The latter turns on the following points: (1) the way in which 'the faith' is spoken of as a formulated deposit (vv.$^{3.\,20}$); (2) the language as to the apostles (v.^{17})—the apostolic period is long passed; (3) the use of Apocryphal writings; (4) the existence of Gnosticism, either that of the Carpocratians or, as Harnack thinks, such as Epiphanius under various names describes as infesting Syria and Palestine, and which (apparently at a later time) found expression in the Coptic Gnostic literature edited by Schmidt ('Texte u. Untersuch.' viii. 1, 2).

These points must be briefly examined. (1) The use of πίστις in Gal 1^{23} 3^{23} 6^{10}, Ro 10^{8}, Eph 4^{5}, Ph 1^{27}, closely approximates to that of our Ep., while the thought does not go beyond that of Gal 1^{6}, Ro 6^{17}. (2) The language of v.^{17} implies that the recipients of the Ep. had been wont to receive oral instruction (ἔλεγον) from the general body of the apostles (τῶν ἀποστ.), and that this period of intercourse was now over. It may well be that some of the apostles had been removed by death, but the requirements of the language are satisfied if we suppose that the apostles were now scattered. (3) The argument from the use of Apocryphal books is serious only when it is vaguely put, as by † Cf. Xen. Cyrop. ii. 3. 9 (inaccurately quoted by Wetstein in loc.), μάχη, ἣν ἐγὼ ὁρῶ πάντας ἀνθρώπους φύσει ἐπισταμένους, ὥσπερ γε καὶ τἆλλα ζῷα κ.τ.λ.

McGiffert (Hist. of Christianity in the Apost. Age, p. 587), 'He makes use of two late apocryphal works.' As a matter of fact, Enoch is assigned by almost all scholars to a date B.C. (Schürer, HJP II. iii. p. 59 ff.). The Assumption of Moses was probably written within the first 30 years of our era (Charles, § 11; Schürer, ib. p. 78 f., with Ewald and others, places it within the first decade after Herod's death). (4) The Gnostic character of the persons attacked in the Ep. is deduced from three passages.

(a) In v.^{4b} the words τὸν μόνον δεσπότην κ. κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰ. Χρ. ἀρνούμενοι are supposed to point to a denial of God as the Creator and Governor of the world, and to a docetic view of Christ's Person. The common article, however, together with ἡμῶν placed after κύριον, proves that Christ alone is meant—a conclusion confirmed by τοῦ θεοῦ ἡμῶν in v.^{4b}. The combination δέσποτα κύριε occurs several times in the LXX (e.g. Gn $15^{2.8}$; cf. Is 1^{24}). The denial is a denial in life (cf. Tit 1^{16}) of Christ's sovereignty (1 Co 6^{20}, Ro 16^{18}, Ph 3^{18}). (b) The ἐνυπνιαζόμενοι of v.^{8} is thought to point to visions as the source of Gnostic speculations. The word, however, in itself connotes nothing more than the wilfulness and falseness of their principles of conduct (cf. frag. in Cramer and Bengel, in loc.). (c) In v.^{19} it is urged that Jude retorts upon Gnostic teachers their own language of disparagement; they are the ψυχικοί. But this is to force an elaborate meaning into simple words. A phrase in v.^{16} (θαυμάζοντες πρόσωπα ὠφελίας χάριν) shows that the 'distinctions' they made were largely social (cf. Ja $2^{1ff.}$, 1 Co $11^{18.22}$). The οἱ ἀποδιορίζοντες (which Jude interprets by his antithetical ἐποικοδομοῦντες ἑαυτούς) is equivalent to St. Paul's οἱ τὰς διχοστασίας . . . ποιοῦντες in Ro 16^{17} (see above). The best commentary on our passage is 1 Co 3^{1-3}, Gal $5^{19f.}$

The arguments therefore for assigning the Ep. to the 2nd cent. break down on examination.

Other critics place the Ep. in the latter half of the 1st cent. To this class belong most English scholars (Plumptre, Lumby, Salmon, Plummer), and among recent German writers Spitta (who places Jude shortly after St. Peter's death), von Soden (who, holding that there is nothing to show that the Ep. was not written by a younger brother of the Lord, gives 80–90 as an approximate date), Kühl (who places it 65–80).

We are brought therefore to the problem of authorship. The Ep. begins with the words Ἰούδας Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ δοῦλος, ἀδελφὸς δὲ Ἰακώβου. Those who place the Ep. in the 2nd cent. either suppose that it is pseudepigraphic (so Pfleiderer, who suggests that some local traditions influenced the writer to take the name of 'Jude the brother of James'), or hold that it was written by someone bearing the name Jude,* and that (to quote Harnack's view) possibly the words Ἰησοῦ Χρ. δοῦλος, and certainly the words ἀδελφὸς δὲ Ἰακώβου, were added at a later time (i.e. 150–180) to enhance its value as a weapon against Gnosticism. If it is objected that such an interpolator would have made Jude to be the apostle, Jülicher suggests that ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου is a 'synonym for the title of bishop.' Those who find in the Ep. itself no evidence to show that it could not have been written in the apostolic age need not criticise these speculations. The simplest interpretation of the salutation, which identifies the writer—not with the apostle (cf. Wordsworth), nor with Judas Barsabbas (cf. J. Lightfoot, Plumptre), but—with the brother of the Lord (Mt 13^{55}, Mk 6^{3}), is the best.† It appears that the Lord's kindred had a position of authority accorded them, especially among Palestinian Christians (Eus. HE iii. 11. 20, 33. 6, iv. 22. 4). At a much earlier date St. Paul, writing to a Gentile Church, appeals to the case of 'the brethren of the Lord' as having a decisive bearing on the question of his own rights (1 Co 9^{5}). The name of James was influential in distant Churches (Gal 2^{12}, Ja 1^{1}). There is then every reason to believe that the words ἀδελφὸς Ἰακώβου would win a hearing for the writer, whether St. James were living or dead, especially in churches which were in constant communication with the church at Jerusalem. That Palestinian Jews, especially those who, like St. James and St. Jude, had been brought into constant communication with Jews of the Dispersion, would be likely to have a command of Greek has been shown by Mayor, St. James, p. xli f., Zahn, Einleitung in das NT, § 2 (see especially p. 31 f.).

The limits of date are now greatly narrowed. The superior limit is the death of St. Jude. The language of Hegesippus (ap. Eus. HE iii. 20) shows that the interview of Domitian with St. Jude's grandsons can hardly be placed late in that Emperor's reign (μέχρι Τραιανοῦ περιμεῖναι αὐτοὺς τῷ βίῳ), and that St. Jude had been dead some time before it took place (ἔτι δὲ περιῆσαν). Hence we cannot place the letter later than 80. As to the inferior limit, we must allow time (a) for the apostolic college to have been broken up by the separation of its members, and probably by the death of some; (b) for such Pauline phraseology as we find in 1 Co, Ro, Col, Eph to have become known to a Hebrew Christian probably of Jerusalem, partly perhaps through personal intercourse (Ac 15. 18^{22} $21^{15ff.}$), certainly (as the kind of evidence shows) through a study of those Epistles. We cannot then place the Ep. earlier than the composition of Col and Eph. The general tone of the Ep. harmonizes best with a date somewhat late in the apostolic age. We shall not be far wrong if we suppose that it was written within a year or two of the Pastoral Epistles (assuming their genuineness), the Apocalypse (assuming the earlier date), the First Epistle of St. Peter, and the Ep. to the Hebrews.

6. PLACE OF WRITING, DESTINATION, CIRCUMSTANCES OF COMPOSITION.—Many critics, who regard the Ep. as directed against a developed Gnosticism, hold it probable that it was written in Egypt (e.g. Jülicher), or even more definitely in Alexandria (Mayerhoff's conjecture, adopted by, e.g., Schenkel, Holtzmann, Pfleiderer). We have already considered the ground for this conjecture. The 'brethren of the Lord' would naturally have a prominent place among 'the elders' closely connected with St. James at Jerusalem. There is no reason to doubt that the Ep. was composed either there or at least in Palestine.

As to its destination, the salutation is quite general. From this fact some critics have deduced the conclusion that the Ep. is a circular letter (so Ewald), others that the letter-form is purely artificial (so Jülicher, Deissmann, Bibelstudien, p. 244). But although the destination is not named in the salutation, the situation with which the letter deals is too concrete to be universally applicable.

A brief examination of the evidence which the letter supplies as to the condition of its intended readers will furnish a clue—probable, not certain—to their identification. (1) The doctrine of God's grace had been taught among them (v.^{4}). They were probably, therefore, men among whom St. Paul had worked. (2) They had received oral instruction from the apostles generally (v.^{17}). They probably, therefore, lived at no great distance from Jerusalem. (3) They were in danger of being leavened by certain false brethren, against whom the Ep. is designed to warn them. What was the character of these false brethren? (a) There is nothing in the Ep. to lead to the supposition that they were teachers, or that their error was doctrinal; (β) they were grossly immoral in life, vv.$^{4.\,8.\,10f.}$ (Βαλαάμ) $^{13.\,23}$; (γ) they were essentially ἀσεβεῖς,—wholly destitute of godly fear,—and in particular they profaned the ἀγάπαι (v.^{12}) and the associated Eucharist by their reckless participation (συνευωχ. ἀφόβως; cf. 1 Co 11$^{27ff.}$) and their selfish greed (ἑαυτοὺς ποιμαίνοντες; cf. 1 Co 11$^{20ff.}$); (δ) in word and deed they were insubordinate against divinely constituted authority,* vv.$^{8.\,10.\,11}$ (Κορέ) ^{16} (γογγυσταί); (ε) they fomented schisms, v.^{19}; (ζ) they practically perverted the doctrine of grace, v.^{4} (cf. Gal 5^{13}, Ro 6$^{1.\,15}$).

* Grotius, Annotationes (on Jude ^{1}), gives it as his opinion that 2 P was the work of Symeon the successor of James, and that our Epistle was written by Jude, the last Jewish Bp. of Jerusalem in the reign of Hadrian (Eus. HE iv. 5. 3; Epiph. Hær. ii. 66. 20).

† This conclusion is confirmed by the fact that Jude uses the Assumption of Moses. We know that his brother James the Just had much in common with what was highest in the teaching and practice of the Pharisees. To such men the Assumption, the work probably of a Pharisaic Quietist (Charles, Introd. § 10), would naturally appeal.

All these points (except the last) have parallels in St. Paul's picture of the Corinthian Church. The same dangers from pagan associations and surroundings are emphasized also in Ac 15$^{20.\,28}$, 1 Th 4$^{1\text{-}8}$, Ro 16$^{17ff.}$, Ph 3$^{2.\,17ff.}$, Eph 4$^{17ff.}$, Rev 2$^{14.\,20}$ 3^{4}, and again in the Didaché (iii. 3, 6). The men, therefore, against whom St. Jude warns his readers appear to have brought the vices and the unchastened selfishness of paganism within the Christian body. The Church, accordingly, to which the letter is addressed was, it would seem, predominantly a Gentile Church. This is confirmed by an incidental phrase, which yet has a conspicuous place in the Ep.—περὶ τῆς κοινῆς ἡμῶν σωτηρίας (v.^{3}). Jude writes as a Hebrew Christian to Gentile Christians. The Church which best fulfils these conditions is the Church in the Syrian Antioch (cf. Beyschlag, Neutest. Theol. ii. p. 484), where St. Paul taught early and late in his missionary career, a Church in constant communication with the Church at Jerusalem (e.g. Ac 15^{1}, Gal 2^{12}), visited, as we learn incidentally, by one of the older apostles (Gal 2^{11}), and exposed to the same dangers from heathenism as the Church at Corinth. It is of course quite possible that the Ep., with its general salutation, was intended to be circulated among a group of Churches connected with Antioch (cf. Ac 15^{23}).

It is not hard to conjecture the circumstances under which the letter, such being its scope and such its probable destination, was written. We may suppose that members of the Church of Antioch came to Jerusalem with news that the leaven of heathen lawlessness was spreading there. St. Jude, one of the original 'elders' of the mother Church, and therefore now (especially if St. James was dead) in a position of peculiar authority, feels the gravity of the occasion, the danger attending a perversion of St. Paul's doctrine of grace, as St. James had realized that involved in the perversion of the true doctrine of faith. The messengers are returning. St. Jude would gladly have sent by them a letter dealing with the blessings of salvation common to Hebrew and Gentile Christians alike. The crisis, however, of which he has heard forces him to narrow his subject to an earnest appeal that, in the present accentuation of the perils which were inseparable from the position of a Gentile Church, they would preserve the purity of the faith in matters of life and conduct.

7. SUMMARY OF THE EPISTLE.—A necessarily brief paraphrase will bring out the connexion of thought.

The salutation of Jude (v.$^{1f.}$). The treacherous entrance into your Church of certain depravers of God's grace in Christ and practical deniers of Jesus as Lord, force me to make my letter a simple call to you to contend for the one faith (v.$^{3f.}$). I need only remind you of the ancient examples of the danger of faithlessness and fleshly sin—Israel (the primary type of the Christian society), the angels who fell, and (like these last in sin and punishment) the Cities of the Plain (vv.$^{5\text{-}7}$). Despite such examples, these men, ever yielding to their own wayward fancies, are guilty both of fleshly sin and of rebellion. They deny the principle of authority; they malign those set to rule. Unlike the archangel in his controversy with the devil, they do not fear to malign even the dread realities of authority which are too high for their comprehension, while in the low region of their own animal instincts they corrupt themselves (vv.$^{8\text{-}10}$). Scripture (v.^{11}) and nature (v.$^{12f.}$) prefigure their manifold sins and their doom. Nay, they are the true subject of the ancient patriarch's prophecy (v.$^{14f.}$). Be not as they are. They are unrestful—discontented, selfish, boastful, intriguing flatterers. Do you be calm, remembering that the apostles, when they visited you, used to tell you that such men would arise (vv.$^{16\text{-}18}$). Again, these men, having only natural aims, cause divisions. Do you build up your society on the foundation of the faith, the Spirit helping your prayers, the love of the Father being your protection, the final mercy of Jesus Christ being your hope (vv.$^{19\text{-}21}$). Such is your duty to yourselves. What is it to these men? Towards some, still wavering, cherish a hopeful compassion; others you must try to save by desperate effort; towards others you can only feel a compassion paralyzed by fear of contamination (v.$^{22f.}$). To God the Father, who can preserve you from these snares, and finally place you in His own presence untainted and exultant, to Him through the mediation of Jesus Christ be glory for ever (v.$^{24f.}$).

* In v.^{8} κυριότητα (cf. Didaché iv. 1) is abstract: it is the principle of authority in general which they rejected. The word δόξας probably points to actual offices of authority in the Church (cf. Clem. Al. Strom. vi. 13, p. 793, ἐγκαταταγῆναι τῷ πρεσβυτερίῳ κατὰ προκοπὴν δόξης· δόξα γὰρ δόξης διαφέρει).

* The second vol. of Zahn's Einleitung appeared after this article was in print. It contains (pp. 42–110) a very full discussion of the questions connected with Jude and 2 P. The chief conclusions at which Zahn arrives are as follows. 2 P was written by St. Peter before, about the autumn of A.D. 63, he visited Rome, i.e. 60–63. It was addressed to Churches mainly Jewish in or near Palestine. Ep. Jude was the work of the Lord's brother, and was addressed to the same Churches as 2 P. The libertines of Jude are false teachers, and exactly correspond to the picture drawn by anticipation in 2 P, to which, indeed, reference is made in Jude$^{4.\,17}$. Zahn takes Jude^{5} to refer to the deliverance of a people (anarthrous λαόν) by 'Jesus' (best supported reading) from the spiritual Egypt of sin, and to the subsequent judgment on the unbelieving in the destruction of Jerusalem. The date, therefore, of the Ep. must be after 70, and is probably about 75. It may be added that Zahn thinks that Jude used the Hebrew or Aramaic original of Enoch.

The writer of the article would gladly have considered Zahn's position in greater detail. But he does not find any reason to modify his own arguments or conclusions.

F. H. CHASE.

JUDGE, JUDGING.—Among the early Israelites the official organization of the administration of justice was entirely unknown. There were no courts of law, no official judges, no codified laws. Disputes were settled by the natural heads of families and tribes, in accordance with the customs that had grown up in the course of their development. These customs were connected with the family and with religion. In the earliest book of Hebrew history (JE) the pictures of patriarchal times represent the father or head of the family as possessing supreme power over his property (Gn 27), his slaves (Gn 21), and the members of his own family (Gn 22. 38^{24}). Disputes between families were settled by an appeal to force, or by an amicable covenant between the heads of the families (Gn 21; cf. the story of Jacob and Esau in Gn 32). But J″ Himself is also represented as acting as supreme judge, and that not only in the case of peoples (Babel, Sodom), but also of individuals (Gn 20^{3}). So also refractory members of a family were solemnly dedicated to God's wrath (Gn $49^{5\text{ff.}}$).

The beginnings of the history of Israel as a people were dominated by the strong personality of Moses. During the nomad period, family disputes were still settled by the head of the family; but Moses himself was the supreme judge to whom appeals were brought (Ex 18^{13}), and he is represented as himself bringing the matters to J″ for decision (Ex 18^{19}), though we are not told how he gained his knowledge of the will of the Deity. Moses had no officials to execute his sentences, but seems in case of division of opinion to have appealed to those who agreed with him to carry out his punishments by force (Ex 32^{26}). This work, however, proved too much for one man, and on the advice of his father-in-law he selected a number of the heads of families—already accustomed to judging in matters pertaining to their own families—to judge the intertribal disputes, reserving for himself the right of settling the more difficult questions that arose (Ex $18^{20\text{ff.}}$; cf. the parallel account in Nu $11^{16.\,24\text{ff.}}$).

It was in accordance with this appointment that the later 'Book of the Covenant' was represented as given by Moses to these elders as a body of customs for their guidance (Ex 21^{1} 24). The active participation of the Deity in judging is still prominent all through this period. To seek a judgment was to 'seek Jahweh' (Ex $33^{7\text{ff.}}$). It was J″ Himself who punished Miriam (Nu 12^{10}), Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 16), and the Israelites themselves (Nu 21). Achan was detected by J″ (whose will on this occasion was ascertained by the drawing of lots), and the punishment was carried out by the people (Jos 7).

The settlement in Canaan, and consequent change from nomad to settled life, led to the emphasizing of local rather than family and tribal authority. The ancient customs were continued, but the 'elders of the city' (זִקְנֵי הָעִיר) took the place of the elders of the tribe (Jg 8^{16} 11^{7}, and see below for Deut.; cf. Nowack, Arch. i. 322, and see ELDER IN OT), though the claims of the latter were not overlooked even in the 7th cent. (cf. Dt 16^{18}). During this period the term 'judges' was applied to the local heroes, who delivered and ruled the tribes of Israel. (For the use and meaning of שֹׁפֵט in the Book of Judges, see the following two articles).

The institution of a monarchy also modified the previous customs, inasmuch as the king and his officials were in a better position than most to enforce their decisions by means of the power they possessed. The administration of justice in the country naturally remained in the hands of the city elders and men who had gained a reputation for wisdom; and the settlement of disputes was by arbitration rather than by royal justice; but where a royal officer was stationed, there he would often be appealed to. The king was the most powerful (at any rate in the best days of the monarchy), and therefore the supreme judge. The person of the king was usually accessible to the poorest of his subjects. The men of Israel brought their troubles regularly to David (2 S $15^{2\text{ff.}}$). The power of the king enabled him when present to override or overawe the local courts (1 K 21, 1 S 8^{20}, 2 S 15^{2} etc.). It was during this period (in the 9th or 8th cent.) that a short book of 'judgments' מִשְׁפָּטִים (Ex 21–23^{9}; cf. EXODUS in vol. i. p. 810) was edited to guide the decisions of men who were called upon to decide certain cases. How far it obtained any authority we cannot tell, but it is very short and incomplete. Judges are mentioned only once in this code, viz. in 21^{22}, but the word פְּלִלִים used here is a rare word; the sentence in which it occurs is difficult to construe as it stands, and Budde has suggested a different reading, which contains no mention of judges (ZATW xi. 106 ff.). In Ex 21^{6} $22^{8.\,9}$ RVm reads 'judges' as a translation of הָאֱלֹהִים, but the word seems to be used here as usual with the meaning 'God' given in the RV text.*

Towards the end of the 7th cent. (in 621) another code of laws—the Deuteronomic—was proclaimed, but the unfortunate death of Josiah seems to have rendered it ineffective from 608 until after the Exile. (See DEUTERONOMY). In judicial matters it confirmed for the most part the already existing customs. Judges and officers (שֹׁפְטִים וְשֹׁטְרִים) are to be appointed in all the cities, according to the tribes (Dt 16^{18}).† The ordinary judges are as before the 'elders of the city' (Dt 19^{12} 21^{18} $22^{16\text{ff.}}$ etc.). In difficult matters, where men had formerly had recourse to the more immediate judgment of the Deity, the priests the Levites are to be associated with the usual judges (Dt $17^{8\text{ff.}}$ $19^{7\text{f.}}$ etc.), and the law as a whole is represented as having been delivered by Moses to the priests the sons of Levi, and unto all the elders of Israel (Dt 31^{9}). The curse of J″ still remains the heaviest of punishments (Dt $28^{15\text{ff.}}$). The greatest fault in the administration of justice during this period was due to bribery, a sin which specially excited the indignation of the preacher of moral righteousness (Am 5^{12}; cf. Mic 7^{3}, Zeph 3^{3}). In Am 2^{3} and Mic 5^{1} the word 'judge' שֹׁפֵט seems to be used of the king (see Driver on the former passage in the 'Cambridge Bible for Schools'), but in Micah the LXX have a different reading, and in Amos Nowack refers the word to the officials of the Moabites (Die kleinen Propheten, p. 126).

* Dillmann thinks that judges who gave judgment in a sanctuary were called אֱלֹהִים in the older Hebrew; cf. his note on this passage in the Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zum AT, but Marti refers the word to the household gods (Geschichte der israelitischen Religion, pp. 29, 48).

† Of the שֹׁטְרִים little is known. They first appear as Israelitish superintendents of forced labour in Egypt (Ex 5, JE), then as 'officers' associated with the elders in the wilderness (Nu 11^{16}, JE). After this they are not mentioned until Deuteronomy. They seem to have been police officials. See note in Driver's commentary on Dt 1^{15}.

The destruction of the monarchies and the exile of both the kingdoms limited the judicial power of the people. In their captivity they were entirely subject to their conquerors. The study of their own law increased, indeed may be said now to have seriously begun, but what little they could carry into practice was only by an act of grace on the part of their masters. The return from exile led to the constitution not of a political power, but of a religious community. The Deuteronomic code was received by it as binding (Neh 8–10), and its provisions were observed as far as was consistent with the laws of the Persians, and afterwards of the Greeks and Romans. Under the Persians the Jews were allowed to follow their own laws in purely internal matters (the elders of the city are mentioned in Ezr 7[25] 10[14]), but quarrels with neighbouring powers were submitted to the Persian court (Ezr 4 and 5). In Judæa the Priestly code was soon added to the Deuteronomic, but as this is chiefly religious it scarcely affected the ordinary administration of justice. It was probably during the time of the Greek domination that further organization led to the establishment in Jerusalem of the Sanhedrin as the supreme court of the Jewish community (see SANHEDRIN). In the small towns and villages justice was administered by a council of seven (Jos. Ant. IV. viii. 14; cf. Schürer, Zeitalter Christi, ii. 132 ff., 3rd ed. ii. 176 ff. [HJP II. i. 163 ff.]), and in larger places by one of twenty-three members (Mishna, Sanh. i. 4). It is to one of these councils that Christ refers in Mt 5[22], and to their members in v.[25]. For further details as to the courts in the time of Christ, see the articles ROMAN LAW and SANHEDRIN.

JUDGES, PERIOD OF THE.—

i. Extent of the Period.
ii. Authorities.
iii. Chronology.
iv. Political Geography.
v. The History.
vi. Trustworthiness of the History.
vii. Religion.
viii. Parallel with the Maccabæan Period.

i. The period extends from the death of Joshua to the anointing of Saul as king over Israel.

ii. Our main authorities are the Book of Judges (specially ch. 5, 'the Song of Deborah') and 1 S 1–10. In addition to these the blessing of Jacob (Gn 49) was formerly reckoned to belong to this period; but the more modern view is that, while vv.[5-7. 14f. 16f.] point to the period of the Judges, other verses transplant us to a later time (Kuenen, Hex. p. 240, Eng. tr.; Dillmann, Gen. vol. ii. p. 447, Eng. tr.). The Book of Ruth has reference to this period, but its composition is referred to post-exilic times by recent critics.

iii. CHRONOLOGY.—The whole period is devoid of certain dates; the most that can be said is that its close may be assigned with probability to within fifty years of B.C. 1000. The length of the period is also very doubtful. If we follow what seems to be the Chronology of the Book of Judges itself, we have to conclude that the Judges (exclusive of Eli and Samuel) occupied a period of more than 410 years. No critic, however, has ever accepted this high total, and there are three good reasons why it should be rejected. (1) It contradicts 1 K 6[1] (480 years from the Exodus to the building of the temple). (2) It has always appeared probable that some of the Judges were contemporaries and not successors or predecessors of the rest. (3) It is improbable that Israel could have existed in the disorganized condition which was hers under the Judges for so long a period as 400 years without being absorbed and lost in the surrounding Canaanites. Moreover, several of the details of which the number 410 is made up do not inspire confidence; the number 40 (representing a generation) or its multiples occurs frequently, and the writer of the book seems to be giving merely a rough reckoning by generations. In the present article it is assumed that the period of the Judges was relatively short, perhaps about 200 years. See CHRONOLOGY OF OLD TEST. vol. i. p. 399.

iv. POLITICAL GEOGRAPHY.—A careful study of Jg, particularly of chs. 1 and 4, shows that the Israelites on entering Palestine did not conquer it, but only overran the inland part of it. A broad strip of land along the coast remained in the hands of the Philistines (cf. Moore on Jg 1[18. 19]) and of the Zidonians (Jg 1[31]). The fortresses which girdled the plain of Esdraelon (Jg 1[27]), and consequently the plain itself, remained unconquered. Moreover, scattered over the land there were cities, e.g. Jerusalem (Jg 1[21]), Gezer (1[29]), and probably Shechem (Jg 9[1-4]; Kittel, ii. 74), in which apparently the Israelites had a footing, but not the supremacy. No doubt some cities came at an early date into the hands of Israel or of their allies (Hebron, Jg 1[10]; Bethlehem, Jg 12[8-10]; Bethel, Jg 1[22]), but it may be said generally that the Canaanites still kept their fortified cities while the Israelites occupied the villages. It was indeed only to be expected that Israel on ceasing to be a nomadic people, would pass through a stage of free village life before they could accustom themselves to the restricted life of cities. These villages were fixed encampments, collections of tents, rather than houses ordered in streets. 'To your tents, O Israel,' was the earlier form of the signal for dispersion, as 'every man to his own city' (1 K 22[36]) was the later. The heaviest blow which could fall on Israel at this period is described in the Song of Deborah in the words, 'The villages (or 'villagers') ceased in Israel' (Jg 5[7] AV and RVm). The only refuge of the people was in dens and caves and natural strongholds (Jg 6[2], 1 S 13[6]). They had destroyed such fortresses as they had won.

Had the Canaanites possessed any real cohesion among themselves, the Israelites must have been chased out of the country as the Midianites were chased out by Gideon; but the Canaanites were hopelessly divided. They were, in fact, a mixed population, whether we reckon them as exactly seven nations or not.

v. HISTORY.—Owing to the doubtfulness of the chronology, a formal division of the epoch of the Judges into periods is impossible. Three great crises, however, stand out in the history—(1) the union of the tribes against Sisera and the Canaanites (Jg 4. 5); (2) the assertion of Israel's individuality (or nationality) against the Midianites; (3) the appearance of the Philistines.

(1) All writers recognize the importance of the Israelite rising under Deborah and Barak. Israel had been checked in its conquests by the fortresses which girdled the plain of Esdraelon and by the chariots of iron which controlled it. Once checked they sank into helplessness, and the Canaanites of the plain turned upon their former assailants. Their success was great. The Israelites of the north and of the centre would have become the helots of the Canaanites, if Deborah had not prophesied and if Barak had not fought. Nor did the battle of the Kishon give Israel freedom only; it also gave life to the idea of national unity. Six tribes, viz. Ephraim, Benjamin, Manasseh (Machir), Zebulun, Issachar, and Naph-tali, united to fight the battle of the God of Israel; and four others, Reuben, Gad (Gilead), Dan, and Asher, are reminded in the Song of Deborah of their failure to realize the duties of their kinship with the rest. The sole literature of this period * (so far as we know) is this song of a people struggling to assert its freedom and its nationality.

(2) Gideon represents a crisis hardly less acute than that at which Deborah appeared. Israel was passing from nomadic to settled life; but if the fruits of agriculture were snatched from them by the Midianites, the temptation to return to a wandering (and perhaps marauding) life, would be very great. At another time, under circumstances of stress, Jephthah and David did actually return to the condition of 'children of the East.' From any such retrograde step Israel, as a whole, was saved by Gideon, the farmer called from the threshing-flail to save his people.

The deliverance wrought by Gideon brought up the question of appointing a permanent head, to judge Israel and fight their battles (cf. 1 S 8^{20}). The Midianites invaded the land every year (Jg $6^{1.3}$), so that the crisis demanded some permanent organization to meet the standing danger. Gideon, on the invitation of the people, established a rule which was a theocracy according to his own profession, but it was administered by himself as earthly vicegerent. He established at his home at Ophrah, in addition to the rest of his state, a golden ephod (see EPHOD) of the God whose government he (and his sons after him) professed to administer (Jg $8^{22-27.30}$ 9^2).

(3) The appearance of the Philistines was a matter of grave importance. If, as seems probable (but see art. JUDGES [BOOK OF], p. 818^b), this event was contemporaneous with the beginning of Ammonite assaults on Israel, this importance is greatly enhanced. Attacked on the east by Ammon, reduced in part to subjection on the west by the Philistines, the Israelites fell into a disorganized and helpless state, from which nothing, perhaps, but the establishment of the kingdom could rescue them.

But the period of the Judges was remarkable, not only for the three crises just mentioned, but also for a slow and silent revolution which went on during the whole of its course.

It was at this time that Israel assimilated to itself a large Canaanite population. Wellhausen (Isr. u. Jüd. Ges.^{2} 46 ff.) points out that this fusion would begin in the country, since the Canaanite peasant would find more in common with the Israelite settler than with his own fellow-countrymen in the cities. This incorporation of the original population into Israel explains the striking growth of the population which took place under the Judges, which, indeed, made Jacob so much stronger than the kindred tribes, Moab, Ammon, and Edom, and rendered the empire of David and Solomon a possibility.

vi. TRUSTWORTHINESS OF THE HISTORY OF THE JUDGES.—This history is so natural a preface to the period of the Kings, that no charge of improbability can be fairly laid against it as a whole. Many details, however, have been referred with more or less probability to myth or misunderstanding, and not to history.

Cushan-rishathaim (Jg 3^8) of Mesopotamia (Aram-naharaim) is a shadowy and uncertain figure. The Shamgar of Jg 3^{31} is supposed to be irreconcilable with the Shamgar of Jg 5^6; 'he was no deliverer of Israel,' writes Kittel (ii. 66 note), 'as the context [of Jg 5^6] shows.' The minor judges Tola and Jair (Jg $10^{1.3}$), and Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon (Jg 12^{8-15}) are generally said to be merely personifications of leading families. Our present account of Jephthah is open to the objection that Jephthah's 'message to Ammon' (Jg 11^{12-27}) seems to be really a document having reference rather to Moab; cf. the mention of Chemosh (v.^{24}) and of Balak (v.^{25}). On the other hand, Jephthah's vow and its fulfilment are defended as natural in Jephthah's age (and therefore as probably historical) by Kittel (ii. 81). The story of Samson, finally, has not been proved a sun-myth, but many will agree with Kittel's dictum (ib.): 'Samson wavers between myth, saga, and history, belonging altogether to no one of them, but in part to each.' See, further, JUDGES (BOOK OF), p. 819.

vii. RELIGION.—In speaking of the religion of this period it is necessary to regard only the statements of the ancient part of the book, avoiding the so-called 'margin.' Inquiry was made of God (Jg 1^1), probably by means of the ephod (see EPHOD); war was made in the name of J″ (Jg 3^{28} 4^6), who was regarded as the national God whose dwelling was on the Arabian peninsula (Jg $5^{4.5}$; cf. Moore); the angel of J″ presented himself in human form in order to make his revelations (Jg 6^{11} $13^{3.6.10}$); prophecy was rare (Jg 4^4, 1 S 3^1); the ark was regarded as equivalent to the presence of J″ Himself (1 S 4^3).

Canaanite influence on religion was strong during this period, for the process of fusion of Canaanite and Israelite was going on. Israel, new to the land, was introduced to the old sanctuaries by the old inhabitants, and thus learned to worship the local Baal, the native god of corn and wine, with the corrupt and corrupting forms of that lascivious shedder of blood, the Canaanite. Of Israel's morals during this period little good can be said. A time of anarchy always impairs the vitality of virtue; and in Israel when 'every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (Jg 17^6), very strange things were done (Jephthah, Samson, Danites, Gibeah). There was no lack of courage in this period, and hospitality was evidently regarded by the mass of the people as inviolable. The sacredness of an oath is strangely illustrated by Jg 11^{35} and 21^7.

Taken as a whole the period may be characterized, in the words of Amos (8^{11}), as days in which there was 'a famine in the land; not a famine of bread, nor a thirst for water, but of hearing the words of the Lord.' The redactor of Jg is indeed continually drawing lessons from the experiences of his people under the Judges, but it seems that at the time itself the events were left for the most part to deliver their own message uninterpreted by any prophet. We may compare the period with the years of 'silence' which preceded the coming of our Lord.

viii. PARALLEL WITH THE MACCABÆAN PERIOD.—There are several points of resemblance between the Maccabæan period and that of the Judges. (1) The form of government (if it could be called a 'form') was the same at both periods. The Maccabees were Judges * (שֹׁפְטִים shōphĕṭīm) like Gideon, Jephthah, and the rest, i.e. not administrators, but champions both against the enemy and against the unfaithful of their own people (cf. 1 Mac $2^{65.66}$ $9^{29-31.73}$). If some of the Maccabees were also priests (Jonathan, 1 Mac 10^{20}; Simon, 1 Mac 14^{47}), so were the ancient judges, Eli and Samuel. (2) Both periods were periods of almost continual struggle (if the chronology of the Judges has been rightly understood above), and the very life of Israel as a distinct people was threatened. (3) There was the same want of unity among the people at both periods (cf. 1 Mac 1^{52} 6^{21} 7^{5}). (4) There was the same absence of 'open vision' (1 S 3^{1}; cf. 1 Mac 4^{46} 14^{41}). (5) Even the language used of the Maccabæan period recalls the time of the Judges (cf. 1 Mac 9^{73} ἤρξατο κρίνειν; 2^{42} πᾶς ὁ ἑκουσιαζόμενος; 14^{4} ἡσύχασεν ἡ γῆ πᾶσας τὰς ἡμέρας Σίμωνος).

---

* If the Blessing of Jacob (Gn 49) in its present form also belongs to the period of the Judges, we have a second document in which is realized the unity of the tribes.

* The Carthaginian sufetes resembled the shōphĕṭīm chiefly in name.

1. THE NAME OF THE BOOK.—The seventh component of the Hebrew Old Testament is named Book of Judges (סֵפֶר שׁוֹפְטִים) in the oldest sources with which we are acquainted (cf. the Talmudic Tract Baba bathra 14^{b}, edited separately by Marx-Dalman in 'Traditio rabbinorum veterrima de librorum veteris testamenti ordine atque origine,' 1884, p. 14). The same expression סֵפֶר שׁוֹפְטִים is found in the Diḳdûḳê ha-ṭĕ'amîm of Aharon ben-Asher (10th cent.), ed. Baer and Strack, p. 58. The self-evident term 'Book' is also frequently dropped, and thus the simple שׁוֹפְטִים employed (so the usual reading in above-cited passage from the Talmud). If one compares, for instance, הַשּׁוֹפְטִים (Ru 1^{1}) and οἱ κριταί (Sir 46^{11}), it is remarkable that the article is dropped before שׁוֹפְטִים when the latter is used as the title of the Book. But in the course of transition of a nomen appellativum to the force of a nomen proprium, the article was frequently omitted (for analogics see König's Syntax, § 295, h–k). The Heb. title of the Book was either simply transcribed (cf. e.g. ܫܘܦܛܝܡ in Ephraem Syrus [acc. to Brockelmann, Lex. Syr. 383^{b}] and Σωφετὶμ in Origen [acc. to Euseb. HE vi. 25]), or it might be translated (cf. e.g. dayyânê in the Peshiṭta, or κριταί, e.g. in Melito of Sardis [acc. to Euseb. HE iv. 26]), or (liber) iudicum, e.g. in Hieronymus, Prologus galeatus (=præfatio regnorum).

2. THE CONDITION OF THE TEXT.—The history of the Text of a literary product needs above all to be considered, in order that a basis may thus be laid for all further investigation. In the case of the Book of Judges this rule is all the more to be observed because of the very complicated history of its text.

(a) The Heb. text, as one finds it, notably in the editio Baeriana libri Josuæ et iudicum (1891), in the excellent Biblia hebraica of Ch. D. Ginsburg (1894), and in the well-known collections of various readings by Kennicott and de Rossi, is, of course, in substantial agreement with the Targum, the Peshiṭta, and the Vulgate.[*]

(b) But the Greek version of the Book of Judges is an extraordinarily manifold one. This is already shown by the number and the nature of the variants which the Alexandrian (A) and the Vatican (B) MSS of the LXX present in this book. For instance, in 1^{1b} A reads τὸν χαναναῖον (הַכְּנַעֲנִי) and πολεμήσεσαι (sic) ἐν αὐτῷ (בּוֹ), but B has τοὺς χαναναίους and πρὸς αὐτούς. Further, in 1^{3} A reads καὶ πολεμήσω (to represent the plur. נִלָּחֲמָה) ἐν τῷ χαναναίῳ (הַכְּנַעֲנִי), but B has καὶ παραταξώμεθα πρὸς τοὺς χαναναίους. In 1^{4b} the respective readings confront one another, ἐπάταξε (A; cf. the plur. וַיַּכּוּ of MT) and ἔκοψαν (B). In 1^{16} חֹתֵן of the MT is reproduced in A by πενθερός, but in B by γαμβρός, which last is the reading also of Jos. Ant. v. ii. 3. But the differences in the Greek translation of the Book of Judges are above all brought to view by de Lagarde, who, in his Septuaginta-Studien (Bd. i. 1892, p. 1 ff.) places side by side all the most important variants occurring in the first five chapters of Jg. His judgment is completely substantiated by the thorough investigations of G. Moore in his Commentary on the Book of Judges, 1895, pp. xliv–xlvi. Budde (Kurzer Handcomm. z. Richterbuch, 1897, p. xvi) has simply reproduced Moore's results. For instance, in 1^{7} the MT as well as AB have 'seventy,' but L(ucian) ἑβδομήκοντα δύο (so Jos. Ant. v. ii. 2, δυοῖν καὶ ἑβδομήκοντα).[*] But, e.g., in 8^{10} both AB and L offer the same reading, 15,000, as the MT, and only Josephus (Ant. v. vi. 5) has μύριοι καὶ ὀκτακισχίλιοι. Hence, in spite of the scepticism of A. Mez (die Bibel des Josephus, 1895, p. 57) it is quite possible that יה' was read as יח' (טו=15 is found for the first time in Origen; cf. König, Einleit. p. 90, note 1). Regarding the two main branches of the Greek version of Jg, Moore has said very judiciously, 'It would probably be going too far to affirm that they are independent; the author of the younger of them may have known and used the older' (Judges, p. xliv).

(c) Further, A. Mez (die Bibel des Josephus, 1895, pp. 11–18, 56–61, 80 f.) has shown, in regard to Jg, that 'the text of Josephus belongs to the most valuable relics of the history of the text of the OT.' For in the case of Jg, Josephus follows the Lucianic text (L) not in the same high degree of dependence as in the Books of Samuel (with four exceptions). In Jg the bond connecting the text of Josephus and that of Lucian is weaker and in many passages even broken. For instance, in 1^{16} the MT has קֵינִי חֹתֵן מֹשֶׁה, L has Ἰωβὰβ τοῦ Κειναίου, but Jos. (Ant. v. ii. 3) Ἰέθρου τοῦ Μαδιανίτου ἀπόγονοι, Μωυσέως γὰρ ἦν γαμβρός (see above for the reading of B). Again, e.g., the expression וַיִּלְכֹּד in 1^{18} is reproduced not only in AL, but also in B by ἐκληρονόμησεν (Itala, hereditavit), but Jos. v. ii. 4 offers rightly εἷλον. Finally, e.g., the king כּוּשַׁן רִשְׁעָתַיִם (Jg 3^{8}) is called in L Χουσανρεσαμώθ, in AB (by an easily intelligible omission of the n, cf. König, Lehrgebäude, ii. 466) Χουσαρσαθάιμ, and in Jos. v. iii. 2 Χουσαρσάθου, etc. What right Mez has to say in reference to this, 'L ist corrigirt,' we cannot see. Still this investigation has confirmed the present writer's view (Einleit. p. 114 ff.) that the traditional Massoretic text is the relatively best source from which to ascertain the words of the Old Testament. This judgment is also entirely substantiated by the investigation into the text of Samuel which Löhr has carried out in the 'Kurzgef. Exeg. Hdbch.' on Samuel, 1898, pp. lxix ff.

'posticum' of Vulg.; 3^{28b} (p. 33) וַיִּרְדְּפוּ; 5^{8} (p. 91) M. Lambert's conjectural לַחֲמֵשׁ שְׁעָרִים 'to five doors' (but see König's Syntax, § 330 m); 11^{37} (p. 51) וְהֲרַדְתִּי, but it is more natural to suppose that in וְיָרַדְתִּי (cf. Hos 12^{1}, Jer 2^{31}) the ו was not distinctly written, and that י has thus arisen; 12^{6} (p. 33) from 'כ' which was meant for יָכֹל may have arisen יָכִין; 13^{12} (p. 35) עֵת (cf. König's Syntax, § 385 k); 20^{33b} (p. 34) ממער' is supposed to have been written for ממערב.

tion of the districts in Palestine which at the death of Joshua had not yet been conquered, and with the description of the operations undertaken by several of the tribes of Israel, in part unsuccessfully, for the complete subjection of their territory (1^{1-36}).—(β) This partial failure is traced to the Divine requital of Israel's religious disobedience, and on the same account it was announced that the Canaanites and other enemies of Israel would continue for a time to maintain their independence, with a view to the chastisement and the probation of Israel. The messenger of J″, mentioned in 2^1, was wrongly identified with Phinehas (Jos 24^{33}) in Jalkuṭ Shim'ônî, vol. ii. ch. 40: מלאך ה׳ והלא פנחס היה.—(γ) Once more it is told how the Israelites, soon after the death of Joshua, were guilty of religious disloyalty. The author's object was to explain why the Israelites suffered repeated defeats in conflicts also with the surrounding nations (2^6–3^4, see below 4 b).

(b) The history of the individual judges is related. They belonged for the most part to the tribe which suffered most from the particular oppression at the time (3^5–16^{31}).—(α) Othni'el of the tribe of Judah, who first came upon the scene immediately after the death of Joshua (3^{7-11}).*—(β) Ehud, the Benjamite (3^{12-30}), broke the yoke of the neighbouring Moabites by the assassination of their king, Eglon. According to Nazir 23^b Ruth was a granddaughter of Eglon: רות בת בנו של עגלון מלך מואב. Seder Olam rabba, ch. 12 (ed. Meyer, p. 34), combines Jg 2^{16} with Ru 2^{13b}, cf. 1 Ch 2^{11}, Ru $4^{20f.}$.—(γ) Shamgar (3^{31}) smote the Philistines.—(δ) In conjunction with Deborah, of the tribe of Ephraim, the hero Barak, of the northern tribe of Naphtali, defeated the Canaanites, who had again assembled a strong force in the north of Canaan (4^1–5^{31}). Sisera, the commander of the army of the enemy, was slain by the woman Jael. Many of the Talmudists took offence at the words 'between (AV 'at) her feet (בֵּין רַגְלֶיהָ) he bowed' (Jebamoth 103^{ab}, Nazir 23^b), but other Talmudists, appealing to Gn 31^{29ab}, rightly found in the expression 'between her feet' nothing to the discredit of Jael.—(ε) Gideon, of the town of 'Ophrah in Ephraim' (?), expelled the Midianites and reigned for long in peace (6^1–8^{35}; cf. Γεδεὼν, ὃς ἑρμηνεύεται πειρατήριον. Ὤμοσε γὰρ, κ.τ.λ., 8^9,—Philo i. 424, ed. Mangey). But his son Abimelech, who seized the reins of power in Shechem, was speedily overcome (9^{1-57}).—(ζ) Tola, a man of Issachar, defended Israel ($10^{1f.}$).—(η) After him Jair, a Gileadite, judged Israel (10^{3-5}).—(θ) Jephthah, the Gileadite, smote the children of Ammon (11^1–12^7).—(ι) Ibzan, of Bethlehem, judged Israel (12^{8-10}); cf. Baba bathra 91^a: אבצן זה בעז 'Ibzan is Boaz' (Ru 2^1).—(κ) Elon, a Zebulunite ($12^{11f.}$), and (λ) 'Abdon, of Pirathon in Ephraim, judged Israel (12^{13-15}). At last (μ) Samson 'began to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines' (13^{5b}), and judged Israel twenty years (13^1–16^{31}).† It is only up to this point that Jg gives a continuous series of narratives. This was already noted in the Diḳdûḳê of Aharon ben-Asher, for in § 70 it is said, 'The Book of Judges (extends) from Othniel, the son of Kenaz, to the death of Samson, the son of Manoah, the Danite' (מעתניאל בן קנז עד שְׁבַּת שמשון בן מנוח הדני).

(c) The last five chapters of Jg do not continue the preceding history, but add two episodes to it. (a) The first episode is as follows: a part of the tribe of Dan wandered from south-western Canaan to the sources of the Jordan. There they conquered the town of Laish, and called it, after the name of their tribe, Dan. In this town they established as priest a Levite from Mt. Ephraim, whom they had persuaded to accompany them (17^1–18^{31}). (β) The second episode tells how the inhabitants of Gibeah which belonged to Benjamin (20^4) abused to death the concubine of a Levite (19^{25}), and how all the other tribes of Israel punished the tribe of Benjamin for refusing to deliver up the miscreants of Gibeah (19^1–21^{25}).

The Book of Judges does not state precisely at what parts of the period of the judges these two episodes happened. The first episode is certainly assigned to a time when there had not fallen to the tribe of the Danites anything as a possession (18^{1b}), i.e. they had been unable to make themselves real masters of the territory assigned to them on the S.W. coast of Canaan (Jos 19^{40-48}, Ezk 48^{1b})—even Budde (on Jg 18^{1b}) regards this as not mere theory. But it is uncertain how long after Joshua's death the oppressions (1^{34} 10^{11b} 14^4) continued which prevented the tribe of the Danites from completely conquering their territory. In any case, neither in $1^{34f.}$ nor elsewhere is it implied that 'the southern Dan never dwelt by the sea, not to speak of itself having possessed ships' (Budde on Jg 5^{17}), and this southern Dan was nearer to the ships than the northern. Nevertheless the date of the history narrated in chs. 17 f. can be limited. For according to 18^{30} it was a grandson of Moses that was priest in the city of Dan, מֹשֶׁה being indicated as the original reading through the Nûn suspensum of מְנַשֶּׁה (cf. the Talmudic statements and the discussion with L. Blau in König's Einleitung, pp. 34, 84^1). It is thus intelligible how the oldest author who outside the Bk. of Jg has described the period of the judges,* namely Josephus, has inserted the two episodes immediately after the narratives of the first chapter of Jg. He further transposes the order of the two narratives, introducing (Ant. V. ii. 8–12) the contents of chs. 19–21 as an illustration of a στάσις δεινή, and with the words ὅμοια δὲ τούτοις παθεῖν καὶ τὴν Δανῖτιν συνέβη φυλήν, he appends (Ant. V. iii. 1) the history contained in chs. 17 f. Seder olam rabba (ch. 12) says, בימי כושן רשעתים היה פסלו של מיכה וג׳ ובימיו היתה פילגש בגבעה, i.e. 'in the days of Cushan-rishathaim was the graven image of Micah, etc. (cf. 18^{30}), and in his days was a concubine in Gibeah.' Moore (on chs. 17 f.) also says rightly that the migration may be assigned to a time not very long after the Israelite invasion of Canaan. Are we, then, to suppose that the two episodes stood originally after the first chapter? This is not likely. For in that case we should not expect to read, 'in those days there was no king in Israel, but every man did that which was right in his own eyes' (17^6 18^1 19^1 21^{25}). At all events it is not without a special aim that the two narratives are placed at the end of Jg. They are intended to show the negative results which during the period of the judges showed themselves in the sphere of religion and morals.

Referring again to the arrangement of the Bk. of Jg, it is interesting to note the ancient division of the Massoretic sections (Baer, Josua et Jud. p. 125). These are fourteen, and they begin with the following verses of the book: 1^1 2^7 (ויעבדו) 3^{31}

† In 'Philonis sine præparatione in Sampson oratio' (Philonis Opera, ed. Lips. 1830, vol. vii. pp. 351–376) it is said, 'Sampson vires sumpsit ad monstranda opera magna' (§ 12), but also 'quum, a gurgite luxuriæ raptus, illuviem passus fuerit inque abyssum immersus cupidinis, non amplius compos erat sursum aspiciendi, sed totus voluptati deditus, ut verum diceret, tanquam a iudice, a muliere coactus fuit' (§ 1).

* 'The days of the judges' are mentioned in Ru 1^1, but passed over in silence between 1 Ch 9^{44} and 10^1, and ben-Sirach's only allusion to them is in the two verses Sir $46^{11f.}$. Cf. the words of Justin (Hist. xxxvi. ii. 7): 'Post Mosen etiam filius eius Aruas, sacerdos sacris Ægyptiis, mox rex creatur, semperque exinde hic mos apud Judæos fuit, ut eosdem reges et sacerdotes haberent, quorum institia religione permixta incredibile quantum coaluere.'

(ואחריו) 6^1 7^1 8^4 (ויבא גדעון וג׳) 9^7 (ויגידו וג׳) 10^1 (ויקם וג׳) 11^{32} (וילכו וג׳) 14^1 (וירד שמשון וג׳) 16^4 (ויהי וג׳) 18^7 (ויעבר יפתח וג׳) 19^{20} (ויאמר האיש), and 20^{27} (וישאלו וג׳). It will be observed that several of these beginnings (e.g. 14^1 instead of 13^1) are not without much interest.

4. THE INNER HARMONY, OR THE UNITY OF THE BOOK.—(a) In 1^8 it is recorded that the members of the tribe of Judah took Jerusalem; but according to 1^{21} this city lay in the sphere of the Benjamites, and by no means can we agree that 'doubtless the author wrote Judah' (Moore, ad loc.). For, since at a later period the Judahite David conquered the city of the Jebusites (2 S $5^{6ff.}$), and since, after the so-called disruption of the kingdom, Jerusalem was the capital of the kingdom of Judah, it was natural to reckon Jerusalem to the territory of the Judahites. Hence there must have been a reliable tradition that Jerus. originally belonged to the sphere of the Benjamites, else it would not have been in Jg 1^{21} assigned to Benjamin (this also against Budde, ad loc.). Further, it is quite an unwarranted assertion that in 1^{34} on account of its difference of form 'the continuation of the Dan history is to be found, whose beginning was still read by Josephus' (Mez, l.c. p. 11). That is to say, Josephus makes the remark, Χαναναῖοι . . . τῆς Ἰούδα φυλῆς, τὴν Ἀσκάλωνα καὶ Ἀκκάρωνα παρεσπάσαντο ἄλλας τε πολλὰς τῶν ἐν τῷ πεδίῳ καὶ Δανίτας εἰς τὸ ὄρος ἠνάγκασαν συμφυγεῖν (Ant. V. iii. 1). But Mez has not noticed that the ἅρματα and the πεδίον, κ.τ.λ., previously mentioned by Josephus, point to 1^{19b} as the source of his words quoted above.

(b) The two sections 1^1–2^5 and $2^{6ff.}$ were not written by one author as parts of one and the same work. For 1^1 begins by mentioning the death of Joshua, but 2^6 mentions something that happened while he was still alive, וַיְשַׁלַּח (καὶ ἐξαπέστειλεν; Hieron. 'dimisit ergo') referring in its present context to the assembly of the people in 2^4. Neither can we say with P. Cassel, ad loc., that the author meant to 'quote' the words of Jos 24^{28}, nor is the imperf. consec. meant as a plusquamperfect (Keil, ad loc.). (See a discussion of all the analogous instances in König's Syntax, § 142). Hence, not the original sense of the passage $2^{6ff.}$ but only its present position may be explained as follows: the first section (1^1–2^5) is meant to show why the internal enemies of Israel continued after the death of Joshua, and the second to explain why Israel during the same period was beaten by foreign foes. This intention of the section $2^{6ff.}$ appears to reveal itself especially in the expressions employed in $2^{14ff.}$ (cf. 3^3). It is not till 3^5 that the Bk. of Jg returns to the mention of internal foes of Israel, on whose account no shôphĕṭîm were raised up (2^{16}). Hence it appears to the present writer that the new section begins with 3^5 and not with 3^7 as is now generally assumed. Further, 2^{10} is not in contradiction with 3^9 (1^{13}, Jos 15^{17}), if Kenaz was the brother of Caleb; and this is not only possible but even almost probable, because in 1^{13} 'the younger,' etc., stands nearer to 'brother' and 'Kenaz' than to 'Othniel.' If so, Othniel was a nephew of Caleb and did not belong to the generation of Joshua; and the Κενίαζος ὄνομα which is read in Jos. Ant. V. iii. 3 (ed. Niese) is not 'the earliest of all the ingenious attempts that have been made to reconcile 3^9 with 2^{10}' (Mez, l.c. p. 12).

(c) There are irreconcilable differences, too, within the history of Deborah and Barak. For in 4^2 there is mention only of 'the king of Canaan,' but in 5^{19} of 'kings of Canaan.' Further, according to $4^{6.10}$ Barak collected his army only from the two tribes of Naphtali and Zebulun, but according to $5^{14ff.}$ warriors joined him also from the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, etc. On the other hand, the sleep of Sisera (4^{21}) appears to the present writer to be presupposed also in 5^{26} (cf. vv.$^{26b.27a}$), and its express mention seems to be omitted merely owing to poetic brevity. Otherwise it would be improbable that a woman should have slain the warrior. Budde says, of course, that '5^{27} shows that Sisera was struck while standing'; but this interpretation overlooks the words, 'where he bowed there he fell' ($5^{27b\beta}$).

(d) שׁ used as the relative is read only in 5^7 6^{17} 7^{12} 8^{26}, and in the last three passages cannot be regarded as interpolated (Giesebrecht, ZATW, Bd. i. 280; see all the instances of this שׁ in König's Lehrgebäude, ii. 322).

(e) The same author would not have written both the introductions to the narrative of the invasion of the Ammonites, contained in $10^{17f.}$ and $11^{4f.}$.

(f) In ch. 14 a great many very important points are passed over in silence of the most unnatural kind, if all the elements of the text that have come down to us are in their original form. For instance, after v.$^{8f.}$ the statement would be wanting that this journey of Samson did not lead to the marriage intended (לְקַחְתָּהּ, v.^{8a}), and that the father of Samson had got over his initial repugnance to a Philistine daughter-in-law. Probably, then, it is a later addition that the parents of Samson were present at his marriage. Josephus also relates* that Samson presented the honey to the Philistine maid, and not that he shared it with his parents (14^{9a}).

(g) Like a so-called red thread there runs through chs. 2–16 a series of passages in which the constant interchange is described between Israel's religious and moral lapses and her punishment, between Israel's repentance and God's help; cf. especially 2^{11-19} $3^{7.12a}$ 4^{1-3} 6^1 8^{33-35} 10^{6-16} 13^1.

(h) Also the two episodes which close the book (chs. 17–21) have their peculiar character (e.g. the formula 'in those days there was no king in Israel,' etc., 17^6 18^1 19^1 21^{25}), and these two narratives also are wanting in a complete inward unity. For if $17^{10f.}$ $18^{17f.}$ $21^{12.19}$ proceeded from one and the same author, they would contain unnatural repetitions.

5. RELATION TO THE PENTATEUCH 'SOURCES.'—The question of the unity of the book as well as that of its date, depends upon the relation of Jg to the different strata embodied in the Pentateuch. Hence it will be of advantage for the following investigation, if we first of all make an attempt to fix this relation. Now it is well known that in the Pentateuch there are four main strata to be distinguished: the Jahwistic (J; Gn 2^{4b}–3^{24} etc.), the Elohistic (E; Gn 20, etc.), the Deuteronomic (D), and the Esoteric-Priestly (P; Gn 1^1–2^{4a} etc.; cf. König, Einleitung, p. 188 ff.); and there is the possibility in abstracto that these four works continued the post-Mosaic history of Israel. But that as a matter of fact these four sources of the Pentateuch continue to flow also into the extant Bk. of Jg, can be established only by positive proofs. This proof is all the more necessary in view of the impossibility of making true progress in critical science if a number of results are assumed as already proved, and one makes it his main object always to pile up higher storeys on the building of the literary criticism of the Old Testament. Besides, the relation of the Bk. of Jg to the 'sources' of the Pentateuch is one of those questions which are differently answered even by decided friends of criticism.

(a) Is the Jahwistic stratum (J) of the Pent. continued in Jg? To begin with, the first chapter of Jg has points of contact in several passages with expressions contained in the preceding book of the OT. For instance, Jos 15^{14-19} is substantially identical with Jg 1^{10-15}; Jos 15^{13} resembles Jg 1^{20}; Jos 15^{63} is substantially the same as Jg 1^{21}; Jos 17^{11-13} (cf. Nu $32^{39.\ 41f.}$) resembles Jg $1^{27f.}$; and Jos 16^{10} is substantially the same as Jg 1^{29}. The opinion of the present writer is that these postscripts in both books are drawn from a common source of earlier origin, and this judgment is based upon the following observations: (α) The two series of passages in Jos and Jg are in only a very few instances actually identical. (β) In particular the tradition (Jg 1^{21}) that Jerusalem belonged to the ideal sphere of the tribe of Benjamin, is to be considered the older, in opposition to the note (Jos 15^{63}, Jg 1^{6}) that Jerus. was the object of an attack by Judah. See above, 4 a; and cf. the mât ('land' or 'district') or mâtât of Urusalim in the Tel el-Amarna letters (Keilinsch. Bibliothek, Bd. v. $180^{25.\ 63}$ 181^{49} 183^{14} $185^{1f.}$). (γ) The ancient source from which the identical sentences in the two series of passages named are drawn, was not the Jahwistic. For these sentences contain a somewhat artlessly connected series of facts, and do not possess the life and the variety of colouring which mark the Jahwistic style (cf. Gn 18 f., 24, etc.). (δ) Precisely in the passage, Jos 15^{14-19} (substantially = Jg 1^{10-15}), which in some measure shows the lifelike style of the Jahwist, there is a deviation from Gn 24^{64}. In the latter the rapid descent from the beast ridden is expressed by wattippōl (AV 'she lighted off'), but in Jos 15^{16} and Jg 1^{14} by wattiẓnaḥ (AV 'she lighted [from] off'), and this verb ẓānaḥ occurs nowhere else but in Jg 4^{21}. If one takes all this into account, it will be found what degree of certainty attaches to the position of Budde, who in the Kurzer Hdcomm., 1898, p. xxii, without positive argument, assigns to the Jahwistic work the following: Jg $1^{1\alpha\beta b.\ 2f.\ 5-7.\ 19.\ 21\ (10.\ 20).\ 11-16.\ 36.\ 17.\ 22-29.\ 30-34}$. Again, the view that the passages in question in the Bk. of Jos are borrowed from Jg 1 (Bertheau, *Commentar*², pp. 3, 37 f., 42) is, in the first place, unnecessary. For the circumstance that those passages in Jos have an 'inorganic' position in their context is explained as well by the view contended for above, that a common source of older origin is used in both books. But the view of Bertheau labours under at least one positive difficulty. In Jos 13^{13} we find the same formula used, and yet this remark is not drawn from Jg 1.

* Ant. v. viii. 6: Καὶ ἀνελόμενος τρία μέλιτος κηρία, σὺν τοῖς λοιποῖς δώροις, οἷς ἐκόμιζε, δίδωσι τῇ παιδί.

To the Jahwistic source Budde (p. xxii) would attribute also, e.g., 6^{12b} and 11^{1a}, although in these sentences the expression gibbôr ḥayil (AV 'a mighty man of valour') is read. This expression is uniformly avoided in the Pent. (cf. the simple gibbôr in Gn 6^{4} $10^{8f.}$ †), but it meets us in Jos 1^{14} 6^{2} 8^{3} 10^{7}, Jg 6^{12} 11^{1} etc. (cf. König, Syntax, § 267d). Winckler (Untersuchungen zur altorient. Geschichte, 1893–1897) speaks of the 'Quellen-Zusammensetzung der Gideon-Erzählungen' (pp. 42 ff.), and finds, e.g., 7^{9-14} and 7^{15}–8^{3} irreconcilable, because it is impossible that Gideon could have played the spy upon the Midianites ($7^{9ff.}$) and yet have attacked them in the beginning of the middle watch (7^{19}). But all that is related in $7^{9ff.}$ might take place in a matter of four hours. The main point, however, is that Winckler adds (p. 49), 'Having thus to assume two different sources for the two narratives, it is most natural (!) to find in these E and J.' He thinks this suggestion is commended by the use in 7^{14} of הָאֱלֹהִים 'the God.' But he has not observed that in 7^{14b} it is the words of a Midianite that are reported.—The three passages in which שֶׁ is used as the relative (6^{17b} 7^{12b} 8^{26b})—a notable idiom of the history of Gideon—Budde (p. xxii) assigns thus, to J 8^{26}, to E 6^{17b}, to R^{P} 7^{12} (see below), only in the notes to the first two passages he sets these also down, on account of the שֶׁ, as additions of a glossator. Also 11^{3} belongs, according to Budde, to J, and yet the concept of 'assemble themselves' is expressed only in this passage by הִתְלַקְּטוּ; cf. נאספו, etc., Gn 29^{3} 34^{30} (both these passages are assigned to J also in Kautzsch's AT), Ex 32^{26} (J also according to Ryssel, Ex-Lv, 1897, p. 370). Further, 15^{1-19} is from J, according to Budde (pp. xxii, 92). But in those portions of the Pentateuch which are attributed to J, שְׁנֵי is used before the objects enumerated, Gn 9^{22} 19^{1} (27^{9}) 34^{25}, Ex 4^{9} etc. (see König, Syntax, § 311c), but שְׁנַיִם before such objects is found nowhere but in Ex 25^{18a}, Dt 17^{6}, Jos 2^{1} 6^{22}, Jg $11^{37.\ 39}$ 15^{13} etc. (see l.c.).

(b) Can the Elohistic stratum (E) of the Pent. be traced in the Bk. of Jg? Budde has, to begin with, assigned $2^{6.\ 6f.}$ to E (also 2^{7} is = Jos 24^{31}, but as a whole it is ascribed by Budde [p. 21] to the Deut. redactor). This is correct in so far as the verses named are substantially identical with Jos 24^{28-30}, and that Jos 24 has indeed marks of the source E has been acknowledged by the present writer in his Einleitung (pp. 203 f., 248). The words of Jg 2^{6-9} attach themselves to the Elohistic narrative of Joshua's end. But this does not prove that the Elohistic source has also supplied other elements in the Bk. of Jg. Budde attributes to this source, e.g., 4^{4-22}, appealing (p. 33) to אִשָּׁה נְבִיאָה (4^{4}; see the analogous expressions in König's Syntax, § 306 o), etc. But he himself adds the judicious remark that he does not feel certain of his inference. At all events the use of מָשַׁךְ in 4^{6} (where AV offers rightly 'draw') cannot be regarded as evidence. For even if Ex 12^{21} could be certainly put down to E, the מֹשְׁכִים of Jg 5^{14} (active, 'grasping the staff [of the commander]'—König, Syntax, § 212h ex.; LXX ἕλκοντες; Targ. and Pesh. כתבין, scribentes!) would have been a source nearer to hand for 4^{6}. Further, Budde assigns 20^{37a} to E, but not v.^{37b} in spite of the מָשַׁךְ, which is found also in Job 21^{33}. To an author denominated E^{2} he ascribes Jg 6^{7-10}. But, e.g., עַל אֹדוֹת (6^{7}) is found, not only in Gn (Samarit. 20^{3}) $21^{11.\ 25}$ 26^{32}, Ex 18^{8}, Nu 12^{1} 13^{24}, Jos 14^{6}, but also in Jer 3^{8}. Here then identity of expression does not prove identity of authors.

(c) Is a successor of the Deuteronomic author who, e.g., wrote Dt $1^{1f.}$–4^{40} etc. (see König's Einleitung, pp. 212–214) to be admitted also for the Bk. of Jg? The passages which repeatedly refer to Israel's disloyalty and Jahweh's anger, Israel's repentance and Jahweh's help (2^{11-19} $3^{7.\ 12a}$ 4^{1-3} 6^{1} 8^{33-35} 10^{6-16} 13^{1}), have points of contact with the passages that are attributed with probability to the Deut. author, not only in their religious and moral tendency, but even in their form. For the verb הִכְעִיס ('to provoke or vex') is found with God as the object only in Dt 4^{25} (9^{16}) 31^{29} ($32^{16.\ 21}$), Jg 2^{12}, and the verb מָכַר ('to sell' = 'deliver') is read in Dt 28^{66} (התמכר) 32^{30}, Jg 2^{14} (3^{6}) $4^{2.\ 9}$ 10^{7}. But the same use of הִכְעִיס meets us also in 1 K 14^{15} 15^{30} $16^{2.\ 7.\ 13.\ 26.\ 33}$ 21^{22} 22^{54}, 2 K $17^{11.\ 17}$ 21^{6} 23^{26}, Is 65^{3}, Jer $7^{16f.}$ 8^{19} 11^{17} $25^{6f.}$ $32^{29f.\ 32}$ $44^{3.\ 6}$, Ezk 8^{17} 16^{26}, Ps 78^{56} 106^{29}, 2 Ch 28^{25} 33^{6} 34^{25} (‖ 1 K 22^{54}, 2 K 17^{17} 22^{17}). Here again, then, this use of the verb הִכְעִיס is no guarantee of the identity of the author of Dt 4^{25} etc. with the author of Jg 2^{12}. (Compare here the words of C. Niebuhr [Studien u. Bemerkungen z. Gesch. d. alten Orients, 1894, p. 1], 'Die wirkliche Nothwendigkeit einer sachlichen Unterscheidung von Dt and D (oder gar D^{1} and D^{2}) vermögen wir bisher nicht nachzuempfinden').

(d) To an R^{P}, i.e. a redactor having affinities with the priestly stratum of the Pent., Budde (p. xxii) assigns the following passages in Jg: $1^{1a\alpha}$ 2^{17} $7^{2-8a.\ 12.\ 14*.}$ † ^{23} $8^{10a\beta b.\ 21b\beta.\ 27a\beta b\ (30-32)}$ $9^{16b-19a}$ (?) 10^{1-5} $11^{1b.\ 2}$ $12^{7b\,(?).\ 8-15}$ 16^{31b} $20^{16\,(?).\ 23\,(?).\ 27b.\ 26a\alpha.\ 37b.}$

† By an asterisk Budde means to indicate that he regards the passage in question as having been worked over.

$^{39.\,42b.\,43.\,44b-46}$ $21^{4a\beta.\,14b.\,19a\beta-20a}$. But regarding $1^{1a\alpha}$ he remarks merely that the words 'after the death of Joshua' are in direct contradiction to $2^{6ff.}$. Yet this does not prove that these words are due to a redactor (R^P). As little certainty appears to attach to the attributing of 2^{17} to this source. For לא עָשׂוּ כֵן 'they did not so,' reminds us not only 'strongly of P' (namely Gn 6^{22} etc.), but one may compare also Gn 29^{26} $42^{20.\,25}$ 45^{21}, Ex 7^6 etc., 1 K 20^{25}, 2 K 15^{12}, Jer 39^{12} 42^5, Zec 1^6, Neh 8^{17}. Further, on 7^{2-8a} Budde remarks (p. 58) that צָרַף 'try' (Jg 7^4), comes into use for the first time from Jer 9^6 onwards, and that the suffixless לְבָד (7^5) has parallels only in Ex 26^6 36^6 (this last should be ^{16}), Zec 12^{12-14}. But in Jg 7^5 it is not the usual idea 'alone' (solus) that is meant to be expressed, but the stronger idea of 'apart' (LXX κατὰ μόνας, Hieron. seorsum). Again, 7^{12}, which contains שׁ used for the relative, is ascribed by Budde to R^P, but in the Pent. stratum P this שׁ is not found.

One might continue to criticise the views of Budde (cf. once more König's Einleitung, pp. 253 f.).* But we cease to test these in detail, and add merely a general remark. Budde says (p. xiv) that by J and E he understands, not persons, but schools.† But this was not the sense originally intended by the terms J and E, and the earlier meaning is not quite obsolete even with Budde. For he speaks still of the 'Zeitalter der Quellen J and E,' and places these sources in relation to the Hexateuch (p. xii). But according to his new view one ought to speak in the plural of 'J's' and 'E's,' and no longer of 'J' or 'E' (Budde, p. xiii), as if there were only 'the' Jahwist; we should say 'a' J(ahwist), etc. But far more important is the circumstance that upon the theory of a plurality of Jahwists the difficulty of tracing the family likeness is very seriously increased. Who has fixed the character of each J, and who can determine it? Then, indeed, is there a danger that such a J is an imaginary quantity, and that one still speaks of J but no longer has him. In any case the judgment of the present writer is to the following effect. Since the different sources from which, according to No. 4 of this article, the present Book of Judges is drawn, cannot be with certainty identified with the main strata of the Pentateuch, nothing results from the relation of Jg to these regarding the age of the materials of which Jg appears to be composed, or regarding the date of the book itself.

6. THE CHARACTER AND AGE OF THE SOURCES OF THE BOOK OF JUDGES.—(a) If any one of the components of the present Bk. of Jg is an independent whole, and reveals itself as a source, it is the Poem in which the victory over Sisera is celebrated (Jg 5). Its verses go tumbling on, foaming like the waves of the Kishon (5^{21}), upon whose banks that victory was gained. Like the gallop of war-horses (5^{22}) ring the anaphora (vv.$^{3b.\,7b.\,12a.\,23a}$), the epizeuxis ($^{12a.\,22b}$), and the symploke ($^{7a.\,24ab}$, cf. $^{19a\alpha\beta.\,20a\alpha\beta}$) in this poem, towards removing whose difficulties the present writer has contributed his part, he trusts not quite unsuccessfully in his Syntax (cf. p. 645). This song gives so detailed (vv.$^{6.\,10a.\,14-18.\,23}$) and so lively a picture of the historical situation (vv.$^{24-27.\,28-30}$) which is commemorated in it, that it must have been born of that situation, even if it has not come down to us quite intact. This is the judgment rightly passed upon it even by such free critics as, e.g., Th. Nöldeke (Untersuch. z. Kritik d. AT, p. 181), H. Steiner (die Heb. Poesie, 1873, p. 24), Ed. Meyer (Gesch. d. Alterthums, i. § 167), B. Stade (Gesch. Isr. i. 49), Aug. Müller (in Königsberger Studien, 1887, p. 7), E. Renan (Hist. du peuple d'Israël, i. 136), J. Wellhausen (Comp. d. Hex. p. 23), H. Cornill (Einleitung, § 16, 3), G. Moore (Judges, p. 132 f.), J. Marquart (Fundamente, etc., 1896, p. 2), K. Budde (Comm. p. 39), Ch. Piepenbring (Hist. du peuple d'Israël, 1898, p. 85: 'ce vieux cantique').

Nor can this judgment be shattered by the arguments which are brought forward by L. Seinecke (Gesch. d. Volkes Israel, i. 243–245). Neither (a) are the political presuppositions of the Song wanting in historical reality, nor do (β) its form or (γ) its contents render a high antiquity impossible for it. For (a) even if the northern Canaanites sustained a defeat in the time of Joshua (see below, 8 a, on Jos 11^{10-14}), their strength might have recovered itself. (β) The use of שׁ for the relative (5^7) has analogies in OT passages of a more northern Palestine origin (see further, 6 d). The plur. ending -în (5^{10}) may have the same origin, or it may be an element in the poetical dialect as in Pr 31^3 etc. (see König, Lehrgebäude, ii. 434). To the same category belong also תַּנָּה (5^{11}: (?) 'im Wechselgesang vortragen,' 'repeat,' 'relate'; cf. the Aram. תַּנֵּי in the Targ. on Ps 9^{12} etc., and the Assyr. šunnû, 'communicate' (Del. Assyr. Wörterb. 1896, p. 674^a). (γ) The heights of Seir (5^4), which lay north of the Peninsula of Sinai, are named as the starting-point of Jahweh who manifested Himself on Sinai (v.^{5}). This tallies with the ancient conception that the seat of the gods was in the northern region of the earth, Lv 1^{11} 4^{24} etc., Is 14^{13} (Jer 1^{13}), Ezk 1^4 (28^{14}), Ps 48^3 (133^3), cf. Job 26^7. This theophany is also intended as a past one. For the temporal sphere of an infin. depends upon its context (Gn 28^{6b} etc.; see König's Syntax, § 216), and בְּצֵאתְךָ, etc. (Jg $5^{4a\alpha}$) is followed by the perfects רָעָשָׁה, etc. Then יָעֵל (v.^{6}) may, coming after בִּימֵי, have arisen from עַל (cf. [א ארח] על 1 Ch 7^{39}), the name of a descendant of Asher. It is probable that, as a parallel to שַׁמְגַּר, a man is intended (cf. Bertheau, ad loc.).* But even if the words בִּימֵי יָעֵל are a gloss (Moore, Marquart, Budde), the antiquity of the poem itself is not thereby endangered. Finally, the assertion that 'from heaven forces took part in the battle' (5^{20}), contains a religio-poetical clothing of the conception that God assisted the Israelites (cf. Ex 14^{24}, Jos 10^{11}). The assertion is not then to be called a 'gross exaggeration' of a later author.†

* W. Frankenberg (die Composition des deuteronom. Richterbuches, 1895, p. 1) remarks, 'A deeper insight into the original contents and the historical origin of the Bk. of Jg is sufficient of itself to convince one of the futility of the attempts that are ever being made afresh to build a literary bridge between the Hexateuch and our Bk. of Jg, and to discover the sources of the Hex. in the latter.'

† 'J und E sind mir durchaus nicht Personen, sondern umfassende, neben einander herlaufende schriftstellerische Schulen.'

* Marquart (Fundamente, etc., 1896, p. 2) takes Shamgar to be 'der fremde Oberkönig,' and combines him with 'Sangara of Carchemish, in the time of Ašurnâṣirabal, c. B.C. 880,' and Sisera with 'Piẓiri the last king of Carchemish' (c. B.C. 740). What an amount of error in the Hebrew tradition is thus assumed without any sufficient reason!

† H. Winckler in his Altorient. Forschungen (1893–1897) offers the following remarks on Jg 5: שׂדה in v.^{4}='height' (p. 192, cf. Assyr. šadu, 'to be high'). This is possible. But it is more probable that זה סיני in v.^{5} is an intermediate exclamation (see König, Syntax, § 414a) than that זה has arisen from רגז (p. 192). The substitution of שֵׂדֶר 'row' for שָׂרִיד in v.^{13} (p. 291) is not probable. In v.$^{14a\alpha}$ he reads (p. 193), מִנִּי אפרים שָׂרוּ בעמק 'from Ephraim they came down (cf. שׁוּר) into the valley,' and he deletes v.$^{14a\beta}$ entirely. We would rather suggest that the gibbōrîm of v.$^{13\,ex.}$ are 'heroes from Ephraim,' and that then משרשים is meant to signify 'eradicantes, i.e. delentes inter Amalek' (cf. LXX ἐξερίζωσεν). Also the reading וְשָׂרוּ בי' עם דברת 'and there came down in Issachar the people of Dabrat' (p. 292), is extremely precarious. For it would be unnatural if after the princes, etc. (v.^{14b}), the population of a single city (Jos 19^{12}) should be mentioned. Finally, instead of נַחַל קְדוּמִים (v.^{21a}) Winckler suggests (p. 193) the sentence, 'the stream of Kishon was [dyed, or the like] with blood' (דָּמִים). But the cir-

M. Vernes (Précis d'histoire juive, p. 210) holds that at the very outset (péremptoirement) it must be regarded as a settled point that at this epoch we cannot have to do with a campaign undertaken by the tribes of Israel in common. But why might not an extraordinary danger have brought about an extraordinary coalition of many tribes of Israel for common defence against the enemy? Some tribes, indeed, declined to be stirred up from their phlegmatic condition (5$^{16-17}$). Further, Vernes finds in the mention of Sinai and of Seir 'l'ignorance ou, si l'on préfère, la negligence de l'homme qui écrit librement à grande distance de son sujet.' But he has himself failed to observe that the mention of Mt. Seir had reference to a northern starting-point of the theophany of Jahweh (see above, regarding the idea of the northern sphere as the seat of deity). Again, the days of Shamgar, although he defeated the Philistines (3^{31}), might still be a time of oppression (4^{4}), and, besides, the note in 4^{4} may be primary, and that in 3^{31} secondary. Further, if the Kishon is called in 5^{21} 'l'antique fleuve' (but see König's Syntax, § 261d), this expression could be used even in the days of Deborah. According to Vernes, the sentence 'Dan יָגוּר אֳנִיּוֹת' (v.^{17}) is also an unnatural one, for 'jamais les Danites n'ont touché à la mer.' But even if we are not to think, with Mikhlal Jophi, of אֳנִיּוֹת הַיַּרְדֵּן, the Danites might 'dwell' as strangers, i.e. serve on board ships. Finally, Vernes will have it that even the address to kings and princes in v.^{3} 'indique une époque de relations internationales.' Well, such an epoch was to hand already at the date of the Tel el-Amarna letters! In the Rev. des Études juives, xxiv. (1892), p. 249, Vernes calls sarai (v.^{15}) an 'état construit ou (!) pluriel de forme araméenne,' and co-ordinates with it 'tsavrê, plus exactment, tsavrai'! (v.^{30}). He denies the existence of 'marques du dialecte hébreu septentrionale' (p. 249^{2}); but see below, 6 d. He thinks 'que la terminologie familière au Cantique est celle des livres de la Bible dont on admet le plus volontiers l'origine post-exilienne.' But he has failed to notice that poetry, even in the earliest times, may have preferred expressions which, owing to their rarity or their more foreign cast, lend to the Song of Deborah a special charm. Thus, e.g., the verb פרע (v.^{2}) will not have been 'emprunté aux Nombres et au Lévitique' (p. 249), even if is not to be translated with M. Lambert (p. 141), 'se dépouiller (pour Dieu), offrir généreusement (cf. en himyarite la locution פרע פרע 'faire une offrande').'

H. Winckler (Gesch. Israels, Bd. i. (1895), p. 34) admits first that the Song (Jg 5) goes back to the pre-Davidic era, because 'it knows nothing of Judah.' But he adds that 'the form in which the Song has come down to us is a product of a much later age, which transformed it for its own ends, and made of it something quite different from what it originally was.' On what grounds does he rest this judgment? All that he says is, 'vv.$^{4f.}$ are manifestly an interpolation, and form the beginning of a hymn to Jahweh which has nothing whatever to do with the Song of Deborah. Also v.^{31} belongs to the same.' It is clear, he says, that the Song is a compound from a hymn to J″ which is full of mythological allusions ('the stars fought'), and from a piece intended to glorify a battle fought by the Northern tribes. It would scarcely be possible to find weaker arguments than these. Are vv.$^{4f.}$ 'manifestly' an interpolation? Was it not natural that the words 'I will sing praise to the Lord God of Israel' (v.^{3}) should be actually followed by some lines in praise of this God? Was it not natural that at the beginning of a poem meant to celebrate a notable action of the Deity, there should be a recalling of a well-known manifestation by which Jahweh established His renown? Would it have been more natural if, after the mention of the determination to praise the Deity (v.^{3}), the Song had proceeded 'in the days of Shamgar,' etc.? (v.^{6}). Further, the wish 'so perish all thine enemies, J″!' (v.^{31}) could not, it is said, be uttered by a pre-Davidic poet. But must not a poem on a decisive defeat of the northern Canaanites quite naturally burst into such a wish? Consequently Winckler has by no means established his contention, and the poem contained in Jg 5 remains one of the most important sources for the earliest history of Israel.

(b) Another ancient source for the present Bk. of Jg is found springing up in the first chapter. In favour of this judgment is first of all the primary character of the tradition that 'Urusalimu' belonged to the sphere of the Benjamites (Jg 1^{21}, Dt 33^{12} contrasted with Jg 1^{8}, Jos 15^{63}). The following circumstance is at the same time not to be overlooked. What is the meaning of the words 'with the Benjamites' in the sentence 'and the Jebusites dwelt with the Benjamites in Jerusalem unto this day'? (1^{21b}). The meaning must be 'within the territory of the Benjamites,' i.e. in the sphere which was assigned to the Benjamites as object of the conquest, and was also in the main actually occupied (cf. 'the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land,' 2 S 5^{6} ‖ 1 Ch 11^{4}). This sense is suggested for the words 'with the Benjamites' by several considerations, one negative and several positive. In the first place, immediately before 1^{21b} it is remarked, 'and (= but) the Benjamites did not drive out the Jebusites, the inhabitants of Jerusalem.' The direct consequence of this failure of the Benjamites in their attack on the Jebusites (1^{21a}) was that the Jebusites dwelt alongside of the Benjamites in Jerusalem (v.^{21b}). Further, the Jebusites are called simply 'the' inhabitants of Jerusalem (Jos 15^{63}, Jg 1^{21a}), and Jebus is simply identified with Jerusalem (יְבוּס הִיא יְרוּשָׁלִַם Jg 19^{10}, Jos 18^{28}, or conversely in 1 Ch 11^{4}). Again, in the remark that the Levite (Jg 19$^{1ff.}$) was in the neighbourhood of Jerusalem (v.^{10}), the latter is called simply 'this city of the Jebusites' (19^{11b}), and it is expressly added that it was 'the city of a stranger that was not of the children of Israel' (19^{12}). In any case the author of 1^{21} did not record merely the failure of the Benjamites to conquer Jerusalem. Had this been all, he might in his account of the period of the judges have passed over in silence the victory of the Judahite David (2 S 5$^{6ff.}$) and yet have written after this victory. No, he must have added that the Jebusites were the—sole—inhabitants of Jerus. down to his own day. Now, it is quite true that even after David's victory (2 S 5$^{6ff.}$) Jebusites continued to live in Jerusalem (24$^{16ff.\ 24}$). But at that period the Jebusites were no longer 'the' inhabitants of Jerusalem (see above), but were oppressed (1 K 9^{20}, Zec 9^{7}). But also most of the other portions of Jg 1 are trustworthy reflections of an ancient situation. For it was very natural that in later times there should be a disposition to represent the success of Joshua's invasion as absolute (see below, 8 a, on Jos 11$^{10-14}$). All the more do the narratives which record the defeats sustained by Israel in their attacks upon the Canaanites, bear the stamp of antiquity. This is confirmed by the wealth of details in the first chapter regarding individual occurrences of this kind which cannot be traced to a certain or probable tendency of later times.

(c) Now a similar dry enumeration of particulars is found also in the passages concerning Shamgar (3^{31}), Tola (10$^{1f.}$), Jair (vv.$^{3-5}$), Ibzan (12$^{8-10}$), Elon cumstance that no trace of such a text has been preserved in exegetic tradition (see König's Syntax, § 261a) is a formidable objection.

(v.$^{11f.}$), and 'Abdon (vv.$^{13-15}$). The modern view of these passages is that they were first introduced into the Bk. of Jg at its final redaction (Budde, p. x). What is there to allege in favour of this position?

(a) It is said that this late redactor (R^{P}, see above, 5 d) wished to obtain the number twelve for the judges (Budde, p. x). For 'in the light of 10^{1} the sections 10^{1-5} and 12^{8-15} recognize Abimelech also as a judge' (pp. ix, 19). Thus 'Abimelech, Tola, Jair, Ibzan, Elon, and 'Abdon were for R^{P} the minor judges.' But was Abimelech really reckoned one of the shôphĕṭîm? What is said in 10^{1}? 'And after Abimelech there arose, to defend Israel, Tola,' etc. This implies, it is said, that Abimelech was reckoned among the 'judges' or 'saviours' of Israel. One might also say that this method of argumentation is typical of a certain modern school of historiography. The express statements of the sources are absolutely ignored, and new and extremely doubtful ones are sought out. For instance, is it not related in 8^{23} and 9^{2} that the kind of rule (משל) which was declined by Gideon because Jahweh was the true king of Israel (Ex 15^{18} יהוה יִמְלֹךְ), was desired by Abimelech? Did not the latter surround himself with a body of armed men? ($9^{4.\ 29b}$, cf. Absalom 2 S 15^{1}). Is it not expressly said that the men of Shechem made Abimelech king (9^{6}); and is this not confirmed by the fable of Jotham? (9^{8-18} 'the trees went forth to anoint a king,' etc.). Again, Abimelech is further called a 'prince' (9^{22} וַיָּשַׂר; cf. the corresponding 'that we should serve him' vv.$^{28.\ 38}$), but not a 'judge.' Nor does his history contain any trace of his having sought to free (הושׁיע) Israel from the yoke of foreign enemies. All the less can the 'to deliver Israel' (לְהוֹשִׁיעַ אֶת־יִשְׂרָאֵל 10^{1}) be referred to Abimelech. Further, it is extremely questionable whether a late redactor desired to establish twelve as the number of the judges. For not only is Samson, to whom 'delivering Israel' is attributed (13^{5}, cf. 14^{4} $15^{3ff.}$ $16^{23f.\ 30}$), counted amongst the judges (15^{20} 16^{31}),* but also Eli (1 S 4^{18b}) and Samuel (7^{15}). This could not be unknown to a later redactor of the Bk. of Jg. How then can the disposition be ascribed to him to make the number of the judges twelve? Besides, Budde himself remarks that in the Bk. of Jg thirteen 'judges' are mentioned, if Abimelech as well as Shamgar is included in the number. But he is not so much inclined to give up Abimelech as Shamgar, in order to reduce the thirteen to twelve. This is quite an arbitrary procedure, for the attribute of 'delivering Israel' which belonged to the character of a shôphēṭ (2^{16}) is ascribed to Shamgar (3^{31}) but not to Abimelech. Or is Shamgar no real historical figure because in a series of MSS of the LXX and in the Itala (cf. Mez, die Bibel des Josephus, p. 81 note) he is named not only in 3^{31} but also after 16^{31}? This vacillating of the textual tradition as to the right place for mentioning Shamgar is explicable by reason of the 'and after him' and the 'Philistines.' But it does not disprove the historicity of an Israelitish hero Shamgar who came upon the scene at a stormy period (5^{6}).

(β) Another ground on which the passages $10^{1f.\ 3-5}$ $12^{8-10.\ 11f.\ 13-15}$ are assigned to a very late redactor (R^{P}), is the following:—In these five sections it is not recorded that Israel was false to its religion, and on that account had to suffer oppression for a term of years, and was delivered from this by a hero. 'The extreme attenuation of the Deuteron. formula is exhibited in 3^{31}. There is mention, indeed, of an act of deliverance, but of no number of years' (Budde, p. 19). But what if those circumstances of which there is no notice did not exist, or were partly not remembered? Can their absence bring into question the historical character of the persons themselves? In the section concerning Othniel (3^{9-11}), which by Budde and others is separated from the above six passages, are there any more real elements? It is quite true that something had 'faded,' but this was the recollection of those personages, and not the 'Deuteronomistic formulæ.' What could have prevented the introducing of those formulæ even at a late period into the biography of the persons named. Hence the conclusion appears more certain that it was not the 'formulæ' that were wanting, but the disposition to modify historical reminiscences in accordance with these formulæ. That has been handed down regarding those persons which was known of them, and this was not little: the name of the man himself and that of his father or his tribe, or it may be the place of his birth and his burial ($10^{2.\ 5}$ $12^{10.\ 12.\ 15}$), or the remembrance of some notable deed done by him (3^{31}), etc. Why should all this be set down to invention? Not because of a wish to reach the number twelve for the judges, as we have seen already. Or was it, perchance, to give a judge to each tribe? The tribes of the individual judges were as follows: Judah (Othniel 3^{9}), Benjamin (Ehud 3^{15}; ? Shamgar 3^{31}), Naphtali (Barak 4^{6}), Ephraim (Gideon 6^{11}), Issachar (Tola 10^{1}), Gilead (Jair 10^{3}), ? Gilead (Jephthah 11^{1}), Judah (Ibzan 12^{8}), Zebulun (Elon 12^{11}), Ephraim ('Abdon 12^{13}), Dan (Samson 13^{2}). One may observe that in this list some tribes occur twice, and that a few tribes are wanting altogether. If an explanation of the local origin of these judges is to be sought for, it is most natural to find it in the circumstance that the hero sprang up from the tribe which felt most the weight of the invader's oppression. Finally, how came poetic fancy and constructive historiography to distribute in their present fashion the six passages 3^{31} 10^{1-5} 12^{8-15}? It is impossible for the present writer to consent to see in this arrangement simply an arbitrary procedure.

(d) But there are in the Bk. of Jg also such lifelike and vivid narratives as cannot be set down to the ideas or tendencies of a later age.

(a) The history of Abimelech (Jg 9) even M. Vernes (Hist. juive, p. 218) calls 'un récit d'une précision, d'un relief étonnant.' But it is not the only one of this class in Jg, as he adds, but it is the only one that is almost wholly secular in its character. It is the only narrative in Jg which is true to the life—only for those critics to whom the secular life is the only real life of ancient Israel. Critics who occupy such a standpoint will not deny the attribute of antiquity to such a story as that of the Benjamite Ehud, who with his left hand stabbed the tyrant Eglon (Jg $3^{15ff.}$). Such critics will not be disposed to deny the historicity of the bold figure of Jephthah, or of the tragic end of his only child (11^{1}–12^{7}). As a 'héros d'aventures privées' even Samson has found grace in the eyes of M. Vernes (p. 238), according to whom the exploits of Samson belonged to the 'disputes qui devaient naître fréquemment à l'époque historique des relations établies entre populations antipathiques.' *

* And this not without reason, as M. Vernes (Hist. juive, p. 237) supposed when he said, 'Laissons de côté l'étrange prétention de nous faire voir dans Samson un juge d'Israël.' For from the words, 'the Lord raised up judges, which delivered them out of the hand of those that spoiled them' (Jg 2^{18}, cf. 1 S 8^{5b}), it results that the term shôphēṭ had assumed the more general sense of 'hero,' or 'leader.'

* M. Vernes adds the following note: 'Il s'agit là, ce nous semble, d'une antipathie comme entre Anglais et Français à tant d'époques de notre histoire. On est en paix officielle, on s'unit par des marriages, etc., mais de temps en temps la haine nationale se fait jour par des explosions violentes. Il reste à remarquer que Samson ne se bat pas une seule fois avec l'épée ou la lance; jamais il n'est à la tête d'une troupe quelconque.

(β) But the religious life also was a real one in ancient Israel. As early as the time of Moses and during the following centuries zeal for the cause of Jahweh could burn (Ex 32$^{25ff.}$), and enthusiasm be aroused for the defence of His honour. For, if the flame of reverence for J" had not been kindled by Moses, why should he and not Samuel have been named as the greatest hero of the religious development of Israel? If the fire of enthusiasm for the religion of J" was not lighted at the great epoch of the deliverance from Egypt, how could this fire have burst out just at a period of the deepest depression (1 S 4$^{16ff.}$), and why should Israel have felt convicted of impiety against Jahweh? (1 S 7^{6b}). Hence there is no reasonable ground for doubt that Gideon (Jg 6$^{11ff.}$) contended for the cult of Jahweh in opposition to the preference for Ba'al, or that he could have taken for his battle-cry, 'For Jahweh and for Gideon (will we fight),' Jg 7^{18b}. Besides, it is in the highest degree worthy of notice that it is precisely in the history of a hero belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, i.e. to central Canaan, that the use of שֶׁ for the relative appears (6^{17} 7^{12} 8^{26}). For it is of the tribe of Ephraim alone that it is recorded in the OT that its dialect differed from that of other Hebrews (Jg 12^{6}); cf. on the speech of Ashdod as a Hebrew dialect, etc., König, Lehrgebäude, ii. 349, 353. Further, it is a fact that in the narratives concerning Elijah and Elisha the following linguistic peculiarities appear: אוֹת 'with,' 2 K 1$^{1.15}$ 3$^{11f.26}$ 6$^{16.19}$ 8^{8}; the shorter form Eliyya (and Ahazya), 1$^{2-4.8.12}$; אַתִּי ('attî, 'thou,' fem.) 4$^{16.23}$ 8^{1}; the corresponding לכי ('to thee,' fem.) 4^{2}; כי ('thy,' fem.) 4$^{3.7}$; שֶׁ, relative, 6^{11}; cf. איכה 'where'?, 6^{13}, so elsewhere only in Ca 1^{7} (Kethîbh); בהשׂדה 2 K 7^{12}, and the same phenomenon shows itself in ancient histories like those of 1 S 13^{21}, 2 S 16^{2}. Therefore it is a sufficiently well-grounded judgment that the present narratives concerning Gideon are compiled from materials which, so to say, bear a local colouring. This judgment is at least supported, further, by two material circumstances. For it is a fact, admitted even, e.g., by Wellhausen (Prolegom. p. 71), that the description of the offering contained in Jg 6$^{17f.}$ corresponds to the earliest stage of the history of the cultus in Israel. Another point has hitherto not been emphasized, but it is of no less importance. The disinclination manifested by Gideon to accept of the offer made to him to be ruler (משׁל Jg 8^{23} 'the Lord shall rule over you') is perfectly in place in the period before Samuel. For it was not till his time that Israel rejected the kingship of Jahweh (Ex 15^{18}) ('they have rejected me, that I should not reign over them,' 1 S 8^{7}).

(γ) In like manner the antiquity of the narrative contained in Jg 17 f. is witnessed to. For the possession by the Ephraimite Micah of a private house of gods (17^{5a}) tallies with the circumstance that in the earlier period a plurality of places of worship was allowed (Ex 20$^{24-26}$). Further, we see a Levite wandering about, ready to settle down wherever he found office and bread (17$^{8ff.}$ 18$^{19f.}$ 19^{1}). This situation of the members of the tribe of Levi was an actual one as long as a number of the Levitical cities were not yet conquered, such as Gezer (Jos 21^{21} 16^{10}, Jg 1^{29}), and those remarks of the Bk. of Jg about the Levites would have possessed no probability if they had proceeded from a period when Jeroboam selected priests from among the people at large (1 K 12^{31}). For the Levite spoken of in Jg 17$^{8ff.}$ wandered from Judah to the territory of Ephraim, etc., but after the time of Jeroboam many members of the tribe of Levi, on the contrary, moved from the territories of the Northern tribes to the kingdom of Judah (2 Ch 11$^{13f.}$). Finally, the note that the priests of the city of Dan were descendants of Moses (Jg 18^{30}), must be borrowed from an ancient source. Later generations were so little disposed to invent such an item, that they sought rather to convert the name of Moses in this passage into Manasseh.

(δ) But also the moral life of ancient Israel did not lack its characteristic aim and peculiar vigour. Even in early times Israel was conscious of a certain sum of moral principles, for we read, 'no such thing ought to be done in Israel': 'do not thou this folly,' and the like (cf. Gn 20^{11} 34^{7b}, Jg 19^{30} 20^{6b}, 2 S 13^{12}). And, since these principles of morality in the most central parts of Israelitish tradition are traced back to the time of Moses, why should we seek for a different origin for them? Is it at all probable, for instance, that they originated at periods which do not give themselves out as creative, but as secondary? Now these ancient principles of the morality of Israel lived in the conscience of this nation, and when they were trodden underfoot, as in the instance of Gibeah (Jg 19$^{23ff.}$), the voice of the moral conscience of the nation spoke out loudly (20$^{6-8}$). Hence it is quite precarious to pronounce the storm of indignation that broke loose upon the Benjamites (v.$^{9ff.}$) fictitious. Finally, the assertion that in the time of the judges a 'common acting on the part of the twelve tribes of Israel is excluded' (Budde on chs. 19–21), is quite ungrounded. Nay, it has not yet been taken into account that the Song of 5$^{1ff.}$ contains an indirect proof to the contrary effect. For if in the period of the judges one could not entertain the notion that a common danger to Israel must be warded off by the common action of all the tribes, one could not have blamed those tribes which kept aloof from the struggle against the northern Canaanites (Jg 5$^{15-17}$).

(e) There is a series of passages in the Bk. of Jg in which the declension of the national prosperity is brought into causal connexion with the religious and moral falling away of the people (cf. especially 2$^{11ff.}$ 3$^{7.12a}$ 4$^{1-8}$ 6^{1} 8$^{33-35}$ 10$^{6-16}$ 13^{1}). It has been shown above (5 c) that these passages cannot with certainty be attributed to a definite Deuteron. author, but we now add the following observations, by way of an attempt to fix positively the character and the age of these passages. (α) There was a religious-moral consciousness on the part of Israel (cf. 6 d, δ) before the period to which the origin of Dt is traced by a large number of critics, i.e. the reign of king Josiah. (β) During the centuries that elapsed between Moses and Samuel, 'the knees which have not bowed unto Baal' (1 K 19^{18}) were not quite wanting. Let us recall, for instance, Deborah and Gideon. (γ) In addition to that series of passages which now are assigned by several critics to a Deuteronomist (Budde's D^{2}), are there not others in the Bk. of Jg in which the same causal nexus between religious unfaithfulness and national decadence is emphasized? cf. 2$^{1-5}$. (δ) May not such passages have been formulated in the guilds of něbi'îm which gathered around Samuel? (1 S 10$^{3-7}$ etc.). (ε) Nor can it be denied that a kernel of farewell addresses of Moses existed before these assumed their present form in Dt (cf. König, Einleitung, pp. 214–216). (ζ) Those passages of Jg which are now by many scholars called Deuteronomistic, are even in relation to their contents not really allied to the passages of the Books of Kings which have points of contact with Dt (1 K 3$^{2f.}$ 11^{6} etc.; see König, Einleitung, p. 267). For it is extremely interesting that in Jg the cove-

Les éléments de son histoire nous semblent, en conséquence, appartenir à une époque relativement peu ancienne.' But this is nearly the opposite of the real course of things. It is precisely in olden times that heroes signalize themselves in single combat. Recall, for instance, the giant figures of the Greek world of legend, the heroes of Homer, or the giants of the German pre-historic era.

nant of J″ is mentioned only in $2^{1.20}$ and the commands of J″ only in $2^{17.34}$, but these things are mentioned in 1 K 2^2 $3^{3.14}$ $6^{12.38}$ $8^{31.55.58.61}$ $9^{4.6}$ $11^{11.33f.38}$ 13^{21} 14^8 18^{18} $19^{10.14}$, 2 K 10^{31} 13^{23} 14^6 $17^{8.13.15f.19.34.37f.}$ $18^{8.12}$ 21^8 $22^{8.11}$ $23^{2f.21.24f.}$. Further, the idea of the centralization of the cultus is not emphasized in that series of passages which it is usual to call Deuteronomistic. No word of censure is uttered against the bāmôth as in 1 K $3^{2f.}$ 15^{14} $22^{44.47}$, 2 K 12^3 $14^{3f.}$ $15^{3f.34f.}$ $18^{5.22}$ $23^{5.8.25}$. Besides, when the remark is made that D^2 'den Begriff des Richter geschaffen hat' (Budde, p. xvi), in support of which Jg 2^{16} is cited, we miss here a recollection of the words, 'since the time that I commanded judges to be over my people Israel' (2 S 7^{11}).

(f) There are only a few passages in Jg which possess sufficiently clear marks of a late origin.

(α) We do not venture to reckon among these elements those passages where the intervention of a supernatural power is described, as in the expression 'an (see König's Syntax, § 304 e) angel of the LORD' (2^1 $13^{3ff.}$), or 'the Spirit of the LORD came upon him,' etc. (3^{10} 6^{34} 11^{29} $14^{6.19}$ 15^{14}). For 'there are more things in heaven and earth, Horatio, than are dreamt of in your philosophy.'

(β) But we find, undoubtedly, a series of so-called 'round numbers'; 'seven' ($6^{1.15}$ 8^{28} 12^9 $16^{7f.13.19}$ 20^{15}), or 'seventy' (1^7 8^{30} [repeated in $9^{2.5.18.24.58}$] ^{4} 12^{14}), or 'seventy-seven' (8^{14}), or 'forty' (3^{11} $5^{8.31}$ 8^{28} 13^1). There are, indeed, also instances where the number 'seven' is meant in an exact sense, as in the case of the seven days of the marriage feast ($14^{12.17}$); for such a feast even at the present day actually lasts, as a rule, for seven days, and is called 'the king's week' (Wetzstein, Zeitschrift f. Ethnologie, v. 291, 293). But the numbers 'seven,' 'seventy,' and 'forty' are unquestionably intended frequently in an approximate sense; cf. 'seven' in Gn 4^{15} 31^{23} 33^3, Ex 7^{25}, Lv $26^{18.24.28}$, Dt $28^{7.25}$, 1 S 2^5 etc., Is 4^1 etc.; 'seventy' in Gn 46^{27}, Ex 1^5 15^{27} $24^{1.9}$, Nu $11^{16.24f.}$ 33^9, Dt 10^{22}, 2 K 10^1, Is 23^{15}, Jer 25^{11} 29^{10}, Ezk 8^{11}, Ps 90^{10}, Lk 10^1; 'seventy-seven' in Gn 4^{24}; 'forty' in Gn 6^3, Ex 7^7 16^{35} etc., Dt 34^7, 1 S 4^{18} 17^{16}, 2 S 5^4 15^7, 1 K 2^{11} 11^{42} 19^8, Ezk 4^6 29^{11-13}, Am 2^{10} 5^{25}, Jon 3^4, Ps 95^{10}, Neh 9^{21}, Mt 4^2, Ac 1^3; cf. the Egyp. and the Gr. parallels in Gn 50^3 and Herodot. ii. 29, iii. 23, iv. 73. The psychological origin of the employment of these numbers lies in this, that naturally it was only approximately and by a familiar expression that one could or would indicate a smaller or a larger quantity. Cf. Adrianos, Εἰσαγωγὴ εἰς τὰς θείας γραφάς, § 85: 'Τὸν ἑπτὰ ἀριθμὸν ἐπὶ πλεονασμοῦ λέγει (ἡ γραφή).'

To the same category may be assigned also the numbers 'eighty' (3^{30}), 'twenty' (4^3 15^{20} 16^{31}; from 40 + 20 arose the 60 which in Jg 12^7 is assigned by the LXX B, etc., as the length of the sway of Jephthah), 'ten' (6^7 12^{11}, cf. Gn 31^7, Lv 26^{26}, Nu 14^{22}, 1 S 1^8 etc., Is 6^{13}, Am 5^3 etc., the ten temptations of Abraham in the Book of Jubilees, ch. 19), and the 'fifty' which is read by LXX A, etc., in 3^{11} (cf. Gn 18^{24}, Jos 7^{21}, 1 S 6^{19} etc.). Also the number 'three' in the three years' reign of Abimelech (Jg 9^{22}) might bear the same character, because 'three' sometimes designates an approximate quantity (Gn 30^{36} $40^{10.12}$ 42^{27}, Ex 2^2 etc., Is 16^{14} 20^3, Jon 2^1, Est 4^{16}, Dn 1^5, 1 Ch 21^{12}). But then the history of Abimelech possesses in other respects many marks of exactitude (see above, 6 d, α). It is certainly, however, an unjustifiable procedure to include in this class of numbers the 'eighteen' of Jg 3^{14}, the 'twenty-three' of 10^2, or the 'twenty-two' read by a few Gr. minuscula MSS in 10^2, probably in imitation of the following number 22, the 'eighteen' of 10^8, the 'forty-two' of 12^6, the 'six' of 12^7, or the 'eight' of 12^{14}.*

This last procedure would be justifiable only upon the assumption that these numbers may be regarded as the arbitrarily chosen parts of a previously fixed total. In point of fact, the following observation has been made: the sum of the interregna ($3^{8.14}$ 4^3 6^1 10^8: 8 + 18 + 20 + 7 + 18 = 71) almost exactly corresponds to the sum of the years of the so-called minor Judges ($10^{2f.}$ $12^{9.11.14}$: 23 + 22 + 7 + 10 + 8 = 70). Wellhausen, who was the first to note this correspondence (in Bleek's Introd.^{4} p. 185, and in Prolegom.^{2} p. 240), afterwards confessed (Comp. of Hex. p. 356) that he had no longer much faith in his former attempt. But Budde, in the Kurzer Hdcomm. (1897, p. xviii), still regards the observation as pertinent in spite of the difference of the two totals that are said to correspond with one another. But if a redactor of Jg had any thought of this correspondence, would he not have been capable of making it an exact one?

Hence the approximate character can be emphasized only in the case of the number 40 and its actual double (80) or its half (20). This is commended further by the following three considerations. The number 40 occurs with relatively great frequency as a round number (see the series of passages cited above). Further, the 480 years which, according to 1 K 6^1, elapsed between the Exodus and the beginning of the building of the temple (in the 4th year of Solomon's reign), are probably a product of 40 × 12. Again, the length of a generation (דּוֹר, Arab. dârun, lit. περίοδος) was probably, in the view of the Israelites, 40 years. For a generation, with few exceptions, was doomed to die in the wilderness (Nu $14^{22f.}$ 26^{64}), and this sojourn in the wilderness lasted for (about) 40 years (Nu $14^{33f.}$ $20^{22ff.}$ 32^{13} $33^{38f.}$, Dt 2^7 8^2 29^5, Jos 5^6 etc.).† Besides, Bertheau (Comm.^{2} p. xvi) rightly observes that in 1 Ch 5^{29-34} 6^{35-38} twelve generations are counted from Aaron to Ahimaaz the contemporary of David and Solomon. Kessler (Chronol. iudicum, etc. p. 12) remarks that no one can prove that twelve generations actually lived in the period from Moses to Solomon. But all we need is proof that Israelitish tradition ever reckoned twelve generations between a contemporary of Moses and a contemporary of Solomon, and this tradition is actually found in 1 Ch 5^{29-34} and 6^{35-38}. Consequently, it can be maintained with sufficient certainty that the chronology of the Bk. of Jg is a product of secondary combination in so far as the approximate number 40 (3^{11} 5^{31} 8^{28} 13^1), its double (3^{30}), and its half (4^3 15^{20} ‖ 16^{31}), are employed as factors in this chronology (so, essentially, Bertheau, p. xiii; Oettli, p. 212; Moore, p. xli f.). Further, it appears to the present writer that the chronological problem of the Bk. of Jg has to be examined in the following direction:—(α) The number 480 (1 K 6^1) is an uncertain total, and cannot be used as the standard in estimating the chronological data of Jg. (β) The round numbers of Jg are really to be treated only as approximate figures equally with the 300 years which Jephthah (Jg 11^{26}) says elapsed between

* Budde (p. xx): 'die beiden Zahlen 18, die 23 und die 22 stellen leichte Abweichungen von 20 dar'; but even he (p. xviii) derives 'die von der Regel so weit abweichende Zahl 6 für Jephthah (12^7) aus einer Vorlage.'

† The round character of the number 40 has been contested by J. C. A. Kessler (Chronologia iudicum et primorum regum, 1882) in the words, 'fides historica numeri 40 annorum non dubia est; nam sæpius huius spatii partes commemorantur et in eo singuli anni vel menses numerantur: Dt 2^{14}, 2 S 5^5, 1 K 2^{11}, 1 Ch 29^{27}, Ex 19^1, Nu 10^{11} 20^1, Dt 1^3' (p. 12). But Röckerath (Bibl. Chronologie, 1865, p. 22) already remarks that the round numbers were partly supplied in place of numbers that had become indistinct, and in any case it is inadmissible to suppose that a period of 40 years could have emerged so frequently by accident.

Israel's entrance into Canaan and his own days. Hitherto no attempt (cf. Seder olam rabba, ed. Meyer, p. 384 f.) that has been made has succeeded in bringing this number 300 into harmony with the other chronological statements of Jg. (γ) Both the principles just stated appear to the present writer to be more correct than the view (Nöldeke, Untersuch. z. Kritik d. AT, p. 173 f.; Moore, p. xli; Budde, p. xviii) that an author of the Bk. of Jg did not count the years of foreign domination ($3^{8.14}$ 4^3 6^1 10^8: 8+18+20+7+18=71 years) in addition to the years of rest, or the years of the hero who destroyed this foreign domination. This is at least not the meaning of the text of $3^{8\text{-}10}$; for after it has been mentioned that the Israelites served Cushan-rishathaim 8 years (3^8), it is added by means of an imperf. consec. 'and (hence) the Israelites cried unto the LORD, and the LORD raised up a deliverer, etc. (v.^{9}), and (hence) the land had rest 40 years, and Othniel died' (v.^{10}). The exegesis which reckons the 8 years of the foreign domination to the years of Othniel, which, it is self-evident, could begin only with the shaking off of the foreign yoke, is not in harmony with the text although it was a favourite with Jewish interpreters.* As little is it the case in 3^{14}, for the 18 years during which Israel groaned under the yoke of the Moabites cannot be included in the 80 years of rest (3^{30}). Nor are the 20 years of oppression (4^3) reckoned among the 40 years of rest (5^{31}). As little are the 7 years of invasions by the Midianites (6^1) reckoned among the 40 years during which the Midianites could not lift up their heads, and the country was in quietness; and these forty years are expressly identified with the days of Gideon (8^{28}). And was Jephthah chosen to be leader at the beginning of the 18 years of the oppression (10^8)? Then he must have long deferred his victory; and yet the text ($11^{4\text{ff.}\ 12\text{ff.}}$) presents the choice, the attack, and the victory of Jephthah as a continuous succession of incidents. Budde, indeed, says (p. xviii) that 'R^p has not counted the times of the foreign domination as elements in the chronology of his people.' But whence does he derive this conclusion? From the circumstance that in the case of the 'minor Judges' only the length of their office is noted; and that in $10^{1.3}$ $12^{8.11.13}$ we find 'after him.' But it is by no means an unquestionable fact that this 'after him' is meant to indicate an 'unbroken' succession. In any case it is a false generalizing from the data to attribute to the author of $10^{1.3}$ $12^{8.11.13}$ the opinion that 'during the whole period of the judges, judge followed judge in direct succession.' And because of this opinion is he to be supposed to have rejected the years of foreign domination and to have replaced these by the years of the minor judges? As the text ($3^{8\text{-}10.\ 14}$ etc., see above) shows, he has neither rejected the one nor substituted the other, for the sum of the years of the foreign domination (71) and the sum of the years of the so-called minor Judges (70) are different. (δ) As little ground is there for the assumption that the Bk. of Jg meant several incidents to be synchronistic. The words 'he (the LORD) sold them into the hands of the Philistines and into the hands of the children of Ammon' (10^7), give only an appearance of right to the view that the invasion of the Ammonites ($10^{8\text{ff.}}$ $11^{4\text{ff.}}$) and that of the Philistines ($13^{1\text{ff.}}$) occurred at the same time. But in truth it is recorded in the Bk. of Jg that the attack of the Ammonites which, following the statement of 10^7, is described in $10^{8\text{ff.}}$ $11^{4\text{ff.}}$, was warded off by Jephthah, that then came the judges Ibzan, etc. ($12^{8\text{ff.}}$), and that the people of Israel on account of new unfaithfulness were oppressed by the invasion of the Philistines. For the text reads, 'and the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the LORD, and the LORD delivered them into the hand of the Philistines' (13^1). Hence it is not the thought expressed in Jg itself (13^1) that is seized by Kessler, who, following Keil and others, again assigns to the same date the incidents related in 10^8–12^{15} and those spoken of in $13^{1\text{ff.}}$ (Chronol. iudicum, p. 29 f.). Now, the question might still arise, whether the order of events in the period of the judges was better known to the sources of the Bk. of Jg or to M. Vernes, who (p. 199) reproaches the 'auteur du livre des Juges' with having placed 'bout à bout des évènements qui ne s'enchaînent en aucune façon.' The present writer for his part prefers the order indicated in the Bk. of Judges.

(γ) Little as the round numbers of the Bk. of Jg positively point to a very late date, this is as little the case with the expression עַד יוֹם גְּלוֹת הָאָרֶץ (18^{30}). It may indeed be somewhat bold to assume הארן as the original reading, and to find in this passage an allusion to the גלה which indirectly is asserted of the 'aron, 'ark (of the covenant)' in 1 S $4^{21\text{f.}}$. It is true that it is not precisely ארץ of which the verb גלה is elsewhere predicated. This may, however, be accidental, for גלה has for subject not only the people (Is 5^{13}, Am 1^5), or Israel (Am $7^{11.17}$, 2 K 17^6 etc.), or persons in general (2 K 24^{24}, Mic 1^6, Ezk 12^3 etc.), but also Judah (Jer 13^{19}, La 1^3, 2 K 25^{21} ‖ Jer 52^{27} etc.), or a city, as גלגל (Am 5^5) or Jerusalem (Jer 1^3) or Damascus (2 K 16^9).—Besides the period during which the descendants of Moses officiated as priests in Dan, in v.^{31} a period is named of the worship of Micah's graven image, namely, the period of the existence of the temple in Shiloh. There is no mention of this temple after the time of Eli (1 S 14^3). In Ps 78^{60} the overthrow of Shiloh is placed before the choosing of Mt. Zion (v.^{68}), and from Jer $7^{12.14}$ it cannot be inferred that it was laid waste during the Assyrian wars (Moore, p. 369). Hence there is not such a serious departure from reality when in Diḳdûḳê ha-ṭĕʿamîm, § 70, it is said, 'on the day when Eli died, Shiloh was laid waste' (יום שָׁמֵת עלי חרבה שילה).—What is now the meaning of the remark in v.^{31}, and why are the two dicta of v.^{30} and v.^{31} placed side by side? In v.^{31} it must be intended to say that the end of the cult of the graven image of Micah stood in a causal connexion with the destruction of the sanctuary of J" at Shiloh, and the two notes of v.$^{30\text{f.}}$ would best harmonize if there was a reference to the destruction of the Shiloh sanctuary also in the words עד גלות וג׳ (v.^{30}). Now, let it be observed that Eli died when he heard that the ark of the covenant was taken (1 S $4^{19\text{-}22}$). But if, in spite of all this, it remains uncertain whether in Jg 18^{30} a statement which raised scruples was changed into an easier reading (cf. the interpolated נ in v.^{81}),* yet the expression 'until the day of the exile of the land' does not point further down than the time when Tiglath-pileser 'took Kedesh, and Hazor, etc., and Galilee, all the land of Naphtali, and carried them captive to Assyria' (2 K 15^{29}), i.e. about B.C. 734. And if this is the meaning of v.^{30}, then from the period of time indicated in v.^{30} a shorter period is selected in v.^{81}. For it was desired to add how long the cult of the graven image of Micah lasted, because this image was a principal subject in the preceding narrative.

* The words 'and after him (Joshua) [was raised up] Othniel, the son of Kenaz, forty years [but] subtract from them the eight years of the oppression under Cushan-rishathaim' (Seder olam rabba, ch. xii.), contradict the text of OT. But it is a very interesting circumstance that Seder o. r. does not always adopt the same exegesis. It does so with the 18 years of 3^{14}, and of the 40 years of 5^{31} two years are subtracted for the oppression of Jabin and Sisera (שני שעבוד ליבין וסיסרא ב׳שנים); but after the mention of the 40 years of Gideon it is expressly said 'and (=but) the 7 years of Midian (6^1) are not reckoned to them' (ושבע שני מדין לא עלו מחובן). Further, how is one to explain the statement, 'from Othniel to the death of Samson are 324 years'? (Diḳ. ha-ṭĕʿamîm, § 70 מעתניאל עד שָׁמֵת שמשון שלוש מאות ועשרים וארבע שנים). The numbers 40+80+40+40+23+22+6+7+10+8+20 ($3^{11.30}$ 5^{31} 8^{28} $10^{2\text{f.}}$ $12^{7\text{f.}\ 11.14}$ 15^{20} ‖ 16^{31}) make up a total of only 296 years. But if 28 be added, the number 324 is obtained. May we perhaps have recourse to the 28 years which in Seder olam rabba (ch. xii.) are attributed to Joshua? At the end of § 70 of Diḳdûḳê comes the statement, 'from Othniel to the rise of Eli as judge were 324 years.' But this also occasions an insoluble problem. Neither of these dicta of Jewish tradition is either noticed or explained in any of the helps accessible to the present writer (Biblia Heb. et Rabbin.; Seder olam rabba; Jewish and modern commentaries).

(δ) In the middle of the second episode of Jg (chs. 19–21), where, e.g., we read 'Jebus which is Jerusalem' (19^{10}, cf. 2 S $5^{6ff.}$), Wellhausen (Comp. 233 ff.) and some others discover a passage of very late origin, namely, 20^{1}–21^{14}. What opinion are we to form of this? Now, in any case, this section must have displaced another narrative, for between the end of ch. 19 and 21^{15} there is a lacuna. But common action on the part of the Israelites was not impossible shortly after the death of Joshua. Let us consider, in addition to what has been said above (6 d, δ), the story of the building of an altar beside Jordan (Jos $22^{10ff.}$). Was this not a protest on the part of the Israelites settled on the east of Jordan against the idea of separation from their nation? And does the unity of the Israelites, which shows itself in 1 S $7^{2ff.}$ $8^{4ff.}$ 11^{3} ('that we may send messengers unto all the coasts of Israel'), etc., ever appear as a new phenomenon? The present writer believes that there are more traces of the unity of ancient Israel than are wont at present to be recognized by some scholars. Were there not 'elders' in Israel before Samuel? (1 S $8^{4ff.}$). Could these not then assemble themselves on account of the unheard of scandal perpetrated by a Benjamite city (Jg 20^{1}), as readily as in connexion with the choice of a king? (1 S 8^{4a}). It is quite true the expression mishkab zakhar (cf. 'that hath not lain by man') is found only in Nu $31^{17f.}$ and Jg $21^{11f.}$; but this is no proof of the late origin of the latter verse, for the expression in question had very probably also an earlier existence. Hence the judgment of the present writer is that not the section 20^{1}–21^{14} as a whole, but only single elements in it bear a secondary character. Such elements are, above all, the round numbers like 400,000 (20^{17}), and there is no department where hyperbole more readily comes in than the department of numbers. We do not believe that tradition required many centuries—for Budde's R^{p} wrote 'perhaps about the year 400' (p. xvi)—in order to create these figures.

(ε) Only legend, and not mythology, has played a rôle in the filling out of the history of Samson. Traces of the so-called 'Folk-lore' are probably to be found, e.g., in the thirty men (14^{19}), the 300 jackals (15^{4}), and the 1000 men (v.$^{15f.}$) whom he slew with the jawbone of an ass. Nay, it is not improbable that this exploit of Samson and the name Ramath-leḥi, i.e. 'height of jaw,' are connected with each other. Rather may this deed of Samson's have been simply placed here, for the localizing activity of popular tradition shows itself elsewhere, or the narrative of the deed may even have been occasioned by the name of the place. The same is probably the case with the story of 'En-haḳḳôrē ($15^{18f.}$), in which the two homonyms ḳôrē', 'partridge,' and ḳôrē', 'caller,' appear to be mixed up. But, all the same, the Samson narratives are no product of mythology. The mythological explaining away of the person of Samson is discountenanced even by M. Vernes (Hist. juive, p. 238 f.); and as we have quoted from him several statements which appear to be unfounded, it is but right that we should quote a passage of which we can thoroughly approve. He says, 'l'interprétation mythologique de l'histoire de Samson échoue au port; sans compter qu'on ne sait trop comment y faire rentrer l'aventure du lion et de l'essaim d'abeilles, des chacals, de la mâchoire, de la porte de Gaza, c'est-à-dire ce qui précède les ruses et le succès de Dalila, le Samson du dernier épisode ne saurait être tenu pour le jeune soleil du printemps. S'il se sert, en effet, du retour de sa vigueur pour triompher de ses adversaires (les ténèbres, l'hiver ?), il succombe lui-même sous cet effort, et si les deux piliers du temple doivent être tenus pour les colonnes d'Hercule, elles sont mises à une très mauvaise place.'

7. THE AUTHOR OF THE BOOK.—The author of Jg is not named in the book itself. In the Talmud (Baba bathra 14^{b}) it is said, 'Samuel wrote (or edited [the sense of the verb kāthab is examined in König's Einleitung, p. 445]) his book and the Bk. of Jg and the Bk. of Ruth' (cf. Marx-Dalman, Traditio rabbinorum veterrima, p. 14). Similarly in Diḳdûḳê ha-ṭĕ'amîm, p. 57, it is said, שמואל הנביא זכרו לברכה כתב ספרו וספר שופטים ורות. But the tradition which becomes fixed in Baba bathra 14 f. is of such late origin, and contains such absolutely impossible elements (see the whole passage in König's Einleitung, p. 445 f.), that on these grounds alone no weight can be attached to it. But it is further shown by the above (No. 6) discussion to be an impossible position.

8. THE SPIRIT OF THE BOOK AND ITS PLACE IN THE HISTORY OF REVELATION.—Of more importance is it to examine the spirit that pervades the Bk. of Jg, to draw the picture which, framed in this book, exhibits to us a momentous period in the development of Israel. What are the leading features of this picture?

(a) The period of the judges was a time of local settlement and physical self-assertion on the part of Israel. When this people had shaken off the Egyptian yoke—which the Israelites can never have invented as a factor in their history—and were on the point of conquering the homeland of their forefathers, they encountered a uniformly violent opposition. Nevertheless, it is unquestionable that the Israelites under Joshua's leadership gained some fundamental victories. The positive tradition to this effect (Jos 6–11) is not upset by any statement to the contrary effect.

The story of the defeat of the northern Canaanites (Jos 11^{10-14}) may contain some natural hyperboles (e.g. 'neither left they any to breathe'), but when these are set aside, the narrative is not set aside. Further, the statements, 'nevertheless the children of Israel expelled not the Geshurites,' etc. (Jos 13^{13} $15^{13-19.\ 63}$ 16^{10} 17^{11-18} $18^{3ff.}$ $23^{4ff.}$), and the parallel statements of Jg $1^{19ff.}$ presuppose that the foundation was laid for the conquest of Canaan, otherwise they would have neither motive nor meaning. These statements add nothing but this, that in the time of Joshua, within the conquered kingdoms, many districts still retained their independence. The interposing of these sentences shows also in what sense the partition of the land is to be understood (Jos $13^{1ff.}$). The territories which were assigned to the different tribes are thought of not as places of quiet possession, but rather as meant to be completely subdued. The sense of Jos 13^{1-13} etc., is not that 'la terre promise est considérée comme une table rase' (M. Vernes, Essais bibliques, p. 297). Finally, neither in Jos 14^{6-15} nor in Jg $1^{1ff.}$ is the idea contained that the different tribes of Israel only in an isolated fashion made their attacks upon Canaan (Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 1890, p. 84, Hdcomm. 1897, p. 2). Budde himself admits (ad loc.) 'the remote possibility' that in Jg 1^{22} 'a short word about Ai' has fallen out. This 'word about Ai,' however, has not fallen out, nor was it a 'short' one (cf. Jos $7^{5ff.}$ 8^{1-29}). It is a groundless assertion that the record of Jg 1 'excludes' the narrative of the Bk. of Jos, and that the Jg narrative is the 'older' (Budde, 1897, p. 2. Charles Piepenbring [Hist. 1898, p. 69] accepts but does not prove this thesis). If the narrative of Jg $1^{1a\beta b.\ 2f.\ 5-7}$ etc. (Budde, 1897, p. xxii), had been the older and the only correct one (Budde, p. 2), how then could Judah speak of 'his lot'? (1^3). 'The narrative, according to v.^{3}, presupposes an earlier division by lot of the yet unconquered land,' as Budde himself (p. 1) has to notice; and Charles Piepenbring says (p. 75) on Jos $18^{2-6.\ 8-10}$: 'Nous y rencontrons une nouvelle preuve qu'on assigna d'avance, par le sort, aux différentes tribus, le territoire que chacune devait conquérir'; cf. the words of Budde on Jg 18^1 'es ist Dan wohl ein Gebiet zugefallen, aber es hat sich nicht darin behaupten können, und dass dieses nicht blosse Theorie ist, beweisen die danitischen Reste in den südlichen Wohnsitzen, die uns in der Samsongeschichte begegnen.' A positive representation that Canaan was thus divided is also implied in other passages of Jg 1. Finally, the 'older' narrative contained in Jg 1 is pronounced to be also the 'historically more credible' (Budde. p. 2). But is it, in point of fact, probable that the tribes of Israel, which under Joshua's lead crossed the Jordan, should not have attacked with their whole force the common foe, in order to inflict upon him some decided defeats? To what end, then, is the narrative (Nu $32^{28ff.}$, Dt 3^{18-20}, Jos 1^{12-16} 22^{1-6}) invented of how the tribes of Reuben, etc., which had their settlements east of the Jordan, crossed this river with the other Israelites, and did not return until the opposition of the western Canaanites was—essentially—broken? Joshua led the host only until the conquest of Jericho (Jos ^{6}; so Budde, p. 1). Did he, then, withdraw from the leadership of Israel? This is 'historically credible.' But if this was really the case, why will Budde (p. 11) substitute 'and Joshua was with them' for the traditional 'and Jahweh was with them'? (Jg 1^{22}). And if the existence of Joshua was assumed in the narrative of Jg 1, would he have been mentioned in this passim fashion?

* The sentence 'the foundations of heaven moved' (2 S 22^{8}) is changed into 'the foundations of the hills moved' (Ps 18^{7}). See, in general, regarding such alterations of parallel texts, König's Einleitung, pp. 76 f., 82 ff.

The truth lies in the middle position, and this true relation of things is exhibited in Jos and Jg; in spite of the foundation-laying victories gained under the lead of Joshua over the inhabitants of Canaan, some centuries were still needed to make the Israelites complete masters of Canaan (Jg $1^{19.\ 21}$ etc.).

(b) The need for external or political conflict was coupled with the task of spiritual self-assertion on the part of Israel against the genius of the Canaanitish nation. The period that followed the migration to Canaan was for the Hebrews the time of the severest struggle of ideas. For it was then that the danger was greatest that Israel should lose the consciousness of her uniqueness, seeing that many tribes with other conceptions and ideas dwelt in her midst. Cf. on this contrast, e.g. Pietschmann, Gesch. der Phön. p. 292 f.; Niebuhr, Gesch. des ebr. Zeitalters, p. 317 ff.; Winckler, Gesch. Isr. p. 133^1; Wildeboer, Jahvedienst en Volksreligie in Israël, 1898, p. 10 ff. But when Piepenbring (Hist. etc. 1898, p. 96) remarks, 'au moment où les Hébreux s'emparèrent de la Palestine, les Cananéens leur étaient bien supérieurs sous le rapport de la culture,' he must be thinking merely of outward culture, such as the art of building cities, the art of war, etc.

During this period the great matter was to defend the heritage of religious ideas and moral principles to which Israel had fallen heir (see above, 6 d, β, δ). The men who were then called to deliver the people belonged to the category of true souls by whom the most important prerogatives of the Jahweh religion were maintained. Then did Gideon defend the monolatry of Jahweh against the adoration of the Canaanite Baal ($6^{11ff.}$). The same hero kept unimpaired the principle (8^{23}) that Israel was under the rule only of a heavenly king (Jahweh, Ex 15^{18}). He pre-eminently exhibits the characteristic which ben-Sirach attributes to the judges when he says, καὶ οἱ κριταὶ, ἕκαστος τῷ αὐτοῦ ὀνόματι, ὅσων οὐκ ἐξεπόρνευσε ἡ καρδία, καὶ ὅσοι οὐκ ἀπεστράφησαν ἀπὸ Κυρίου, εἴη τὸ μνημόσυνον αὐτῶν ἐν εὐλογίαις, κ.τ.λ. (Sir $46^{11f.}$). Then was the conscience of the nation of Israel sufficiently awake to stir them up to energy when danger threatened that the Canaanite immorality (Gn $9^{23.\ 26b}$ $19^{5ff.}$ 34^{2b}, Lv 18^{25} etc.) might gain a footing in Israel (Jg 19^{30} 20^{6b}).

True, indeed, all the acts of the Israel of those days cannot bear to be tried by the standard of an enlightened humanity, or the ideal of evangelical Christianity. We shudder at the cutting off of thumbs and great toes (Jg 1^6). But not only were the Athenians once guilty of the same conduct towards Æginetan prisoners (Ælian, Var. Hist. ii. 9), but even the Christian Abyssinians of our own day are given to this terrible practice (cf. Flad, Zwölf Jahre in Abessinien, etc.). Moreover, in the pre-Christian history of Divine revelation, stages of progress are not wanting; cf. e.g. on the history of prophecy (1 S 9^9), or the Divine name (Ex $6^{2f.}$, 1 S 1^3, Is 1^4, Hos 2^{18}), or the idea of retaliation (Ex 20^5, Jer 31^{29}, Ezk 18^{20}). Although then a Deborah had not advanced to the stage of an Isaiah, and although a Samson (cf. on the Nazirites, Am 2^{12}) did not stand upon the same plane as the Sermon on the Mount (Jg 16^{28} compared with Mt 5^{44}), yet the Bk. of Jg stands, not without right, in the series of the nĕbi'îm (Diḳdûḳê, § 70, etc.). This book is a monument of that Divine Providence which sustained the people of Israel, so that they maintained their national existence, and during a time of the strongest temptations kept safe their religious-moral ideals, which had a most important end to serve in pointing to the perfect religion and morality.

JUDGING (Ethical).—The practice of judging, against which we have so many warnings in the NT, consists not so much in the characterizing of particular actions or modes of life, as in making these the basis for a sweeping, and, in some cases, a final verdict on the character of those to whom they are rightly or wrongly attributed. The warnings are given in the interests both of the critic and the criticized. The practice is equally hurtful to both, and therefore if it is not absolutely condemned, it is surrounded by so many safeguards and limitations as to be practically forbidden. On the one hand it is an infringement of the royal law (Ja 2^{13}), on the other, it stands in the way of that self-criticism which is necessary to amendment of morals and progress in religion (Mt 7^{3}). The chief objection to judging, however, is that it must be based on partial knowledge; we are necessarily ignorant of the inner life, the motives and principles of other men; we are not acquainted either with the antecedent conditions of their actions, or the possibilities of justification, or progress, or amendment, that their future may contain. This is the position taken up by Jesus Christ in opposition to Jewish legalists. He declared that the latter judged according to appearance (Jn 7^{24}), according to the flesh (Jn 8^{15}). As their religion consisted in the performance of certain prescribed duties, and the avoidance of outward offences, they had a rough and ready standard by which to estimate character. Christ and St. Paul had a more righteous because more complete standard; they took into account the inner thoughts and motives, and, knowing the complexity of these, deliberately refrained from judging, even where the outward evidence seemed absolutely convincing (Jn 8^{11}, 1 Co 4^{5}). One last motive in the prohibition of judging must not be overlooked. It was necessary to exercise patience and forbearance, not only in the interests of the individual, but in those of the Church. This is at least indirectly taught in the Parable of the Tares (Mt 13^{24}), which cannot be limited exclusively to ecclesiastical discipline, and it is a prominent motive with St. Paul. It appears especially in his treatment of the 'strong' and 'weak' parties in Rome (Ro 14), and of the rival possessors of gifts in Corinth (1 Co 13). In one word, while self-judgment is enjoined, the judgment of others is discountenanced throughout the NT. J. MILLAR.

JUDGMENT.—1. The truth that God will come to the world for judgment is part of the burden of OT prophecy. The rule of God, partially realized over Israel in the days of the prophets, is destined to be made perfect, and it is to extend over all the nations of the earth. This consummation will necessitate a 'day of the Lord,' i.e. a judgment of the faithless in the chosen nation and of the heathen (Is 2^{12}, Jl 1^{15} 2^{1} etc.); but Israel will be saved and enjoy the blessings of a new and everlasting covenant (Is 61^{8}, Jer $31^{31\text{ff.}}$ etc.). See Day of the Lord, under ESCHATOLOGY, vol. i. pp. 735 ff.

2. When in later times the belief in a resurrection of the dead was developed (Dn 12^{2}), till in the time of Christ it was firmly rooted in the minds of all but the Sadducees, our Lord revealed a great universal judgment of the living and the dead, the issue, represented in figurative and therefore indeterminate speech, being now the establishment of the Messianic kingdom on earth, now the complete transformation of all that at present appears, and the advent of new heavens and a new earth. The people of Christ will be called in the judgment to an everlasting participation in the glories of His heavenly kingdom, and His enemies will have the sentence of eternal condemnation pronounced on them (Mt $13^{36\text{ff.}\ 47\text{ff.}}$ 25, Mk 13, Lk 21).

3. In accordance with the spiritual nature of the kingdom of God, and with the fact that it is even now begun on earth, we find, especially in the Johannine writings, that the judgment in one aspect or stage of it is a present act. For judgment Christ is come into this world (Jn 9^{39}). There is an actual separation of men in progress here and now, and to a great extent they themselves may see that there is nothing arbitrary in the awards which are made; the spiritual blessings bestowed on the one hand and the mental sufferings or want endured on the other, commend themselves to the enlightened conscience as just and inevitable. Christ is as a present light in the world, discerning between the souls of men, attracting and gladdening some, those who do truth, and repelling others who do evil, multiplying for them the pains of darkness, hatred, and sin (Jn $3^{18\text{ff.}}$ 12^{31}). The former are called even now to everlasting life (3^{36} 6^{47}, 1 Jn 3^{14}), and should know that they have it (1 Jn 5^{13}); the latter know not life, but abide in death, and have an immediate experience of the wrath of God (Jn 3^{36}, 1 Jn $3^{14\text{f.}}$ 5^{12}).

4. This judgment, which is in progress now, is destined to be perfected, though there is necessarily obscurity as to the future existence. In the last assize Christ will be the Judge as before (Mt $25^{31\text{ff.}}$, Ac 10^{42} 17^{31}, 2 Co 5^{10}, 2 Ti 4^{1}). Mankind will all appear before His judgment-seat. The righteous will thus have in His presence a perfect vision and possession of the goodness they have chosen in Him (2 Ti 4^{8}, 1 Jn 3^{2}); the wicked will see with dismay into what an abyss of sin and woe they have fallen (Rev 1^{7}). It may be said men will hereafter judge themselves. Those who are unlike Christ will find themselves as such to be separate from Him. The two classes of people are parted because they have acquired distinct natures like the sheep and the goats (Mt $25^{31\text{ff.}}$). The future judgment will thus be 'just,' determined by what people made of themselves when they were in the body (2 Co 5^{10}). Or the books will be opened, and men will be judged out of those things which are written in the books, according to their works (Rev 20^{12}). The character of each person is a 'book' or record, preserving, in moral and spiritual effects, all that he has been and done and loved; and in the judgment these books will be 'opened,' or each man's character will be manifested as the light of Christ falls upon it. The people of Christ themselves receive different awards at the last, according to what their life has been (Lk $19^{11\text{ff.}}$, 1 Co $3^{12\text{ff.}}$). A test like fire will try every believer's work. Some have acquired a close likeness to Christ by their lives of true holiness and love; and the greater the likeness, the more He will be known, loved, and enjoyed, or the richer they themselves will be. G. FERRIES.

JUDGMENT HALL is the AV translation in Jn $18^{28.\ 33}$ and Ac 23^{35} of the Greek πραιτώριον, though this word contains no reference to judging. In the RV it is rendered 'palace' or 'prætorium.' See PRÆTORIUM.

JUDGMENT SEAT.—The usual word employed for this in the NT is βῆμα (Mt 27^{19}, Jn 19^{13}, Ac $18^{12.\ 16\text{f.}}$ $25^{6.\ 10.\ 17}$, Ro 14^{10}, 2 Co 5^{10}), properly a 'tribune.' Two of these were provided in the law-courts of Greece, one for the accuser and one for the defendant (cf. Liddell and Scott's Greek Lexicon under βῆμα), but in the NT the word is used of the official seat (tribunal) of the Roman judge. The word κριτήριον used in Ja 2^{6} occurs also in 1 Co $6^{2.\ 4}$, where it is translated in RVm by 'tribunals.' See, further, art. GABBATHA.

JUDITH (יְהוּדִית 'Ιουδίν, 'Ιουδίθ, 'Ιουδείθ).—1. A wife of Esau, daughter of Beeri the Hittite (Gn 26^{34}) (cf. Gn 36^{2}, and see OHOLIBAMAH).

2. Heroine of the BOOK OF JUDITH; daughter of Merari, of the tribe of Simeon (8^{1} [cf. Nu 1^{6}] 9^{2}); widow of Manasses of the same tribe. See following article. F. C. PORTER.

JUDITH, BOOK OF.—1. CONTENTS.—The story of the Book of Judith in the LXX is as follows :—Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians in Nineveh, in his 12th year made war against Arphaxad king of the Medes, summoning all nations to his aid; and in his 17th year was victorious and destroyed the Median capital, Ecbatana. The next year he sent Holofernes with 132,000 men to take vengeance on the western lands which had refused to come to his help. Holof. laid waste the lands of those who resisted, and required the destruction of their sanctuaries and gods, and the sole worship of Nebuchadnezzar. The Jews feared for Jerusalem and the temple, just reconsecrated after their recent return from exile. Joakim, the high priest, and the Sanhedrin resolved upon resistance, and ordered the fortifying of certain mountain towns of Samaria which commanded the entrance into Judæa from the north. The people gave themselves to fasting and prayer. An Ammonite general, Achior, warned Holofernes, with an appeal to history, that the God of heaven protected this people unless they sinned against him, and for his counsel was delivered to the enemy. Bethulia was the point of attack, and upon the issue of its siege depended the fate of the Jewish land and religion. The three elders of the city, Ozias, Chabris, and Charmis, yielded to the demand of the famished people and promised surrender after five days. Judith, a rich young widow of the tribe of Simeon, confident of the righteousness of her people, believed that God would deliver them by her hand. Prepared by prayer, and protected by strict observance of legal rites, she made her way to Holofernes, predicted the speedy destruction of her people because she foresaw that in their hunger they would eat unclean and consecrated food, captivated him by her deceits and by her beauty, and beheaded him as he lay in a drunken stupor after a banquet in her honour. 'Her beauty took his soul prisoner; the scimitar passed through his neck.' She returned with the head to Bethulia. Achior recognized it, and at sight of it was converted to Judaism. Confusion and fear fell upon the leaderless army of the Assyrians, and the Jews slaughtered them in their flight and gained great spoils. Judith was richly rewarded and honoured, and in a song celebrated the deliverance. Peace reigned during her long life of 105 years, and for a long time after.

2. TEXTS AND VERSIONS.—The LXX text exists in three recensions, (1) B A ℵ, etc., the ruling text; (2) cod. 58, to which Old Lat. and Syriac are closely related; (3) cod. 19, 108, similar to (2).

A Hebrew original is commonly accepted, not only on the ground of Hebraisms in language and ideas, but also because of errors of translation (see 1^{8} 2^{2} $3^{1. 8. 9. 10}$ 4^{3} 8^{21} $11^{7. 11}$ $16^{3. 17}$, Fritzsche, Ball). Origen, indeed, says that he learned from Jews that they did not possess Tobit and Judith even among their 'Apocrypha' (Ep. ad Afric. 13), and there are no allusions to Jth in the older rabbinical literature. Yet it does not follow that the later Jewish versions are retranslations from the Greek. If the story had an independent history among Jews it is historically important to trace it. Jerome is the first witness to a Heb. (Aram.) original, and his testimony deserves attention.

The Vulgate.—Jerome (Pref. to Jth.) says that the Hebrews had Jth among their Apocrypha, and reckoned it among histories. His Jth he affirms to be a translation of this 'Chaldee' version, which he regarded as the original. He put into Latin 'only those things which a sound understanding could find in the Chaldee words.' His work was indeed hastily done, in one night, and carelessly, 'aiming to give sense for sense rather than word for word.' Probably, as in the case of Tobit, an interpreter rendered the Chaldee into Hebrew, and Jerome dictated a Latin version of the Heb. to a scribe. He, of course, had the Old Lat. before him.

Jerome's testimony is commonly set aside, and it is assumed, after Fritzsche, that his modifications of the Old Lat. were mainly arbitrary, and that we can know nothing of his Chaldee text. Is this a just verdict? The Vulg., in comparison with the Old Lat. and Greek, omits many geographical details (e.g. LXX 2^{28} $3^{9. 10}$ $4^{4. 6}$ 15^{4}) and many concrete incidents (e.g. LXX 1^{13-16} 2^{7-10} $7^{6. 17-19. 32}$ $10^{2b. 3b. 9. 10b. 17. 18. 20. 22}$ $11^{3b. 4}$ $12^{3b. 15b}$ $14^{8. 9}$ 15^{11b} 16^{24b}, and parts of $8^{2. 3. 6. 29. 31}$ 9^{1} $13^{12. 13}$ $14^{2. 3. 11. 12}$ $15^{12. 13}$). Jth.'s achievement is made less sensuous and more simply religious in character (cf. LXX 10^{4} 11^{17} $12^{13. 15. 16}$). The deceptions are less bald (LXX 11^{5-7} 13^{3}). Homiletical additions are made (Vulg. 4^{10-13} 5^{11-15} 9^{6-8} 5^{16-19}, parts of 6^{12-21} 7^{19-22} 8^{21-26}). Changes such as these mark a secondary form of the story. But are they due to Jerome? Against that supposition it is to be argued, (1) that it was not his way to edit, but to translate; (2) that he did not in this case take time for such revision. It is therefore probable, apart from the confirmation of the Midrash, that even such deviations of Vulg. from LXX as these were due in the main to the Chaldee version. Still more probable is this in the few cases of additional concrete detail (Vulg. $7^{6. 7}$ 11^{11} 14^{9-12} 16^{31}).

Further, it is probable that in Jerome's Chaldee, Bethulia was identified with Jerusalem. The Vulg. never gives a clear description of the situation of Bethulia (cf. LXX $4^{6. 7}$ $6^{7. 10. 11}$ 7^{3} 8^{3} 10^{18} 11^{2}); it omits or changes all passages which clearly distinguish Bethulia and Jerusalem up to 15^{9} (cf. LXX $4^{6. 7}$ 11^{19} 11^{13} 15^{5}; and Vulg. omits LXX $8^{21. 22. 24}$ 9^{1b} $11^{14. 15}$). Further, Vulg. contains some positive suggestions that Jerusalem is the besieged city (Vulg. 3^{14} [cf. LXX $3^{9. 10}$] $7^{3. 6. 7. 9}$ 15^{4}; and Ozias is 'prince of Judah,' Vulg. 8^{34} 13^{23}). Only in 15^{9} and perhaps 16^{22-25} does Vulg. require the distinction. This suggests that the identification is not due to Jerome but to his source.

Hebrew Versions.—The story of Jth exists in several forms in Hebrew, none of them from early sources (Jellinek, Beth ha-Midrasch, i. 130–141, ii. 12 ff. [translations in Lipsius, Zeitschr. f. wissens. Theol. (1867), p. 337 ff.; Ball in Wace's Apocrypha, i. p. 252 ff.; Scholz, Commentar, 2 ed., Anhang i. and ii.]; Gaster, 'An unknown Hebrew Version of the History of Jth' [PSBA (1894), p. 156 ff.]). Lipsius distinguishes two forms of the story, one of which is closely related to our book. In both the scene is Jerusalem, the time that of the Maccabæan wars. Judith is in some way related to the Hasmonæan house. It is Nicanor who is beheaded; and the deed is celebrated in connexion with the Feast of Dedication. Names are often omitted, and details vary widely. The long Midrash (Jellinek, ii. 12–22; Scholz, Anhang i.) summarizes chs. 1–5 briefly, but in chs. 7–14 follows the Vulgate so closely that a relationship between them is certain.* The indications of the Chaldee original in the Vulg. pointed out above are strongly confirmed by this version. The phenomena would be explained by supposing that the Midrash is a later form of Jerome's Chaldee text, still less concrete, still more general and homiletical in character. Jerusalem entirely displaces Bethulia; Holofernes is king of Greece, and Nebuch. disappears; Chabris and Charmis are priests, Ozias is prince of Israel (= Vulg. 13^{23}), and Joakim is not mentioned.

The older Form.—Scholz argues for the greater originality of the Vulgate against the LXX, and of the short Midrash (Jellinek, i. 130 f.; Lipsius, p. 355 f.; Ball, p. 252 f.; Scholz, Anh. ii.) against the long. So Gaster confidently claims originality for his Hebrew version, and is followed with surprising unreserve by Cornill (Einl. in d. AT^{4}, p. 272). 'It seems undoubted that here lies the simplest and most original form of the story, out of which the Greek romance grew' (cf. Ginsburg). But is the simple always the original form of a story? Gaster's argument, 'If it were an abridged text, names and situations would have been retained, and only the rhetorical portions omitted,' substitutes the interests of a modern historian for those of an ancient story-teller. On the other hand, in favour of the greater originality of the LXX version, apart from the general fact of its far greater age, it is to be urged that it is more natural to suppose (1) that elaborate but not especially significant geographical and historical details, aside from the main story, should be omitted rather than added by later editors; (2) that edifying and rhetorical embellishments, speeches, prayers, etc., should be added, not omitted; (3) that references to the Maccabæan period should be added, not removed to give place to an impossible or an unknown historical setting; (4) that the scene should be changed from Bethulia to Jerusalem, not the reverse; (5) that Greeks should take the place of Assyrians as Israel's enemy; (6) that Jth.'s lineage should be changed from the tribe of Simeon to the family of the Hasmonæans, not the reverse; and perhaps that she should be first a widow, afterwards a maiden. (She is a widow in the long Midrash).

* Vulg. and Midrash agree, i.e., in omissions (LXX $7^{17-19. 32}$ $8^{21-23. 24b}$ 9^{1} $10^{9. 10f. 17a. 18. 22}$ $11^{4. 14}$ 12^{13b} $15^{3. 4. 5. 11b}$) and in additions (Vulg. 6^{16-18} $7^{6. 10. 11. 19-22}$ 8^{23-25} 9^{6-8} $10^{16-18. 20}$ $11^{12. 14. 15}$ 12^{6} $13^{6. 16. 23}$ $14^{7. 8-14}$), as well as in a multitude of lesser details.

The originality claimed for the LXX, or its Hebrew text, is, however, relative. The story may have had a long previous history.

3. PLACE OF THE STORY.—Bethulia (Betylua) cannot, in the LXX, mean Jerusalem. Its situation is so well described (in Northern Samaria, near Dothan, $4^{6.7}$; cf. $3^{9.10}$ 5^{1} $6^{7.10.11}$ $7^{3.18}$ 8^{3}) that few doubt its existence, though it is not otherwise known. 'To hold it for a pure fiction belongs to the gross fictions of the learned' (Fritzsche). 'He would not have built his story geographically in the air' (Schürer). It is as clearly distinguished from Jerusalem as words permit ($4^{2.6.7}$ $8^{21.24}$ 11^{19} $15^{5.8}$ $16^{18.20.21.23}$, cf. 8^{3}).

4. TIME OF THE STORY.—The historical setting of the LXX is impossible. Nineveh and Assyria fell 608 B.C. Nebuch., king of the Chaldæans in Babylon, destroyed Jerusalem in his 18th year (586), and died 562. The return from exile was not before 536, and the rebuilding of the temple was in 520–516. But the confusion of these events could hardly be due to ignorance. What Jew would not know the place of Nebuch. in relation to the Assyrians and to the Exile? It is possible that a copyist or translator put familiar biblical names in the place of names strange to him (Kaulen). It is also possible that the author used Nebuch. and the Assyrians as symbols, and that he meant to tell (1) no history at all but a story ('poem,' Luther), teaching that Judah is safe from all enemies if it keeps the law; or (2) future history prophetically set forth (an apocalypse, Scholz); or (3) present or recent history disguised under significant names. Thus Volkmar (1860) elaborately defended the equations: Nebuch.= Trajan, Nineveh=Rome (or Antioch), Medes= Parthians, Ecbatana=Nisibis, Holofernes=Lusius Quietus, etc. But the parallels are forced, and 'the arguments which place the Epistle of Clem. in the 1st cent. are a hundredfold stronger than those which place the Bk. of Jth in the second' (Lightfoot). More commonly the Maccabæan history is found veiled in our story. Ball suggests (not always consistently) that Nebuch.=Antiochus IV., Assyrians=Syrians, Holofernes= Nicanor, Arphaxad=Arsaces, Medes=Parthians, Jth=Judas, Bethulia=Jerusalem, Joakim=Alcimus, etc. He says, 'The Bk. of Jth is a free composition in the manner of the Haggada, principally based upon recollections of the facts of the heroic Judas, and more especially upon the facts related in 1 Mac 3^{27}–4^{61} 6^{1-7} 7^{26-50}, 2 Mac 9^{1-3} 10^{1-8} 15' (cf. Holtzmann, Neutest. Zeitgeschichte, 16). But the book does not readily yield to allegorical treatment. If it was written in the reign of Alexandra (B.C. 79–70) concerning the Maccabæan wars (Ball), why is the scene Bethulia, not Jerusalem? why are Judith and Ozias Simeonites? why should Judas and his exploits be so completely veiled in a book meant to glorify him and his house?

In fact, the indications of the Maccabæan age are of a general and doubtful character. The history 'points to a time when danger threatened not only the people but also its faith. . . . This reminds us of Daniel and the Maccabæan period' (Schürer). The ritualism of the book has some late marks (8^{6}). The high priest did not command Samaria (4^{4-6}; cf. $15^{5.8}$) until John Hyrcanus. Hellenistic cities were not independent after the Roman period. But, on the other hand, a writer may attempt to describe past conditions, and may make mistakes in doing so. This writer professes to tell of a time long past (14^{10} 16^{25}). That he wrote in the late Maccabæan or in the Roman period is quite probable. That he wrote primarily of the Maccabæan wars there is little sign.

Schürer now (Herzog^3, 1896) attaches importance to an early view, not mentioned in his HJP. 'The presupposed historical background answers more to the time of Artaxerxes Ochus. In one of his expeditions against Phœnicia and Egypt, about B.C. 350, he took also some Jewish prisoners, and among his most conspicuous generals in that campaign were the satrap (king) Holofernes of Cappadocia and the eunuch Bagoas.' Sulpicius Severus (Chron. ii. 14–16) first argued that Jth was an actual history of that time. Gutschmid (Jhb. f. Klas. Phil. 1863, p. 714) says, 'Severus seems to me to have proved as much as this, that the author of the Bk. of Jth actually meant to put her history in the time of Ochus' (so Nöldeke; Keil; W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 439; Wellhausen, Isr. u. Jüd. Gesch.^{3} 186). True, Holofernes was the title of other Cappadocian kings (Ball), but no other is known to have had anything to do with the Jews (Keil). True also that Bagoas is Persian for 'eunuch.' Yet force remains in the association of the two names in Jth and in this historical assault upon Judæa under the king of the great Eastern empire. It is possible, then, that the writer lived in the 1st cent. B.C. and wrote of an event three centuries earlier. It would be possible then to think of a century or more of peace after the deliverance (16^{25} (cf. ^{23})), and to speak of the return from exile as recent (4^{3} $5^{18.19}$). There was no king (5^{3}), and the Joiakim of Neh $12^{10.26}$ might possibly be supposed to have been high priest. See also a Persian custom in 2^{7}, and compare 16^{10}.

5. HISTORICAL CHARACTER.—The early chapters of the book contain historical and geographical impossibilities, and the later chapters much self-evident romance. With the geography of Palestine, however, the writer shows great familiarity.[*] The historicity of Bethulia does not prove the actuality of Judith and her deed, though it is a serious obstacle to the allegorical interpretation of the book and also to the supposition that the story originally concerned the Maccabæan age.[†]

---

[*] Schlatter thinks Jth gives a true picture not only of the geographical, but also of the political, social, and religious conditions of the isolated Jewish hill towns of Northern Samaria before the time of the Maccabees.

[†] Cf. the part played by Bethsura in 1 Mac.

Nevertheless 'it is possible that in some Palestinian town a popular festival was celebrated in memory of the heroic deed of a woman, and that after the true occasion was forgotten and had given place to a manifoldly embellished legend, a history was composed in honour of Judith, probably before the destruction of the temple' (Zunz, Gottesdienstliche Vorträge, p. 124). One is reminded of the little city besieged by a great king and delivered by a poor wise man (Ec $9^{14.\,15}$), perhaps also an incident of the Persian period.

Josephus is silent both as to the invasion of Ochus and as to Jth, and his silence speaks against the antiquity of the book and its firm place in the Greek Bible of the 1st century. The NT has no reference.* The earliest reference is in Clem. Rom. i. 55, where Judith is put before Esther as an example of womanly heroism. The book was therefore classical, probably scriptural, about A.D. 90 among Christians. That Jewish tradition should come to connect the story with the Maccabæan period is natural.

6. LITERARY CHARACTER.—The book is a work of literary skill, 'as a work of art quite perfect' (Ewald). 'The representation contains nothing diffuse, bombastic, forced, but is short, simple, natural, and betrays originality. . . . Appropriate, in part admirable, are the particular descriptions. . . . Extraordinarily successful is the song of praise at the close of the book. . . . I put it unhesitatingly by the side of the best poetical products of the Hebrew spirit' (Fritzsche, 127 f., 209).

7. RELIGIOUS AND ETHICAL TEACHINGS.—The religious ideas of the book are of the Pharisaic type, particularistic and legal. Patriotism centres in zeal for the temple ($4^{2.\,3.\,11\text{-}15}$ $8^{21.\,24}$ $9^{8.\,13}$; cf. 5^{19} 9^{1} 11^{13} $16^{18\text{-}20}$). Israel can suffer no harm unless it sin against God ($5^{17\text{-}21}$ $11^{10\text{-}19}$). The fatal sin might be the most excusable of ritual transgressions ($11^{12\text{ff.}}$), though Judith's confidence rests chiefly on the freedom of her race from idolatry ($8^{18\text{-}20}$). In the account of Judith's own piety the food laws (10^{5} $11^{12\text{-}15}$ $12^{1\text{-}9.\,19}$), fasts (8^{6}), washings ($12^{7.\,9}$), and prayer (9. 11^{17} 12^{8} $13^{4.\,5}$) are emphasized. Her persistent widowhood is praised (16^{22}; cf. $8^{4\text{-}8}$). Social virtues are wanting, except the freeing of her slave (16^{23}).† The Pharisaic union of determinism and freedom is to be observed. Salvation comes from God, and all is in accordance with His will ($8^{11\text{-}27}$ $9^{5\text{-}14}$ $16^{13\text{-}17}$). Yet it is not through angel or miracle, but through the wisdom and boldness of Judith that deliverance is wrought (cf. $8^{32\text{-}34}$ 10^{9} $15^{9.\,10}$). But she gets her strength by prayer (9. 12^{8} $13^{4.\,5}$), and the glory of God is greater because of the weakness of the means through which so great a triumph was achieved (9^{11} $16^{6.\,7.\,11.\,12}$). The absence of angels and miracles (cf. Tobit) and of future life and Messianic hope is to be noted. A proselyte is welcomed (14^{10}).

JULIA (Ἰουλία).—One of those greeted by St. Paul in Ro 16^{15} with Philologus, Nereus, Olympas, and others. It has been suggested that Philologus and Julia were husband and wife, and the others members of the family. The name was the commonest of all Roman female names, commonest of all among slaves of the imperial household, and nothing can be proved by it. The following inscription is interesting (CIL vi. 20416): D.M | IVLIAE NEREI · F · | CLAVDIAE.

A. C. HEADLAM.

JULIUS (Ἰούλιος).—The name of the centurion in whose custody St. Paul journeyed to Rome (Ac $27^{1.\,3}$). When it was determined that St. Paul with his companions should sail to Italy, he was delivered with his companions 'to a centurion named Julius of the Augustan cohort.' Throughout the voyage the centurion is represented as treating his prisoner with some kindness and distinction. He was allowed to go ashore and see his friends at Sidon. Although the centurion does not attend to the apostle's warnings at first (vv.$^{9.\,11}$), it is at his instigation that he orders the soldiers to cut away the boat (v.$^{31\text{f.}}$), and it is to save him that he prevents the soldiers from killing the prisoners (v.$^{42\text{f.}}$). On arrival at Rome, St. Paul was allowed to live by himself with the soldier who guarded him (Ac 28^{16}).

Two points in this narrative demand close attention, the Augustan cohort and the statement last made. We will take the latter first. There is an interesting variation of text. The best of the MSS (ℵABI) and Vulg. Pesh. Boh. read in Ac 28^{16} 'And when we entered into Rome, Paul was suffered to abide by himself with the soldier that guarded him.' This is adopted by WH and by Blass in his α text. The latter in his β text on the authority of HLP$^{\text{etc.}}$ Harcl.$^{\text{cor.}}$ Gig, reads, 'the centurion handed over the prisoners to the head of the camp, while Paul was allowed to remain by himself without the camp with the soldiers that guarded him.' The word translated 'head of the camp' is in Greek στρατοπεδάρχης, while the one representative of the Old Latin we have here reads principi peregrinorum. It must be remembered that D and most Old Latin authorities are defective in this place. A portion of this latter reading is found in the TR, and has always been interpreted as referring to the præfectus prætorio; stress has been laid on the singular, and it has been supposed necessarily to refer to a date before 62 while Burrhus filled the office alone. Prof. Mommsen tells us that neither the term nor the duty is consonant with Roman usage, and suggests another interpretation based primarily on the technical Latin word, which appears in the version princeps peregrinorum. In order to perfect the organization of the Roman army and the communications with the legions on the frontier, there was a body of troops detached from the foreign legions called frumentarii. At some date or other they were organized under a head of their own, and had a camp on the Cælian hill. It was called the castra peregrinorum, and the head of it the princeps castrorum peregrinorum or princeps peregrinorum. This is represented in the Greek apparently less correctly, or at least less technically, by στρατοπεδάρχης. To this body of messengers, constantly travelling backwards and forwards, it would be natural that prisoners should be entrusted, and there is evidence to that effect. It had been usual in the absence of evidence to refer this organization to the time of Hadrian, but Mommsen thinks it more probable that it dates from the time of Augustus, and would use the Acts for evidence to that effect.

But the question now arises — What is the authority of the text? for this may be a crucial instance of the value of the β text. How, on Blass's theory, did it come about that St. Luke substituted a vague phrase for the technical language he had previously employed? If his theory be incorrect, which reading is intrinsically likely to be altered? It has become the fashion to hint that the β reading is here correct; but it may be pointed out that the phrase which is most correct technically, that of the Latin MSS, is the work of a translator who, being a Roman, would presumably have more accurate knowledge than the original writer, giving precision in his translations by employing a technical word. Following that line of argument it might be suggested that perhaps here we have an instance in which the more precise text of β arose from the influence of the Latin version and possibly bilingual MSS. At any rate, the β text is here very definitely connected with Rome.

† The question of the morality of Judith's deed should not be discussed without reference to the existing state of war, and to such examples as Jael and Esther.

But what is the meaning of the σπεῖρα Σεβαστή? The cohortes of the Roman legion had no special designation, and therefore in this case we must have a cohort of auxiliary troops; and many such were named Augusta. But then we should have an auxiliary used for services for which, as far as we know, they were not employed. Mommsen seems to suggest a connexion with the cohors peregrinorum, although confessing that this name and that of the Italian band are still unsolved. Ramsay, starting from this suggestion, develops it as follows: 'But when we recollect (1) that Luke regularly uses the terms of educated conversation, not the strict technical terms; and (2) that he was a Greek who was careless of Roman forms or names, we shall not seek in this case to treat the Greek name (σπεῖρα Σεβαστή) as a translation of a correct Roman name; but we shall look for a body in the Roman service which was likely to be called "the troops of the Emperor" by the persons in whose society Luke moved at the time . . . we conclude, then, that "the troops of the Emperor" was a popular colloquial means of describing the corps of officer-couriers; and we thus gather from Acts an interesting fact, elsewhere unattested but in perfect conformity with the known facts' (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 315).

The conclusions of Professors Mommsen and Ramsay, which are almost always full of interest, are given with this warning, that a superstructure, however ingenious, is built on a slight foundation when it is based on a reading which on external grounds has no claim to acceptance, and may easily be a correction of the 2nd century introducing the precise phraseology and writing of the later date.

The attempt of Schürer (HJP I. ii. 53) to connect the Augustan band with a σπεῖρα Σεβαστηνῶν does not give any assistance to the problem, and is based on a confusion of ideas.

JUNIAS (or JUNIA).—In Ro 16^7 St. Paul greets Andronicus and Junias (or Junia); the name being in the accusative, the sex is not determined (Ἀνδρόνικον καὶ Ἰουνίαν). If masculine, the name is a shortened form of Junianus; if feminine, Junia is a common name. As has been pointed out under ANDRONICUS (wh. see), there is a little doubt as to whether the two are to be included among the apostles—probably they are to be, the word being taken in its wider signification. In that case it is hardly likely that the name is feminine, although, curiously enough, Chrysostom does not consider the idea of a female apostle impossible: 'And, indeed, to be apostles at all is a great thing. But to be even amongst those of note, just consider what a great encomium this is. But they were of note owing to their works and their achievements. Oh! how great is the devotion of this woman, that she should be even counted worthy of the appellation of apostle.'

A. C. HEADLAM.

JUNIPER (רֹתֶם rōthem).—Rōthem occurs three times in the Bible. Elijah sat under a rōthem (1 K 19^4). The LXX transliterates this Ῥαθμέν. The poor are said to cut up the roots of the rōthem for food (Job 30^4), LXX ῥίζας ξύλων. The tongue is compared (Ps 120^4) to coals of rōthem, LXX τοῖς ἄνθραξιν τοῖς ἐρημικοῖς. It is clear from these references that the LXX did not understand what was meant by rōthem. The Arab. happily furnishes the clue. Ratam is a sort of broom, Retama Retem, L., which grows in all the deserts of Egypt, Sinai, and the Holy Land. The tr. (AV in all, and RV text 1 K 19^4, Ps 120^4) 'juniper' is incorrect. 'Broom' (RV text Job 30^4, and marg. in other passages) is somewhat misleading. The particular species of plant not growing in other lands had better be called by its indigenous name ratam.

The ratam is a glabrescent shrub, with a few linear leaves, 3–4 lines long, purplish white flowers, half an inch long, 1–5 together in subsessile clusters along the twigs, and obliquely ovate, 1-seeded, beaked pods, half an inch long. The shrub gives the poorest kind of shade, and yet it is often the only refuge from the blazing sun of the desert. Its roots are suitable for burning, and are used for making charcoal. They would be poor eating indeed. This has led some to suppose that שֹׁרֶשׁ shōresh (Job 30^4), may mean the seeds which are said to be eaten by sheep. For this, however, there is no etymological warrant. The LXX tr. is against it.

G. E. POST.

JUPITER in 2 Mac 6^2 is Zeus, the supreme god in the Greek pantheon. Zeus Xenios (ib.), i.e. Zeus the god of hospitality and protector of strangers, was worshipped throughout the Greek world. Zeus Olympios (ib.), Olympian Zeus, was probably so called because first worshipped on Mount Olympus in North Thessaly; but owing to the influence of the Homeric poetry the epithet became familiar wherever Greek was spoken, and the god was widely worshipped under that name, e.g. at Athens, Chalcis, Megara, Olympia, Sparta, Corinth, Syracuse, Naxos, and Miletus (Farnell, Cults of the Greek States, I. iv.). The juxtaposition of the two cults by Antiochus Epiphanes, who specially honoured Zeus Olympios (Nestle, Marg. p. 42), would imply to the Greek mind that the supreme God who ruled the whole world, whether of Greeks or foreigners (Xenios), was not J", but the Zeus Olympios who had been a Greek god from the earliest, i.e. Homeric, times.

The Jupiter of Ac $14^{12.13}$ though called Zeus, was not the Greek god, but the native god of the Lycaonian population, whose Lycaonian name was represented in Greek as Zeus. The reading of Codex Bezæ in v.^{13} is τοῦ ὄντος Διὸς πρὸ πόλεως, and is to be translated 'of Zeus, who is called Zeus Propoleôs,' i.e. 'Jupiter-before-the-town'—the epithet Propoleôs being given to the god because his temple was outside the town; cf. the inscription in Claudiopolis of Isauria to Διὶ Προαστίῳ (Ramsay, The Church in the Roman Empire, pp. 51–53). The remains of this temple have not yet been discovered; but, in the opinion of Ramsay, they might be identified with but very little excavation.

In Ac 19^{35} ('the image which fell down from Jupiter,' τὸ [ἄγαλμα] διοπετές) the phrase 'from Jupiter' is simply='from the clear sky' (see Ramsay, p. 604 n. of vol. i. of this Dictionary).

F. B. JEVONS.

JUSHAB-HESED (יוּשַׁב חֶסֶד 'loving-kindness is returned').—A son of Zerubbabel, 1 Ch 3^{20}.

JUSTICE is in Scripture essentially identical with Righteousness (wh. see). The same words (צַדִּיק, צֶדֶק, צְדָקָה, δίκαιος, δικαιοσύνη) are rendered now by one and now by the other term, but chiefly by 'righteous,' 'righteousness.' The tendency in RV is to replace 'just' by 'righteous'; see Ps 89^{14}, Pr 4^{18}; in Pr $10^{6.7}$ the same word is rendered both 'just' and 'righteous.' Referring to the artt. on Justification and Righteousness for detailed exposition of the meaning and development of the idea, we need here refer only to general considerations.

The Eng. word 'justice,' in addition to the broad sense in which it denotes moral excellence in general and is equivalent to righteousness, has acquired the special sense of honesty, fairness to others, and then judicial righteousness, whereas 'righteousness' has kept to its original meaning. In Scripture it is the broad sense that is almost exclusively meant in reference both to God and man. Or, put in another way, the justice or righteousness of Scripture denotes almost exclusively moral and religious perfection, of which every other moral excellence is a necessary corollary. There are indeed the beginnings of a special meaning, but little more; thus 'just balances' (Lv 19^{36}), 'One that ruleth over men righteously' (2 S 23^{3}), 'Whatsoever is right I will give you' (Mt 20^{4}). But, in the main, Scripture refers only to absolute, essential righteousness; in demanding this it demands all.

Such absolute, universal righteousness is everywhere affirmed of God: 'Just and right is he' (Dt 32^{4}), 'A just God and a saviour' (Is 45^{21}), 'The Lord is righteous; he loveth righteousness' (Ps 11^{7}), 'That he might himself be just' (Ro 3^{26}). God is indeed spoken of as a Judge, Gn 18^{25}, Ps 7^{11}, Is 33^{22} (שֹׁפֵט), but it is in the general sense of ruler, sovereign. It is evident, on the principle that the greater includes the less, that every special form of justice — legislative, retributive — is included in and follows from the general idea. The justice ascribed to God is absolute, perfect. 'Thou that art of purer eyes than to behold evil, and that canst not look on perverseness' (Hab 1^{13}).

The term is used in the same comprehensive sense of men. The good are the just or righteous in contrast with the wicked (Ps 37^{12} etc.). The Lord Jesus is so described (Ac 3^{14}, 1 P 3^{18}). 'Whatsoever things are just' (Ph 4^{8}). 'A just man' is the comprehensive description given of individuals (Gn 6^{9}, Mt 1^{19}, Mk 6^{20}, Lk 2^{25} 23^{50}, Ac 10^{22}, 2 P 2^{7}. A bishop must be just (Tit 1^{8}).

Assuming that justice and mercy are the two complementary aspects of holiness, justice is the aspect emphasized in the OT. It may be regarded as distinctively the OT attribute or virtue. Not that this aspect is superseded in NT. The entire teaching of the Sermon on the Mount goes to show that Christianity immensely deepens OT ideas. But in the gospel mercy takes the central place. This is the natural order of revelation. 'The law was given by Moses; grace and truth came by Jesus Christ' (Jn 1^{17}). Justice as righteousness forms the solid substratum of moral character in God and man, and must come first; but this point being secured, mercy lifts us to a higher stage (Ro 13^{10}). The revelation of righteousness is crowned by the revelation of love (1 Jn 4^{8}). Thus the two testaments each play a distinct part in the revelation of moral truth. J. S. BANKS.

JUSTIFICATION.—To 'justify' means to set right, or to put on a right footing, one whose relation, either in consequence of misunderstanding or misrepresentation, or because of misconduct, has been what it should not be. Where there has been no real wrong-doing, 'justification' is simply vindication or declaration of innocence or rectitude; where there has been real wrong-doing, it presupposes the fulfilment of some condition by which the wrong-doing is made good or expiated. In both cases a relation more or less abnormal is changed into one that is normal,—in the one by means of more light, in the other by means of more right.

Neither the Heb. צדק (Pi. and Hiph.) nor the Gr. δικαιοῦν means to make righteous, but simply to put in a right relation. It is a question primarily of relationship, not of character or conduct; though the relationship is conceived as conditioning both character and conduct.

The fundamental meaning of δικαιόω is 'to settle or recognize as right.' In Class. Lit. it means (1) to hold or deem right, Herod. i. 100; Eurip. Supplic. 526; Thuc. i. 140. 2; ii. 41. 2, etc.; (2) to do a man justice, i.e. in general, to judge or punish, Herod. iii. 29, and so frequently in later Greek, especially Dio Cassius (cf. the Scots use of 'justify'). δικαιόω came to be a technical term in ecclesiastical Greek in sense (1), used of the decree of councils, ἐδικαίωσεν ἡ ἁγία καὶ μεγάλη σύνοδος, Can. 17, Conc. Nic.

In LXX (OT and Apoc.) it is used to translate the Piel and Hiph'il of צדק (Qal=δεδικαιῶσθαι), almost always with a personal object: so Ex 23^{7}. The root meaning everywhere seems to be, 'to set forth as righteous,' to justify, in a legal sense. This may signify either (1) to show one to be righteous, Ezk $16^{51.52}$, Jer 3^{11}; or (2) to declare righteous, Dt 25^{1}, 1 K 8^{32}. Similarly in the Pseudepigraphical Books, e.g. Ps.-Sol ii. 16, ix. 3, where it means to justify God.

In NT the sense is determined largely by the usage of LXX. We have (1) to show one to be righteous, 1 Co 4^{4}, Lk 7^{35}; (2) to pronounce righteous, as a judicial act, Lk 16^{15} 7^{29}; (3) in Pauline usage δικαιοῦν denotes the judicial act of God whereby those who put faith in Christ are declared righteous in His eyes, free from guilt and punishment, Ro 4^{5}, Gal 2^{16} et passim. (3) is thus an expansion and Christian application of (2). In Ro 8^{30} δικαιοῦν is specifically mentioned as an element in the divine work of saving the individual. Cremer points out that while in Hebrew Hiph. presupposes Qal, — justification, the being just,—the converse is true in Greek (δικαιοῦν—δεδικαιῶσθαι).

In general we may say that in Bibl. Lit. the word δικαιοῦν is used always, or almost always, in the forensic sense, and that its proper meaning is to pronounce righteous. Of itself it does not affirm or deny the real righteousness of the person so declared, or treated as, righteous, and in so far as he is not really righteous it implies forgiveness. But it may be taken as certain that it cannot mean to make righteous, not even in 1 Co 6^{11}. Verbs in -όω, derived from adjectives of moral meaning, never have this efficient signification. Godet (Com. on Rom. Eng. tr. i. 157) goes so far as to say that there is not a single example in the whole of Class. Lit. where the word= to make righteous. And the usage of the NT is unmistakable. See esp. Morison, Crit. Expos. of the Third Chap. of the Ep. to the Rom. pp. 163–198.

A word may be added on two other terms. δικαίωμα is the declaration or decision, either (1) that a thing is δίκαιον, or (2) that a person is δίκαιος. (1) gives us the common meaning of 'ordinance' or 'precept,' Lk 1^{6}, Ro 8^{4}, He 9^{1}; (2) the technical Pauline sense in Ro $5^{16.18}$. δικαίωμα is the act of justification regarded as complete; δικαίωσις (a word occurring only twice in NT, elsewhere replaced by the verb δικαιοῦν) is the act as in process, which, therefore, when relating to sinners=the act of acquittal, as is especially clear from Ro 5^{18}.

See also under RIGHTEOUSNESS.

Put into a sentence, the point of view of this article may be stated as follows:—God has ever been seeking to establish normal personal relations between Himself and sinful men; and so far as men have responded to the divine movement, as befitted that movement, on the one hand, and the stage of their personal and moral development to which the movement accommodated itself, on the other, such a normal relation was established. That relation was justification. The first step was thus taken to God's being to man that without which man could not be to God, still less in himself, what he was designed to be.

I. The act of justification may affect various relations.

1. A man's relation to himself.—A man may seek to set himself right with himself, in other words, to justify himself to himself. Something of this kind is implied in 1 Co $4^{3.4}$ 'I judge not mine own self. For I know nothing against myself; yet am I not hereby justified: but He that judgeth me is the Lord'; and in 1 Jn $3^{19.20}$ 'Hereby shall we know that we are of the truth, and shall assure our heart before Him, whereinsoever our heart condemn us; because God is greater than our heart, and knoweth all things.' Such justification is, of course, exclusively the vindication or clearing up of one's own innocence or rectitude before or to oneself. There is such a thing as mistaken self-judgment: it may be either for the better or the worse.

2. A man's relation to his fellow-man.—Men set themselves right with their fellow-men, whether regarded individually or corporately. If a man have been misrepresented, to justify himself is to clear or vindicate himself in the particular respect in which he has been misjudged; if, on the other hand, he is guilty of wrong in thought or word or act, the wrong relation thence arising or thereby constituted, has to be rectified by some sort of expiation or good-making of the wrong. It may be by confession of fault, or an expression of regret, or the payment of a fine, or loss of liberty, or endurance of suffering. In the legislation of Israel, as set forth in OT, provision was made both for the vindication of innocence (Nu $5^{18ff.}$) and the making good of real wrong-doing (Ex 21^{19-30} 22^{14}).

3. Men are sometimes set right or justified by others; that, too, in both senses, namely, the vindication of innocence or rectitude, and atonement for wrong. The former is referred to in Dt 25^{1} 'If there be a controversy between men, and the judges judge them; then they shall justify the righteous and condemn the wicked.' Justification of the wicked for a reward, on the contrary, is denounced in Is 5^{23}. In Ezk $16^{51.52}$ Jerus. is satirically represented as justifying her sinful sisters, i.e. causing them to appear righteous, by her own abominations (cf. Jer 3^{11}). Amends might also be made for evil-doing within certain limits. Elihu is represented as anxious that Job should make clear his rectitude, as, e.g., in Job 33^{32}, where we read: 'If thou hast anything to say, answer me: speak, for I desire to justify thee'; and it is said of God in Ps 37^{6}, 'He shall make thy righteousness to go forth as the light, and thy judgment as the noonday' (cf. Is 54^{17}).

4. The justification of men before God is often referred to, but only to be characterized as impossible; that, too, in both respects. Such failure is distinctly pronounced inevitable in Ps 143^{2} 'Enter not into judgment with Thy servant: for in Thy sight shall no man living be justified.' See also Job 25^{4} 'How then can man be just with God?' In NT the same thing is both everywhere implied and often expressly affirmed, as, e.g., in Gal 2^{16} 'because by the works of the law shall no flesh be justified' (cf. Ro 3^{20}), Ac 13^{39} 'by him every one is justified from all things from which ye could not be justified by the law of Moses.'

Not only is the impossibility of vindicating their righteousness before God denied to men, but also that of setting themselves right by making amends for or expiating unrighteousness. That it cannot be effected by works, is clear from declarations like Is 57^{12} 'as for thy works, they shall not profit thee'; and especially Is 64^{6} 'For we are all become as one that is unclean, and all our righteousnesses are as a polluted garment . . . and our iniquities like the wind have taken us away.' Further, to say, 'The temple of the Lord, the temple of the Lord are these,' is to 'trust in lying words' (Jer 7^{4}). But equally out of the question is it to purchase the divine favour by mere sacrifices; for 'In sacrifice and offering He has no delight' (Ps 40^{6} 51^{16}); 'I desire mercy, and not sacrifice' (Hos 6^{6}; cf. Ps 4^{5}); a multitude of sacrifices is nothing to Him (Is 1^{11}); 'the solemn meeting,' 'new moons,' 'appointed feasts,' His 'soul hateth' (Is 1^{13}); yea, 'The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord' (Pr 15^{8} 21^{27}).

As to NT—the impossibility either of vindicating righteousness or making amends for sin by works of the law and by sacrifices, is the burden of the Epp. of St. Paul and of that to the Hebrews, besides being everywhere else implied (cf. e.g. Gal 2^{16}, Ro 3^{20}, He 10^{5-8} where Ps 40 is quoted: 'Sacrifice and offering thou wouldest not . . . in whole burnt-offerings and sacrifices for sin thou hadst no pleasure').

5. The impossibility of justification in the sight of God, thus explicitly affirmed in the particular cases adduced, is implicitly assumed throughout OT and NT. In point of fact, the idea that men should either vindicate their own innocence or rectitude, or that they of themselves, or any creature for them, should establish a right relation between God and themselves, by acts or sacrifices, or anything of their own, is totally alien from the spirit and life that produced the writings which constitute our Bible.

Passages, indeed, in which all manner of good deeds are required, whilst contempt is cast on sacrifices and the like, may seem and are often taken to imply that by right conduct men can set themselves right with God; but this is by no means their import. As fruits of a right relation, both sacrifices and right conduct are obligatory and pleasing to God; as means of establishing a right relation, the one is an abomination, the other utterly insufficient (cf. Ps 51^{15-17} with v.^{19} of the same psalm).

II. 'Justification,' however, understanding it as previously defined, is undoubtedly recognized both as possible and as a fact. Men are actually set right with God, notwithstanding their sin, and their utter inability to expiate or make amends for sin.

1. 'Justification' is in some sense ascribed even to Gentiles. In this respect the case of Cornelius is typical. 'Of a truth,' says St. Peter regarding him, 'I perceive that God is no respecter of persons: but in every nation he that feareth Him and worketh righteousness, is acceptable to Him' (Ac $10^{34.35}$; cf. Ps 15^{2}, He 11^{33}, Mt 8^{5-13}, Ro 2^{14}, Ac 28^{28} 15^{17}). To be 'acceptable' is to be on the footing with God, in the relation to Him, which conditions the bestowal of such grace as a man is capable of receiving, i.e. to be justified. In a certain respect Abraham may be regarded as an example of Gentile 'justification'; for, as St. Paul emphatically affirms, his faith was 'reckoned for righteousness . . . when he was in uncircumcision'; 'that he might be the father of all them that believe, though they be in uncircumcision' (Ro 4^{9-11}). When he believed, he was neither Jew nor Christian.

2. 'Justification' was, further, a common experience under the Old Covenant. The proof of this lies first and foremost in the fact of forgiveness, which St. Paul treats as constituting an integral part of justification, even if he does not, as some hold, identify the two. Forgiveness followed on the offering of appointed sacrifices, and is represented as an experience which many had, and all might have, at the hands of God. The frequent injunctions to trust in the Lord, and the many declarations that it is a good thing to trust in Him, point in the same direction. How otherwise shall we account for the consciousness of righteousness which is expressed by men who at the same time make confession of sin? And the confidence placed in God as the hearer and answerer of prayer, as a refuge and stronghold, as a support and a defence, and so forth? These are either justification itself or its fruits.

3. It scarcely needs saying that the fact of justification before God is the great theme of NT, especially of the Epistles to the Galatians, Romans, and Hebrews. Whilst, as was pointed out, the self-rectification of man's abnormal relation to God, whether by 'works of law,' i.e. by a self-generated righteousness, or by means of sacrifice and offerings or other religious services

(Gal 3⁹⁻¹²), is treated as almost ridiculously impracticable, the blessed news is brought that though all have sinned, all may find justification through faith in Christ, whom God has set forth as a propitiation (Ro 3²¹⁻²⁶).

III. But by what right, it will be asked, can 'justification' be affirmed, not only of Israelites, but even of Gentiles? The Apostle Paul's correlation of Abraham with believers in Christ (Ro 4²⁰⁻²⁵), has puzzled commentators enough; how then can it be right to correlate with them those whom St. Paul is supposed to represent as having been shut up under a law which brought the knowledge of sin (Ro 3²⁰), and therefore the certainty of judgment (Ro 2⁵⁻¹¹); whilst the sacrifices which were offered are said to make no one perfect as pertaining to the conscience? (He 9⁹). And is it not still less admissible to extend 'justification' to those who are characterised as 'sinners of the Gentiles'? (Gal 2¹⁵).

The difficulty now touched upon affects all the three aspects of the subject, viz., first, the divine action (Ro 3²⁰⁻²⁶ et passim); then, the human faith, which, no less than divine action, is necessary to justification; and, finally, the very nature of the relation itself, which is termed justification.

It can only be met by the recognition, on the one hand, of the distinction between implicit and explicit justification; and, on the other, of the fact that between implicit and explicit justification there are or may be stages which are not subjected to the limits of earth and time.

The three points just referred to can be represented by means of concentric spheres, the outermost of which shall stand for the Gentiles, the two inner ones respectively for the Israelites and Christian believers; though it needs to be noted that since the break-up of the Jewish system—perhaps, also, largely prior thereto—the distinction between the Israelites and the Gentiles, so far as justification is concerned, has gradually been becoming less and less; their two spheres have therefore been merging into one. For there is no nation now that can be said to have legal, sacrificial, and religious institutions to which God stands in the same relation, or which discharge the same function relatively to God, as those which are summarily designated the Jewish Dispensation or Covenant. Let us consider the three points in relation to the three classes of cases specified.

1. In the case of the Gentiles, the divine action consists in the opening of the human eye to the sacredness and absoluteness of the right. This takes place ordinarily in connexion with some specific duty. 'I am under a sacred or absolutely binding obligation to do this or not to do that,' the man feels, or possibly says to himself. His eye or ear has been opened: a revelation has been made to him. If he respond, yea, and is ready to do what he sees to be right or avoid what he sees to be wrong, he has attained to a footing which for his stage of personal development is right,—in other words, he has exercised that element of faith which is possible at that stage, and attained implicit justification.

If he continue faithfully to say, yea, with the same purpose of obedience, even though he have to confess many failures of execution, he is destined one day to stand face to face with Christ, and, by the exercise of full, explicit faith in Him, to become partaker of that conscious peace with God of which previously he had and could have only glimpses and foretastes.

2. Speaking generally, the purpose of the Jewish Dispensation was, negatively considered, to check the decrease in humanity of the sensitiveness which conditioned justification of the kind just described; positively considered, on the one hand, to develop a moral personality that should be capable of justification at ever higher stages; and, on the other hand, prepare the way for the coming and work of the Son of God, by which justification in its highest potence was to be rendered possible.

Abraham was a morally faithful man of the type of Cornelius. The special command and promise given him by God, and his ready obedience, both taken together, rendered possible a higher relation than was open to Gentiles under the conditions previously described.

In and through Abraham, God took the principles of heredity and sociality into the service of the higher spiritual development of the race, instead of leaving them to subserve, almost exclusively, its degradation. For the positive purpose referred to, that is, of developing the moral personality, two methods were pursued; first, institutions were regulated or called into existence, and laws were enacted or sanctioned, by which the moral consciousness was quickened, or, as St. Paul puts it, the knowledge of sin was increased (Ro 3²⁰); and, secondly, along therewith sacrifices were sanctioned or ordered, by which a way of forgiveness was provided. Still further, with a view to checking the too natural tendency to the conception of righteousness and sacrifice which eventually dominated the mind of the vast majority of the Jewish nation,—the protest against which, be it remarked, largely colours, not only St. Paul's two great Epp. to the Galatians and Romans, but also the Ep. to the Hebrews,—prophets were commissioned, on the one hand, gradually to develop the law and unfold its true significance; and, on the other, to denounce perfunctory sacrifices, offerings, and observances.

The Israelite who loyally recognized the 'law,' that is, the entire complex of duties arising out of his national relationship, as God's means of showing him how to be holy as He was holy (Lv 19), and who availed himself of the divinely provided means of atoning for his failures, exercised faith, so far as it was then possible and required. Ipso facto, he thus behaved as one who belonged to the covenant, notwithstanding the sins he might commit. As such his relation was a right one; he was justified to the degree then attainable. If he were ever condemned, it was not for sins, but for open disloyalty to the covenant, with its obligations and sacrifices, i.e. for defiant refusal to recognize right as right and grace as grace. But even true Israelites had to wait for the new covenant which God was to make with the house of Israel, when the law should be written in their hearts (He 8¹⁰); though their attitude grew to be ever more completely that which we find in Simeon, who, when Jesus was presented to him in the temple, exclaimed, 'Now lettest Thou Thy servant depart, O Lord, according to Thy word, in peace; for mine eyes have seen Thy salvation' (Lk 2²⁹· ³⁰).

3. 'Justification' reached its culmination through Christ. The realization of the idea and the adoption of the term coincided. The Gentile had no proper sense even of forgiveness, much less of justification; but then his sense of sin was not keen enough to cause him real despair because of the lack. The Israelite had a profounder sense of sin, and therefore, unless he was to despair, needed an assurance of forgiveness as objective as the command which condemned him; but he never got beyond sins, and therefore never realized justification, in the proper sense; nor had he the term. It was reserved for Christianity to produce the consciousness of sin, and to meet what would otherwise have generated despair, by opening the way to justification. The apostle who faced sinfulness most directly, was the one to gain the profoundest insight into justification; and it is worthy of note that whilst St. Paul stretches a bridge from forgiveness to justification by once interchanging the terms (Ro 4^{6-8}), he nowhere else substitutes the one term for the other, except in Col 2^{13}, where he uses, not ἀφεὶς, but χαρισάμενος.

First of all, the divine action for the rectification of man's relation to Himself culminated in Christ. Through Him, law, revealed alike in life and suffering, and sacrifice both by and to God, were presented in their supremest form. Opportunity was thus given, nay more, potential ability was also generated, to respond with a response in which loyal assent to the right, trustful surrender to love, and, finally,—so far as those are concerned who have not seen Christ with the fleshly eye,—belief that realizes the invisible, are all blended, i.e. a response which is what NT understands by 'faith.'

Such a response under such conditions,—what is it but 'a beginning in spirit' (ἐναρξάμενοι πνεύματι, Gal 3^{3-5}; cf. 3^{2} 4^{6} $5^{5ff.}$, He 8^{8-12}), a 'receiving of sonship' (ἵνα τὴν υἱοθεσίαν ἀπολάβωμεν, Gal 4^{1-5}), and therefore the ability to look up to God as a son, 'crying, Abba, Father' (Gal $4^{6.7}$); in other words, what is it but, ipso facto, 'justification,' that is, a rectified relation, a being put on a right footing, in a right relation? The Christian believer is related rightly to God; accordingly law ceases to be mere law, and sacrifice ceases to be a means of purchasing grace; and though he may fall into sin, he can still look up to God as one whose relation has once for all been made right in and through Christ.

(Neither the Roman Catholic and other present-day kindred doctrines which represent justification as in some sense imparting real righteousness; nor the traditional or 'orthodox' doctrine of an imputation of the righteousness of Christ, are true to Scripture, though each of them embodies a certain aspect of the truth.)

How Christ by His work on our behalf empowered man to fulfil the conditions devolving on him, i.e. to exercise faith, as well as to do that which faith of moral necessity presupposed, is a point which belongs to the doctrine of the atonement; but if justice be done to NT hints on the subject, propitiation, justification, and sanctification will be found to constitute the distinguishable though inseparable factors of one great spiritual whole.

JUSTLE.—Nah 2^{4} 'The charets shall rage in the streets, they shall justle one against another in the broad wayes.' Thus the verse appears in AV of 1611. In mod. edd. 'charets' is spelt 'chariots,' but 'justle' is retained (and accepted by RV) though 'jostle' is the usual spelling now. Cf. Golding, Calvin's Job, 580, 'if we be pinched with adversitie, the passion of sorow is so vehement, as it cannot be ruled: for then a man skirmisheth in such wise, as he justleth against God, and that is to his owne destruction in the end.' T. Fuller, Holy Warre, II. ii. p. 45, 'He was infected with the humour of the clergie of that age, who counted themselves to want room except they justled with Princes.'

JUSTUS (Ἰοῦστος).—1. In Ac 1^{23} we are told that two names were put forward for election to the place vacated by Judas, Joseph called Barsabbas, who was called Justus, and Matthias. Justus is, of course, the Greek name assumed by a Hebrew. See JOSEPH BARSABBAS. 2. In Ac 18^{7} we learn that St. Paul when at Corinth lodged with one Justus, or Tit(i)us Justus, a proselyte (σεβόμενος τὸν Θεόν) whose house was near the synagogue. There is some variation in the MSS. The name is Titius Justus in B, the Vulgate, and Memphitic versions (in Codex Amiatinus 'Titus nomine Justus'), Titus Justus in ℵE, Titus alone in the Sahidic version and Peshitta, Justus alone in AD and later MSS; two MSS omit the name altogether. According to Ramsay, 'Titius Justus was evidently a Roman or a Latin, one of the coloni of the colony Corinth. Like the centurion Cornelius, he had been attracted to the synagogue—his citizenship could afford Paul an opening to the more educated class of the Corinthian population' (St. Paul the Traveller, p. 256). 3. In Col $4^{10.11}$ St. Paul speaks of Aristarchus, his fellow-prisoner, Mark the cousin of Barnabas, and Jesus, which is called Justus. They were all 'of the circumcision,' and were his only fellow-workers for the kingdom who were a comfort to him. The name is a Gentile surname assumed by a Jew, as in 1.

JUTAH or JUTTAH (in Jos 15^{55} יוּטָה [Hahn, followed by RV; AV has Juttah, which is the punctuation of Michaelis, יוּטָּה], in Jos 21^{16} יֻטָּה [hence AV and RV both have Juttah]).—A town of Judah (Jos 15^{55}) mentioned in connexion with Maon, Carmel, and Ziph in the mountains, given to the priests, the sons of Aaron (Jos 21^{16}), as a city of refuge for the man-slayer. It has been left out of the catalogue of cities of refuge in 1 Ch 6^{59}, but QPB adds note, 'Insert, Juttah with her pasture grounds.' In the time of Eusebius and Jerome (Onomast. s.v. Ἰεττάν) it was a large village 18 MP. from Eleutheropolis, and in Daroma-ad-australem. Reland (Pal. p. 870) suggests that Juttah was probably the residence of Zacharias and Elisabeth, and the birthplace of John the Baptist, the πόλις Ἰούδα ('a city of Judah') of Lk 1^{39} being so written by a corruption, or from a softer pronunciation, instead of πόλις Ἰούτα (so also Robinson, BRP ^{2} ii. 206). Seetzen (1807) appears to have identified the modern village of Yutta as Juttah, and Robinson (BRP^{2} i. 495, ii. 206) corroborated the identification. It is a large Moslem village, standing high on a ridge 16 miles from Beit Jibrîn (Eleutheropolis), and in the vicinity of Maon (Main), Carmel (Kurmul), and Ziph (Tell ez-Zif). It is built of stone, and the water supply is from cisterns. On the south there are rock-cut tombs, and rock wine-presses are found all about the village. The country around is stony, but the inhabitants are very rich in flocks (SWP iii. 310).

KABZEEL (קַבְצְאֵל, B Καιβαισελεήλ, A Κασθεήλ).—A town in the extreme south of Judah, on the border of Edom, Jos 15^{21}. It is mentioned in 2 S 23^{20} (B Καβεσεήλ; cf. 1 Ch 11^{22}) as the native place of Benaiah, the son of Jehoiada. In Neh 11^{25} it appears under the name Jekabzeel as reinhabited after the Captivity (LXX omits in this verse both Jekabzeel and Dibon). Its site has not been identified.

C. R. CONDER.

KADESH, KADESH-BARNEA (קָדֵשׁ Gn 14^{7} [where it is also called עֵין־מִשְׁפָּט 'well of decision'] * 16^{14} 20^{1}, Nu 13^{26} 20$^{1.\,14}$ et al.; קָדֵשׁ בַּרְנֵעַ in Dt 1$^{2.\,19}$ 2^{14} 9^{23}, Nu 32^{8} 34^{4}, Jos 10^{41} 14$^{6.\,7}$ 15^{3} [all]; LXX Καδής, Καδὴς [τοῦ] Βαρνή).—With the exception of Sinai, no spot is more memorable in the history of the wanderings of the Israelites than Kadesh-barnea. It was here that the host camped during the 38 years that intervened between the sending out of the spies and the entrance into Palestine (Nu 20$^{1.\,16}$ JE). It would appear, indeed, from Dt 2^{14} as if the time was spent away from Kadesh. We may perhaps infer † that at Kadesh the tabernacle with the ark of the covenant was set up; that it was the abode of Moses and the chiefs of the tribes, and that it was the general centre to which the people resorted for worship and for judgment on disputed questions. But it by no means follows that the whole multitude with their flocks and herds congregated in the immediate neighbourhood; such a multitude of people and animals would, for the sake of pasturage alone, require a wide field in which to pitch their tents. It was at Kadesh that Miriam died (Nu 20^{1}); it was the scene of the rebellion of Korah and his company (Nu 16); it was from Kadesh that the spies were sent in advance to ascertain and report to Moses on the physical character and the inhabitants of Canaan (Nu 13^{26}); and it was at Kadesh that the miraculous supply of water was obtained (Nu 20$^{1\text{-}12}$), when, apparently, the fountains which had caused the spot to be selected as camping ground were dried up; caused either by a prolonged drought, or by the blocking up of the underground channels by the falling in of the limestone strata. Whatever may have been the cause, the restoration of the flow of water was clearly miraculous, as it occurred at the moment of the interposition of Moses by command of God; though in a manner at variance with precise directions, which were to 'speak unto the rock' (Nu 20^{8}), not to strike it with the rod. This departure from his instructions cost Moses his doom.

The position of Kadesh-barnea has been the subject of much controversy. By a comparison of various passages the site is brought within very narrow limits. It was on the borders of the Wilderness of Zin (Nu 20^{1}), a tract which lay along the western margin of the valley of the Arabah; it was also near the southern boundary of the territory of Judah and of the land of the twelve tribes (Nu 34^{4}). It was eleven days' journey from Horeb (Mt. Sinai) by way of Mt. Seir, or, in other words, by the route of the Arabah,—doubtless the number of days occupied by the Israelitish host in their journey between these two important camps; and it was not far distant from the border of Edom and the base of Mt. Hor, a site which has been recognized as indisputable by many competent authorities. It was from Kadesh-barnea that Moses on the expiration of the 'forty years,' and the resumption of the journeys of the Israelites, sent messengers to the king of Edom asking permission to pass through his land so as to reach the tableland of Moab on their way northwards; which request was refused (Nu 20$^{14\text{-}21}$ E).* All these passages lead us to infer some position in the Badiet et-Tîh—the great expanse of treeless limestone plateau which intervenes between the valley of the Arabah, opposite Mt. Hor on the east and the coast of Philistia about Gaza on the west. These conditions appear to be fully satisfied in the site discovered by the late Rev. John Rowland in 1842, to which he was guided by some Arabs when resident at Gaza. Here he found a lofty wall of limestone, at the base of which issued forth a copious spring, or several springs, which emptied themselves into a large artificially constructed basin, then into another of smaller size; and, continuing to flow down the valley, spread fertility on either hand until the waters ultimately disappeared beneath the sands of the desert. The spring is known amongst the Arabs by the name of 'Ain Ḳadîs, or Holy Well, a name which seems to preserve the original biblical one. It was clear from the stone troughs and the marks of cattle and sheep around that the well was a favourite resort of the tribes for water, and doubtless was so even prior to the visit of the Israelites. The presence of water is a first necessity of life in those districts, and such a copious supply pointed it out as one suitable for the camping ground of the host. This spot was afterwards visited by Dr. H. Clay Trumbull, who confirms Rowland's identification, and who is the author of the most important work yet published on the subject.† The term 'city' applied to this spot probably means a camp or village of the Midianites (Nu 20^{16}).

KADESH ON THE ORONTES.—See TAHTIM-HODSHI.

KADMIEL (קַדְמִיאֵל).—The name of a Levitical family which returned with Zerubbabel, Ezr 2^{40} = Neh 7^{43} (cf. 1 Es 5^{26}). The expression which follows, namely, 'of the children of Hodaviah' (or Hodevah), is apparently meant to limit the Kadmiel family to those members who belonged to the Hodaviah branch. In Ezr 3^{9} (cf. 1 Es 5^{58}), in connexion with the laying of the foundation of the temple, as well as in Neh 9$^{4\text{ff.}}$ (the day of humiliation) and 10^{9} (the sealing of the covenant), Kadmiel appears to be an individual. The name occurs further in Neh 12$^{8.\,24}$. In the last of these passages we ought certainly to read, on the strength of parallel passages, 'Jeshua, Bani (or Binnui), Kadmiel' instead of 'Jeshua ben-Kadmiel.' This emendation is supported by the fact that ℵBA as well as Luc. have υἱοὶ Καδμιήλ, implying an original בני not בן. See, further, Smend, Listen, p. 10, n. 10; Ryle, Ezra and Nehemiah, ad ll. citt.

* The name Ḳadesh implies that the place was a sanctuary; no doubt it bore this character before its occupation by Israel. See, further, Driver on Dt 33^{2}, where Wellh. would read 'from Meribath-Kadesh' (מִמְּרִיבַת קָדֵשׁ) for מֵרִבְבֹת קֹדֶשׁ 'out of holy myriads,' of MT.

† But see Driver on Dt 2^{14}.

* In Dt 1. 2$^{4\text{-}8}$ there is no mention of these negotiations with Edom (Moore on Jg 11^{16}).

† Kadesh Barnea (New York, 1884); also PEFSt (1881) p. 210. The site discovered by Rowland is supported by Ritter, Schultz, and Palmer; objected to by Robinson, Stanley, and others. It was not visited by the expedition of the Pal. Explor. Fund of 1883-4, as it lay to the westward of the Arabah, beyond the line of survey by Major Kitchener, R.E., now Lord Kitchener of Khartoum.

KADMONITES, קַדְמֹנִי, Κελμωναῖοι, 'men of the East,' only in Gn 15^{19}, inhabitants of the Syrian desert, possibly descendants of Kedemah, the twelfth son of Ishmael (Gn 25^{15}). Mentioned after the Kenites and Kenizzites, the K. are represented as occupying the district along the eastern border of Palestine, near the Dead Sea, which was also called the East Sea, הַיָּם הַקַּדְמוֹנִי (Ezk 47^{18}). Their name occurs in the longest list of the nations which originally held possession of the territories promised to Abraham. Usually seven, sometimes only six, but here ten such nations are named. Ewald and many following him regard the K. as equivalent to the Bĕnê Ḳedem, children of the East (wh. see), descendants (? Gn 25^{6}) of Abraham by Keturah (Gn 29^{1}, Jg 7^{12}, 1 K 4^{30}, Job 1^{3}, Is 11^{14}, Jer 49^{28}, Ezk $25^{4.10}$). In that case, K. would be the designation of no particular tribe, but of the Keturæan Arabs, as distinguished from the Ishmaelites. The children of the East are represented in the passages referred to as occupying Paddan-aram, associated with the Midianites and Amalekites, inhabiting Kedar, neighbours and conquerors of the children of Ammon, coupled with the Egyptians in their fame for wisdom, and as Easterns contrasted with the Philistines who possessed the extreme west. Job is described as one of them. It seems better to regard the K. as a particular tribe like the other nations named in this list. Whether they are to be viewed as a branch of the Ishmaelitish or of the Keturæan Arabs is not clear.

KAIN (הַקַּיִן, properly Hakkain, AV Cain; A Ἀκείμ, Jos 15^{57}.—A town of Judah in the Hebron mountains, probably the present ruin Yukîn, on a high knoll S.E. of Hebron, overlooking the Jeshimon. It is visible from Minyeh (see BETHPEOR), and may be the 'nest of the Kenite' on a cliff (Nu 24^{21}), visible from the top of Peor. The Kenites inhabited this region. The tomb of Cain is now shown at this spot. Near it is the village of Beni N'aim, the old name of which was Kefr Barakah, which is the Caphar Barucha of the fourth cent. A.D. (Jerome, Paula), supposed to be the place where Abraham 'blessed' God (Gn 18^{22}), and whence he saw the destruction of the cities of the Ciccar. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xxi.

C. R. CONDER.

KAIN (קַיִן 'lance,' 'spear'). — A clan name = Kenites (wh. see), Nu 24^{22}, Jg 4^{11}. In 1 S 15^{6b} Wellh. reads קַיִן instead of קֵינִי, and the same change is proposed by Meyer (ZATW, i. 137, n. 3) for בְּנֵי קֵינִי in Jg 1^{16} (but see Moore, ad. loc. and on 4^{11}, and cf. Budde, Richt. u. Sam. 9, 68).

KALLAI (קַלָּי; A Καλλαί, B om.).—The head of the priestly family of Sallai, in the time of Jeshua the high priest, Neh 12^{20}.

KAMON (קָמוֹן; B Ῥαμνών, A Ῥαμμώ, Luc. Καλκών). —The burial-place of Jair, Jg 10^{5}. The site has not been recovered. It was probably east of the Jordan; probably identical, Moore thinks, with Kamûn mentioned by Polybius (V. lxx. 12) in connexion with Pella. Eusebius is certainly wrong in identifying it with Kammōna (modern Tell Ḳeimûn), 6 miles N.W. of Legio (Lejjûn). See JOKNEAM.

KANAH (קָנָה).—1. A wâdy (נַחַל), forming the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh, terminating on the W. at the sea and on the E. at En-tappuah (Jos 16^{8} 17^{9}). This eastern limit must have been near Shechem lying to the S.E., but it has not been identified with any certainty. The modern Wâdy Ḳanah, the channel of a small stream rising near Nâblus (Shechem), is regarded by Conder as representing the ancient Ḳanah (Handbook to the Bible, 263); but Thomson (Land and Book, 'Southern Pal.,' 56) considers that this tributary of the 'Aujeh would put the boundary too far to the south (so also Dillmann). In connexion with the brook Ḳanah a difficulty arises in locating the Me-jarkon and Rakkon (Jos 19^{46} *), if these three under different names are all represented by the 'Aujeh immediately to the north of Jaffa. The discovery of Tell Rakkeit near the mouth of the 'Aujeh makes the supposition not impossible that Me-jarkon and Rakkon were names of that river after being joined by the brook Ḳanah. All the streams crossing the northern half of the plain of Sharon are reedy and discoloured. Thomson is in favour of the Falîk as representing Ḳanah, and its divided mouth would account for the two names Me-jarkon and Rakkon. Farther north, on each side of Cæsarea, are two streams that suggest the Bible names mentioned, namely, el-Akhdar (Yellow River) and el-Azraḳ (Blue River). These streams would give Dan the coast-line up to Dora, and coincide with the territory assigned to that tribe by Josephus (Ant. V. i. 21).

2. A town on the northern boundary of Asher (Jos 19^{28}). The English reader must be careful to distinguish it from Cana of Galilee (wh. see). It is very probably the modern Kana, a considerable village lying a few miles S.E. of Tyre (cf. Robinson, BRP ^{2} ii. 456; Guérin, Galilée, ii. 390 f.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal. ^{3} 262 f.). In its neighbourhood there is a large Phœnician sepulchral monument known as 'Hiram's Tomb' (PEF Mem. i. 61). Ḳanah is possibly referred to in the journey of the Egyptian mohar in the time of Ramses II. under the name Pa-Kana-na.

G. M. MACKIE.

KAREAH (קָרֵחַ 'bald'). — Father of Johanan, who was a Judæan contemporary of Jeremiah, and one of the captains of the forces in the open field who escaped the deportation to Babylon at the destruction of Jerusalem by Nebuchadrezzar (2 K 25^{23}, Jer $40^{13.15.16}$ $42^{1.8}$ $43^{2.4.5}$). In Jer 40^{8} MT reads 'Johanan and Jonathan, sons of Kareaḥ,' but here LXX (47^{8}) makes mention only of Johanan, as in the other passages above cited. Probably therefore יוֹנָתָן in MT is due merely to mistaken repetition of יוֹחָנָן.

C. F. BURNEY.

KARIATHIARIUS (A Καριαθιαριός, B Καρταθειαρειός; RVm 'Kiriath-arim or Kiriath-jearim'), 1 Es 5^{19} for Kiriath-jearim (wh. see).

KARKA (הַקַּרְקָעָה, with ה locale, hence AV Karkaa).—An unknown place on the south border of Judah, apparently in the Tîh plateau, Jos 15^{3}. The LXX has κατὰ δυσμὰς Καδής.

KARKOR (קַרְקֹר).—A place apparently in Gilead, Jg 8^{10}. The site is unknown.

KARTAH (קַרְתָּה).—A city of Zebulun given to the Levites, Jos 21^{34}. It is not mentioned in the parallel passage, 1 Ch 6^{77}. The site is unknown. It might be for Ḳaṭṭath (קַטָּת) by a clerical error.

KARTAN (קַרְתָּן).—A city of Naphtali given to the Levites, Jos 21^{32}. The parallel passage, 1 Ch 6^{76}, has Ḳiriathaim (wh. see). While Luc. reads Καρθάν in harmony with MT, B has Θεμμών, A Νοεμμών.

---

* There are suspicions as to the correctness of the MT (see Dillm.'s and Bennett's notes). Rakkon (רַקּוֹן), which is omitted in LXX, may have arisen by dittography from the preceding הַיַּרְקוֹן.

KATTATH (קַטָּת, B Κατανάθ, A Καττάθ, Luc. Κοττάθ).—A city of Zebulun, Jos 19^{15}, perhaps to be identified with Ḳartah (wh. see) or with Ḳiṭron (wh. see) of Jg 1^{30}, a place from which the Zebulunites were unable to expel the Canaanites. The site is unknown. Van de Velde suggests Tell Ḳerdaneh, N.E. of Ḥaifa, at the source of the Nahr Na'aman. According to the Talm. (Bab. Megillah 6*a*) Ḳiṭron is the later Sepphoris (Seffûrieh). This is opposed by Neubauer (Géog. du Talm. 191).

C. R. CONDER.

KEDAR (קֵדָר, Κηδάρ).—The name of Ishmael's second son (Gn 25^{13}=1 Ch 1^{29}). 'The earliest reference to Kedar of which the date is certain is Jer 2^{10}' (Cheyne, Introd. to Isaiah, p. 131), where Kedar is made the type of a distant and barbarous tribe, being there coupled with Citium as it is with Meshech in Ps 120^{5}. The import of the name is better known to the author of Jer 49^{29}, where Kedar is identified with the Bĕnê-ḳedem, and their nomad life, with their sheep and camels, tents, curtains, and belongings, is described; by Ezekiel (27^{21}) they are coupled with 'Arab,' and described as trading with Tyre in cattle; and the author of the second part of Isaiah couples them with Nebaioth (60^{7}), alludes to their pursuit of sheep-breeding (ib.), and to their unwalled settlements (42^{11}). In Ca 1^{5} the tents of Kedar are made typical of blackness, with perhaps an allusion to the Hebrew sense of the root קדר, 'to be turbid or black.'

While the name Kedar is unknown to Arabic traditions, it is said to be preserved in some Minæan inscriptions (Glaser, Skizze, ii. p. 439), and is known in various forms to the Greek geographers, who, indeed, locate the tribe very differently (the passages are collected by Gesenius, Thes. s.v.). Our chief source of information about it is to be found in the inscriptions of Assurbanipal (George Smith, History of Assurbanipal, pp. 256–298; S. A. Smith, Keilschrifttexte Assurbanipal's, i. 58–75; Cuneiform Inscriptions of W. Asia, iii. plates 24–28, v. plates 7–10). The land of Ḳi-id-ri (G. Smith, p. 283), Ḳa-ad-ri (ib. p. 290), or Ki-id-ri (S. A. Smith, p. 60), and the people called Kid-ra-ai (G. Smith, p. 271), have been justly identified with Kedar by G. Smith and all who have commented on this king's annals (Delitzsch, Paradies, p. 299; Glaser, Skizze, ii. 267–274, etc.), as being mentioned in close proximity to A-ri-bi (the Arab) and Na-ba-ai-te (Nebaioth), and described as possessors of 'asses, camels, and sheep' (S. A. Smith, l.c. p. 67); moreover, some people mentioned with them are, according to one interpretation of a difficult word, described as 'dwellers in tents' (S. A. Smith, l.c. p. 103).

It is plain that the identification of Kedar with the Arabs, which is clearly found in Ca 1^{5}, and prevails in the later Jewish literature, had already commenced in Assyrian times; thus whereas Esarhaddon calls a certain Hazael king of Aribi (Cylinder A of the Esarhaddon Inscriptions, ed. Harper, p. 8), Assurbanipal, who repeats this passage, calls him king of Kedar (G. Smith, p. 283);* and though U-ai-te' is ordinarily styled by Esarhaddon 'king of the Arabs' (WAI iii. pl. 24. l. 11, 108, etc.), the Kedarites are particularly styled 'his men' (l. 107), and likewise the Arab general A-bi-ya-te' is called a Kedarite (l. 121). Nevertheless, a special country of Kedar existed, and from the detailed account of Assurbanipal's Arabian campaign it ought to be possible to locate it accurately. This monarch's army marched 100 Kash-bu Ḳaḳ-ḳa-ru from Nineveh, crossing the Tigris and Euphrates, to the wilderness of Mas, and 6 Kash-bu Ḳaḳ-ḳa-ru from Azalla in Mas to Kurasiti, where they besieged the Kedarites. It is not, however, clear whether the distance from Nineveh to Azalla, or to the border of Mas, is given in the first figure; and views differ as to the length of the measure employed (Glaser, l.c. p. 279 n.; Delitzsch, l.c. p. 177). Since the captives are sent to Damascus (l. 113), it seems probable that the direction of the king's march was towards Hauran (as Delitzsch, l.c., suggests) rather than Yemamah (where Glaser, l.c., endeavours to locate Kedar on what seem inadequate grounds). The fact, too, that the Kedarite kings invade Syria viâ Moab (WAI v. col. vii. 112; G. Smith, p. 288), points the same way.

With regard to the history of Kedar, we learn from the inscription that the gods of Hazael, king of Kedar, had been plundered by Esarhaddon (see above), but that Hazael, having sued for them, received them back (the chief being called Adarsamain), and was made vassal-king of Arabia. His son, called by Esarhaddon Ya'il, by Assurbanipal Ya'u-ta' (WAI iii. 21, col. viii. 37), more frequently U-ai-te' (ib. 21, col. viii. 7, etc.), probably on account of the heavier tribute exacted from him (Esarhaddon, l.c. 8, 20–24) in the next reign joined the party of Samas-sum-ukin, and invaded Syria; but being defeated by the Assyrians, fled to the friendly tribe Nebaioth, who, however, appear to have given him up to Assurbanipal. Another king of Kedar, named Ammuladi, thereupon invaded Syria a second time, but was also defeated, and taken together with Adiyah, wife of U-ai-te'. Simultaneously with the expedition into Syria, U-ai-te' had despatched a force to Babylon under the Kedarites Abiyate' and Aimu, the former of whom, after defeat, sued for pardon, and obtained the sovereignty of Arabia: this, however, he quickly resigned in favour of the cousin and namesake of the former king, who with the king of Nebaioth organized a fresh revolt, against which Assurbanipal's expedition was directed. The Kedarite nest was destroyed, and severe punishment inflicted on Arabia. The date of this invasion is probably B.C. 648 (cf. Lehmann, 'Samas-sum-ukin,' Assyriologische Bibliothek, viii. p. 6).

While the inscriptions of Assurbanipal thus explain the co-ordination of Kedar with 'Arab' and 'Nebaioth,' it is not probable that the blow dealt to Kedar by this monarch is that to which Is 21$^{16. 17}$ refers. Cheyne (l.c.), who thinks this passage may be Isaianic, seems inclined to connect it with an attack on the Arabs by Sargon; but this monarch nowhere mentions Kedar, and it seems doubtful whether this oracle can have been written before the hegemony of Kedar, which may have existed before the time of Hazael and Esarhaddon, but has not been shown to have been anterior to it. After two invasions of Syria by Arabs led by Kedarite kings, the name of the tribe could be made to stand for the nation, and this suggests that the oracle is later than the events described by Assurbanipal, since its author appears to reckon the Dedanim among the sons of Kedar (vv.$^{13. 17}$); and the oracle in which they are threatened with an attack by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 49$^{3. 28}$) is similarly loose in its application of their name.

Interesting as are the Kedarite names recorded in the inscriptions, they are evidently too carelessly transcribed to render identification safe; the name Ammuladi (like Amme'ta', S. A. Smith, l.c. ii. 38) is clearly Arabic, whereas Hazael is doubtless Aramaic. The name of the tribe itself is probably derived from the Arabic root Ḳdr, which gives a verb meaning 'to be able or powerful,' but derivatives of which have various senses, suitable for personal names. The name of their chief god (whence either they or a neighbouring tribe were called, Glaser, l.c. 278), A-tar-sa-ma-ai-in, seems to be either Phœnician or Aramaic הדר שמין (as it is analyzed by Delitzsch, l.c.) rather than a form of Athtar (as Glaser, l.c., suggests). Further suggestions for the derivation of these names are given by E. Sachau, ZA, 1897 (xii.), p. 44 ff.

D. S. MARGOLIOUTH.

KEDEMAH (קֵדְמָה 'eastward').—A son of Ishmael, Gn 25^{15}=1 Ch 1^{31}. The clan of which he is the eponymous head has not been identified. Ball ('Genesis' in SBOT, ad loc.) considers that in both the above passages קֵדְמָה is a mistake for נוֹדָב (Nodab), which is read in 1 Ch 5^{19}. He remarks that Ḳēdĕmah, 'eastward,' is a singular name, that נ might be misread ק, while ב and מ are often confused. Neither the LXX (Κέδμα) nor Luc. (Κέδεμα) lend any support to Ball's proposed emendation.

KEDEMOTH (קְדֵמוֹת).—A place apparently on the upper course of the Arnon, assigned to Reuben, Jos 13^{18}, and a Levitical city, 21^{37} (=1 Ch 6^{79} [Heb. ^{64}]). The 'wilderness of Ḳedemoth' is mentioned in Dt 2^{26} as the point from which messengers were sent by Moses to Sihon. The exact site is unknown, although it has been suggested that it may be the ruin Umm er-Raṣâṣ, N.E. of Dibon (Dhibân).

LITERATURE.—Tristram, Land of Moab, 140 ff.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{2} 193; Dillm. on Nu 21^{13}; Driver on Dt 2^{26}; Buhl, GAP 268.

KEDESH (קֶדֶשׁ).—1. A city in the south of Judah (Jos 15^{23}) whose site is uncertain. It is to be distinguished from Kadesh-barnea (see Dillm. ad loc.). 2. A city in Issachar, 1 Ch 6^{72} [Heb.^{57}], where, however, Kedesh is not improbably a textual error for Kishion (which see) of the parallel passage Jos 21^{28}. 3. See KEDESH-NAPHTALI.

KEDESH-NAPHTALI (קֶדֶשׁ נַפְתָּלִי Jg 4^6, also called 'Kedesh in Galilee,' Jos 20^7 21^{32}, 1 Ch 6^{76}; called simply 'Kedesh' in Jos 12^{22} 19^{37}, Jg $4^{9.\,10.\,11}$, 2 K 15^{29}, 1 Mac $11^{63.\,73}$).—A city of refuge (Jos 20^7), and likewise a Levitical city (Jos 21^{32}). In early times it was fortified like a number of other cities in that region (Jos 19^{37}). Its full history would reveal, (1) a sacred city of the earliest inhabitants, (2) a stronghold of unusual importance, conquered by the Hebrews, conquered in turn by the Phœnicians, and a centre of great political influence down to the time when Titus encamped with his army before its walls. From its importance in many ways, and the wonderful fertility of the region, it could never have sunk into a condition of poverty or insignificance.

It is noted in biblical history as the residence of Barak, and here the warriors of Zebulun and Naphtali were assembled by Deborah and Barak before the battle with Sisera, and it was near the city that Sisera met his death (Jg $4^{6.\,10}$; cf. Moore, ad loc.). During one of the many invasions of W. Asia by the Assyr. armies, K., with many neighbouring cities, was captured by Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15^{29}). This was in the reign of Pekah, king of Israel, B.C. 734. In Maccabæan times, c. B.C. 150, it was here that Jonathan routed Demetrius, king of Syria, with his army (1 Mac 11^{63-73}; Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 6). At the beginning of our era it belonged to Tyre, and was hostile to the Galilæans (Jos. Wars, II. xviii. 1; IV. ii. 3).

Strong foundations and walls still surviving at the modern village called Ḳedes, lying to the north-west of the Lake of Hûleh, indicate the character of the ancient city, and among the remains several of the finest sarcophagi of the country have been recovered, one of which is double, i.e. made to contain two bodies under one lid, the stone pillows in each loculus being at alternate ends. K. was situated on a small plain surrounded by gentle forest-covered hills from which there was a wide outlook, and for picturesqueness and beauty it had few equals among the cities of Upper Galilee.

KEHELATHAH (קְהֵלָתָה, Μακελλάθ, Luc. Μακελάδ, Ceelatha, Nu $33^{22.\,23}$).—One of the twelve stations in the journeyings of the children of Israel which are mentioned only in Nu 33. It follows Haẓeroth. Nothing is known about its position. The word is from the same Hebrew root (קהל) as Maḳheloth in v.^{25} [note that in the LXX the two words are very similar], and means 'assembly or congregation.'

A. T. CHAPMAN.

KEILAH (קְעִילָה) the Garmite (1 Ch 4^{19}).—See following art. and GENEALOGY.

KEILAH (קְעִילָה, Κεειλά, in Josephus Κίλλα, the inhabitants being Κιλλανοί or Κιλλῖται).—This city is interesting principally for its connexion with the history of David. Shortly after he began to gather men around him he defeated the Philistines, who had been raiding Keilah, and robbing the threshing-floors. In Keilah he remained for a while. Thither came to him Abiathar, the representative of the priestly house of Ithamar, bringing the ephod, after Saul had slain the priests at Nob. By consulting the ephod, David knew that Saul would come down to capture him, and that the men of Keilah, notwithstanding the service he had done them, would hand him over to Saul, and he therefore left the town (1 S 23^{1-13}). Apart from this incident, the OT mentions the name of Keilah in three other passages. It is in one of the groups of cities assigned to Judah in the Shephelah (Jos 15^{44}). The two halves of the 'district of Keilah' were represented in Nehemiah's wall-building work (Neh $3^{17.\,18}$). And in a genealogical fragment (1 Ch 4^{19}), in connexion with certain other names that connect themselves with the geography, mention is made of 'the father of Keilah the Garmite' among the kindred of Caleb the son of Jephunneh.

In the time of David, Keilah was an important place, a city of gates and bars (1 S 23^7). Nehemiah hints at its importance in his time, by speaking of it as a double district. And it was a very important place many centuries earlier, when Ebed-tob and Su-yardata of the Tel el-Amarna tablets wrote of it (under the name Kilta) to the Egyptian king along with Gedor, Gath, and Rabbah (PSBA, June 1888, Bab. Tab. from Tel el-Amarna, iii.), and again along with Gezer, Gath, Rabbah, and Jerusalem (Mittheilungen aus der Orientalischen Sammlungen, part iii. Nos. 100, 106).

Keilah is commonly identified with Khurbet Kila, about 7 miles east of Eleutheropolis, and 1575 ft. above the sea. This is reconcilable with the statement in the Onomasticon, that it is 17 miles (perhaps it should be 7, Jerome has it 8) from Eleutheropolis, on the road to Hebron; but it is difficult to think of so elevated a region as in the Shephelah (cf. Dillm. on Jos 15^{44}). The Onomasticon is cited, as well as later writings (Nicephorus, Hist. xii. 48, and Cassiodorus in Sozomen, Hist. vii. 29), as giving the tradition that the prophet Habakkuk was buried at Keilah, though other traditions say at Hukkok.

W. J. BEECHER.

KELAIAH (קְלָיָה).—A Levite who had married a foreign wife, Ezr 10^{23}, called in 1 Es 9^{23} Colius. In Ezr the gloss is added 'which is Kelita' (in 1 Es, 'who was called Calitas' [which see]). Kelita appears in Neh 8^{7} as one of the Levites who assisted Ezra in expounding the law (cf. 1 Es 9^{48}, Calitas), and his name occurs amongst the signatories to the covenant, Neh 10^{10}. It does not follow, however, that, because Kelaiah was also called Kelita, he is to be identified with this Kelita. Siegfried-Stade think not.

KELITA.—See KELAIAH.

KEMUEL (קְמוּאֵל).—The son of Nahor and father of Aram, Gn 22^{21} (contrast 10^{22} where Aram is son of Shem, and see Dillm. ad loc.). Knobel proposed to connect Kemuel with Kamula in N. Mesopotamia, but this is pronounced by Dillmann to be out of the question. 2. The prince (נָשִׂיא) of the tribe of Ephraim, one of the twelve commissioners for the dividing of the land, Nu 34^{24} (P). 3. The father of Hashabaiah the ruler (נָגִיד) of the Levites, 1 Ch 27^{17}.

KENAN (קֵינָן). — Son of Enoch and father of Mahalelel, Gn $5^{9.12}$ (AV Cainan; but AVm, like RV, Kenan) 1 Ch 1^{2}. LXX has Καινάν, which reappears in Lk $3^{37f.}$ (WH read Καινάμ), giving Cainan (which see) of EV. The name Kenan is simply a variation of Cain (קַיִן 'spear'). 'Halévy (Recherches Bibl. ix. 219) calls attention to the fact that Kênân was the name of a god among the Sabæans' (cf. Baethgen, Beiträge, 127 f.). See Dillm. on Gn 5^{9}.

KENATH (קְנָת) is mentioned (Nu 32^{42}) as having been captured by a clan of Machir, which then gave it their own name of Nobah. Their occupation was only temporary, for Geshur and Aram (1 Ch 2^{23}) reconquered Kenath with its daughter towns.

The Onom. (Lagarde, 269. 15, 296. 109) speaks of a village 'now called Καναθά, lying ἐν Τραχῶνι πλησίον Βοστρῶν'; and Jos. (BJ I. xix. 2) mentions a Καναθά which in his time belonged to Coele-syria. In accordance with these indications, the site has been generally identified with el-Ḳanawât, a place on the western edge of the Hauran range which contains important ruins from the Roman and Christian periods. The fullest description of its present condition is found in Merrill (East of Jordan, 36–43). If this be correct, Kenath offers an instance of the persistence of a native name during and in spite of a temporary alien occupation. The accuracy of this identification has been recently contested by, e.g., Socin (*Bäd.*² 313) and Moore (Comm. on Judges 8^{11}). See, further, Dillm. on Nu 32^{42}.

A. C. WELCH.

KENAZ (קְנַז).—The eponym of the Kenizzite clan, variously described in OT as the son of Eliphaz and grandson of Esau (Gn 36^{11} R), as a 'duke' of Edom (Gn 36^{42} P), as the father of Othniel (Jos 15^{17} JE), and as the grandson of Caleb (1 Ch 4^{15}). The Kenizzites (AV Kenezites), who are named amongst the inhabitants of Canaan in patriarchal times (Gn 15^{19} R), had probably their original settlements in Mt. Seir (which would account for K. being called a grandson of Esau or Edom), and from thence a branch migrated to the S. of Canaan (see CALEB). The Chronicler makes K. a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4^{13-15}).

KENITES (הַקֵּינִי, הַקֵּנִי; in Nu 24^{22}, Jg 4^{11} קַיִן, οἱ Κεναῖοι, Κιναῖοι, Cinæus, Kain), first mentioned in Gn 15^{19} along with the Kenizzites and Kadmonites of Edom. Balaam 'looked upon' them from the mountains of Moab, and punning upon the likeness of their name to the Hebrew ḳên, 'nest,' declared that though their 'nest' was 'in a rock' (Ṣela', perhaps the later Petra), they should be 'wasted'* until Asshur should carry them away captive (Nu $24^{21.22}$). Acc. to Jg 1^{16}, Hobab, the father-in-law of Moses, was a Kenite, and his descendants 'went up out of the city of palm trees with the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah, which is in the south of Arad; and they went and dwelt among the people.' It was in this direction that the Jewish town of Kinah stood (Jos 15^{22}). We find one of the Kenites, Heber, separating himself from the rest of the tribe and camping in the northern part of Israel, near Kedesh, at the time of the overthrow of Sisera (Jg $4^{11.17}$). The Chronicler includes them among the ancestors of the great houses of Judah (1 Ch 2^{55}); and Saul forewarned the Kenites of his intended attack on the Amalekites or Bedâwin, as they had 'showed kindness to all the children of Israel when they came up out of Egypt' (1 S 15^{6}). Similarly, when David pretended to Achish of Gath that he had raided the enemies of the Philistines, he associates together the Israelites of S. Judah, the Jerahmeelites (1 Ch 2^{25}) and the Kenites (1 S 27^{10}). Subsequently he sent presents out of the spoil which he had acquired to 'the elders of Judah' who 'were in the cities of the Kenites' (1 S 30^{29}). Hammath, the ancestor of the Rechabites, is also stated to have been a Kenite (1 Ch 2^{55}).

It is thus clear that the K. were regarded as closely allied to the Isr., or at all events to the tribe of Judah. As the father-in-law of Moses was priest of Midian, it would seem that they were also connected with the Midianites. Like the Bedâwin, they were nomads, and the description of the Rechabites (Jer 35^{6-10}) shows that even under the monarchy those who lived in the land of Israel still inhabited tents and clung to all the nomadic habits of their forefathers. As was natural, they were chiefly to be found in the south of Judah, and more especially in the desert to the south of it. They thus resembled the gipsies of modern Europe, as well as the travelling tinkers or blacksmiths of the Middle Ages.

Indeed, it is not improbable that they really represent a tribe of smiths. The word Ḳênî or 'Kenite' means 'a smith' in Aramaic, from a root which has given ḳayin, 'a lance,' in Hebrew. We know that the smiths of the ancient world formed a corporation which was regarded as possessing special secrets, and whose members led wandering lives. We also know that in the time of Samuel the Israelites had no smiths of their own, all having been removed by the Philistines 'lest the Hebrews make them swords or spears' (1 S $13^{19.20}$). It would appear, therefore, that the blacksmith's art was confined to a particular corporation, and that the Israelites were unacquainted with it. Yet the art of working in iron as well as bronze was known in Canaan at an early period: in the Travels of the Mohar, a story written in Egypt in the time of Ramses II., the hero of the tale finds an iron-smith ready to hand when an accident happens to his chariot.

Josephus, who elsewhere calls the Kenites Κενετίδες, speaks of them as 'the race of the Shechemites' (Σικιμιτῶν) in his account of Saul's expedition (Ant. VI. vii. 3). The Targums transform the name into Salmaite, from Salma, 'the father of Beth-lehem,' who seems to be termed a Kenite in 1 Ch $2^{54.55}$. The Sam. VS of Gn 15^{19} inserts the same name before 'Kenite.'

* Hommel (AHT 245 n.) follows Klostermann in reading לְעֵבֶר for לְבָעֵר, 'Kain shall belong to the 'Eber.' The emendation is not a happy one, any more than Hommel's explanation of Ash(h)ur in the same passage.

KENIZZITE.—See Kenaz.

KENOSIS (Lat. inanitio, exinanitio, evacuatio; Eng. 'self-stripping,' 'self-divesting,' 'self-emptying'). — This is not a biblical word, occurring neither in the LXX nor in the NT (though once in its literal sense in Theod.'s trⁿ of Is 34^{11}). It is a technical word of later theology found in some fragments of the κατὰ Βήρωνος καὶ Ἥλικος, wrongly attributed to Hippolytus, in Gregory of Nazianzus (Or. 31), Cyril of Alexandria (Ep. 2 ad Nest. 70A), and later writers, to express the action implied in the use of the cognate verb in Ph 2^7 ἑαυτὸν ἐκένωσεν ('semetipsum exinanivit,' Vulg.; 'exhausit semetipsum,' Tert. adv. Marc. v. 20; 'made himself of no reputation,' AV; 'emptied himself,' RV).

In this passage the extent of the self-emptying is explained by the following participle, μορφὴν δούλου λαβών: that of which He emptied Himself, by the preceding words, τὸ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ: so that the meaning is 'He emptied Himself' of His position of equality with God, of 'that condition of glory and majesty which was the adequate manifestation of the divine nature' (Gifford, ad loc.; cf. κενώσας ἑαυτὸν ἀπὸ τοῦ εἶναι ἴσα θεῷ, Synod of Antioch, ap. Routh, Rell. Sacr. iii. p. 298) by 'taking on Himself the form of a servant.' The phrase means little more than that He accepted the limitations implied in incarnation (cf. ἐπτώχευσεν πλούσιος ὤν, 2 Co 8^9), and was probably suggested to St. Paul as the antithesis to the conception of the fulness (πλήρωμα) of God which dwelt essentially in His Son. In correspondence with this, kenosis in its earliest theological use is little more than a synonym for the Incarnation, but it emphasized the Incarnation as a divine act, human nature being saved from above rather than by self-development from below, and hence it is a favourite word with Cyril in his argument against Nestorius; it emphasized also the free voluntary condescension of the preincarnate Son, and the fact that there were real limitations imposed by Himself upon Himself during the incarnate life. It is put forward by St. Paul as an example of the way in which men should not look only each to his own things, but each also to the things of others. But mediæval and Reformed theology attempted to define more exactly what these limitations were, and with this there followed a change in the exact meaning of the word kenosis.

(a) It was applied to the limitations upon the Christ in His incarnate human life; to the limitations imposed upon divine omnipotence and divine omniscience within the human sphere of action, in order to allow a real growth and action of human will and human knowledge; and the word was sometimes used widely to apply to all such limitations, sometimes (e.g. in the discussions of the 17th cent.) it was used, in antithesis to κρύψις, of a virtual surrender of such attributes, as opposed to a possession but conscious restraint in the use of them. On these exact points the Bible does not define, but it supplies the factors that have to be reconciled, viz. the reality of a divine oneness between the Father and the Son (Jn 1^{1-18} 10^{30}, He 1^3), certain limitations of perfect intercourse between the Father and the Incarnate Son (Mt 27^{46} ἵνα τί με ἐγκατέλιπες;), certain statements of the Lord Himself as to the limitations of His own knowledge (Mk 13^{32}) and of His own 'glory' (Jn 17^4), and statements of NT writers as to the reality of temptation, and of growth in wisdom and learning in Him (Lk 2^{40-52}, He 4^{15} $5^{7.8}$). The analogy of the primary use of the word by St. Paul also suggests that the kenosis was always a self-kenosis; that as the original Incarnation was an act of voluntary self-restraint, so the whole state of the incarnate life implied a constant voluntary limitation imposed upon a power or a knowledge that was His by right (cf. Gore, ubi infra, p. 218; Ottley, Incarnation, ii. 291), 'He willed not to use His power, not to use His knowledge,' is a surer formula than 'He could not.'

(b) It has been also applied to limitations imposed upon the Incarnate Christ with respect to His divine attributes as exercised within the divine sphere of action during the incarnate life; so that kenosis will imply the absolute or partial cessation of the Word's cosmic functions while He was incarnate. On this point, again, the Bible supplies no clear teaching, though the language of He 1^3 (ὢν . . . φέρων . . . ἐκάθισεν) seems to imply a permanence of cosmic functions; and such a cessation conflicts not only with the general stream of Christian theology, but with the conception of the unchangeable character of the divine nature.

KERAS (Κηράς, AV Ceras), 1 Es 5^{29}.—Head of a family of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel; called Keros (קֵרֹס, A Κήραος, B Καδής), Ezr 2^{44}, Neh 7^{47} (ℵA Κειράς, B -ρά).

KERCHIEFS (מִסְפָּחוֹת, ἐπιβόλαια) are mentioned only in Ezk $13^{18.21}$, where a woe is pronounced upon the false prophetesses 'who sew bands (or fillets, not pillows as in AV, RV) upon all joints of the hands, and make kerchiefs for the head of (persons of) every stature, to hunt souls.' The passage is somewhat obscure, but the reference appears to be undoubtedly to some species of divination practised in order to obtain oracles. The מִסְפָּחוֹת seem to have been large veils or coverings thrown over the head and reaching down to the feet (and this is the original meaning of the Eng. word), and were adapted to every stature. The wearer of the fillets and 'kerchiefs' was in this way introduced into the magical circle (cf. Davidson's and Bertholet's notes in their Comm. ad loc.). Hitzig notes the analogy of the later practice of wearing tĕphillîm and putting on the large ṭallith at prayer (cf. Mt 23^5).

In the Wyclifite Bible of 1382 occurs the form 'couercheues' (Is 3^{23}, changed in 1388 into 'kercheues'), which shows the derivation from Fr. couvre-chef (couvrir to cover, chef the head). The Geneva version has 'vailes upon the head' in the text, but in marg. 'kerchefes to couer their heades.' The Bishops' Bible first gives 'kerchiefes' in the text. When the derivation of the word was obscured, it came to be used more generally for any small piece of dress. In this sense the word is still familiar in 'handkerchief,' though both 'kerchief' itself and its other compound 'neckerchief' are nearly gone out (see Craik, Eng. of Shaks. 176).

KERÊ.—See Text of Old Testament.

KEREN-HAPPUCH (קֶרֶן הַפּוּךְ, literally 'horn of antimony,' so Vulg.; LXX strangely Ἀμαλθείας κέρας, 'horn of Amalthæa,' i.e. plenty). — The youngest daughter born to Job in his second estate of prosperity (Job 42^{14}). The name is indicative of beautiful eyes, from the dye made of antimony, used to tinge the eyelashes (cf. Dillm. or Davidson, ad loc.; and see 2 K 9^{30}, Jer 4^{30}).

KERIOTH (קְרִיּוֹת).—A place in Moab, Jer 48^{24} (in v.^{41} with art. הַקְּרִיּוֹת, RVm 'the cities'), Am 2^2. It is mentioned on the Moabite Stone, l. 13, where Mesha declares that he dragged 'the altar-hearth of Davdoh (?) before Chemosh * in Ḳeriyyoth'. Its site is uncertain, but weighty arguments have been adduced in favour of identifying it with Ar (wh. see), the capital of Moab (Is 15^{1}), which was probably situated in the valley of the Arnon, somewhere on the N. or N.E. border of Moab (see Driver on Am 2^{2} and Dt $2^{9.18}$, and cf. Buhl, GAP 270, who identifies Kerioth, however, not with Ar, but with Kir—the latter of which again he identifies with Rabbath-moab, while he considers Ar to be the name not of a city, but of a district, that, namely, to the south of the Arnon). J. A. SELBIE.

KERIOTH-HEZRON (קְרִיּוֹת־חֶצְרוֹן, LXX αἱ πόλεις Ασερών, AV 'Kerioth [and] Hezron).—A place in the Negeb of Judah (Jos 15^{25}, where it is added, 'which is Hazor.' See HAZOR, No. 4, and HEZRON, p. 379^{b}). Kerioth-hezron should probably be identified with the modern Ḳarjetein, N.E. of Tell 'Arâd. In all probability this was the birthplace of the traitor disciple Judas (wh. see), the name Iscariot being=אִישׁ קְרִיּוֹת 'man of Kerioth.' This is much more plausible than the conjecture which connects Iscariot with Azkaroth of Midrash Bereshith rabba, ch. 98, which Schwarz (Das heil. Land, p. 128) identifies with el-'Askar (Sychar ?).

KESITAH.—The ḳĕsîṭāh (קְשִׂיטָה) is mentioned only three times in the OT (Gn 33^{19}, Jos 24^{32}, Job 42^{11}). In the first and primary passage—to which one of the other passages certainly, and both probably (cf. Budde's 'Hiob,' Einleit. p. xliii) refer—Jacob is represented as paying a hundred ḳĕsiṭāhs for the 'parcel of ground where he had spread his tent' at Shalem. The ḳĕsîtah therefore must have been a standard of value, probably metallic (cf. Job 42^{11}). Its meaning and value in modern currency, however, are entirely unknown. The oldest versions (LXX, Onkelos, Vulgate) give 'lamb' or 'sheep,' on what grounds we do not know. In our Eng. VSS the rendering is 'piece of money' (AV once 'piece of silver,' Jos 24^{32}). Ball, in Haupt's SBOT (Genesis, p. 91), proposes for philological reasons to point קְשִׁיטָה ḳĕshîṭāh. Spurrell (Notes on Gen.^{2} p. 288) has a good note (wh. see). Cf. Madden, Coins of the Jews, p. 11; Jacobé, 'La Kesita' in Rev. de l'hist. et de litt. Bibl. i. 6, pp. 515–518 (not seen); and see art. MONEY in this Dictionary.

KETAB (Κητάβ, AV Cetab), 1 Es 5^{30}.—Head of a family of temple servants who returned with Zerubbabel. There is no corresponding name in the lists of Ezr and Neh.

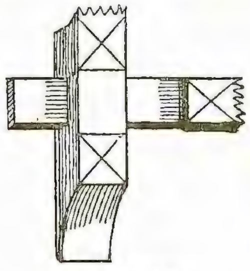
KETHIBH.—See TEXT OF OLD TESTAMENT.

KETTLE.—See FOOD, p. 40, V. 2.

KETURAH (קְטוּרָה 'incense').—According to Gn 25^{1} (probably J), Abraham, after the death of Sarah (this is certainly the meaning intended by the compiler of Gn in its present form), again took (וַיֹּסֶף וַיִּקַּח) a wife (אִשָּׁה), Keturah, who bore to him six sons, who became the ancestors of Arab tribes. In v.^{6} (R) she bears the less honourable designation of פִּילֶגֶשׁ 'concubine' (cf. 1 Ch 1^{32}). The Keturah episode in Abraham's life is an evidence at once of the presence of different documents in Gn, the hopelessness of discovering a consistent chronology in that book, and the tendency of personal to shade off into tribal history. In the light of Gn 17^{17} 'Shall a child be born to him that is a hundred years old?' it would be strange if the same writer, according to whose chronology Abraham was 137 years old at the time of Sarah's death (Gn 23^{1}), should relate, without remark, the birth of six sons to him after that event. Of course the difficulty disappears when we observe that a tradition independent of P and P's chronology is preserved by J in Gn 25^{1-5}, relating to Keturah. Further, as has been shown already in art. ABRAHAM (p. 16^{a}), it is impossible to resist the conclusion that the Keturah story is really an embodiment of the Israelitish belief of the relationship of Arabian clans and tribes to the Hebrew stock rather than the record of personal history.

From the meaning of the name Keturah, 'frankincense,' Sprenger (Geog. Arab. 295) suggests that the 'sons of Keturah' were so named because the author of Gn $25^{1ff.}$ knew them as traders in that commodity. A tribe Ḳatûrâ, living in the neighbourhood of Mecca, is named by the later Arab genealogists (Ritter, Erdkunde, xii. 19 ff.). On the various Keturah tribes of Gn 25 see sep. articles on the names of these. J. A. SELBIE.

KEY, LOCK.—Many of the old houses in Lebanon have still the ancient wooden lock commonly known in England as the Egyptian lock. It is generally fixed on the outside of the door, but in large villages and towns it is often put on the inside, a hole being cut in the door to allow the arm with the key to be inserted.



OUTSIDE OF LOCK.

The Syrian lock consists of two pieces of wood set at right angles to each other. The upright piece is nailed to the door, and has in its upper part four or five holes bored, into which headed pins, or nails with the points cut off, are dropped; the upper part of these holes is then plugged with wood. When the cross-bolt is pushed rapidly into the socket in the door-post these pins fall into holes made in the bolt to receive them, and so prevent its withdrawal. The bolt is hollow from the outer end for rather more than half its length, and into this hollow end the key (מַפְתֵּחַ) is inserted. The latter is a piece of wood about 9 in. long, with pins inserted in its upper surface at one end, to correspond with the holes in the bolt. When the pins in the key enter the holes in the bolt the key is pressed upwards, and the pins of the lock are thus raised above the bolt, which is then set free, and is withdrawn by the key. The length of the bolt is usually about 8½ in., but there are locks very much larger. The key, owing to its size, is generally stuck in the girdle, but is sometimes tied to a handkerchief and slung over the shoulder. The principle of this lock is really the same as that of Bramah's and Chubb's locks. See, further, art. HOUSE, p. 434 f.

Doors or gates are sometimes barred on the inside. The bar often extends from post to post across the door, but frequently the bar is inserted into a recess in the wall from which it is partly withdrawn, and so secures the door.

KEZIAH (קְצִיעָה, i.e. cassia, or 'fragrant as cinnamon').—The name of the second daughter born to Job after his restoration to prosperity (Job 42^{14}).

KIBROTH-HATTAAVAH (קִבְרוֹת הַתַּאֲוָה).—A station in the wanderings of the Israelites on the journey from Sinai to Kadesh, and within one day's journey from Sinai, Nu 11^{34} 33^{16}, Dt 9^{22}. Its identification depends, therefore, on those of Sinai and Kadesh (which see). The traditional site, as early as the days of St. Sylvia of Aquitaine (c. A.D. 388), was a little to the north of the Nukb el-Hawa, or 'Pass of the Wind,' by which travellers are wont to reach expeditiously the plain at the foot of the traditional Sinai ('hic autem locus, ubi se montes aperiebant, iunctus est cum eo loco quo sunt memoriœ concupiscentiœ'). The name, 'graves of lust,' seems to imply something of a monumental character (? cairn, cromlech). J. RENDEL HARRIS.

KID.—See GOAT.

KIDNEYS.—The Heb. word kĕlāyôth (כְּלָיוֹת, LXX and Rev 2^{23} νεφροί) has received two distinct renderings in our EV according as it is used literally or figuratively.

1. In the literal sense kĕlāyôth is used only of the kidneys of animals offered in sacrifice (except in three poetical passages, Job 16^{13}, Ps 139^{13}, La 3^{13}, where it refers to the human organs), and is so rendered. By the law of the Priests' Code, 'the two kidneys and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks' (RV loins *), along with certain other parts of the viscera, were J‴'s special share of all the sacrificial victims. Special instructions to this effect are given (Lv $3^{4.\ 10.\ 15}$) for the various victims in the case of the peace-offering—the remaining portions of the carcase being consumed by the worshippers, the blood, of course, always excepted—for the sin-offering (4^9), the trespass-offering (7^4), and, in narrative form, for the special consecration sacrifices ($8^{16.\ 25.\ 28}$, Ex $29^{13.\ 22}$). In the case of sacrificial victims burnt entire upon the altar, such instructions were unnecessary. The raison d'être of the peculiar sanctity attaching to these parts of the viscera is to be found in the idea, common to the Semitic and other ancient peoples, that these parts were, next to the blood, the seat of life (see esp. RS[1] p. 359 ff.), and accordingly, with the blood, to be given back to the Author of life. With the advance of reflexion and speculation on the mystery of life, the practice found its justification rather in the thought that the parts specified, and the kidneys in particular, were the choicest portions of the victim, and therefore appropriately devoted to J″. This point of view led to the poetical figure in the comparatively late 'Song of Moses,' the 'kidney-fat of wheat' (Dt 32^{14}, EV 'the fat of kidneys of wheat') to express the finest variety of that cereal (cf. Is 34^6 'the kidney-fat of rams').

2. A natural extension of the idea of the kidneys as an important seat of life led to their being regarded as one of the organs of feeling, as the seat not only of impulse and affection, but of the moral sentiments (see Delitzsch, Biblical Psychology, § xiii.; Dillmann, Handb. d. AT Theologie, p. 359). In this, to us figurative, sense our translators have adopted the rendering 'reins' (from Lat. renes, 'kidneys'), as also in the three poetical passages cited above (under 1). Jeremiah in particular is fond of this use of the word kĕlāyôth as a synonym of lēbh, the heart. Thus J″ is said to be 'near' in the mouth of the wicked, but far from their 'reins' (Jer 12^2), a thought expressed by Isaiah (29^{13}) and Ezekiel (33^{31}) by the contrast of 'mouth' and 'heart.' Jeremiah also repeatedly emphasizes J‴'s character as the supreme Judge who 'tries the reins and heart' of men (Jer 11^{20}, with slight variations 17^{10} 20^{12}; cf. Ps 26^2, Rev 2^{23}). The kidneys or reins are also represented in poetry as the seat of conscience, man's moral teacher (Ps 7^9 'my reins instruct me'), monitor (73^{21} 'I was pricked in my reins'), and approving judge (Pr 23^{16} 'my reins shall rejoice, when thy lips speak right things'). With this thought may be compared the late Jewish conceit that of man's two kidneys, 'one prompts him to do good, the other to do evil' (Talmud, Berakhoth 61*a*; cf. Ro $7^{19\text{ff.}}$). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KIDRON, THE BROOK (נַחַל קִדְרוֹן [i.e. 'the torrent-valley or wādy of Kidron']; LXX ὁ χειμάῤῥους Κεδρών, but twice (2 S 15^{23a} [B] ^{b} [A], 1 K 15^{13} AB) ὁ χειμάῤῥους τῶν Κέδρων, once (Jer 31 [Gr. 38]^{40}) νάχαλ [B; A χειμάῤῥους] K.; NT, only in Jn 18^1 ὁ χειμάῤῥους τῶν Κέδρων, or according to some MSS, τοῦ Κέδρου or τοῦ Κεδρών).—A deep depression in the ground on the east side of Jerusalem, which is dry not only in summer but also during the greater part of the winter season, but in which after heavy rains a torrent sometimes flows.

The generally accepted explanation of the name (קִדְרוֹן from root קדר 'become black') is from the dark colour of the stream or the ravine.

Baur, who has been followed by Hilgenfeld, has made this the basis of an elaborate attack on the Fourth Gospel, arguing that the writer has imagined Κεδρων to be the genitive plural of κέδρος, 'a cedar,' and therefore cannot be the Apostle John, who as a Jew would have known that the name was derived from קִדְרוֹן 'dark.' Lightfoot, who in his Biblical Essays discusses this objection, dwells upon the fact, already alluded to, that in two passages in the LXX (2 S 15^{23}, and 1 K 15^{13}) the reading which has the support of AB is τῶν κέδρων; yet the LXX translators cannot have mistaken the meaning of the word, otherwise they could not have written, as they generally do, ὁ χειμάῤῥους Κέδρων, which on this supposition would be a solecism. Lightfoot also calls attention to the great uncertainty as to the actual reading in Jn 18^1; and, though the preponderance of MS evidence is either for τῶν Κέδρων or τοῦ Κέδρου, he believes the true account to be that the original reading was τοῦ Κεδρών; because this reading will explain the other two, whereas neither of the other two will explain either this or each other; and also because it is much more probable that τοῦ Κεδρών would be changed into τῶν Κέδρων and τοῦ Κέδρου, than conversely, the tendency being to assimilate terminations. This solution was adopted by Griesbach and Lachmann. Westcott and Hort, however, in their 'Notes on Select Readings' defend the reading τῶν Κέδρων, and regard it as probably preserving 'the true etymology of קִדְרוֹן, which seems to be an archaic (? Canaanite) plural of קדר, "the Dark [trees]"; for though no name from this root is applied to any tree in biblical Hebrew, some tree resembling a cedar was called by a similar name in at least the later language (see exx. in Buxtorf, Lex. Talm. 1976); and the Greek κέδρος is probably of Phœnician origin.' WH rightly maintain that נַחַל denoted not so much the stream as the ravine through which it flowed, and remark that isolated patches of cedar-forest may well have survived from prehistoric times in sheltered spots.

The Valley of Kidron (modern Wādy Sitti Marjam) begins towards the north-west of Jerusalem at the foot of Mount Scopus, where the rocks appear to have been hollowed out by quarrying for stones for building tombs; afterwards it turns to the right towards the south, separating Jerusalem by a deep depression of the ground from the Mount of Olives. It is here at the east side of the city that the name Kidron was specially applied to it, for the descent is here much steeper than at the north side of Jerusalem; but the whole forms one continuous channel. Near the site of Gethsemane, where the ravine may have been crossed by our Lord and the eleven apostles on the evening of the betrayal, the bottom of the Kidron is about 150 ft. below Gethsemane, but nearly 380 ft. below the platform of the temple. The bed of the river becomes more perceptible as it turns towards the south, though it is only on rare occasions that water flows in it. There is, however, a curious spring which rises in a cave on the west side of the Kidron, and which appears to have originally flowed into the Kidron valley, but to have been diverted later through a tunnel cut in the rock through the ridge that forms the southern part of the Temple hill. A remarkable inscription was discovered in 1880 which records in pure Hebrew the making of this tunnel; and though it unfortunately gives no information about its date other than what can be inferred from the language and the characters in which it is written, it is conjectured with some probability that it may refer to the engineering work which was carried out by Hezekiah at the time of Sennacherib's invasion of Judæa, when 'he took counsel with his princes to stop the waters of the fountains which were without the city, and they helped him. So there was gathered much people together, and they stopped all the fountains, and the brook that flowed through the midst of the land' (2 Ch $32^{3.4}$). Robinson had suggested long before this discovery that the Kidron might very possibly flow beneath the present surface of the ground; and Barclay asserted that at a point in the valley about two miles below the city the murmuring of a stream could be distinctly heard, which stream on excavating he actually discovered. There may, therefore, before the time of Hezekiah, have been a flow of water in the now dry valley of the Kidron.

On leaving the city, the Kidron valley turns south-east towards the Dead Sea, and as it proceeds becomes deeper and more precipitous, its bed being more than 300 ft. deep. It passes here through a barren and desolate region, where many of the Essenes and anchorites made their homes in grottoes which have been excavated in its sides.

The name Kidron does not occur in the earlier books of the Bible; but after David had made Jerusalem the capital of the kingdom, the physical geography of the country in its immediate neighbourhood naturally became more closely connected with the history of Judah than it had hitherto been.

The first mention is in 2 S 15^{23}, where in the story of David's flight from Absalom it is recorded that he passed over the brook (naḥal) Kidron. The next mention is in 1 K 2^{37}, in the prohibition to Shimei against his ever crossing Kidron. This passage has been relied on by some scholars (e.g. Sir G. Grove) as showing that the name of Kidron was sometimes given to the ravines on the west of Jerusalem; since otherwise Solomon's prohibition would not have been trangressed by Shimei's journey to Gath to recover his fugitive slaves; for whether Gath be identified with Tell es-Safied or with Beit Jibrîn, it would in either case be by the western or Bethlehem gate that Shimei would leave the city, and the valley on the east side would be altogether out of his way. The narrative, however, does not assert that he actually passed over Kidron; and indeed, when it is carefully examined, it rather suggests the contrary. In the prohibition Shimei is commanded, 'Go not forth thence any whither,' and then the king adds, 'For on the day thou goest out and passest over the brook Kidron, know thou for certain that thou shalt surely die.' But in the recapitulation of the prohibition made after Shimei's journey to Gath, it is the general command 'not to walk abroad any whither' which alone is dwelt on, and there is now no mention of Kidron at all. The reason for its having been expressly mentioned in the original prohibition probably was because it was on the direct road to Shimei's home at Bahurîm, and was the boundary of the city on that side.

The later references to the Kidron in the historical books of the OT all without exception occur in the accounts given of the destruction of heathen images and altars which were either burned at Kidron, or, when broken or ground to powder, were cast into its valley or on the graves which studded it. In 1 K 15^{13} and in 2 Ch 15^{16} it is recorded that Asa burned at Kidron the idol which his mother had set up; and in 2 Ch 29^{16} and 30^{14} that Hezekiah cast into the Kidron the pollutions which had been found in the temple, and the altars that were in Jerusalem; and in 2 K $23^{4.6.12}$ that Josiah burned at Kidron the Asherah that had been in the house of the LORD, and stamped it small to powder, and cast the powder thereof upon the graves of the children of the people. As graves were regarded as polluting all who walked over them or came in contact with them, the intention of these reforming kings was clearly to dishonour thus the images to which worship had been paid, and the altars which had been used in that worship; but from the words of 2 Ch 34^{5} 'it would appear that in Josiah's case at least there was some intention of also dishonouring the graves,' for it is there expressly said that he strewed the dust of the images upon the graves of them that had sacrificed unto them.

The neighbourhood of Kidron would seem to be referred to in Jer 26^{23}; but the only place in the prophetical writings in which it is mentioned by name is in Jer 31^{40}. The passage is a remarkable one. 'And the whole valley of the dead bodies, and of the ashes, and all the fields unto the brook Kidron, unto the corner of the horse gate toward the east, shall be holy unto the LORD, it shall not be plucked up, nor thrown down any more for ever'.

The popular name for the Kidron valley, the Valley of Jehoshaphat (wh. see), is not found in the Bible or in Josephus, and cannot be traced earlier than the 4th cent. after Christ. It appears first in the Onomasticon of Eusebius (272, 89), and then in Jerome's Onomasticon (145, 13), and in his Commentary on Joel. It is derived from a supposed identification of the valley of the Kidron with the valley spoken of in Joel's prophecy (Jl $3^{2.12}$). The identification of the two is clearly an error (but see Driver, ad loc.). The narrow ravine of Kidron would be a most unsuitable place for the gathering of the nations; and it is to be noted that the word twice used by Joel for the Valley of Jehoshaphat is עֵמֶק, which denotes a wide spacious valley fit for cornfields and suitable for a battlefield, whereas the word habitually employed for the Kidron valley in the OT is נַחַל, denoting a narrow valley or ravine (the modern wâdy); and these words are never interchanged. There is, however, one passage—2 K 23^{4}—in which the expression shadmôth Ḳidrôn (Heb. שַׁדְמוֹת קִדְרוֹן, LXX σαδημώθ [A; σαλημώθ B] Κεδρών) occurs, which is translated both in AV and RV 'fields of Kidron' (prob. a point at the junction with the Valley of Hinnom), but the usual term, naḥal, is again used in 2 K 23^{6}.

It has been suggested that the name, 'the Valley of Jehoshaphat' in Jl may be a purely imaginary name, and may represent a locality which had no existence except in the vision of the prophet. Robinson (BRP^{2} i. 269) conjectures that it may be a metaphorical allusion to the significance of the name Jehoshaphat, 'J″ judgeth.' This view appears to be favoured by the tr^{n} of Theodotion, χώρα κρίσεως, and by that of Targ. Jon. 'The place of the decision of judgment.' Michaelis takes this view, and supposes it to be a prediction of Maccabæan victories. It has also been suggested that the frequent mention by Joel of Mount Zion, Jerusalem, and the Temple, may have led to the belief that the valley spoken of in the same prophecy was in the immediate neighbourhood.

This characteristic of the prophet Joel may, however, suggest a somewhat different conclusion. His frequent use of the names of real localities in his prophecies may be appealed to as making it probable that the vision of the Valley of Jehoshaphat may also be connected with a real locality. It may be noted that the word used by the Chronicler (2 Ch 20^{26}) to describe the valley in which Jehoshaphat assembled the people after his victory over the combined forces of the Edomites, Ammonites, and Moabites is the same word (עֵמֶק) which is twice used by Joel to describe the valley of Jehoshaphat. The author of Ch is, of course, one of the later writers of the OT, but he is more ancient than the other authorities quoted. The historical event is recorded in Kings as well as in Chronicles, though the account in Ch is fuller. The defeat of so many nations, and the great deliverance thus granted to Judah in the past, might have seemed to the prophet a not unapt type of the future gathering of the nations, and of the victory over them which he foretold. This might help to explain the transference of the title the 'Valley of Jehoshaphat' to the Kidron valley in later times: for the valley which was the scene of Jehoshaphat's victory stretches very near that part of the Kidron which turns towards the Dead Sea.

At the present time the Jewish as well as the Christian and Mohammedan population of Palestine identify the valley of Kidron with the scene of Joel's prophecy, and believe that the Last Judgment will be held there. It is the dearest wish of every Jew to obtain a grave at Kidron.

One of the four monuments by the Kidron at the foot of the Mount of Olives is associated by popular tradition with Jehoshaphat, though it is recorded in 1 K 22^{50} that Jehoshaphat was buried in the city of David. This is repeated in 2 Ch 21^{1}.

The title given to Kidron in Jer 31^{40} 'the valley of the dead bodies,' suggests that Ezekiel, who so often repeats more fully notes which had been struck by Jeremiah, may have intended to represent Kidron by the valley of dry bones to which he was carried out in the spirit of the Lord (Ezk 37). The imagery, indeed, of the vision may have been suggested by sights which he had seen in Mesopotamia, in the desert track where, as Stanley remarks, bones and skeletons of man and beast, the remnants of some vast caravan or the burial-place of some mighty host of ancient days, dry and bleaching in the yellow sands, would form a sight familiar to travellers through the wilderness; yet, as in a dream, imagery taken from one place is often transferred to another and a distant locality, so it may have been with the prophet whose spirit was so often in the land of Israel while his body was by the banks of the Chebar (cf. Ezk 40^{2}), and who by the words with which ch. 37 opens seems to represent the locality to which he was carried out as a distant one.

KIDRON (in 1 Mac 15^{39} τὴν Κεδρών [Καιδρ-] A, א om. τήν; in v.^{41} τὴν Κεδρώ A, Κεδρών א*, Χεβρών א$^{\text{c. a. c. b}}$; in 16^{9} Κεδρών Aא).—A place fortified by Cendebæus (1 Mac $15^{39.\ 41}$), and the point to which he was pursued after his defeat by the sons of Simon the Maccabee (16^{9}). It is named in connexion with Jamnia, and may be the modern Kaṭrah near Yebna. It is possibly the same town that is called Gederoth in Jos 15^{41}, 2 Ch 28^{18}.

LITERATURE.—SWP vol. iii. sheet xvi.; Guérin, Judée, ii. 35 f.; Baedeker-Socin, Pal.^{2} 210; Buhl, GAP 188; Dillm. on Jos 15^{36}.

KILAN (A Κιλάν, B Κειλάν, AV Ceilan), 1 Es 5^{15}.—Sixty-seven sons of Kilan and Azetas returned with Zerub. from captivity. There are no corresponding names in the lists of Ezr 2 and Neh 7.

KINAH (קִינָה).—A town in the extreme south of Judah, Jos 15^{22}. The site is unknown. The common noun ḳînah means 'wailing song,' 'lament for the dead'; but it is possible that the name of the above town is derived from the Kenites (קֵינִי), who settled in the Negeb (Nu 10^{32}), and had several cities in that quarter (1 S 30^{29}). See Dillm. Josua, p. 525.

KINDNESS (חֶסֶד [see careful study of this term in W. R. Smith, Proph. of Isr. 160 ff. 406]; χρηστότης).—1. Religion is and ought to be determinative of human life in general, and so in particular it moulds the grace of kindness. God was kind to the people of Israel, looking upon their affliction in Egypt and delivering them (Ex 3). The people were frequently reminded of this merciful intervention of J″, and it was set before them as the ground of obedience and of action resembling His. Israel was not to oppress or vex a stranger, but to love him, for they knew the heart of a stranger, having been strangers in Egypt (Ex 22^{21} 23^{9}, Lv $19^{33\text{f.}}$). The laws in the Book of the Covenant are specially marked by the requirement of kindness to the poor and needy, and the succeeding laws and the exhortations of the prophets continue to press the obligation. Indeed, God's pardon for sin and His rich spiritual blessings are made dependent in part on the suppliant's kindness to others in distress (Is $1^{15\text{-}17}$ $58^{6\text{ff.}}$).

Christ revealed God as the Father of men, and the kindness and mercy He enjoined on His followers resemble the type of these which is manifested by God. The divine Father regards men as potentially His true sons, and yearns for the prodigal's return (Lk 15^{20}). To effect His merciful purpose He uses the instruments of kindness—even His severity is kind. He makes His sun rise on the evil and the good (Mt 5^{45}), and blesses even the unbelieving with rain and fruitful seasons and gladness of heart (Ac 14^{17}), and He sent Christ to reveal Himself by miracles of kindness, and by opening up a way of spiritual salvation. Love to God will dispose men to view others as He does, i.e. as persons who are laden with suffering, but capable of the highest things, and as most likely to be influenced for good by love and kindness (Lk $6^{35\text{f.}}$, 1 Jn 3^{17}).

2. (a) Intensively, kindness is limited, or at least its form is regulated, by the condition that righteousness must be maintained and developed. A holy God cannot bestow complete happiness on the unholy. Penitence, faith, and new obedience are therefore demanded in men, and the misery endured while they are absent or deficient is but a proof of God's kindness. So, if man's brother sin against him, he must be induced to repent and turn from the wrong (Mt $18^{15\text{ff.}}$). He who only showers promiscuous benefits on the evil-doer shows no true kindness to the latter or to the community, but rather encourages the sinner in sin, and so shares in it. Here kindness is manifested in reclaiming the offender from evil (which must be clearly represented as such), and in particular by the manner in which he is approached, by signs of goodwill, by patience, forbearance, timely speech, and timely silence, and all those nameless, conciliatory arts which can spring only from that love which suffereth long and is kind, and seeketh not her own (1 Co $13^{4f.}$). The ends of righteousness and of true kindness further require that man shall be just before being generous (although when a material debt is paid we still fail to give others their due if it is discharged without love, Ro $13^{7f.}$), and that there be no indiscriminate or injudicious bestowal of aid, such as would tend to lessen another's self-respect and reliance on self-help (2 Th $3^{7ff.}$), not to speak of actions which are only to be described as officious (1 P 4^{15}). So, too, it is needful to adhere to the truth, at the risk of an apparent want of kindness. The Christian should endeavour to rise to the height of Christ's example, so as to be able, on occasion given, to speak the truth to those who are in trying circumstances, with such a spirit of faith and glad confidence in the fatherly love of God that the announcement will have, not a hurtful but, as far as may be, a soothing and bracing effect (Eph $4^{15.25}$). Kindness, therefore, is based on righteous Christian love as its principle and motive; and our Lord's golden rule (Mt 7^{12}) and parable of the Good Samaritan furnish guidance for the practical application of the principle.

(b) Extensively, kindness is due to all men with whom one has to do, and even to the lower animals, the example and care of God being again our standard (Jn 4^{11}, Mt 6^{26}). People of one's own faith, as being nearer than others, and furnishing more points of contact, and yielding many services which merit gratitude, have special claims (Gal 6^{10}). But the ungodly and sinful also call for compassionate care in view of their spiritual possibilities. Even the minor courtesies of life in general human intercourse are of value (Mt $10^{12.42}$).

G. FERRIES.

KINDRED (in AV 1611 nearly always kinred) occurs in the plur. in the sense of 'families,' 1 Ch 16^{28}, Ps 22^{27} 96^{7} (all מִשְׁפָּחוֹת), Ac 3^{25} (πατριαί, RV 'families'), Rev 1^{7} 7^{9} 11^{9} 13^{7} (φυλαί, RV 'tribes'). Tindale has the sing. in the same sense, Dt 29^{18} 'Lest there be amonge you man or woman kynred or trybe that turneth awaye in his hert this daye from the Lord oure God' (AV 'family'). Cf. Elyot, Gouvernour, ii. 99, 'And also for his endeavour, prowesse, and wisedome, [Moyses] was moche estemed by Pharao and the nobles of Egipte; so that he moughte have lived there continually in moche honour and welth, if he would have preferred his singular advaile before the universall weale of his owne kynred or familie.'

KINE.—See Ox.

KING (THE OFFICE OF, IN ISRAEL).—I. ORIGIN.—1. Of the origin of the king (מֶלֶךְ melek) among Semitic peoples only uncertain inferences can be drawn from the meaning of the word and from facts more or less disputed.

MLK in Assyr. and Aram. = 'advise,' 'decree'; Arab. = 'possess,' 'rule'; Heb. and Eth. = 'rule.' This suggests that the term arose rather from the intellectual than the merely physical side, from counsel rather than prowess. He whose counsel was found best, eventually became king. Further, the term seems to have arisen after the purely nomadic stage of the Semitic nations (in which the Sheikh rules)* had ceased, yet before any had gained large territories. For king seems to be closely connected with city life, in contrast alike to unsettled wanderings and to permanent possession of large tracts of country. Thus we find in the time of Abraham several kings in a small space round the Dead Sea, and many throughout Palestine at the time of the conquest, each ruling a town with its adjacent lands, and presumably such villages as were dependent on it. The office in such cases appears to have been normally (apparently not in Edom, Gn $36^{31ff.}$) hereditary.†

2. Side by side, however, with this there existed in each Semitic city the conception of a divine King who was supreme over the whole people, and from whom it had come into being. The frequency with which the gods of Semitic nations have an appellative of which MLK forms a part (e.g. Melḳart of Tyre) or the whole (Milkom of Ammon), shows that this was one of their primary conceptions of Deity.

We may explain the fact of both God and ruler possessing the same title by supposing either that the root idea of MLK suited both alike, the term being given to the Deity as signifying Him who gives counsel (e.g. by oracle); or that the title was given to the human ruler in accordance with his claim to be descended from, or to represent, the Deity; or (though this is very improbable) that the roots are different and the identity of the words as applied to God and to the president of a city is accidental. But, whatever the cause, the fact of the identity of titles tended to strengthen enormously the king's position.

3. Of the origin of the office (not the title) of king in Israel itself we have comparatively full particulars. We see the preparation for it and its inauguration. At the Exodus Moses supplied the place of a king,‡ centralizing in himself all the visible power. We know much less of Joshua, but the same appears to have been the case with him. But after the first flush of victory was over, when the tribes were divided by whole districts of unconquered Canaanites, and the sense even of religious unity was weakened by compliance with local religious customs, the inroads of various foes produced (at God's call) guerilla chiefs who released the parts where they lived from foreign attacks. One of these, Gideon, was invited by 'the men of Israel' to 'rule' over them,§ and though he verbally refused, saying, 'The LORD shall rule over you,'‖ he appears to have ruled over his city Ophrah, for on his death his son Abimelech kills all his brothers (except Jotham) and has himself made king in Shechem (Jg 9^{6}).¶ Abimelech acted as prince (וַיָּשַׂר Jg 9^{22}) 'over

* 'Das Königthum ist in Arabien eine fremde Pflanze,' G. Jacob (Das Leben der vorislamischen Beduinen, 1895, p. 164).

† Even Ebed-Tob (c. B.C. 1400) of Urusalim implies that this was the norm, when he contrasts his own case: 'It was not my father who installed me in this place nor my mother, but the arm of the mighty king has allowed me to enter into my ancestral house' (Hommel, Ancient Heb. Trad. p. 155). Observe that in the MLK, being properly the ruler merely of a city, we have perhaps the explanation of the fact that the term was not used by the Assyrian monarchs of themselves. They may have already found this title belonging to the kings of the various cities that they had conquered, and therefore they called themselves Sar (perhaps Is 10^{8} has a satirical allusion to this nomenclature).

‡ Dt 33^{5}, however, 'and he was king in Jeshurun,' probably refers to God.

§ Mĕshōl bānū. From a comparison of Jg 9^{2} with $9^{8.10.12.14}$ this seems to be here synonymous with MLK.

‖ Jg $8^{22.23}$. To say that such a contrast between an earthly and the heavenly king is an anachronism, and that, therefore, these verses belong to a later date (Moore), is with our present knowledge of the sources of Jg much too drastic a treatment. See, further, art. JUDGES (BOOK), p. 816^{a}.

¶ We do not know the relation of Ophrah to Shechem. It is possible that they were the same place, the latter representing the Canaanite part of it, which rebelled against the Israelites.

Israel' (i.e. apparently Shechem, and a few towns near), but his death after three years prevented a prolongation of a kingship in Israel after the Canaanite form. Jephthah had a kind of headship in Gilead (Jg 11$^{6-11}$), but no more was done in the direction of the formal kingdom till the time of Samuel. Samuel had indeed conquered the Philistines at Ebenezer, and had recovered the district that had been formally taken over by the Philistines (1 S 7$^{11-14}$); but, as it seems, as he became older and less energetic, the Philistines became stronger, and by their superior weapons and organization were reducing the Israelites to a condition little better than that of serfs (1 S 13$^{19ff.}$). The danger of extinction as a nation at the hands of the Philistines was imminent, and unity in feeling and action was absolutely essential if Israel was to be preserved. It was the sense partly of this and partly of the declension of Samuel's sons from their father's uprightness in the internal administration of the district round him that led the elders of Israel to ask Samuel for a king.

The words attributed to Samuel in reply are very difficult. On the one hand, if Dt 17$^{14-20}$ (cf. 28^{36}) is Mosaic, the principles that ought to guide the election of a king must, one would suppose, have been well known, and it is so far worthy of notice that in at least three out of the four points (no stranger, not multiplying horses, not multiplying wives, the study of the Law) Saul satisfied these principles. But with our present knowledge it seems impossible to reconcile Samuel's fears with a knowledge by him of the sanction given to the king in Dt. For Dt assumes that the kingdom need not be opposed to the theocratic government of the nation, but may rather become a form of it. On the other hand, Samuel's words are such as could hardly fail to suggest themselves to every far-seeing religiously-minded patriot.[*]

Nothing but the strongest necessity could justify (as by God's answer to Samuel it did justify) the commencement of a system which tended to repress the development of the free life of the individual Israelites, a life which might otherwise have attained much sooner the realization of the perfect liberty of the ideal believer in God. A king, however, was better than destruction by the Philistines or absorption by the Canaanites.

II. THE METHOD OF APPOINTMENT. — 1. The Choice.—(a) In the case of Saul. The subordination of the 'lay' to the 'religious' element in Israel is clearly seen in the action of the elders. Even if (as is hardly probable) any of them had an idea of a king possessing merely secular authority, no trace of such a feeling is shown, as they unite in seeking the sanction and the power of the religious authority. Further, Samuel even after consenting to their wish gives them strictly no voice in the appointment. He is guided to anoint Saul privately, and the public decision is made by lot, after which Saul is presented to the people as 'him whom the Lord hath chosen,' and they shout 'God save the king' (1 S 10^{24} [E^2]). Naturally, after the first success, a public assembly is called by Samuel to ensure the ratification by the people of the choice already made (1 S 11^{14} [J]), he taking the opportunity of convincing the people that a visible king would not have been necessary had they served God fully, and of urging them to serve Him faithfully under the new arrangement (1 S 12 [E^2]).[†]

(b) In the case of David also the appointment was from above (1 S 16^{13} 'midrashic'), but effect was not given to it until after Saul's death, when the men of Judah anointed him as their king (2 S 2^4), and not fully until seven years later, when 'all the tribes of Israel' anointed him king over all Israel. They did this, however, only after receiving certain stipulations from David (2 S 5^3). The virtual omission of these by Solomon, and their definite rejection by Rehoboam, caused the division of the kingdom.

(c) In other cases in David's line of which particulars have come down to us, the reigning king freely chose his successor from among his sons (1 K 1$^{33-35}$, but this was preferably the firstborn, 2 Ch 21^3).[*] Naturally, on the restoration of Joash to his rights, Jehoiada the priest took the opportunity of obtaining from him and the people an agreement to serve the LORD, the observance of whose worship was bound up with the national constitution and national prosperity (2 K 11^{17}). So again (also after conspiracies by others) the people appointed Azariah-Uzziah (2 K 14^{21}), Josiah (2 K 21^{24}), and, on the untimely death of Josiah, his son Jehoahaz (2 K 23^{30}). The appointment of Ahaziah by the people was due solely to his being the only son left to his father, Jehoram having apparently designated another son before both his and his own death (2 Ch 21^{17} 22^1).

2. The Anointing.[†]—Besides the reference given above, see ANOINTING, §§ 8, 9. The only king of the northern dynasty whose anointing is mentioned is Jehu (2 K 9^6), where the act is strictly private, like that of Saul and of David by Samuel. Many have thought from the absence of all mention in other cases that only those kings were anointed whose claims to the throne were disputed, but this is very unlikely. The cases of private anointing are mentioned as showing to the recipient God's choice and purpose: the public anointing is mentioned only on special occasions, just in the same way as the words 'God save the king' are recorded (1 K 1^{39}, 2 K 11^{12}). The frequency of the term 'the LORD'S anointed' confirms this (1 S 24^{10} 26^9, 2 S 1^{14} 19^{21} [Heb. ^{22}]). It has been suggested that kings were anointed in order that they might fulfil priestly functions (see below), but there is no hint of this. The ceremony was perhaps already purely archaic in Saul's time. The writer, however, of 1 S 16^{13} ('midrashic') connects it with the gift of the spirit.[‡]

III. THE EXTERNAL MARKS.—(a) Sceptre (שֵׁבֶט).—This very primitive sign of supreme authority is used of the Israelitish king in Ps 45^7, and perhaps nowhere else. See SCEPTRE.

(b) Spear (חֲנִית).—This, both among pre-Mohammedan (W. R. Smith, Kinship, p. 171) and modern Arabs (Tristram, Land of Israel, p. 259), marks the presence of the sheikh. It was in the hand of Saul when David played to him (1 S 18^{10} [J^1]), by his side at meal-time (20^{33} [J^1]), in his hand when he sat at council (22^6 [J^1]), planted by his pillow as he slept in camp (26^7 [E^1]). He is also said by the Amalekite to have leaned on it when he was dying (2 S 1^6 [E^1]).[§] These examples suggest that Saul did not use the sceptre; but it should be noticed that in the first three passages the more offensive use of the spear comes into question, and in the fourth and fifth he was engaged in war.

---

[*] It is, of course, still possible that the form of the objections attributed to Samuel is one 'moulded by the experiences of a later age' (Driver, Dt. p. 213), but the narrative as it stands probably represents his actual feelings.

[†] Such is the general result we appear to reach by combining all the data in 1 S; but see OTJC^{2} 135 ff.

[*] In the maintenance of the hereditary principle we may see, probably, the chief cause of the longer duration of the Southern kingdom.

[†] For the existence of this practice in Egypt at coronations, cf. T. T. Perowne in Smith's DB^{2} i. 137.

[‡] W. R. Smith (RS pp. 215, 364) conjectures (a) from Ps 45^8, compared with Is 61^3, that the anointing of kings was part of the ceremony of investing them in the festal dress and ornaments appropriate to their dignity (cf. Ca 3^{11}); (b) from the original use of animal fat, that anointing meant the transference of the living virtues of the animal slain. He also sees in the very act of applying the ointment originally a form of homage.

[§] Cf. Kirkpatrick on 1 S 18^{10}. Perhaps the javelin (כִּידוֹן) in the hand of Joshua was as much a symbol of authority as a weapon (Jos 8^{18}).

(c) Crown or diadem (נֵזֶר), of Saul on the battlefield (2 S 1^{10} [E^{1}]), therefore light and probably a fillet of silk; and of Joash (2 K 11^{12} ‖ 2 Ch 23^{11}, cf. Ps 89^{39} 132^{18}); with stones (Zec 9^{16}). See, further, CROWN, §§ 3, 4, and DIADEM.

(d) Bracelet (צְעָדָה), also of Saul (2 S 1^{10}), and in plur. prob. (by emendation) of Joash (2 K 11^{12}). See BRACELET.

(e) Throne (כִּסֵּא), presupposed in numerous promises and commands (e.g. Dt 17^{18}, 1 S 2^{8}, 2 S 3^{10} 7$^{13.16}$ 14^{9}, 2 K 10^{3}, Jer 13^{13}). David's is used by Solomon (1 K 2^{12}), who in audience places another throne for his mother (v.^{19}), but afterwards has a costly new one made for himself (1 K 10$^{18-20}$), as well as a porch for it (1 K 7^{7}).

(f) A place of honour in the temple (Ezk 46$^{1.2}$ and perhaps 2 K 23^{3}).

(g) Palace (בַּיִת, הֵיכָל, אַרְמוֹן).—Solomon's (1 K 7$^{1-12}$) had apparently three chief parts, the Great Hall (or House of the Forest of Lebanon), the porch of judgment, and the porch or ordinary reception room, besides the private apartments, rich with cedar beams and pillars. So Jehoiakim's was cieled with cedar and painted with vermilion (Jer 22^{14}). Ahab's was of ivory, i.e. probably panelled with it (1 K 22^{39}, cf. Ps 45^{8}).

(h) The royal chariot (רֶכֶב).—Nowhere expressly included among the insignia of the king, but perhaps implied by the analogy of Egypt (Gn 41^{43}), and the importance that chariots held in the establishment both of the king and of the nobility (1 S 8^{11}, 1 K 9^{19} 10^{26}, Is 22^{18}, Jer 17^{25} 22^{4}). Hence the fact that Absalom and Adonijah set up a chariot and attendant runners (2 S 15^{1}, 1 K 1^{5}) indicated their claim to semi-royal state. See CHARIOT.

(i) The royal harem (2 S 16^{21}).

(j) The bodyguard, primarily of Philistine mercenaries (Cherethites, Pelethites, and Gittites, 2 S 8^{18} [J^{1}] 15^{18} [J^{1}]) and perhaps Carians (2 K 11$^{4.19}$), who may also have been the royal butchers (see W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} pp. 260–263, and art. CHERETHITES). They were apparently identical with the 'mighty men' (1 K 1$^{8.10.38}$).*

IV. DUTIES OF THE KING.—1. In war.—As preparations for war called the kingdom into existence, so it continued to be the principal function of the king to direct warlike operations, and to see that the land was well defended by fortresses and possessed the material of war (e.g. 1 K 12$^{21\text{ff.}}$, 2 Ch 17^{2} 26$^{9.15}$ 32$^{2-5}$). Naturally the nucleus at least of a standing army was always maintained, probably the bodyguard (see above), the whole fighting force of the nation being called out only as needed (see ARMY). Sometimes also the king employed a large force of mercenaries (2 Ch 25^{6}).

2. Judicial.—In Eastern even more than in Western lands the supreme court of appeal is the sovereign in person, and in Eastern lands more particularly each litigant, however humble, has the right of bringing his cause before the king if the latter has time to hear it (cf. 2 S 14$^{5\text{ff.}}$ 15^{2}, 1 K 3$^{16\text{ff.}}$). Hence the fact that Jotham judged the people was a sign that he completely took his father's place (2 K 15^{5}). So, too, right judgment is almost equivalent to a good rule (Is 16^{5}). Sometimes, perhaps, the king was called 'the judge' (so of Moab, Am 2^{3}).†

Through this concentration of the judicial functions it is probable that the powers of the 'elders' diminished, and that thus there was the more need for the royal judges whom Jehoshaphat sent throughout Judah, whose head was 'the ruler of the house of Judah' (2 Ch 19$^{5.11}$). They seem, however, to have become even more amenable to bribery than the elders (see below). Solomon, as stated above, built a special porch for judgment (1 K 7^{7}). It is also worthy of note that the king seems to have had no power to originate laws (even Josiah's reform is based on the book that had been found, 2 K 23$^{1-3}$), and that he himself was under law (1 K 21$^{4\text{ff.}}$, Dt 17^{19}).

3. Religious.—In all early Semitic nationalities, and especially in Israel, religion was bound up with the unity of the people. For a king to neglect the worship of the national god would be to alienate a large proportion of his subjects, who, believing themselves to have sprung from their god, felt that his honour was their own, and also that their own welfare depended upon the treatment he received. Hence the maintenance of the religious establishment was necessarily an important part of the king's duties.* A further question arises whether the early Semitic custom of the king being the religious head of the nation and the chief sacrificing priest obtained also in Israel. It has been asserted that this was the primary object of the anointing of the Israelitish kings, but no hint to this effect is given in the OT (see above). Yet there are certainly traces of the old custom, whether it is to be regarded as held legitimate by the Israelites themselves (till quite late times) or not.

Thus we find the following examples:—(a) Sacrifices are offered by Saul against the wish of Samuel (1 S 13$^{9-11}$ [J^{2}] 14$^{33\text{ff.}}$ [J^{1}]), but are evidently regarded by Saul himself as his right in Samuel's absence. Also, perhaps, by David himself (2 S 6$^{13.17}$ [J^{1}] 24^{25} [J^{1}]), but in these cases the sacrifices may merely have been offered by the priests at David's order (comp., too, Ezk 45$^{17\text{b}.22}$). (b) David wears the linen ephod (2 S 6^{14}, cf. 1 Ch 15^{27}), which was a priestly garment (1 S 2^{18} 22^{18}) (see EPHOD), and he and Solomon bless the people (2 S 6^{18}, 1 K 8^{14}). (c) It is more important that David and Solomon dismiss and appoint the chief priest at their pleasure (2 S 8^{17}, 1 K 2$^{26.27.35}$).† This may have been due to a desire to have a royal priesthood distinct from the priests of other sanctuaries (cf. 1 Ch 6^{10}, 1 K 4^{2} with 1 Ch 16$^{39.40}$). It is possible that the officials manifestly not of the Levitical line who are called priests (כֹּהֲנִים), viz. David's sons (2 S 8^{18} [J^{1}]) and Ira the Jairite (2 S 20^{26} [R$^{\text{P}}$]),‡ represent those royal officials who saw to the maintenance of such royal priests, unless perhaps they were the intermediaries between the king and the whole body of the priests for certain functions, e.g. to supply the royal sacrifices, to superintend the royal expenditure upon the preparations for the Temple, etc.§

V. MAINTENANCE AND ESTABLISHMENT.—1. Taxation.—(a) Ezk 45$^{7.8}$ 48^{21} speak of a royal domain with which God's 'princes' will be so satisfied that they will no more oppress the people, but even with this the 'prince' is still to receive large supplies of food (45$^{13-16}$). Such a royal domain is also hinted at in 1 S 8^{12} (E^2), and actually possessed by David (1 Ch 27$^{25-31}$).

---

* But surely not with 'the governors of the people' mentioned in 2 Ch 23^{20}, as Smith's DB^{2} i. 1245, suggests.

† Not in Dt 17$^{9.12}$ (Benzinger, Arch. p. 306), for the singular there is either generic and = plural in 19$^{17.18}$, or it refers to a president of lay judges (so Driver).

* Ezk 45^{17} expressly orders that the prince shall provide the sacrifices (cf. 46$^{4-6}$ and 2 Ch 30^{24} 35^{7}).

† That David gets the choir appointed (1 Ch 15$^{16-24}$) proves nothing, for, apart from the question of the historicity of the Chronicler's narrative, even the closest sacerdotal body may depend on the laity for money. 1 Ch 16$^{4-6}$ is more to the point, but need not imply more. So also with Solomon building the Temple, which Nowack (Arch. i. p. 310) strangely compares to Ahaz building the altar in wilful opposition to the type sanctioned by the nation's religious laws.

‡ I.e. dated by Budde 440–400 B.C., therefore (on the same principles) not much earlier than the Chronicler (see next note).

§ The Chronicler evades the difficulty by paraphrasing 'the sons of David were chief about the king' (1 Ch 18^{17}). In 1 K 4^{5} the title is given to Zabud as well as 'the king's friend' (see below).

The word 'priests' in 2 S 8^{18} 20^{26} has been explained to mean, on the one hand, spiritual counsellors, or the king's highest officials, or his daily companions (which is against usage); and, on the other hand, 'priest' in the fullest sense. But to believe that the sons of David and Ira the Jairite actually exercised priestly functions requires much more evidence than has yet been adduced (but see Driver on 2 S 8^{18}). The act of Uzziah is represented by the Chronicler as monstrously illegal (2 Ch 26$^{16-18}$), and has no parallel in Israelitish history.

(b) Presents, more or less compulsory, were given by subjects (to Saul 1 S 10^{27} 16^{20}), and by foreigners (to David 2 S 8^{10}, to Solomon 1 K 4$^{21-23}$ 10$^{10-25}$, and to kings of Israel from Moab 2 K 3^4, cf. Is 16^1). The king would also certainly have his share of booty (David 2 S 8^{11} 12^{30}, 1 Ch 26^{27}).

(c) The king had apparently the right to the first cut of the pasture land (Am 7^1) for his many horses (1 K 18^5). The land-tax was, as it seems, unknown in Palestine. Yet there was probably a property-tax of some kind (1 S 17^{25} [E^1]), perhaps the tenth of all produce (1 S 8$^{15.\ 17}$ [E^2]). Naturally, for extraordinary needs extraordinary requisitions were levied (2 K 15^{20} 23^{35}). Caravans paid toll (1 K 10^{15}), and much profit must have been derived from what was in Solomon's days the royal monopoly in horses and, apparently, chariots (1 K 10$^{28.\ 29}$), as well as from the commerce by sea (1 K 10^{11}). Apparently also the property of condemned persons (1 K 21$^{1.\ 3.\ 7}$), and of those who had left the country (2 K 8$^{3.\ 6}$), passed to the king. That he also sometimes seized property unjustly is implied in Ezk 45$^{7.\ 8}$.

(d) We are not told the reasons why the census was taken by David (2 S 24^1 [J^1]), but perhaps one was the desire to equalize taxation, as was evidently that of Solomon's division of the country into twelve districts (1 K 4^7),* which were only partly named after the twelve tribes, though roughly coextensive with them.

2. Officials (שָׂרִים 2 S 8^{16}).—Perhaps the more important of these were those 'that saw the king's face' (2 K 25^{19}=Jer 52^{25}). It should be noticed that the details are almost confined to the time of David and Solomon (2 S 8$^{16\text{ff.}}$ 20$^{23\text{ff.}}$, 1 K 4$^{2\text{ff.}}$, 1 Ch 18$^{15\text{ff.}}$), and that in only a few cases can we affirm the continuance of the office throughout the monarchy.

(a) Military.—(α) The captain of the host, i.e. commander-in-chief (under the king) of the whole available fighting strength of the nation, exclusive, perhaps, of the bodyguard (see above). This position, the consolidation and concentration of an older usage (Dt 20^9), was held by Abner under Saul and Ishbosheth (1 S 14^{50}, 2 S 2^8), by Joab (2 S 8^{16}) and for a short time by Amasa in Judah (2 S 19^{13}, 1 K 2^{32}), and, on Joab's removal, by Benaiah (1 K 2^{35}). In the northern kingdom the king appears to have divided the office into that of the two captains of his chariots (1 K 16$^{9.\ 16}$). (β) The captain of the bodyguard (see above), Benaiah (2 S 8^{18} 20^{23}).

(b) Civil.—(α) The mazkîr (מַזְכִּיר), lit.='he who brings to remembrance,' viz. Jehoshaphat in the time of David and Solomon (2 S 8^{16} 20^{24}, 1 Ch 18^{15}, 1 K 4^3), Joah ben-Asaph in the time of Hezekiah (2 K 18$^{18.\ 37}$=Is 36$^{3.\ 22}$), Joah ben-Joahaz in the time of Josiah (2 Ch 34^8). This is usually rendered 'recorder,' his duties being supposed to be those of chronicling the chief events; but this would hardly appear to be a sufficiently influential position. Perhaps his duty was rather that of reminding the king in matters of state, and he represented the Grand Vizier of modern times (cf. Benz. p. 310).

(β) The ṣōphēr (סוֹפֵר) or 'scribe' (AV, RV), apparently the writer of the royal correspondence, the Secretary of State (2 S 8^{17} 20^{25}, 1 Ch 18^{16}). Solomon had two, who were apparently the sons of David's 'scribe' (1 K 4^3). His duties appear to have been partly financial (2 K 12^{10} 22$^{3-9}$), and he sometimes is mentioned before the Recorder (2 K 18$^{18.\ 37}$=Is 36$^{3.\ 22}$, 2 Ch 34^8, cf. 2 K 22^3). See, further, Riehm, s.v. 'Kanzler.'

(γ) The officer over the household, אֲשֶׁר עַל הַבַּיִת (1 K 4^6 18^3), i.e. the head of the palace, intrusted with 'the key' (Is 22^{22}). Apparently=סֹכֵן (Is 22^{15}), but this may be a general term for 'official.' He perhaps stood for our High Chamberlain or Steward. Not mentioned in David's time. In the time of Hezekiah he is mentioned before both Scribe and Recorder (2 K 18$^{18.\ 37}$ 19^2=Is 36$^{3.\ 22}$ 37^2), and certainly held a superior position to that held by the Scribe (cf. Is 22$^{15.\ 20}$ with 36^3).

(δ) The overseer of the forced labour (אֲשֶׁר עַל הַמַּס) first seen in the latter part of David's reign. Adoram (Adoniram) held the office from then till his murder in the revolt from Rehoboam (2 S 20^{24}, 1 K 4^6 5^{14} 12^{18} ‖ 2 Ch 10^{18}).

(ε) The king's servant (עֶבֶד הַמֶּלֶךְ) is mentioned with other high officials in 2 K 22^{12}. The same title is on the seal of one Obadiah (figured in Nowack, Arch. i. p. 262; Benzinger, Arch. p. 258), but nothing is known of it. Perhaps it is the same as

(ζ) The king's friend (1 K 4^5, 1 Ch 27^{33}, cf. 2 S 15^{37} 16^{16}).

(θ) The prefect of the twelve commissariat districts (1 K 4^5, see above).

(ι) Minor officials, e.g. the head of the wardrobe (2 K 22^{14}, and perhaps 10^{22}); heads of various departments of royal properties (1 Ch 27$^{25-31}$); eunuchs (סָרִיסִים) or perhaps chamberlains (1 S 8^{15}, 1 K 22^9, 2 K 8^6, and often; in 2 K 25^{19}=officer); the governor of the city (שַׂר הָעִיר, 1 K 22^{26}, 2 K 23^8, 2 Ch 34^8, cf. Neh 11^9).

(κ) Although these officials were necessary for the working of the monarchical government, which probably always tended to obliterate the old landmarks of the tribal system, with its semi-independent elders (these are still mentioned under the monarchy, 1 K 20^7, 2 K 23^1), yet by the very severance of the ruling class from the soil it tended also to increase the difference between class and class. The Mosaic legislation, though perhaps hardly suitable for great commercial enterprises, was admirably fitted to maintain comparative equality, but the rule of the king in both N. and S. Israel produced crying injustice on the part of the rich and misery for the poor (e.g. Am 2$^{6.\ 7}$, Is 5^8, Jer 5^{28}, Mic 3^{11}).

VI. Lastly, it may be noticed briefly that the king, both by success and by failure, played an important part in preparation for the future. His success showed the necessity for organization and concentration; his failure, in his degeneration from the nearly ideal David to the worthless Zedekiah (relieved, though the crown temporarily was, by godly representatives), showed that a kingdom as such and alone was an ineffectual protection. A wholly ideal David was hoped for (Ezk 34^{23} 37^{25}), and in due time given. But before then the title of king was borne by members of the Hasmonæan dynasty from Aristobulus I. (B.C. 105–104) to Aristobulus II.

* It is hardly accurate to say that Judah is omitted (e.g. Benzinger, p. 308), for Socoh (v.^{10}, cf. also Jos 15$^{35.\ 48}$, 2 Ch 11^7 28^{18}, 1 S 17^1) was up the vale of Elah in the Shephelah of Judah. Of the places mentioned with it in 1 K 4^{10} Hepher is unknown, and also Arubboth (but see Dr. C. Schick in PEFSt, Oct. 1898, p. 238. Josephus, ed. Niese, Ant. VIII. ii. 3, omits all ref. to v.^{10} [against Smith's DB^{2} i. 250]), though this possibly is to be identified with Arab, mentioned in Jos 15^{52} (Socoh, v.^{48} is in the next group), and also in the Shephelah, not far apparently from Dumah, which was near Eleutheropolis (see ARAB and DUMAH). But evidently Jerusalem and the part immediately round it is omitted in Solomon's twelve districts. This is explicable by the fact that being so near to the seat of government it would necessarily be more easily mulcted for provisioning troops, etc., and also may have come under the special care of one of the other officials named, e.g. the governor of the city (see below).

(B.C. 63), and by Herod the Great from B.C. 40 to B.C. 4. See separate articles on these names.

LITERATURE.—Besides the ordinary Histories of the Jewish People, and Dictionaries, may be mentioned Benzinger, Hebräische Archäologie (Leipzig, 1894); Nowack, Lehrbuch der Hebräischen Archäologie (Leipzig, 1894); McCurdy, HPM (1894–96, §§ 27–63, 511–538). A. LUKYN WILLIAMS.

KINGDOM OF GOD, OF HEAVEN (βασιλεία τοῦ θεοῦ, τῶν οὐρανῶν).—The importance of the place which this idea of the kingdom of God holds in Scripture, and especially in the teaching of Jesus; the new prominence it has come to assume in recent years in theology (since Kant and Schleiermacher, particularly in the school of A. Ritschl, but also among theologians generally, e.g. Lipsius, Oosterzee, Maurice); and the attempts which have been made to find in it the supreme and controlling notion of Christian dogmatics, as well as of Christian ethics,—all render it desirable that full and careful consideration should be given to this leading thought of the Christian religion, and that the attempt should be made to present its biblical aspects in as complete a form as possible, in their relations to each other, and to the other elements of Christian truth. Little inquiry is necessary to convince us that this idea enters vitally into the whole texture of revelation, has its root in the fundamental ideas of the OT, is paramount in the earthly teaching of our Lord, receives further development—with special reference, however, to its eschatological side—in the apostolic writings, and presents points of deepest interest to students both of doctrine and morals at the present day. Our task, then, in this article will be—following the natural biblical development of the subject—to exhibit first the general features of the OT preparation for the Christian doctrine of the kingdom of God; then to set forth the teaching of Jesus on this vital topic; and, finally, to compare with this the doctrine of the Epistles and other NT writings. By pursuing this course we may hope to arrive at a notion which shall be helpful in enabling us to judge of the place and value of this doctrine in theology and ethics, and to form a correct estimate of past and current misapprehensions and mutilations of the idea.

I. OT DOCTRINE OF THE KINGDOM OF GOD.—1. To reach the true idea of the kingdom of God in OT we must go farther back than the point from which a start is usually made—the theocratic constitution at Sinai. As in all the spheres of the Divine operation, grace invariably presupposes nature, so is it in this. The real basis for the idea of the kingdom of God is already laid in the Creation history. The doctrine of Scripture, in its oldest as well as in its later parts, is here entirely uniform. The one God—the God who afterwards entered into covenant with the patriarchs, and as J″ brought Isr. out of Egypt, and formed it into a people for Himself—is the Almighty Maker of heaven and earth, the Creator, Lord, and Ruler of all things, animate and inanimate. The Creation narrative in Gn 1, with its delegation to man of 'dominion' over the creatures (cf. Ps 8), already lays down this doctrine, and the second history of Creation (Gn $2^{4ff.}$) is equally explicit. No limit is set in these creation histories to the absolute power of God. As H. Schultz says: 'When God, the possessor of heaven and earth (Gn 14^{19-22}), can make everything good, that is to say, finds nowhere any hindrance in anything already in existence, which, having its origin in some other being, is antagonistic to Him (Gn 1^{31}); and when to His word "Be" comes the willing "And it was"; in other words, when matter obeys the Divine command like a willing servant, it is assuredly taken for granted that everything, even this chaotic matter which obeys the creative word of God, is included within the will of God, and called forth by Him' (OT Theol. ii. 186, Eng. trans.). On this conception of God as Creator rests the doctrine which pervades the whole OT of His unlimited dominion or rule in nature and providence. The ethical or spiritual kingdom of God rests on a basis of natural dominion. This is expressed in the clearest way in psalmists and prophets. God is King of all the earth (Ps 47^{7}); His kingdom ruleth over all, and angels, His hosts, and all His works in all places of His dominion, are exhorted to bless Him (Ps 103^{19-22}); natural agents are His ministers (Ps 104^{4}), and continue according to His ordinances as serving Him (Ps 119^{89-91}); He is the God, even He alone, of all the kingdoms of the earth, for He made heaven and earth (Is 37^{16}); 'all that is in the heaven and in the earth is thine: thine is the kingdom, O Lord, and thou art exalted as head above all' (1 Ch 29^{11}). This natural dominion or kingdom of God embraces all beings and events—the affairs of men as well as the agencies and powers of nature, which He disposes at His will. Nothing is withdrawn from His providential government, which takes in events great and small, remote and near, of nations and of individuals, the thoughts of men as well as their outward actions, the army of heaven as well as the inhabitants of the earth (cf. Gn 18^{25} 45^{5-9}, Ex 9^{13-16}, Dt 32^{9}, Pr 21^{1}, 2 Ch 16^{9}, 2 K 19^{28}, Is 10^{15}, Dn 4^{35} etc.). The disobedience of men does not withdraw them from the range of the Divine control. If men will not serve the purposes of God willingly, they are made to serve the Divine ends unwillingly (Ex 9^{16}). They are the clay: God is the potter; they cannot escape from the potter's hands; and if they will not be made vessels of honour, they are turned to other uses as vessels of dishonour (Jer 18^{6}; cf. Ro 9^{21-23}). Their very wrath is made to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He restrains (Ps 76^{10}).

There is therefore recognized in Scripture—OT and NT alike—a natural and universal kingdom or dominion of God, embracing all objects, persons, and events, all doings of individuals and nations, all operations and changes of nature and history, absolutely without exception, which is the basis on which a higher kind of kingdom—a moral and spiritual kingdom—is built up. The natural creation obeys God undeviatingly by an inherent law of its constitution (Ps 119^{91}, Is $1^{2,3}$); to man alone belongs the possibility of entering into personal relations with his Maker, and of rendering Him a free and intelligent obedience. We have seen that God's ordinary providential rule in the worlds of matter and mind is never for a moment suspended, even in the case of wicked men; but altogether higher in quality is a moral rule,—a rule in the minds and hearts of men, a rule by moral means over willing and obedient subjects. For man is not a mere natural existence; in Kant's famous phrase, he is a member of a kingdom of ends; is capable of entering into the will of his Creator, and of rendering Him a spontaneous and willing obedience. Here, then, is the idea of a kingdom of God of a higher kind—a realm of free, personal spirits, yielding voluntary obedience to the known will of their Creator,—and it lies in the nature of the case, and is already implied in the narrative of the creation of man, and of God's dealings with him, that the production of such an ethical kingdom in humanity was God's end in creation from the first (Gn 1. 2). 'How would it now look to you,' says the philosophic Saxon king Alfred, 'if there were any very powerful king, and he had no freemen in all his kingdom, but that all were slaves? Then, said I, it would not be thought by me right nor reasonable if men in such a servile condition only should attend upon him.

Then, quoth he, it would be more unnatural if God, in all His kingdom, had no free creature under His power. Therefore, He made two rational creatures, free angels and men, and gave them the great gift of freedom. Hence, they could do evil as well as good, whichever they would. He gave this very free gift, and a very fixed law to every man unto this end.' We have here, therefore, a higher type of dominion, one in which God's will is freely accepted by rational and moral intelligences; and had this been realized on the lines originally laid down, there would have been, even on a creation basis, a kingdom of God in humanity.

2. But this brings us to the next cardinal point in the OT doctrine. The kingdom of God on the basis of creation just indicated was not realized. The narrative of creation is immediately succeeded in our oldest history by the record of the Fall—of a turning aside of man from his primitive innocence —which frustrated (speaking humanly) the original designs of the Creator, and introduced sin, death, and multiplied penal evils into the world (Gn 3). It is usual for biblical theologians to make somewhat light of this narrative, which stands at the gateway of the history of revelation, as if it did not enter deeply into the religious conceptions of the people of Israel. 'It will hardly be maintained,' says Schultz, 'that any other OT writer even hints at such an idea' as that man possessed an aboriginal dignity which was afterwards lost (OT Theol. ii. p. 258 ff.). It may be affirmed with some confidence, on the other hand, that, apart from explicit references to the narrative of the Fall (which, however, could not be unknown to any writer of the prophetic period), the background of the whole picture in OT is that of a world in revolt, turned aside from God, sunk, and ever sinking deeper, in unrighteousness, abandoned to idolatry and to the lusts and corruptions which are the natural fruit of apostasy from the Creator,—a world in contrariety to the divine holiness, and judged as guilty, and justly exposed to the Divine anger (Gn 6[5.6] 8[21] 13[13] 19[20.21], Lv 18[24-30], Dt 9[4-6], 1 K 8[46], Ps 14. 51[5] 143[2], Pr 20[9], Ec 7[20], Is 1, Hos 4, etc. Cf. Dillmann, Alttest. Theol. pp. 376–88). This representation of the condition of humanity as universally under sin has for its consequence a proposition of the utmost importance for the right apprehension of our subject, viz., that if God is to have a moral kingdom in the world, it must be a kingdom brought into existence through grace,—it must be produced through redemption and regeneration as the result of a divine supernatural economy of salvation. This note of grace is already struck with unmistakable clearness in the Protevangelium, where the first sin is met by the promise of a final complete victory, not without suffering, of the 'seed of the woman' over 'the seed of the serpent' (Gn 3[15]); and the history of revelation ever after is but the history of this developing purpose of God for the complete overthrow of evil, and the final establishment, through a mingled operation of mercy and judgment, of the kingdom of God upon earth. As entering into covenant with His people Israel for the realization of this end, God is known peculiarly by His name J" (Ex 6[1-8]),—a name which specially denotes Him as the self-identical and changeless One, the Being who is eternally what He is (Ex 3[14]), who is and remains one with Himself in all He thinks, purposes, and does (Mal 3[6]), who possesses, together with immutability, the attribute of self-determining freedom and unlimited rule (Dt 4[39]); who, therefore, in the relation of the covenant, would display His might, demonstrate His supremacy as Moral Ruler, magnify His covenant-keeping faithfulness, and reveal Himself as the Living, Personal God, working freely in history in pursuance of gracious purposes, and in spite of all human opposition bringing them to pass (cf. Dillmann, pp. 217, 218). The history of OT revelation, therefore, is simply, as said, the history of the developing kingdom of God in its earlier, preparatory, inchoate form, yet from the first a kingdom of grace and salvation. Herein, from the biblical point of view, lies the key to all historical developments, the explanation of all arrangements and movements of Divine providence. Israel's position brought it into contact, not only with petty neighbouring states, but with the mightiest empires of East and West. But these appear in OT only as they affect the chosen race, and it is there made manifest that the centre of God's purposes is always Israel, as, in truth, the centre of interest must always be that portion of the race with which for the time being the kingdom of God is identified. 'Just as,' in the striking words of Trench, 'in tracing the course of a stream, not the huge morasses nor the vast stagnant pools on either side would delay us; we should not, because of their extent, count them the river, but recognize that as such, though it were the slenderest thread, in which an onward movement might be discerned; so is it here. Egypt and Assyria and Babylon were but the vast stagnant morasses on either side of the river; the Man in whose seed the whole earth should be blessed, he and his family were the little stream in which the life and onward movement of the world were to be treated. . . . They belong not to history, least of all to sacred history, those Babels, those cities of confusion, those huge pens into which by force and fraud the early hunters of men, the Nimrods and Sesostrises, drove and compelled their fellows . . . where no faith existed, but in the blind powers of nature, and the brute forces of the natural man' (Hulsean Lectures, 1845, Lect. II.).

The stadia in the development of this OT idea of the kingdom of God are those of the history of the chosen people itself. For Israel was, in the root conception of its history, a people of God, a people whom God had chosen, and called, and formed into a nation for His own praise (Ex 19[3-6], Is 43[21]). The name 'theocracy,' therefore, is properly given to its constitution, as Josephus perceived, when he framed this title for it (c. Ap. ii. 16). W. R. Smith, indeed, in his able work on The Prophets of Israel (pp. 51–53), is of opinion that so far from this title bringing out the distinctive feature of the religion of Israel, it rather denotes that which Israel had in common with all other nations of that time,—for these nations also had their supreme gods, whom they worshipped, and under whose protection they placed themselves in their national undertakings (Chemosh, e.g. in Moab). This, however, hardly meets the point, for certainly no other nation ever rested its whole life as Israel did on the consciousness of a redemption and covenant with God, and found the whole reason of its existence in the calling to love and serve Him, and to be a witness for Him in the midst of the earth; nor had any other nation such a story to tell of its origin, even in legend, as Israel (Dt 4[32-38]; cf. Schultz, OT Theology, i. pp. 136–138, ii. pp. 7–9). Within its national theocratic form, besides, Israel cherished, as we shall immediately see, the consciousness of a universalistic destiny, and this consciousness goes back to the very foundation of the nation's life. For the national form was not the first thing in the history of Israel. It had been preceded by an earlier form—the patriarchal—the days of the covenants with the fathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (cf. Schultz, ii. pp. 6, 7). And there already we find the clear expression of the idea that Israel was a people called with a view to the ultimate blessing of the whole world (נִבְרְכוּ in Gn 12^3 18^{18} 28^{14}; הִתְבָּרְכוּ in Gn 22^{18} 26^4).

3. It is now incumbent on us to mark the chief steps in the historical development of this idea in OT more exactly; and here in a general view we readily distinguish as successive the patriarchal, the Mosaic, the royal, and the prophetic periods in the growth of this conception. (a) The early records trace for us with careful particularity the narrowing down of the line of salvation from the posterity of Seth (Gn $4^{25.\,26}$) to that of Shem (Gn $9^{26.\,27}$; cf. Schultz, ii. pp. 346, 347), then to the family of Terah (Gn $11^{27\text{-}32}$), till, finally, it concentrates itself in one world-historical figure — that of Abraham. Looming through the mists of the past, the personality of Abraham arrests our attention as one of the great creative origins of time. With Abraham strictly historical revelation may be said to begin. Alike on the Divine and on the human side, the transactions with him are unsurpassed in OT in interest and importance. He is the founder of the Heb. nation, — 'the religiously-elect nation of antiquity,' as Volkmar calls it; the fountain-head of the three great monotheistic religions of the world; to him in a special sense belonged the covenants and the promises; out of his loins Christ came; in him at this hour all families of the earth are being blessed. The call of Abraham—the covenants made with him — constitute, therefore, a new era in the religious history of mankind. As men multiplied and spread in the earth, they fell farther away from the true God, and there seems little doubt that, left to themselves, they would soon have lost altogether the knowledge of God which they possessed (Jos 24^2). This catastrophe was averted by the choice of Abraham. Separated from his kindred, he was to be a witness for the truth which the world was suffering to be quenched in universal idolatry. The covenant was at first with the individual, but its ultimate scope was the blessing of the human race (Gn $12^{1\text{-}3}$ etc.). Neither did it stop with simple declaration, but provided for the fulfilment of the promise by granting to him an heir, through whose descendants, multiplied into a great nation, the promise should be realized (Gn $15^{4.\,5}$ etc.). A special part of this promise was that kings should come out of him (Gn 17^6). The line of promise was defined more exactly to lie through Isaac and subsequently Jacob (to the exclusion of Ishmael and Esau), with both of whom the covenant was renewed (Gn $26^{2\text{-}4}$ $28^{11\text{-}15}$ etc.); then by a succession of remarkable providences the descendants of Jacob were taken down to Egypt, where, first in prosperity, afterwards under the sterner discipline of oppression, they grew to be a nation such as God required for the fulfilment of His purpose. We are aware of the boldness of the criticism which would dissipate the whole of this history into unsubstantial myth and legend. Against this revolutionary treatment we enter our respectful protest. What legend can do for the life of Abraham is sufficiently evidenced by the fables and stories in the Bk. of Jubilees, and in other Jewish, Mohammedan, and Persian accounts. The history of Abraham in the Bible stands, from internal evidence alone, on an entirely different footing from these. In its simple, coherent, divinely-elevated character, its organic unity with the rest of the history of revelation, its absolute freedom from the puerility and extravagance which mark the products of the myth-forming spirit, it approves itself as a grave, serious record of important events, the knowledge of which had been carefully preserved by family tradition, or even from an early date by written documents (cf. Dillmann, Alttest. Theol. pp. 77, 78; and art. by Köhler on 'Abraham' in third ed. of Herzog's RE).

(b) Hitherto, while the foundations are being laid strong and deep, there has been no specific mention of a kingdom of God, such as we meet with in the transactions of Sinai next to be adverted to. A kingdom of God in the only form in which mankind at that time was able to apprehend it could not be created until a body of people had been called into existence out of whom it could be constituted. With the revival of the national faith under Moses, the marvellous deliverance of the Exodus, and the consolidation of the fugitive Hebrews into a nation pledged in covenant to J″ at Sinai, and receiving at His hand laws and institutions for their use, the requisite conditions were fulfilled and a kingdom of God, or true theocracy, starts for the first time into visible existence. Already in the exaltation of religious feeling J″ is hailed as King in Moses' Song at the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex 15^{18}); but it is in the covenant at Sinai, with its attendant solemnities and sacrifices, that the theocratic constitution is formally established. There God proposes to take the people to Himself as a peculiar treasure above all people, that they may be to Him a kingdom of priests (consecrated), and a holy (separated) nation; and the people, in accepting the terms of this covenant, and pledging themselves to obedience, enter by the sprinkling of blood into the gracious relation thus proposed (Ex $19^{3\text{-}6}$ $24^{4\text{-}8}$). Thenceforth they are a people of God, and J″ is formally their Lawgiver and King (Is 33^{22}). The covenant is based on grace, yet the continuance of its blessings is made to depend on the fulfilment of statutory conditions (cf. Ro 10^5); it is a covenant of law, yet God appears in it as 'merciful and gracious . . . forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin' (Ex $34^{6.\,7}$), and provision is made in sacrifices and purifications for the removal of the guilt and uncleanness by which the fellowship with God would otherwise be continually interrupted, if not entirely broken off. The people, on their part, have it set before them as an aim, to be holy because God is holy (Lv 19^2), and to realize righteousness by diligent observance of all God's statutes and ordinances, from the central motive of love (Dt $4^{1\text{-}5}$). Such, apart from doubtful details of Levitical ritual, was the general constitution under which Israel was placed, and it separated that people absolutely from their heathen neighbours (Nu 23^9). It is easy to see, however, that notwithstanding this limitation of the covenant to a particular people, and even its obvious design to seclude this people for a time from contact with other nations, it had in it germs of universality which were certain ultimately to burst the limits of the national form, and expand into a religion for the whole world. In the words of Riehm: 'By divine revelation ideas were planted in the minds of the people of Israel, so lofty, and rich, and deep, that in the existing religious condition they could never see their perfect realization; ideas which, with every step in the development of the religious life and knowledge, only more fully disclosed their own depth and fulness, and which must therefore necessarily have led them to look to the future for their fulfilment' (Mess. Prophecy, 1867, p. 33). How much, e.g., lay in the simple fact that J″, the God of Isr., was yet the God of the whole earth (Ex 19^5); that to Him alone belonged honour and glory; that it was due to Him that all nations should serve Him and keep His commandments. 'On the ground of his knowledge of J″ must the Israelite claim the whole earth for the kingdom of his God' (Riehm). The ideas at the root of the covenant, in short, were larger than could be permanently embodied in an exclusively national form, and from the first these larger ideas are seen shining through, and heralding the wider fulfilment (e.g. Nu 11^{29} 14^{21} 24^{17-19}).

(c) The disparity between the Divine idea and the existing reality of the kingdom of God, which was manifest from the outset in the constant unfaithfulness and repeated rebellions of the people (Ex 32, Nu 11, etc.), was further accentuated in the tribal jealousies and divisions, the lawless turbulence and the gross declensions, alternating with revivals of the spirit of faith and heroism, of the periods of the Conquest and the Judges (Jos 22, Jg 2. 7. 21^{25} etc.), and led in the time of Samuel to the demand for a king (1 S 8), and to the establishment of the monarchy under Saul (1 S 10), and then under David (1 S 16^{1-10}, 2 S 5^{1-9}). The sin of the people, as the event showed, did not lie simply in their desire for a king, for this it lay in the purpose of God to give them (Dt 17^{14-20}), but in the spirit of self-will and insubordination out of which the desire came, and the ideal of a king they had set before them—one like those of the nations around, who would judge them, and lead them to battle, and give them distinction and military glory (1 S $8^{7-9.\ 19-22}$). We thus arrive at another transition period in the history of the kingdom of God—the end of the judgeship and the beginning of the monarchy. It was a change which in the nature of things was bound to come. Already in Eli's days we see on every side the evidence of decay, of break-up, of failure. Under Samuel's rule there is a revival of the religion and prestige of the nation, but only for a time. The prophets do not live for ever, and the nation could not always be held together by the bond of Samuel's personality. He grew old, and his sons did not walk in his steps. Then came the clamour for a change—for a trial of a new system. Instead of the prophet, we have the royal Saul—a king after the people's hearts, but yet not after God's heart. In all this, none the less, is to be distinguished an onward movement,—a step to the great goal God always had in view—the bringing in of His own anointed. When Saul's reign had ended in ruin and disaster to himself and to the land (1 S 31), the way was open for God to set upon the throne His king—a man after His own heart, who should fulfil all His will (cf. Ac 13^{22}). The Davidic era thus became, despite the deep later shadows in David's personal character and career, a typical one for the history of the kingdom of God. It introduced a new abiding element into the conception of the theocracy, for we have not now simply the single, invisible Ruler, J″, but the visible representative of this unseen Sovereign reigning in His name on earth. The fundamental outlines of the theocratic kingdom in this new form are laid down in the promises to David (2 S 7), in whose house the kingdom is established (vv.$^{12.\ 16}$, Ps 89. 132); and this yields the ideal of the theocratic ruler as it henceforth appears in the history, and in the loftier strains of psalm and prophecy—one who would feel that his sole function was to be the instrument and visible representative of the great invisible King, and would rule the kingdom in strict subordination to the will and law of God; who would know that his authority was a deputed, delegated authority, and would seek at every step to be guided by God's wishes; who would have unity of will with God—would be in sympathy with God in His ends; a truly pious king, therefore, ruling the kingdom, not from worldly motives, or in a worldly spirit, or for self-aggrandizement, but for God's glory, to whom God would be a 'Father,' and he would be 'God's son' (2 S 7. 23^{1-5}, Ps 2. 20. 45. 72. 89. 110. 132, etc., Is 32, etc.). Only approximately, and with sad defections, was this ideal realized even under David; or amidst the external splendours of the reign of Solomon; or under the most pious of Judah's princes after the division of the kingdom; but the manifest failure of the visible theocracy only made the light of prophecy burn brighter in the hope of a future day and a greater Personage (cf. Is 7^{14-16} $9^{6.\ 7}$ etc.), in whom, under happier conditions, the ideal would be realized.

(d) This brings us to the last stage in the OT development of the idea of the kingdom of God—the prophetic, with which must be conjoined the enlarged ideals and anticipations of the psalms. All the germs of previous revelation now blossom into an incomparable fulness of conception of the future glorious triumph of God's kingdom in Isr. and over the earth, but with a clearer apprehension, wrought by the unspeakably bitter disappointments and humiliations of the nation, of the conditions under which alone such a consummation could be wrought out. It is a marvellous fact that it was not because Isr. was succeeding in fulfilling its mission, but because it was failing in it, that the spirit of prophecy wrought so powerfully in the development of these germs, which lay hidden in the nation's life, to a universal form. Now at least, with unmistakable clearness, we have the full consciousness that J″ is the God of the whole earth; that His providence rules over all; that His purpose has an aspect to the Gentiles as well as to the Jews; that Isr. is His servant, with a mission to become a light to the Gentiles and a blessing to the whole of mankind (Am 4^{13} 5^{8}, Mic 4^{1-3}, Is 40. 42. 60, etc.). The more evident it became that the existing form of the theocracy would not endure, the stronger became the conviction that God's kingdom would not perish, but that there would be a restoration of the theocracy on a grander and more spiritual basis, accompanied with the promulgation to the nations of the world of the worship of the living God, and the pouring out of the Spirit on all flesh (Jer 31^{31-34}, Ezk 17^{22-24} 36^{25-27}, Jl 2^{28-32}). A similar development of this consciousness of the universal mission of Isr. meets us in the Psalms—the highest point, perhaps, being reached in the 87th Psalm, which foretells the future inclusion of the most distant peoples, the greatest world-powers, even the most inveterate enemies of J″, in the future city or kingdom of God (RV, cf. Ps 2. 67. 98, etc.). On no idea, accordingly, is the influence of the development in psalm and prophecy more marked than on that of the theocratic King—the coming Personage in whom the hopes of the spiritual part of Israel increasingly centred. The clearer it became that the restoration and perfection of the theocracy were not to be looked for from pious kings like Hezekiah and Josiah, and the higher and more spiritual the conceptions became of the 'new covenant' which God would have to make with His people, or the remnant of them, after judgment had done its work (Is 6^{9-13}, Jer 31^{31-34}, Ezk 36^{25-27}, Hos 14, etc.), the more imperative was it felt to be that the Deliverer and Ruler of the seed of David should stand in a relation of nearness and unity to J″ transcending the limits of ordinary humanity—that the perfect union between Him and J″ should be realized on the basis of an exceptional dignity of nature, raising Him to a superhuman level of character and authority (Ps 110, Is 9^{6-7}, Jer 31^{22}, Mic 5^{2}, Dn $7^{13.\ 14}$, Zec 3^{8}, Mal 3^{1} etc.). Along another line—though not without manifest relation to the former (cf. Is 52^{15} 53^{12} $55^{3.\ 4}$ etc.)—is the development of the conception of the 'Servant of J″,' which, rising from the basis of the national calling of Isr., narrowing itself after to the spiritual portion of the people (St. Paul's 'election of grace'), culminates in the majestic portraiture of the individual Suffering Servant (ch. 52^{13}–53) whom the Church rightly identifies with her Messiah. Preludes to this representation are found in the psalms which depict the sufferings that fall upon the godly (Ps 5–14. 22, etc.), and in the historical examples which show it to be a universal law that the righteous must suffer at the hands of the wicked, as well as with and for them (e.g. Joseph, Moses, David); but the Isaianic conception goes beyond all others in attributing to these sufferings of the Servant an expiatory character, and connecting them with the sin-offering (Is 53^{10-12}; cf. Zec $13^{1.\ 7}$). As respects the future form of the kingdom of God, it is always represented, in characteristically OT fashion, as reaching its triumph in conjunction with a restoration of Isr. or the remnant of it (Is 6^{13}, Am 9^{7-10} etc.), purified by judgment, converted and reunited (e.g. Ezk 37, Hos 1^{11}), and with a revival of the earlier institutions (Is 1^{25-27}, 4); while the nations, brought to the knowledge of the true God by the displays of His power and mercy, are either incorporated with the chosen people as sharers of their privileges (Ps 87), or become worshippers and tributaries of J″ (Ps $72^{10.\ 11.\ 17}$, Is 60, Mal 1^{11} etc.). But the sense of the surpassing greatness of the reality constantly tends to break through the literalism of these forms, and to mould them into new shapes (Is $2^{2.\ 3}$, Jl 3^{18-21}, Ezk 47, etc.). The one thing sure on the verge of every horizon is—'The kingdom shall be J″s' (Ob ^{21}).

There is, however, one other respect in which we can see, in this prophetic period, a distinct preparation for the NT idea of the kingdom of God. In the earlier stages of the theocracy, nation and Church—if we may so speak—were one. The Israelite was a member of the theocracy in virtue of birth and circumcision. The religious consciousness and the national consciousness were part of the same inseparable whole. But in the progress of Isr. history we observe a development which forms the necessary transition to the more spiritual idea of the kingdom in NT. It is the idea of the Church within the Church—of the true and spiritual Isr. in the midst of the natural Isr., who form a distinct, or at least distinguishable, body by themselves. There are earlier intimations, but in the form we have here especially in view, the growth of this idea belongs more particularly to the last dark days of the national history, when it became clear to prophetic eyes that Isr. as a people was doomed to destruction, and the efforts of the prophets were directed to gather out a remnant who might maintain the witness to God till better times came. A marked stage in this transition is seen in the ministry of Isaiah, who, when his message was rejected, gathered round him the little band of his own disciples, and sealed up the testimony in their midst (Is 8^{16-18}, cf. Mal 3^{16}). It is this 'ecclesia invisiblis of the Old Covenant,' as Oehler calls it,—this 'ecclesiola in ecclesia,' as Delitzsch names it,—which may be regarded as the germ of the Church-idea proper. W. R. Smith perhaps states it better than any. 'The formation of this little community,' he says, 'was a new thing in the history of religion. Till then, no one had dreamed of a fellowship of faith dissociated from all national forms, maintained without the exercise of ritual services, bound together by faith in the divine word alone. It was the birth of a new era in OT religion, for it was the birth of the conception of the Church, the first step in the emancipation of spiritual religion from the forms of political life—a step not less significant that all its consequences were not seen till centuries had passed away' (Prophets of Israel, pp. 274–75).

The collapse of the Jewish state in Isr. and Judah seemed to have laid the hope of the kingdom of God in ruins; but events proved that this hope was now strong enough to live on its own account, and the Babylonian Exile only tended to its further enlargement and strengthening. Torn from their roots in their own land, without holy city, temple, sacrifices, the people were taught that the acceptable worship of J″ was not tied to any one place, or dependent on a fixed priesthood or ritual; brought into contact with the world, in a geographical respect, to an extent they had never been before, they gained a new view of the extension of the world in space, which carried with it an extension of their idea of the time involved in the Divine plans. A new element entered the thoughts of the Jews at this period which never afterwards left it—an enlarged sense of the scale of things in space and time, the effect of which is seen in the enlarged scale of vision of the Bk. of Daniel (whatever its date), and even of the reveries in such apocalyptic compositions as the Bk. of Enoch. More than any book of OT the prophecy of Daniel gave definite shape and direction to the conception of a kingdom of the God of heaven, granted by the Ancient of Days to one like unto a son of man, who comes to receive it with the clouds of heaven, which kingdom was an everlasting dominion that could not be destroyed (Dn 7^{13-15}, cf. ch. 2^{44}; 'son of man' as opposed to 'beasts'; human, not bestial). The interpretation of this symbol as referring to a kingdom 'given to the saints of the Most High' ($7^{22.\ 27}$) need not exclude a Messianic reference; this, at least, is most generally held to be the source of the title 'Son of Man' as used by our Lord (found also in the Bk. of Enoch 46^{2} 48^{2} etc., both references probably of Christian origin). This kingdom of God in Dn which is to succeed the last of the four world kingdoms, and break in pieces all the others ($2^{34.\ 35.\ 44.\ 45}$; cf. $7^{14.\ 27}$), is of supernatural origin, of holy character, strictly universal in its scope, and endures for ever. The other writings of post-ex. Judaism (Bar, Ps.-Sol, 1 Mac, pseudo-Sibyllines, etc.) never rise to the height of these older representations, and mostly fall far below them into tame generalities, borrowed from passages in psalms and prophets, without any outlook towards the saving of the Gentiles, or discernment of the need of a spiritual conversion of the people. The Messiah, so far as He is brought into view at all, appears only to destroy the wicked, and establish His kingdom with the righteous (cf. Candlish, Kingdom of God, pp. 88–117; Stanton, Jewish and Christian Messiah, passim). We are thus taken back to the return from exile under Zerub. and the outburst of genuine prophecy connected therewith (Hag, Zec), and to the strains of Mal a century later, as the period of the last great utterances on the kingdom of God in OT. These add little to the features already sketched, beyond the note of warning and expectation of the coming of the Messenger of the Covenant to His temple, preceded by the sending of Elijah, with which Malachi closes (3^{1} 4^{5}). It is difficult not to feel, though centuries intervene, in passing from OT to NT, as if the evangelist had taken up his pen precisely where Malachi laid his down. The chief phenomena of these intervening centuries—so far as they are not absolutely a blank to us—the rise of scribism, of the synagogue worship, of the Jewish sects, the Maccabæan struggle, the dispersion, the fusion of Greek and Jewish thought in Alexandria,—yield little directly for the development of the idea of the kingdom of God, though in many indirect ways their influence was profound, sometimes in narrowing and despiritualizing the conception, and giving it a Pharisaic and political complexion, and again, through the synagogues and contact with Hellenic culture, preparing the way for a freer and more universal religion. The one fact which stands out clear is that in the time of our Lord neither Pharisee, nor Sadducee, nor Essene, had any hold of a conception of the kingdom which answered to the deep, spiritual, vital import of the idea in OT. The few who cherished more worthy views were to be sought for in the private circles of the pious who talked of these things (Mal 3^{16}), and 'looked for redemption in Jerusalem' (Lk $2^{25. 38}$). The idea of the kingdom of God in its spiritual meaning had to be *re*covered, or more properly *dis*covered, in a worldly, legalistic, Sadducean age. To bring it again, with the force of a new revelation, before the minds of men, in union with the call to repentance, was the task of John the Baptist. Then, when the time was fulfilled, Jesus came, preaching the gospel of the kingdom (Mk 1^{15}).

II. THE TEACHING OF JESUS ON THE KINGDOM OF GOD.—1. Here we may first glance at the relation of Jesus to His forerunner. St. Matthew informs us that John came preaching in the wilderness of Judæa, and saying, 'Repent ye: for the kingdom of heaven is at hand' (Mt 3^{2}). Elsewhere this expression is not put in the mouth of the Baptist; but there is no doubt from the tenor of his message, and from the declarations of Jesus regarding him (Mt 11^{10-14}), that the kingdom was the burden of his preaching. Through him a revivification of the idea took place in the minds and consciences of the people, and the greatest commotion was created by his proclamation that the kingdom was just at hand (Mt $3^{5. 6}$, Mk 1^{5}). But the kingdom announced by John was something very different from the political kingdom of Pharisaic expectation. He revived the terrors, warnings, and predictions of the later OT prophecy, and gave them a forcible and immediate application to his own times. He struck at the root of the delusion that mere descent from Abraham would avail for entrance to the kingdom; proclaimed the need of repentance and changed conduct as the condition of forgiveness, declared the imminence of judgment, and a sifting of good from bad at Messiah's appearance (Mt 3^{7-10}, Lk 3^{7-9}). The kingdom he announced was ethical in its demands (Lk 3^{10-14}), was connected with the person of a Coming One, who should execute the work of judgment, and also baptize with the Holy Spirit and with fire (Mt, Mk, Lk), and was immediately to be expected. John was fully conscious of his own inferiority, and of the impotence of his water-baptism to effect a real change of heart in the multitudes who resorted to him, and his hope was therefore placed in this Greater One, who had the baptism of the Spirit (Jn 1^{19-27}). The question, then, arises: Was Jesus from the first conscious that He was this Greater One whom John had proclaimed, or did He begin His ministry, as some have contended (e.g. Colani and Renan), only as a disciple and imitator of the Baptist? That the former view is the correct one would be, of course, put beyond doubt, if the intimations of the Fourth Gospel were accepted (Jn $1^{30-34. 40-51}$ 3. 4^{26} etc.); but the Synoptics, also, in their narratives of the relations of John and Jesus at the baptism (Mt 3^{13-17} and parallels), of the temptations (Mt 4^{1-11} and parallels), which would have no meaning unless Jesus was consciously entering on His work as Messiah, of the early use by Jesus of the title 'Son of Man' (Mk 2^{10} etc.), and by many other indications, show plainly that this is the right view to take. (Baldensperger can only get over the use of 'Son of Man,' which he also accepts as a Messianic title, by arbitrarily assuming that all the incidents in which this name occurs took place after Peter's confession—a violent and unwarrantable hypothesis, Selbstbewusstsein Jesu^{2}, p. 252). How this consciousness of His Messiahship was developed in Jesus is a question which lies beyond our present limits. It was plainly there from the period of the baptism, and we have earlier indications of its presence (Lk 2^{49}, see below). We take it, therefore, as a datum to start from, that when Jesus began to preach the gospel of the kingdom He already knew His vocation to be its Founder and its Lord.

2. The relation of the Baptist to OT prophecy (Mt $11^{13. 14}$), and the historical connexion of Jesus with John, make it evident that, in announcing the approaching advent of 'the kingdom of heaven,' Jesus had in view the very kingdom which the prophets had foretold. We have already seen that this precise expression is not met with in OT (most nearly in Dn $7^{14. 18. 22}$), but Jesus in many places unmistakably takes over the OT theocratic idea (Mt $8^{11. 12}$ 21^{43} 22^{41-46} etc.). This suggests the further question as to our Lord's own customary designation for this divine kingdom. In Mt, with but four exceptions (ch. 6^{33} is an incorrect reading), the phrase employed is always 'the kingdom of heaven'; whereas the other Gospels and the remaining books of NT have uniformly 'the kingdom of God.' Which was Christ's own expression, or did He use both? (so Bruce). The contrast between Mt and the other Gospels, even in parallel passages, compels us to suppose that one is more original than the other, and the question is which. Some (as Weiss) prefer 'kingdom of God,' but preponderating reasons seem to be in favour of the form in Mt. There is reason to believe that the phrase מַלְכוּת שָׁמַיִם (rule [Dalm. Worte Jesu, 77 ff.] of the heavens) was a current expression in Rabbinical circles (see passages in Lightfoot and Wetstein on Mt 3^{2}; and especially Schoettgen on Mt 11^{29}); and there is probability in the conjecture that this may have been the form employed by our Lord in His ordinary Aramaic preaching (not necessarily to the exclusion of an occasional use of the other), and that, in translating into Gr., the evangelists may either, as in our existing Mt, have retained this Heb. formula, or have (as in Mk, Lk, etc.) rendered it by its equivalent, more suitable to Gentiles—'the kingdom of God.' This is further supported by comparison with the language of the Lord's Prayer (Mt $6^{9. 10}$, Lk 11^{2}). No distinction in meaning of any importance can fairly be established between the two expressions, which denote the kingdom as, on the one hand, God's, and, on the other, heavenly in its origin, aims, and end. 'The kingdom of heaven, as appears from the prophecies of Daniel, is the kingdom of the Messiah; while the Lord's Prayer teaches us that it is the kingdom of God's Spirit, in which the will of man is made conformable to the will of God—a kingdom which comes from heaven, is heaven on earth, and ends in heaven' (Lange on Mt 3^{2}).

3. In examining the teaching of Jesus on the nature of this kingdom, we do well to start from the point already established—the connexion of the kingdom with His own Person. Nothing is plainer than that, in His own view, Jesus is not simply the Founder of this kingdom, but it is His kingdom as well as the Father's, and He is Lord and King over it (Mt 13^{41} 16^{28} 20^{21} $25^{34. 40}$ etc.). The idea here is moulded by that of the OT theocracy, in which God was at once the King of the chosen nation, and exercised His functions through a visible representative. This relation, only brokenly and typically illustrated in the descendants of David, is now, in accordance with prophecy, perfectly realized in the Messianic King, whose solidarity with God in heart and will is complete (Mt 11^{27}, Jn 4^{34} 5^{30} 6^{38} etc.). But the connexion of the kingdom with the Person of Jesus is more intimate even than this. Jesus is not only the Founder and Lord of the new theocracy, but is Himself the vital germ of it,—the living embodiment and representative of its principle, — the actual type of the new relation of sonship to God into which men are invited to enter through Him, —so that the kingdom of God may truly be said to have existed on earth in His Person from the first moment of His manifestation. It is through vital relation to Him, as the Synoptics, and still more clearly the Fourth Gospel, show,—through reception of His Person and message, through faith in Him, surrender to Him, submission to His rule, keeping His commandments, which is synonymous with doing the will of the Father, through union with Him as the branches and the vine, etc.,—that the kingdom is constituted (Mt 7^{21-23} 8^{10} 11^{28-30} $16^{24.\,25}$, Jn 15^{1-8} etc.). With all this goes a profoundly modified conception of the nature of the sovereignty in this new kingdom of God, which, as founded, not by worldly means of conquest and violence, but by humility, by service, by deeds of mercy, by suffering, by witness for the truth (Mt $11^{4-6.\,29}$ 13^{19} $18^{3.\,4}$ 20^{25-28}, Jn $18^{36.\,37}$), is ruled in like manner, not by force or tyranny, but by the suasive influences of love over freely surrendered hearts (Mt 11^{28-30} 22^{37-40}, Jn 14^{15} 15^{15}).

4. In light of this essential relation of Jesus to His kingdom, we are now prepared to consider the two great titles by which this relation was expressed by Jesus Himself—'Son of Man,' and 'Son of God.' The second of these titles, to which we return below, is, in the Synoptics at least, more frequently given to Jesus by others than assumed by Jesus Himself (Mt 3^{17} $4^{3.\,6}$ 14^{33} $27^{40.\,54}$, Mk 3^{11} 15^{39} etc.), but it is constantly implied, even in the earlier Gospels, in His mode of speaking of His Father, and is sometimes emphatically expressed (e.g. Mt 11^{27} $16^{16.\,17}$ $26^{63.\,64}$). In Jn it is the more common. It is otherwise with the title 'Son of Man,' which is the favourite designation of Jesus for Himself, but is never used by His disciples, or by the evangelists, in speaking of Him (only once outside the Gospels by Stephen, Ac 7^{56}). It occurs also in a singularly impressive and weighty form, with the definite article to both nouns, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου.* It was plainly on His own lips a Messianic title (Mk 2^{10}, Mt 16^{28} 26^{64}, Jn 5^{27} etc.), yet there is no evidence, apart from the doubtful Bk. of Enoch, that it was a current title for the Messiah in that time. The usage in the Gospels shows decisively it was not. It was not the wish of Jesus to make a public avowal of His Messiahship in His early ministry, but we find Him freely using this enigmatic title (Mk 2^{10}). The Jews evidently were perplexed as to its meaning (Jn 12^{34}). The phrase 'Son of Man' in Mt 16^{13} is manifestly not synonymous with 'Christ,' either in popular acceptation or in the minds of the disciples. We must therefore hold it for certain that the expression was one welling up from the depths of the original consciousness of Jesus, and expressing some profound conception of His mission. What precisely this is, is a point on which there is wide difference of opinion (see the various views well stated in Lietzmann's Der Menschensohn, 1896). Wendt will have it (Die Lehre Jesu, ii. pp. 442, 443) that the title is meant to designate its possessor as a weak, creaturely being—member, Messiah though He was, of the weak, creaturely race of humanity. But this theory cannot be carried through without doing violence to many passages in which this name is evidently used as a title of dignity; the highest functions being claimed by Jesus, not, as Wendt's argument would require, despite of His being Son of Man, but because He is Son of Man (Mk 2^{28}, Jn 5^{27} etc.). More probable is the generally accepted view which connects this title with the language of Dn 7^{13} already alluded to—'there came with the clouds of heaven one like unto a Son of Man,' etc. (cf. Mt 26^{64}). Whatever view be taken of this expression,—whether it be supposed to denote an individual (so Beyschlag), or only to symbolize the humanness of the new kingdom in contrast with the kingdoms of the beasts which had preceded,—there lies in it at least the notion that the kingdom of God, not resting like the others on brute force, would be the first in which the divine ideal of humanity would be realized; so that our Lord, in taking this title, may well have expressed the consciousness that there had appeared in Him the New Man of the race—the type and representative of a new humanity—one who, because of this perfection of His humanity, stood in a relation to all men, and was their natural ruler and Lord in the kingdom He had come to found. There lay thus, in the use of the title by Jesus, at once the idea of the reality and truth of His humanity, the consciousness of His unique perfection as man, the sense of His universal relation to the race, and the knowledge of His calling and function to be the Messianic King.* He was Son of Man, as embodying in Himself the divine idea of a godlike humanity—the Son of Man, as the unique individual of the race who sustained this character—the Son of Man in the universal sense, as representing in His Person, not the seed of Abraham alone, but the whole of mankind. This title, accordingly, already expresses the principle of universality of the new religion in its contrast with the national limitation of Judaism, and the current conception of the Messiah. Baldensperger is therefore only partially correct when he rejects the 'ideal man' theory of this title, and ridicules it as an attempt to carry back our nineteenth-century notions into a period to which they were quite strange (2nd ed. p. 178). There lies behind it, certainly, no such abstract conception as 'the ideal man,' yet the reality which that phrase expresses is undoubtedly present from the beginning as an element in the consciousness from which the title springs.

We return to the more particular consideration of the second title, 'Son of God,' which, on the face of it, expresses the consciousness which Jesus had of His relation to God, just as the previous title expressed His consciousness of the relation He sustained to men. Those are undoubtedly right who warn us off from seeking, in the first instance, a metaphysical interpretation of this title. We shall not reach Christ's own meaning in the use of it, or the fact it represents in His consciousness, by starting with the definitions of the Nicene Creed; but must seek our clue rather in the line of the OT conceptions through which originally it came also to Him. As J″ was the Father of His nation Isr. (Ex $4^{22.\,23}$, Hos 11^{1}), so was He peculiarly the Father of the theocratic King, 'I will be his Father, and he shall be my Son' (2 S 7^{14}, Ps 89^{20}). We have seen already what the relation imported in the theocratic ruler—a perfect unity with God in will and aim; such a solidarity between God and His visible representative that the purposes of the former, and those only, were perfectly executed by the latter. We saw, too, how entirely this ideal failed to be realized on the purely human basis of the OT theocracy, and how manifest it became, that if ever it was to be realized, the King in whom this was done must stand in a relation of nearness and unity to J″ transcending the limits of ordinary humanity—that he must possess an exceptional dignity of nature, raising him to a superhuman rank of character and authority (Is $9^{6.7}$ etc.). When, now, we turn to the Gospels, we cannot but notice that the same ideas prevail. 'Son of God' is there also a Messianic title (Mt 16^{16} $26^{63.64}$, Jn 1^{49} 10^{36} etc.); and it connotes, with whatever else, a perfect oneness of thought, will, aim, sentiment, purpose, between the Father and the Son—entire moral and spiritual unity, reciprocal and exclusive knowledge, the perfect adoption by the Son of the divine ends as His own, and absolute fidelity and devotion in the execution of them (Mt 11^{27}, Jn 5^{20} $10^{15.30}$ etc.). And this is not less clearly associated in Jesus with the consciousness that this unbroken oneness in spirit with God is connected with some peculiar distinction in nature—that His relation to God as Son is not that of other men, but that He is the Son par excellence—the Son of God in a special and solitary relation of life and affection. It is observable, accordingly, that even while He recognizes the divine affinity in every human soul, invites men to sonship in His kingdom, and teaches His disciples to address God, and to love and trust Him as their Father, He never places Himself as Son in the same category with them, but always carefully distinguishes His own relation to the Father from theirs (e.g. Jn 20^{17}). Here, then, we come on that in the consciousness of Jesus which, while it cannot be properly spoken of as a metaphysical conception of His Person, yet legitimately lays the basis for those metaphysical, or at least transcendental, predications regarding Him which are found in the creeds, and even earlier in the Epistles, and the Johannine Prologue. What this transcendental element in the consciousness of Jesus implied, can only be inferred from His various utterances respecting Himself in the Gospels, from the claims He makes, the prerogatives He assumes, the works He does, His promise of His perpetual presence with His Church, and of His return in glory, His glimpses even into a previous state of pre-existence, etc. (Mt 7^{21-23} 18^{20} 25. 26^{64} 28^{18-20}, Jn 8^{58} 17^{5} etc.)—all matters which we cannot discuss here. One thing, however, is at once implied in what has just been said, namely, that whereas in the OT conception the official sense of the phrase 'Son of God' overshadows the personal, in the case of Jesus it is precisely the other way—the official relation is grounded in the personal. He is the Son of God as Messianic King, because He is first Son of God by nature. He is 'the Son' simpliciter; and this consciousness of a personal peculiarity in His relation to the Father, springing as it no doubt did from His sense of entire spiritual oneness, may be presumed to go back in some form to the earliest dawn of His reflective life (cf. Lk 2^{49}). There was no period of His life in which He did not know God as His Father; was not conscious of an untroubled relation of union with Him; did not find in His soul the reflection of His character; and did not yield to Him His entire love, trust, and obedience. We cannot err, therefore, in finding the root of Christ's conception of His kingdom in His own perfect consciousness of His filial relation to His Father, together with the new views of religion, of righteousness, of duty, and of blessedness, which this implied. The consciousness he had of Himself as Son, with the correlative idea of God as Father, leads to the designation of the kingdom as 'the kingdom of the Father' (Mt 13^{43}); just as St. Paul also speaks of it as 'the kingdom of the Son of His love,' into which the Father has translated us (Col $1^{12.13}$). The kingdom, in this view, is the sphere of God's fatherly love and rule in hearts truthfully submitted to Him through His Son; of His gracious, unbounded self-communication for the blessing and enrichment of His people. This doctrine of Jesus as to the divine Fatherhood, however, is not offhand to be identified, as it so often is, with the doctrine of the paternal love of God to all men, which has for its correlate the doctrine of a universal natural sonship of man. It is surprising how little basis is found for this doctrine of a universal Fatherhood and sonship in the recorded sayings of Jesus. It is doubtful if it is to be found anywhere, except by implication in the parable of the Prodigal (Lk 15^{11-32}). That Christ recognizes a natural kinship of every human soul with God (cf. Gn $1^{26.27}$), and a calling and destination of every individual to be a son of God in His kingdom, is indeed most true; but Fatherhood and sonship in His ordinary speech is a relation within His kingdom, not a relation of mere nature, but (so throughout the whole NT) the result of a divine act of grace placing man in this relation (the Pauline υἱοθεσία; cf. Jn $1^{12.13}$), and of a supernatural impartation of a new nature and life (Jn $3^{5.6}$). In comparison with this higher, divine relation, the natural sinks, as it were, into the background. We gain, indeed, the right point of view for understanding this doctrine of Jesus on the divine Fatherhood, only when we observe that it takes its origin, not from the general relation of God to the world, or even from the relation of God to believers in His kingdom, but primarily from the relation of the Father to Himself. It does not begin at the circumference—the general relation of God to mankind, but at the centre—the special, unique, incomparable relation of the Father to the Son. It is in the relation to the Son that we have, so to speak, the spring of Fatherhood in the heart of God. This relation, which in its fulness none other can share, is then in its measure extended to those who are the members of His kingdom; and, finally, extends itself even as a blessed possibility to all mankind, in harmony with man's original destination (parable of Prodigal).

* Lietzmann in his tractate, Der Menschensohn (1896), seeks to break the force of this by going back from the Gr. to the Aram., in which ברנשא means simply 'man' (unemphatic). But the emphatic force of the expression cannot be erased from the Gospel usage. Lietzmann stands almost alone in holding that the term was not used by Jesus, but found its way into the Gospels from a Christian misconception.

* This is, in substance, Neander's view (Life of Christ), and a better has not yet been found.

5. With the help of this clue afforded us by the personal consciousness of Jesus, we are able to advance to some nearer determination on the subject of His kingdom. If Jesus was indeed sure of Himself from the first as the Son of God,—if He had this perfect filial consciousness from the beginning,—there falls away every ground for assuming that His views fluctuated and varied regarding this kingdom He came to found, or that He did not clearly grasp it from the outset in its essential nature, laws, and conditions of success. The Gospels give us no warrant for supposing that such fluctuation took place; the only point which can with plausibility be raised being that discussed below: whether from the first He apprehended the necessity of His death. If the essential feature in His kingdom was the admission of men through grace into a relation of sonship akin to His own, He could not have varied in His conception of it, of its righteousness, or of the general conditions of entrance into it, unless His own self-consciousness had varied. A second weighty result we reach is, that if Jesus was fully conscious of Himself as Son of God, and Founder of this kingdom, from the first, this kingdom in His view could not have been a merely future thing, but must have been conceived of as already existing. This, again, is a point on which much discussion has been raised: whether, namely, the kingdom of God, in the teaching of Jesus, has only an eschatological significance (thus Kaftan, Schmoller, etc.), or whether it denotes an already existing reality (Ritschl, Wendt, etc.). The true view, surely, is that it is not either exclusively. It both has a present being upon earth, and has a perfect, glorified form in eternity. The existence of the kingdom as a present, developing reality is implied in the parables of growth (mustard seed, leaven, seed growing secretly, Mt 13, Mk 4^{26-32}); in the representations of it, in its earthly form, as a mixture of good and bad (wheat and tares, the net of fishes, Mt 13); in the description of the righteousness of the kingdom (Sermon on the Mount) which is to be realized in the ordinary human relations; as well as in many special sayings (e.g. Mt 12^{28}, Lk 16^{18} 17^{21}, whether 'within' or 'among' makes no difference). But, apart from specific declarations, the truth is implied in the simple fact that Jesus Himself was present in the full consciousness of His Sonship and calling to be the Founder of the kingdom, gathering disciples to Himself as the nucleus of a future society. We have formerly observed that in the Person of Jesus, even had there been no other, the kingdom of God was already present in humanity. In Him lay the vital germ of that kingdom; He was the bearer and representative of its principle of Sonship; in Him its powers and grace were made manifest (Mt 12^{28}). When, as the result of His activity, a band of disciples were drawn around Him, the members of which were introduced by Him into a new fellowship with God, and in whose hearts the principle of a divine rule was manifestly established, it was more than ever evident that the kingdom of God had begun on earth.

6. Still endeavouring to keep in view the inward and essential nature of this kingdom, or reign of God among men, which Jesus came to introduce, we are led by the representations of the Gospels to form such conceptions of it as the following. In what is said under these heads, the connexion of the kingdom with its Founder, and the teaching of Jesus on God, man, righteousness, salvation, will receive further illustration.

(a) The kingdom is in its beginnings, as just stated, the introduction of a new principle of divine rule into the hearts of men, through the word (Mt 13^{19}), the truth (Jn 18^{37}), the Spirit (Jn $3^{5.\,6}$), in virtue of which, changed in disposition (Mt 18^{3}), they become doers of the will of the Father in heaven (Mt 7^{21} etc.). It is therefore, in its principle, something inward, vital, invisible (Lk $17^{20.\,21}$). It is not the idea of Jesus, however, that this kingdom should be confined solely to the inward life. It is rather a principle working from within outwards for the renewal and transformation of every department of our earthly existence (marriage, the family, the state, social life, etc., Mt 19^{3-9}, Jn 2^{1-11}, Mt 22^{21} etc.). It is thus a growing, developing thing—as it is represented in the parables (Mt 13). The kingdom is not fully come till everything in human life, and in the relations of man in society, is brought into complete harmony with the will of God (Mt 6^{10}; cf. Neander, Life of Christ, p. 89, Eng. tr.). While, however, Jesus gives us many incidental indications of the true relation of His kingdom to society, it is the spiritual or directly religious and ethical aspect of the kingdom which alone is more prominent in His teaching. 'The whole weight is rested on the inward disposition, on the new relation to God, on the new life of the Spirit, on the new righteousness proceeding from that life, on the new hopes and privileges of the sons of God. Everything is looked at in the light of the spiritual, the eternal. We read nothing in Christ of the effects of His religion on art, on culture, on philosophy, on politics, on commerce, on education, on science, on literature, on economical or social reform' (Christian View of God and the World, p. 406). So also with the apostles. Yet a regenerating spirit has gone forth from the gospel of the kingdom in all these departments.

(b) On the other side, the kingdom of God is viewed as a sphere of privilege and blessing into which the disciple is admitted, in which he receives the forgiveness of his sins, attains the satisfaction of his spiritual wants, is filled with righteousness, and inherits the felicity of the eternal life (Mt 5^{3-10} 6^{14} 19^{29} $25^{34.\,46}$, Lk 4^{18}, Jn $6^{27.\,35.\,40}$ 10^{28} etc.). It is the summum bonum for man—the good to be desired above all others, and for which everything else should be sacrificed (Mt 6^{33} 13^{44-46} parables of Treasure and Pearl, 19^{29}, Lk 10^{42}, Jn 17^{3} etc.). The kingdom of God is thus emphatically with Jesus, as throughout the whole of Scripture, a kingdom of grace, the message of it 'good tidings' (Mt 4^{23}, Lk $2^{10.\,11}$ 4^{22}). Its proclamation is a gospel, and it brings to man at once the fullest provision for his needs as a sinner, the highest satisfaction of his moral life, and the noblest end for his practical realization. God's royalty in His kingdom is shown not less by gift than by rule; it is gracious, unstinted giving which is the foundation of the whole (Mt 7^{7-11}, Jn 5^{14} 6^{32-35} $10^{11.\,28}$ etc.). It is thus the sphere of 'salvation,' though this term (σωτηρία) is still seldom used (Lk 19^{9}, Jn 4^{22}; cf. Lk 1^{69-72}, Mt $16^{25.\,26}$ 19^{25}, Lk 19^{10}, Jn 3^{14-17} 5^{34} 12^{47} etc.). The all-embracing expression for its good is 'eternal life'; yet in the Synoptics this term is always applied to the future consummation of that good (e.g. Mk 10^{30}), whereas in Jn it is used also to denote the present possession of the life of God by believers (Jn 5^{24}). Wendt justly points out, however, that even in Jn this is done only in occasional passages (Die Lehre Jesu, ii. p. 193), and the Synoptics also recognize in fact the present reception and enjoyment by believers of those blessings of the kingdom which Jn designates by 'eternal life' (Mt 5^{3-10} etc.).

(c) The kingdom of God is inseparably associated with character in its members. The conditions of entrance into it are repentance and faith (Mk 1^{15}, Lk 7^{50} $13^{3.\,5}$ etc.); its blessings require for their reception such moral dispositions as poverty of spirit, humility, meekness, and lowliness of heart, spiritual hungering and thirsting (Mt $5^{3.\,6}$ $11^{28.\,29}$ $18^{3.\,4}$, Jn 4^{14} 6^{35}); as a kingdom of the truth, those only that are of the truth (Jn 18^{37}), of an honest and good heart (Lk 8^{15}), will receive it; to know its doctrine, there must be a willingness to do the will of God (Jn 7^{17}); a desire for the honour of men is fatal to seeking the honour that comes from God (Jn 5^{44}). These states of mind are not the product of nature, but the result of a new spiritual birth (Jn $3^{3.\,5}$). Within the kingdom, the rule of God takes the form of the realization of a new and spiritual righteousness in the hearts of the members, and in their relations with each other and with the world. This righteousness is of the essence of the kingdom (Mt 6^{33}), and a great part of the teaching of Jesus relates to it (notably the Sermon on the Mount). It is at once part of the blessing of the kingdom (Mt 5^{6}), and a moral task set before the members for their accomplishment (Mt 5^{13-16} 7^{21}). Its norm is the perfection of the Father Himself (Mt 5^{48})—the absolutely Good One (Mk 10^{18}). Like everything else in the kingdom, it is the product of a divinely given life, and develops from within outwards, from heart to conduct, as a good tree brings forth fruit (Mt 7^{17}). It differs from the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees in motive and in aim,—being spontaneous, where theirs was formal and mechanical; spiritual, where theirs had regard only to the letter of the precept; done with a sole respect to God, where theirs was man-pleasing (Mt 5^{17}–6^{18}). Its supreme principle is love (Mt 7^{12}, Mk 12^{28-34}). In relation to God, it takes the form of a spirit of dependence, and trust in His fatherly providence, which relieves from earthly care (Mt 6^{25-34} 7^{6-11}); in its estimate of goods, it sets supreme store on the kingdom and its righteousness, and seeks these beyond all material blessings (Mt $6^{19-23.\ 31-33}$); in its relation to man, it shows itself in mercy, forbearance, forgiveness of injuries, active beneficence, and in the bright shining of a holy example (Mt $5^{5.\ 7.\ 38-48}$ 7^{12}). Its standards of judgment are the direct inversion of most of those which prevail in the world. It inverts, e.g., the world's standards of blessedness in calling the poor in spirit, the mourning, the meek, the persecuted, etc., blessed (Mt 5^{3-12}; cf. Mal 3^{14}); the world's standards of greatness in pronouncing that true greatness lies in humility and service (Mt $18^{3.\ 4}$, Mk 10^{44}, Jn $13^{14.\ 15}$); the world's standards of wisdom in pronouncing the typical wise man of the world a fool (Lk 12^{15-21}); the world's standards of the chief good in making that consist in the kingdom and its righteousness (Mt 6^{33}), etc. Yet, in His doctrine of the righteousness of the kingdom, Jesus declares that He is not introducing anything absolutely new, but only unfolding the deepest spirit and teaching of law and prophets (Mt $5^{17.\ 18}$ 22^{36-39}).

(d) It follows from the nature of the kingdom, as just described, that it is a kingdom entirely spiritual and unworldly in its nature (Jn 18^{36}, cf. Mk $10^{42.\ 43}$)—supernatural and heavenly in its origin, powers, blessings, aims, and ends,—a kingdom free alike from national and ceremonial limitations, working by its own laws, and destined in the end to embrace all peoples. There is thus given us from another side what we saw to lie already in the Lord's designation of Himself as 'Son of Man'—the universality of the kingdom of God. Jesus already hints at this in Mt 8^{11} 'They shall come from the east and from the west, and shall sit down with Abraham,' etc.; it is implied in His parables (Mt 13 'the field is the world,' v.^{38}; parable of Mustard Seed, etc.); is declared elsewhere (Mt 21^{43} 'The kingdom of God shall be taken from you,' etc.); and is announced in several sayings of Jn (e.g. Jn 12^{32} 'I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me,' etc.). It comes out distinctly in the commission after the resurrection (Mt 28^{19}, Mk 16^{15}). It must also have been given to the consciousness of Jesus from the first by the prophecy in Dn ($2^{35.\ 44}$ $7^{14.\ 27}$). Equally clear is it from the attitude of Jesus to mere ceremonial observances (Mt 15^{1-20}), and the critical, discretionary position He assumed to the whole Mosaic Law (e.g. the Sabbath, Mk 2^{28}; marriage, Mt 19^{6-9}), that, while Himself observing the ordinances of His nation, He did not bind these on the members of His kingdom, but claimed the right as Son of Man—i.e. the Messiah—to alter, change, and abrogate them. His relation to the Jewish law He lays down in the principle that He came, not to destroy, but to fulfil (Mt 5^{17}). But this fulfilment was of a nature which meant in part destruction. His aim throughout was to judge the details of the law by reference to its underlying principle, and to the highest needs of men (Mk 2^{27}),—to go back at every point clearly from commands to principles, from outward conduct to dispositions of the heart, from forms of worship to spirit of worship—and this led to the dropping away of everything that was of mere provisional or temporary value. In the Sermon on the Mount, accordingly, and in all the Gospels, the whole stress is laid on the spiritual, the ethical, the eternal, and no reference is made to the ceremonial law at all. Nay, in the two similitudes of the Patch on the Old Garment, and the New Wine in Old Bottles (Mt $9^{16.\ 17}$), Jesus indicates in the clearest way His consciousness that His kingdom was something radically new, and not simply a reformed and purified Judaism, and that the old forms were utterly inadequate to contain the spirit of the new religion—that the latter would indeed burst and rend them, if it were put into them.

(e) The kingdom thus introduced into time and history has two stadia—an earthly and an eternal. The consideration of this point involves, finally, some investigations to which we proceed.

(a) A question of much importance here is as to the connexion which Jesus conceived to subsist between the founding of His kingdom and His death. The question is twofold: whether from the beginning of His ministry He clearly recognized the necessity of His death; and, if He did, or even if this knowledge came later, what significance He attributed to His death for the founding of His kingdom. The first point is not to be settled on a priori grounds, but from an impartial consideration of the history. We cannot, however, doubt, from a review of all the circumstances, that Jesus did, from the commencement of His Messianic career, recognize the fate in store for Him—whether the precise mode of His death is another question (but cf. Jn $3^{14.\ 16}$). It is true that it was not till after the memorable confession at Cæsarea Philippi that Jesus began to speak plainly to His disciples of His approaching sufferings and death (Mt 16^{21} etc.), but it does not follow that this was the beginning of His own knowledge on the subject. On the contrary, it is evident from the clearness, fulness, and decision with which He then announces His death and resurrection, that these topics had long occupied His own thoughts, and were already settled convictions in His mind. But we are not left entirely to conjecture. It is, on the face of it, in the highest degree improbable that one who from the outset grasped so clearly the essential nature of His kingdom in its contrast with the world, who had rejected the temptations to give it another shape (Mt 4^{1-11}), who predicted so accurately in His parables the stadia of its development in history (Mt 13), who forewarned His disciples of the certain persecutions which awaited them for His sake (Mt $5^{10.\ 11}$ 10^{16-24}), could have been ignorant of the inevitable collision which must occur between Himself and the Jewish authorities, and which He must have foreseen could not but issue in His death. That He did anticipate it is expressly implied in His saying, 'The disciple is not above his Master,' etc. (Mt 10^{24}), and in His allusion to the bridegroom being taken away from them (Mt 9^{15}). More definitely, Jesus had deeply studied the prophecies, and in the very beginning of His ministry announced that those relating to the Servant of J" in Is were fulfilled in Himself (Lk 4^{21}). But He could not be unaware of what was written of the death of this Servant in Is 53; and the recorded greeting of the Baptist, 'Behold the Lamb of God,' etc. (Jn 1^{29}), would recall that passage. There are other sayings in Jn—those to Nicodemus (Jn $3^{14.\ 16}$), and especially the enigmatic utterances about giving His flesh for the life of the world (Jn 6^{51-56})—which point in the same direction. But if Jesus foresaw His death, it was impossible that He should not have regarded His temporary submission to it as in some way necessary for the ends of His kingdom—for, that His subjection to death was, and could be, only temporary, He never, in the strength of His Messianic consciousness, doubted. His announcement of His death is always conjoined with the declaration of His rising again (Mt 16^{21} 20^{19} etc.); and the shadow of the Cross never clouds for a moment His assurance of His final coming in glory to judge the world (Mt 7^{22} 10^{23} 13^{41} 16^{27}, Lk 12^{8} etc.). If, accordingly, we ask, What was the significance which Jesus attached to His death in connexion with the establishment of His kingdom? we are driven, by the passages already cited, to see in it more than the mere illustration of a general law of sacrifice (Jn 12^{24-26}), or a proof of fidelity in His vocation. We must take an incidental saying like Mk 10^{45} 'For even the Son of Man came . . . to give his life a ransom for many,' not as if it stood alone, but with the depth and seriousness of meaning supplied by a context of similar utterances. The great passage on the expiatory sufferings of the Servant of J″ (Is 53) must probably be our clue here also. We recall the word of the Baptist, 'The Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn 1^{29}); the saying in which His death is connected with salvation in the conversation with Nicodemus ('as Moses lifted up the serpent,' etc., Jn 3^{14}; for though the 'lifting up' is a term of exaltation, we can hardly fail to associate it with His death); the 'giving his flesh for the life of the world' in Jn 6^{51}; but, above all, the solemn and explicit words at the institution of the Supper, 'My blood of the covenant, which is shed for many unto the remission of sins' (Mt 26^{28}; cf. Mk 14^{24}, Lk 22^{20}, 1 Co 11^{25}). In keeping with this connexion of His death in the consciousness of Jesus with the remission of sins, we are told how, after the resurrection, the disciples were enjoined to make this a fundamental article of their preaching (Lk 24^{47}). The death of Jesus, followed by His rising again, was evidently, in the Lord's own view, a decisive turning-point in the history of His kingdom, and in the spiritual history of the world; and not till that event had taken place, and the spirit had been given as the sequel to it, had the kingdom been fully constituted (Lk 24^{49}, Ac 1^{5} 2^{33}).

(β) It remains that we glance at the eschatological declarations of Jesus respecting His kingdom, for that its earthly phase is to be succeeded by a heavenly, in which the separation of good and bad shall be finally effected, and the ripened results of its long development shall be garnered up under new and glorious conditions, is a constant element in His teaching (Mt 13^{40-43} $19^{28.\,29}$ $22^{29.\,30}$ $25^{34.\,46}$, Jn $14^{1.\,2}$ 17^{24} etc.). This higher and eternal state, described as 'the regeneration' (παλιγγενεσία), or 'the resurrection' (ut supra), is introduced by the coming (παρουσία) of the Son of Man in glory, the resurrection of the dead, and a judgment which takes account of the conduct alike of the professed members of the kingdom, and of the nations of mankind (Mt 24, Jn $5^{28.\,29}$, Mt 7^{21-23} 25, etc.). The principles on which this judgment proceeds are essential character, with its fruits in word and deed; faithfulness or unfaithfulness in duty; watchfulness; boldness in confessing Christ, or sin in denying Him; the presence or absence of love, etc. The separation which the judgment effects is, so far as appears, final (Mt 13^{40-43} 25^{46} etc.). In thus carrying the consummation of the kingdom into a future life, and connecting it with His personal return, Jesus goes entirely beyond OT limits; though there also the doctrines of a future life in the blessed enjoyment of God, and of a resurrection of the dead, are in process of formation (Ps 17^{15} $49^{14.\,15}$ 73^{23-26}, Is 25^{8} 26^{19}, Hos 6^{3} 13^{14}, Dn 12^{2} etc.). The doctrine of the resurrection was a cardinal one with the Pharisees; but it had its deep roots in the OT doctrines of man, of God, of sin, of death, and of salvation (Mt 22^{29-33}), and, as connected by Jesus with the redemption and new life of His kingdom, is an essential part of His religion. The question, nevertheless, is one of some difficulty, how far the undoubtedly largely symbolical and figurative character of these discourses of Jesus on the last things entitles us to rely on them as real representations of the future? They assuredly do not give us a scientific, or perfectly objective, knowledge of the nature, the course, and relative order of these events, such as we can turn with precision into a theological system. Yet they are too definite and circumstantial to permit of our supposing that to the consciousness of Jesus they were mere figures, or were not intended to convey to us some real knowledge on the subjects of which they treat. This question presses especially in regard to the Parousia. Did Jesus, e.g., anticipate for His kingdom a long period of development in the world before the end came; or was His Parousia regarded by Himself as immediate, or, at least, as not long to be delayed? Mt 24^{29}, with certain other passages (Mt 10^{23} 16^{28}), might seem to teach the latter, and we know that the times and the seasons were not within the human knowledge of the Son (Mk 13^{32}, Ac 1^{6}); but a careful consideration of the whole teaching of Jesus will lead us to modify this first impression. We cannot mistake that the picture of the kingdom given us in the parables is that of a slowly developing reality, bound to a law of rhythm—'first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear' (Mk 4^{28})—with the world and humanity as its sphere of manifestation, and good and evil growing side by side in it till both are fully ripe (Mt 13); and other passages suggest the like idea of a prolonged world-development, and a diffusion of the gospel among all nations before the end come (Mt 8^{11} 21^{43} 24^{4-14}, Lk $19^{11.\,12.\,15}$; cf. also the post-resurrection commissions, Mt $28^{19.\,20}$, Mk 16^{15} etc.). Against these numerous indications the εὐθέως of Mt 24^{29} (which may be variously accounted for) cannot be allowed to tell; especially as there are not wanting signs in the discourse itself of a nearer and a remoter horizon ('these things,' 'that day and hour,' vv.$^{34.\,36}$). The truth would seem to be that Jesus does not always speak of His Parousia (any more than of His kingdom) in the same sense; that it is to Him rather a process in which many elements flow together into a single image, than a single definite event, always looked at in the same light. Thus he says to the high priest, with obvious reference to the prophecy in Dn, 'Henceforth,' that is, from this time on, 'ye shall see the Son of Man sitting at the right hand of power, and coming on the clouds of heaven' (Mt 26^{64}). He came in His resurrection; in the mission of the Comforter; in the power and spread of His kingdom, especially after the removal of the limitations created by the existing Jewish polity (which seems to be the meaning in Mt 16^{28}); He comes in every great day of the Lord in the history of His Church; He will yet come more conspicuously in the events of the future; and, last of all, He will personally come to judge the quick and the dead. The kingdom advances to its goal, not peacefully or suddenly, but by a succession of great crises (Mt 24), and each of these is in a sense the coming of the Son of Man (cf. Reuss' Hist. of Christ. Theol. i. pp. 217, 218; Bruce's Kingdom of God, ch. 12; Orr's Christian View of God and the World, p. 384).

7. One topic more, of considerable importance, we must allude to before leaving this part of our subject. It is the much canvassed question of the relation of the idea of the kingdom of God to that of the Church. If our previous exposition is correct, these ideas are not quite identical, as they have frequently been taken to be. The kingdom of God is a wider conception than that of the Church. On the other hand, these ideas do not stand so far apart as they are sometimes represented. In some cases, e.g. in Mt $16^{18.\,19}$, the phrase 'kingdom of heaven' is practically synonymous with the Church. The Church is, as a society, the visible expression of this kingdom in the world; is indeed the only society which does formally profess (very imperfectly often) to represent it. Yet the Church is not the outward embodiment of this kingdom in all its aspects, but only in its directly religious and ethical, i.e. in its purely spiritual, aspect. The direct business of the Church, e.g., is not to take to do with art, science, politics, literature, etc., but to bear witness for God and His truth to men, to preach and spread the gospel of the kingdom, to maintain God's worship, to administer the sacraments, to provide for the self-edification and religious fellowship of believers (cf. Christian View of God and the World, pp. 409, 410). That Jesus contemplated the union of the members of His kingdom into such a visible society—or Church—is evident from direct statements, as in Mt 16^{18} ('on this rock I will build my Church'); from the institution of the apostolate (Mt 10^{1-5}); from the instructions about baptism (Mt $28^{19.20}$); from the rules of discipline He lays down (Mt 18^{15-18}), etc.: while the important functions which He intrusts to this society are seen from the terms in which He speaks of it; the promises He gives to it (Mt 16^{18-20} 18^{20}); the authority He confers upon it (Mt 16^{19} 18^{18}, Jn 20^{23}); the sacraments He leaves with it; and the assurances of His perpetual presence, which are among His last words to it (Mt 28^{20}). In Jn the deeper root of the Church idea is manifest in the conception of the living union of the branches with the vine (Jn 15^{1-7}).

III. THE TEACHING OF THE EPISTLES AND OTHER BOOKS OF NT ON THE KINGDOM OF GOD.—In passing from the Gospels, and especially the Synoptics, to the remaining writings of NT, we are sensible at once of a great difference in the use made of this conception of the kingdom of God. It is no longer the central and all-comprehending notion which it was in the popular teaching of Jesus, but sinks comparatively into the background, where it does not altogether disappear, and is employed, so far as retained, in an almost exclusively eschatological sense. The difference is accounted for by the altered circumstances of the Christian community. It was no longer the Jesus of the earthly ministry, but the Risen Lord, that was the centre of the faith and hope of the Christian believers. The Christ had died, had risen again, was exalted to heaven, had poured out the Spirit, was expected speedily to return to judgment; and interest was concentrated on the meaning and bearings of these great facts on salvation. The gospel had passed over from Jews to Gentiles, and Churches were everywhere being formed and organized. Under these changed conditions it was inevitable also that nomenclature should change, and that the higher stage on which the kingdom of God had entered in history should evolve a speech, and forms of conception for itself, adapted to its new wants. And this is what actually happened. Instead of the kingdom, it is now Christ Himself who is the centre of preaching; in speaking to Gentiles, His work, the blessings of His salvation, the nature and fruits of the new life of the Spirit, the hopes connected with His appearing, are naturally dwelt on without reference to the theocratic conception; as respects the earthly form, the idea of the Church necessarily displaces every other. The one sphere which these altered conditions did not touch was the eschatological, and here accordingly we find the idea of the kingdom, as one among other forms of conception, retained.

The phenomenon which here confronts us has, of course, struck every careful student of the NT. Harnack notices it in his Dogmengeschichte: 'It is not wonderful,' he says, 'that in the oldest Christian preaching "Jesus Christ" meets us as frequently as, in the preaching of Jesus, the kingdom of God itself' (i. p. 70; cf. Ritschl, Rechtfertigung, ii. p. 293 ff.; Kaftan, Das Wesen, p. 229, etc.). In Ac there are a few references which show that 'the kingdom of God' was still the general formula for the substance of Christian preaching (8^{12} 14^{22} 19^{8} 20^{25} $28^{23.31}$). But in the Epistles the term recedes decidedly into the background, and, as just stated, is generally used in an eschatological sense. 1 P does not use the expression; Ja only once (βασιλεία alone, Ja 2^{5}). The Pauline theology is developed from its own basis, without any systematic attempt to fit it to this conception. In He it is other ideas that rule. The term 'kingdom' occurs only once, with a future reference (12^{28}). In the Johannine writings, the only occurrences are in two places in the Gospel, and denote (on Christ's lips) the present spiritual kingdom ($3^{3.5}$ 18^{36}—in the latter passage 'my kingdom'). Generally, in this Gospel, as in the Epistles, the idea of the kingdom recedes behind that of 'life.' The case of Rev requires consideration by itself. Here, clearly, the idea of the kingdom is a governing one. Believers are made a kingdom unto God, and have the hope of reigning with Christ (1^{6} 3^{21} 5^{10}); the Lamb is 'Lord of lords, and King of kings' (17^{14} 19^{16}, cf. 1^{5}); and the climax of His conflict with His enemies is that 'the kingdom of the world is become the kingdom of our Lord, and of His Christ; and He shall reign for ever and ever' (11^{15-17}). The peculiarity in the apocalyptic representation, however, is the interpolation before the general judgment of 1000 years' reign of Christ with His saints on earth, following upon a binding of Satan, and a first resurrection (20^{1-8}). The picture stands alone in NT, though the idea involved in it—that of a 'pre-eminent blossoming time' for the Church before the final consummation—'a time in which the Church shall celebrate her Sabbath eve,—the eve before the Sabbath' (Martensen)—stands in no contradiction with the teaching of Jesus, is in every way probable, and is not unfamiliar to OT prophecy (Is 11^{6} 35, etc.).

At first sight the contrast between the apostolic gospel and the teaching of Jesus in the Synoptics, as respects the use made of this idea of the kingdom, is sufficiently marked; but when we consider the subject a little more carefully—looking rather to the essence of the doctrine than to the language employed—a substantial harmony is apparent. It is plain, from the notices in the Ac above cited, and from the incidental references, that 'the kingdom of God' was still a recognized formula to cover all the contents of Christian preaching; though, for the reasons already assigned, it had no longer the same prominence as at an earlier period; and, while the prevailing tendency was to limit this title to the kingdom of the future, and to connect it with the Parousia (e.g. 2 Th 1^{5}, 2 Ti $4^{1.8}$, where ἐπιφάνεια), there are still a few cases which show that it was also applied to the present experience and state of privilege of Christians. Such, e.g., are Ro 14^{17}, where the kingdom of God is declared to consist, not in meat and drink, but in 'righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost'; and Col 1^{13}, where believers are spoken of as already 'translated' into 'the kingdom of the Son of his love.' Apart, however, from the mere use of the term,—which is a secondary matter,—we cannot fail to see that everything that Christ meant by the present being of His kingdom is fully recognized and insisted on by the apostolic writers; Christ Himself is 'the Lord' (ὁ Κύριος); He is exalted to the place of universal dominion at God's right hand (Ac 2^{33-36}, 1 Co $15^{24.25}$, Eph 1^{20-23}, Ph 2^{9-11}, He 1^{8} 2^{9}, Ja 2^{1}, 1 P 3^{22} etc.); the kingdom is that of God and of Christ (Eph 5^{5}, Col 1^{13}); He exercises, therefore, a present unlimited sway in and over His people, and over all things for their sake (Eph 1^{22}). Believers, again, are 'sons of God'; are, like Isr., 'an elect race, a royal priesthood, a holy nation, a people of God's own possession,' called 'out of darkness into his marvellous light,' 'a people of God' (1 P 2$^{9.10}$); they are renewed and dwelt in by His Spirit, which gives them the victory over sin in their members (Ro 7^{25} 8$^{1-9}$); grace 'reigns' in them (Ro 5^{21} 6$^{12.13.19}$);—in short, everything that can constitute a present kingdom of God on earth is acknowledged as existing in their case. If, therefore, there is any contrast with the teaching of Christ, it is in the advance to a higher, richer conception of the spiritual life than was possible at an elementary stage of instruction.

As respects the peculiarities of the doctrine of the kingdom of God in the Pauline Epistles, it is not necessary to add much to what has been said. The kingdom, in the apostle's view, as in Christ's own teaching, is connected with 'a redemption (ἀπολύτρωσις) through his blood,' and with forgiveness of sins (Col 1^{14}, cf. Eph 1^{7}). In its form of glory it awaits the appearing of Christ (2 Th 1$^{5-10}$, 2 Ti 4$^{1.8}$). But as in Rev we have the millennial doctrine, so in St. Paul we have the doctrine of the development of the man of sin and of the apostasy prior to the advent (2 Th 2$^{3-10}$, cf. Mt 24$^{11.12}$). It is still a moot question how far this doctrine is moulded upon current representations of Antichrist, and how far it is original (cf. references in Stanton's Jewish and Christian Messiah, p. 310). In St. John's Epistles the idea is more generalized (1 Jn 2$^{18.22}$ 4^{3}); while in the Apocalypse it assumes the threefold form of the Beast, the False Prophet, and the Woman (Rev 13. 17). Finally, St. Paul alone gives us the sublime idea of an ultimate rendering up of the mediatorial kingdom by the Son to the Father, 'that God may be all in all' (1 Co 15^{28}).

It lies beyond the scope of this article to discuss the various shapes which this great scriptural idea of the kingdom of God has assumed in its course down the ages. The chief are the Patristic Chiliastic idea; the Mediæval or Catholic idea (as in Augustine, who, however, has glimpses of a wider truth in his City of God); the Reformation idea, which still identifies the kingdom too exclusively with the Church; and the various modern forms of conception in the Church and schools from Kant downwards. A great impulse has been given to the study of this notion by the later Ritschlian theologians, who have done much to restore it to its just importance. It must however, always remain doubtful—and the diversities in the apostolic teaching give additional force to the doubt—how far this single idea of the kingdom of God is fitted to serve as the principle of an exhaustive system of theology. Its proper place would seem to be within the system as defining the end in the light of which God's whole purpose in Christ is to be read; and in this way it is fitted to render essential service as the bond of union between dogmatic theology and Christian ethics — two departments which have hitherto stood too far apart. It does this service by introducing the idea of an end which is at the same time an aim—in setting before the individual as his life-task the realization of that kingdom of God which is God's own end in creation and redemption. The social tendencies of our age give this idea of the kingdom of God a special value for our own time; and we may expect that its importance will be increasingly recognized,—on the one hand, in its ennobling effect on the conception of Christian work, and the higher spirit of unity it tends to engender in those engaged in it; and, on the other, in broadening the conception of Christian duty as embracing the obligation to labour for the supremacy of God's will in all the departments of private, social, and public life. It may be that the time has come for a resuscitation of this idea of Jesus which the exigencies of the apostolic age threw somewhat into the background; and that new applications and triumphs await it in the complexities of our modern social life, which even inspired men of the first generation could not reasonably foresee.

1. TITLE, SCOPE, AND PLACE IN CANON.—The title in AV, RV is 'The first (second) Book of the Kings.' Heb. מלכים א (ב) 'Kings I. II.'; LXX ΒΑΣΙΛΕΙΩΝ Γ (Δ). The use of the definite article in the English Version, 'the Kings,' is therefore unwarranted. The narrative of Kings, like those of Samuel and Chronicles, is continuous, and the division into two books is clearly a later device, and no part of the scheme of the original editor.

The division of the Hebrew text of Kings into two books is not found in the MSS or in the early printed editions. It first occurs in the great Rabbinic Bible of Daniel Bomberg, published at Venice 1516–17, where an asterisk between 1 K 22^{54} and 2 K 1^{1} calls attention to a note in the margin:—כאן מתחילים הלועזים ספר מלכי׳ רביעי. 'Here the non-Jews (i.e. Christians) begin the fourth Book of Kings.' A similar note is found between 1 and 2 S. Cf. Ginsburg, Introd. to the Massoretico-critical Edit. of the Heb. Bible, pp. 45, 930 f. Thus the division in MT seems to have been an innovation from LXX, Vulg. While in LXX no known MS presents an undivided text of 1. 2 K, 3. 4 K, 1. 2 Ch, it is interesting to note that in B the first verse of each second book appears also at the close of each first book respectively—a fact which shows that the divider of the books was desirous of indicating the inner connexion existing between the first and second divisions in each case. Cf. the manner in which in MT Ezr 1^{1-3a} (to ויעל) repeats 2 Ch 36$^{22.23}$, of which it originally formed the unbroken continuation.

Kings takes up the history of the kingdom of Israel at the point which has been reached by the narrative of Samuel, viz. the last days of David's reign, and the appointment of Solomon as his successor. Passing from Solomon to an account of the circumstances which led to the disruption of the kingdom, the editor from this point gives a parallel history of the divided kingdoms of Israel and Judah. The fall of the northern kingdom having been recorded (2 K 17), the narrative continues with an account of the fortunes of the southern kingdom until its destruction by Nebuchadrezzar and the final deportation of the Judæans to Babylon, B.C. 586. The concluding section of the work carries the history down to the release of king Jehoiachin from prison in the 37th year of his captivity (B.C. 561), under Evil-Merodach, the successor of Nebuchadrezzar.

Kings belongs to the second of the three divisions of the Hebrew Canon—the Nĕbhî'îm (נְבִיאִים) or Prophets. In this division the book forms, with Joshua, Judges, and Samuel, the earlier section, styled Nebhî'îm rīshônîm (נְבִיאִים רִאשֹׁנִים), the Former Prophets, as distinct from the Latter Prophets—Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the Twelve minor prophets. The justification of this nomenclature as it applies to Kings is to be gathered from consideration of the purpose which the writer of the book appears to have had in view.

2. PURPOSE.—Kings may accurately be described as a history of the period of the monarchy of Israel and Judah; and indeed, on account of the excellence of the sources employed for the composition of the work, takes first rank among the historical documents of the OT. But the mere compilation of a history is not the sole, or main, purpose of the writer. This may rather be characterized as religious and admonitory. History is employed as the vehicle of certain special religious lessons, drawn from the past, which the writer desires to inculcate upon his own age, and upon future generations. Thus an exhaustive employment of the historical sources which lay at his disposal is no part of his plan. So far from claiming to have utilized to the full his sources of information, he definitely and repeatedly refers to them as containing further details of fact likely to be of interest to the curious (I 11^{41} 14$^{19.29}$ al. See below). His special purpose is consistent with a selection from his materials; and this selection he carries out with such skill that the simple narration of the facts of history generally suffices to convey the lesson which the writer has at heart, even apart from his own comment and application.

The religious standpoint of the writer of Kings is that of the Book of Deuteronomy. He is deeply imbued with the spirit of this book, and his language is strongly coloured by its phraseology (see below).

Thus his aim is to apply to the past history of his race, from the time of Solomon and onward to his own day, the Deuteronomic standard, and to exemplify the view that prosperity is to be traced to a faithful regard for this standard, failure and catastrophe to its deliberate repudiation. The leading principles of Deut. upon which the writer of Kings desires to lay stress may be said, in the main, to be two: (i.) Whole-hearted devotion to J″ as Israel's only God, an obligation based upon the fact that J″ has made choice of Israel from among the nations as His special possession. (ii.) Sacrificial worship of J″ to be conducted only at one centre, viz. at the temple at Jerusalem, the place which J″ has chosen to set His name there. Conformity to these two principles is made the test to which the deeds of individual kings are brought, and in accordance with which a verdict is pronounced upon their characters.

The writer's ideal of kingship is David, the faithful worshipper and servant of J″. The piety of David is repeatedly the norm to which the action of his descendants is referred, and, when the times are darkest and apostasy most rampant, it is for David's sake that J″ still keeps a 'lamp' alight for him at Jerusalem.

Accordingly, the marked prosperity of the earlier part of Solomon's reign is due to the fact that he 'loved J″, walking in the statutes of David his father' (I 3^{3}). It is true that a qualification has to be added,—'only he sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places,' a mode of action alien to the enactment of Deut. with regard to the central sanctuary (Dt 12$^{5\text{ff.}}$ al.). This, however, can be lightly passed over, in view of the fact that the temple at Jerusalem was not yet built—a point in excuse which is expressly cited (v.^{2}), apparently by some later reviser of the text (see below on ch. 3). The building of the temple by Solomon, as the sanctuary of J″'s choice, receives specially detailed treatment (5-7); its dedication affords scope for the utmost emphasis which can be laid upon its importance as the centre of J″'s manifestation to His people (ch. 8), and is the occasion of a renewal of the promises made to Solomon upon the condition of his faithful adherence to the spirit of the Deuteronomic code (ch. 9$^{1\text{ff.}}$).

The decay of Solomon's power is traced (ch. 11) to his marriage alliances with foreign women in deliberate infringement of J″'s command (Dt 7$^{1\text{-}4}$, Ex 34$^{12.16}$ J; cf. Jos 23^{7} D^{2}), and the consequent introduction of their idolatrous cults. This leads directly to the division of the kingdom, and the irrevocable loss of ten tribes to the house of David.

Jeroboam, the first monarch of the new kingdom of Israel, though J″'s appointed agent in bringing about the disruption (ch. 11$^{29\text{ff.}}$), yet no sooner succeeds to power than he sows the seeds of the ruin of the Northern Kingdom. The introduction of the calf-worship (ch. 12$^{25\text{ff.}}$) is regarded by the writer as the great blot upon Israel's history; and that not only as the worship of J″ under an outward symbol in contravention of the second commandment, but also as being, so far as the kingdom of the ten tribes was concerned, a fatal blow aimed against the centralization of worship at the temple in Jerusalem. It is on account of the maintenance of this cult of the calves up to the fall of the N. Kingdom that a uniformly unfavourable verdict is passed by the writer upon every king of Israel, even upon Jehu, who was most zealous as an eradicator of the foreign cult of Ba'al-Melkart (II 10$^{29.31}$). II 17$^{7\text{-}18.21\text{-}23}$ presents us with the writer's reflections upon the causes which brought about the destruction of the kingdom of Israel, and, among other forms of idolatry cited as instances of unfaithfulness to J″, the 'great sin' of Jeroboam occupies the crowning position (vv.$^{21\text{-}23}$).

The kingdom of Judah, as the heritage of the house of David and the seat of J″'s sanctuary at Jerusalem, is regarded by the writer with more favourable eyes. Certain of its kings—Asa, Jehoshaphat, Jehoash, Amaziah, Azariah, and Jotham—have a more or less favourable estimate taken of their characters, though in every case it is mentioned to their disadvantage that 'the high places were not removed,' i.e. that the sacrificial worship of J″ was conducted elsewhere than at the central sanctuary only. In the cases of Hezekiah and Josiah the writer's verdict is one of unqualified approval. This is because Hezekiah appears as the initiator of a religious reformation which aims at the removal of the high places (II 18$^{3\text{ff.}}$)—a policy which, after the idolatrous reaction under Manasseh and his son Amon, is fully carried out by Josiah upon the lines of the Deuteronomic code, which was discovered in the temple during the 18th year of his reign (II 22$^{3\text{ff.}}$; see DEUTERONOMY).

It is this Deuteronomic reformation which, according to Kings as it stands in its present form, avails to delay the doom pronounced upon the kingdom of Judah on account of the apostasy of Manasseh (II 21$^{10\text{-}15}$ 22$^{15\text{-}20}$). Perhaps, in the view of the first editor of the book, it might have availed to save the kingdom and to restore it to its pristine glory. This is a question which depends mainly upon consideration of the date which is to be assigned for the editing of Kings, and the character and extent of the additions which the book has received in later times.

3. METHOD AND CHARACTERISTICS OF THE EDITOR.—The editor of Kings, in dealing with a period of about 400 years in length, naturally makes use of earlier written documents for the purpose which he has in view. These documents, which form his sources of information, are in some cases expressly named. We have mention of 'the book of the acts of Solomon' (סֵפֶר דִּבְרֵי שְׁלֹמֹה; I 11^{41}), and of 'the book of the annals' (דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים 'acts of days,' i.e. 'daily record of events') of the kings of Israel'

(I 14^{19} al.), and also 'of the kings of Judah' (I 14^{29} al.).*

An official 'recorder' (הַמַּזְכִּיר, lit. 'the man who brings to remembrance'; LXX ὁ ὑπομιμνήσκων, ὁ ὑπομνηματογράφος, ὁ ἐπὶ τῶν ὑπομνημάτων) is mentioned among the ministers of David (2 S 8^{16} 20^{25}), Solomon (1 K 4^{3}), Hezekiah (2 K $18^{18.37}$), and Josiah (2 Ch 34^{18}), and it may be assumed that the same office existed in the northern as in the southern kingdom. Probably, the work of this 'recorder' was that of state-annalist, whose duty consisted in taking note in writing of the important events of his time (cf. Est 2^{23} 6^{1}). It is not clear whether the editor of Kings had access to the annals of both kingdoms at first-hand, or whether his 'books of the annals' were not rather continuous histories based mainly upon the annals, and thus rather of a literary than an official character. The latter view is most generally adopted (cf. especially Kuenen, Onderzoek, § 24^{8}; Cornill, Einleitung, p. 111 f.).

Besides these state records, the editor employs other nameless sources, which will be noticed in dealing in detail with the composition of Kings. At this point it should be observed that, as in the cases of the Hexateuch and of Judges and Samuel, so in the case of Kings, the editor's work is rather that of a compiler or redactor than that of an author strictly so termed. In giving a summary of the events of any particular reign, he appears, it is true, often to epitomize in his own language information which was contained at greater length in the 'Annals.' In other cases, however, he incorporates whole narratives, or sections of narratives, so far as they suit his purpose, in their original form, merely welding the sources together so as to construct a continuous history.

The proof that such was the method of the editor is to be found chiefly in the variations in style and language between different portions of Kings. Lengthy prophetical narratives stand side by side with brief political and statistical notices. Different sections are marked by dialectical peculiarities. Thus the great group of narratives which, commencing with I 17 and running on into the middle of II, relate the affairs of the kingdom of Israel, shows traces of a peculiar diction which may be supposed to be North Palestinian (see below on I 17 ff.). Later sections, again, exhibit a decadence of style, e.g. the use of the perfect with weak ו in place of ו consecutive with the imperfect—II $18^{4.36}$ 19^{18} $21^{4.6}$ $23^{4.5.8.10.13.14.15}$. There are variations between section and section in the form of proper names:—II 1^{2-17a} is peculiar among the Elijah narratives in using the form אֵלִיָּה beside the ordinary אֵלִיָּהוּ; II 18^{14-16} employs the form חִזְקִיָּה instead of חִזְקִיָּהוּ, which is used uniformly in II $18^{13.17-20}$ end. And especially, as we shall proceed to notice, the editor himself is characterized by the use of a phraseology which serves as a clear indication of the portions of his book which are to be traced to his own pen. Another mark of the composite nature of Kings is the existence of a small number of discrepancies in detail: e.g. I $5^{13ff.}$ (Heb. $^{27ff.}$) 11^{26} are inconsistent with I 9^{22}; I 12^{22-24} disagrees with I 14^{30}.

To the editor is due the stereotyped form into which the introduction and conclusion of a reign is thrown, and which constitutes, as it were, the framework upon which the narrative as a whole is built. The regularity of the editor's method in the construction of this framework is worthy of special notice. The form in which the account of a reign is introduced is as follows. For kings of Judah:—1. A synchronism of the year of accession with the corresponding reigning year of the contemporary king of Israel, probably calculated by the editor himself. This, commencing with Abijah, naturally ceases with Hezekiah, upon the fall of the N. Kingdom. 2. Age of the king at accession. 3. Length of his reign. 4. Name of the queen-mother. This, together with 2, 3, is drawn from the 'Annals.' 5. A brief verdict upon the king's character, framed in accordance with the Deuteronomic standard. For kings of Israel:—1. A synchronism of the year of accession with the corresponding reigning year of the contemporary king of Judah. 2. Length of the king's reign. 3. A brief verdict as to his character, always unfavourable, and generally consisting of two parts: a. Statement of the general fact that he did evil in the sight of J″; b. More special mention of his following the sins of Jeroboam. The conclusion of the account of a reign takes the following form:—

1. An indication of the editor's principal source, containing further details as to the king in question. Usually we read—

'And the rest of the acts of M. and all that he did, are they } of the Acts of Solomon?'
not written } of the Annals of the kings of Judah?'
in the book } of the Annals of the kings of Israel?'

וְיֶתֶר דִּבְרֵי פ׳ וְכָל־אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה הֲלֹא הֵם (הֵמָּה) { דִּבְרֵי שְׁלֹמֹה
כְּתוּבִים עַל סֵפֶר { דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים לְמַלְכֵי יְהוּדָה
{ דִּבְרֵי הַיָּמִים לְמַלְכֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל

When further details, general or special, are mentioned as existing in the source, these usually stand immediately after 'and all that he did,' e.g. I 11^{41} 'and his wisdom.' An exception is I 15^{23} (Asa), where 'and all his might' precedes.

Slight variations of this stereotyped form are—

A. 'And the rest of all the acts,' etc. וְיֶתֶר כָּל־דִּבְרֵי וג׳ I 15^{23} (Asa).

B. Total omission of 'and all that he did'; without further details 5 times, viz. I 14^{19} (Jeroboam) 16^{20} (Zimri), II 14^{18} (Amaziah) 15^{11} (Zechariah) 15^{15} (Shallum); with further details II 20^{20} (Hezekiah).

Reading 'which he did' אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה, 5 times, viz. I 16^{27} (Omri), II 1^{18} (Ahaziah of Israel) 14^{15} (Jehoash of Israel) 16^{19} (Ahaz) 21^{25} (Amon); 'and what he did' וַאֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה I 16^{5} (Baasha); 'and his might which he did' וּגְבוּרָתוֹ אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה, I 22^{45} (^{46} Heb. Jehoshaphat).

C. 'Behold, they are' הִנָּם, in place of 'are they not?' הֲלֹא הֵם 5 times, viz. I 14^{19} (Jeroboam), II $15^{11.15.26.31}$ (Zechariah, Shallum, Pekahiah, Pekah).

2. Mention of the king's death and burial—
(a) 'And M. slept with his fathers,
(b) and was buried } (with his fathers) in X.' and they buried him }

וַיִּשְׁכַּב פ׳ עִם־אֲבֹתָיו { וַיִּקָּבֵר (עִם־אֲבֹתָיו) ב׳*
{ וַיִּקְבְּרוּ אֹתוֹ

3. Notice of the due succession of the king's son—

'And N. his son reigned in his stead.'

וַיִּמְלֹךְ פ׳ בְּנוֹ תַּחְתָּיו

The following table exhibits the regularity with which this system is carried out. When any fact above mentioned as belonging to the introduction is omitted in that position, but added subsequently in the narrative of the reign or in the summary, this is indicated by the sign +:—

* In speaking of the named sources of Kings, we may add the reference to 'the Book of the Upright' (Book of Jashar as in Jos 10^{13}, 2 S 1^{18}), which is to be restored from LXX after I 8^{13} (LXX I 8^{53}). οὐχ ἰδοὺ αὕτη γέγραπται ἐν βιβλίῳ τῆς ᾠδῆς; represents הֲלֹא הִיא כְתוּבָה עַל סֵפֶר הַשִּׁיר, הַשִּׁיר being a misreading of הַיָּשָׁר.

* Once with singular active verb used impersonally: וַיִּקְבֹּר אֹתוֹ 'And (one) buried him,' II 21^{26} (Amon).

In the body of the narrative there are certain formulæ which are employed for the introduction of an historical notice, to indicate that it is more or less contemporaneous with the events of the narrative immediately preceding. The frequency with which these formulæ recur, especially in the citation of brief facts from the 'Annals,' renders the inference fair that they are due to the hand of the editor, and represent his methods of piecing together the extracts derived from his sources. Of such expressions the most usual is 'Then' (אָז), I 3^{16} 8$^{1. 12}$ 9$^{11b. 24b}$ 11^{7} 16^{21} 22^{49} (Heb.^{50}); II 8^{22b} 12^{17} (Heb.^{18}) 14^{8} 15^{16} 16^{5}.

When greater definiteness seemed desirable, other phrases are employed. These are: 'In those days' (בַּיָּמִים הָהֵם), II 10^{32} 15^{37} 20^{1}; 'In his days' (בְּיָמָיו), I 16^{34}, II 8^{20} 23^{29} 24^{1} and 15^{19} (emend after LXX); 'At that time' (בָּעֵת הַהִיא), I 14^{1}, II 16^{6} 18^{16} 20^{12} 24^{10}; cf. I 8^{65} 11^{29}, II 8^{22}.

Besides the construction of the framework of the book and the welding of the material, the editor is also responsible for a number of passages of greater or less length, which point and enforce the religious purpose of his composition. These passages generally take the form of a commentary upon the causes which operated in bringing about the developments of history, framed in accordance with the Deuteronomic model. Very frequently, also, the editor allows himself considerable latitude in the expansion and adaptation of the speeches contained in his narrative, in illustration of the same standpoint. In passages of this character the editor's hand may readily be distinguished. They exhibit a constant recurrence of strongly marked phrases, to be found elsewhere for the most part only in Deuteronomy or in books which exhibit the influence of Deuteronomy, and therefore presumably derived from that source. Other expressions stand alongside of these Deuteronomistic expressions, and are of a part with the thoughts of which they are the vehicle; and these possess an individuality of their own, and are peculiar (or nearly so) to Kings. To the former class the following phrases may be assigned:[*]—

1. שָׁמַר מִשְׁמֶרֶת י״ Keep the charge of J″: I 2^{3}, Dt 11^{1}; cf. Jos 22^{3} (D^{2}).

2. הָלַךְ בִּדְרָכֵי י״ Walk in the ways of J″: I 2^{3} 3^{14} 8^{58} 11$^{33. 38}$, Dt 8^{6} 10^{12} 11^{22} 19^{9} 26^{17} 28^{9} 30^{16}, Jos 22^{5} (D^{2}), Zec 3^{7}, Is 42^{24}, 2 Ch 6^{31}, Ps 81^{16} (^{14} Heb.) 119^{3} 128^{1}; cf. Hos 14^{9} (^{10} Heb.).

3. שָׁמַר חֻקֹּתָיו וּמִצְוֹתָיו וּמִשְׁפָּטָיו וְעֵדְוֹתָיו Keep his statutes, and his commandments, and his judgments, and his testimonies (generally one or more of these terms is omitted): I 2^{3} 3^{14} 6^{12} 8$^{58. 61}$ 9$^{4. 6}$ 11$^{34. 38}$ 14^{8}, II 17$^{16. 19. 37}$ 18^{6} 23^{3}. The phrase is of constant occurrence in Dt 4$^{2. 40}$ 5^{29} (^{26} Heb.) 6^{2} al.

4. לְמַעַן תַּשְׂכִּיל אֵת כָּל־אֲשֶׁר תַּעֲשֶׂה That thou mayest prosper in (or cause to prosper) all that thou doest: I 2^{3}, Dt 29^{9} (^{8} Heb.).

5. לְמַעַן יָקִים (הֵקִים) י״ אֶת־דְּבָרוֹ That J″ may (might) establish his word: I 2^{4} 12^{15} (‖ 2 Ch 10^{15}), Dt 9^{5}; cf. I 6^{12}, 1 S 1^{23}, Jer 33^{14}, Dn 9^{12}.

6. בְּכָל־לֵב (לְבָבוֹ, לְבָבָם) וּבְכָל־נֶפֶשׁ (נַפְשׁוֹ, נַפְשָׁם) With all the (his, their) heart, and with all the (his, their) soul: I 2^{4} 8^{48} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{38}), II 23^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{31})^{25}, Dt 4^{29} 6^{5} 10^{12} 11^{13} 13^{3} (^{4} Heb.) 26^{16} 30$^{2. 6. 10}$, Jos 22^{5} 23^{14} (both D^{2}), 2 Ch 15^{12}. II 23^{25} adds וּבְכָל־מְאֹדוֹ and with all his might, a use of the substantive מְאֹד only to be paralleled by Dt 6^{5}.

בְּכָל־לְבָבוֹ (לִבָּם) With all his (their) heart: I 8^{23} 14^{8}, II 10^{31}.

7. שָׁמַר לְ׳ אֶת־הַבְּרִית וְאֶת־הַחֶסֶד Keep for him (etc.) the covenant and the kindness (J″ as subject): I 8^{23} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{14}), Dt 7$^{9. 12}$, Neh 1^{5} 9^{32}, Ps 89^{28} (^{29} Heb.), Dn 9^{4}; cf. I 3^{6} hast kept for him this great kindness.

8. כַּיּוֹם הַזֶּה As it is this day (the phrase calls attention to the fulfilment of a promise or threat): I 3^{6} 8^{24} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{15})^{61}, Dt 2^{30} 4$^{20. 38}$ 8^{18} 10^{15} 29^{28} (^{27} Heb.), Jer 11^{5} 25^{18} 32^{20} 44$^{6. 23}$, 1 Ch 28^{7}, Dn 9$^{7. 15}$; כְּהַיּוֹם הַזֶּה Dt 6^{24}, Jer 44^{22}, Ezr 9$^{7. 15}$, Neh 9^{10}. In pre-Deut. writings the only occurrences are Gn 50^{20} (E), 1 S 22$^{8. 13}$ ↑. Gn 39^{11} (J) is different.

9. עַמְּךָ אֲשֶׁר בָּחָרְתָּ Thy people, which thou hast chosen: I 3^{8} a reminiscence of Dt 7^{6} 14^{2}; cf. 4^{37}.

10. הֵנִיחַ י״ אֱלֹהַי לִי מִסָּבִיב J″ my God hath given me rest on every side: I 5^{4} (^{18} Heb.), 2 S 7$^{1. 11}$, Dt 12^{10} 25^{19}, Jos 21^{42} 23^{1} (both D^{2}); cf. Dt 3^{20}, Jos 1$^{13. 15}$ 22^{4} (both D^{2}).

11. Reference to J″'s choosing (בָּחַר) of Jerusalem as the seat of his sanctuary: I 8$^{16. 44. 48}$ 11$^{13. 32. 36}$ 14^{21}, II 21^{7} 23^{27}. The allusion is to Dt 12$^{5. 11. 18. 21. 26}$ 14$^{23. 24. 25}$ 15^{20} 16$^{2. 6. 7. 11. 15. 16}$ 17$^{8. 10}$ 18^{6} 26^{2} 31^{11}.

12. י״ אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל אֵין־כָּמוֹךָ אֱלֹהִים בַּשָּׁמַיִם מִמַּעַל וְעַל הָאָרֶץ מִתָּחַת J″ God of Israel, there is no God like thee, in heaven above, or on earth beneath: I 8^{23} a reminiscence of Dt 4^{39}; cf. Jos 2^{11b} (D^{2}).

13. אֲשֶׁר נָתַתָּ (נָתַן, נָתַתִּי) לַאֲבוֹתָם Which thou gavest (he, I gave) to their fathers: I 8$^{34. 40. 48}$ 14^{15}, II 21^{8}; cf. Dt 26^{15}, and the common phrase of Dt which J″ our (your, etc.) God is about to give us (you, etc.), 1$^{20. 25}$ 2^{29} 3^{20} 4^{40} 5^{16} al.

14. בְּאַחַד שְׁעָרָיו In any of his gates: I 8^{37} (upon the authority of LXX, Pesh., in place of the impossible בְּאֶרֶץ שְׁעָרָיו, MT), Dt 15^{7} 16^{5} 17^{2} 23^{16} (^{17} Heb.); cf. 18^{6} ↑.

15. כָּל־הַיָּמִים אֲשֶׁר הֵמָּה חַיִּים עַל־פְּנֵי הָאֲדָמָה All the days that they live upon the land: I 8^{40} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{31}), Dt 4^{10} 12^{1} 31^{13}↑.

16. יָדְךָ הַחֲזָקָה וּזְרֹעֲךָ הַנְּטוּיָה Thy mighty hand and thy stretched out arm: I 8^{42} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{32}), Dt 4^{34} 5^{15} 7^{19} 11^{2} 26^{8}, Jer 21^{5} (different order) 32^{21} (אֶזְרוֹעַ), Ezk 20$^{33. 34}$, Ps 136^{12}↑. Mighty hand alone, Dt 3^{24} 6^{21} 7^{8} 9^{26} 34^{12}, Ex 3^{19} 6^{1} 32^{11} (all JE) 13^{9} (E), Nu 20^{20} (JE, referring to Edom), Neh 1^{10}, Dn 9^{15}↑; cf. Jos 4^{24} (D^{2}). Stretched out arm alone, II 17^{36}, Dt 9^{29}, Jer 27^{5} 32^{17}, Ex 6^{6} (P)↑.

17. כָּל־עַמֵּי הָאָרֶץ All the peoples of the earth: I 8^{43} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{33})$^{53. 60}$, Dt 28^{10}, Jos 4^{24} (D^{2}), Ezk 31^{12}, Zeph 3^{20}↑.

18. נָתַן לִפְנֵי Deliver over to (lit. set before): I 8^{46} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{36}), Dt 1$^{8. 21}$ 2$^{31. 33. 36}$ 7$^{2. 23}$ 23^{14} (^{15} Heb.) 28$^{7. 25}$ 31^{5}, Jos 10^{12} 11^{6} (both D^{2}), Jg 11^{9} Is 41^{2}, all the occurrences of the phrase in this special sense.

19. Shall bethink themselves (lit. bring back to their heart וְהֵשִׁיבוּ אֶל־לִבָּם) in the land whither they are carried captive: I 8^{47} a reminiscence of Dt 30^{1}.

20. Return unto thee with all their heart, etc.: I 8^{48}, II 23^{25}, Dt 30^{10}; cf. Jer 3^{10}.

21. For they be thy people and thine inheritance, which thou broughtest forth out of Egypt: I 8^{51} a reminiscence of Dt 9$^{26. 29}$.

22. כּוּר הַבַּרְזֶל The furnace of iron: I 8^{51}, Dt 4^{20}, Jer 11^{4}↑.

23. Hath given rest (מְנוּחָה) unto his people Israel: I 8^{56}, probably with reference to Dt 12^{9}; cf. Ps 95^{11}.

24. There hath not failed (lit. fallen נָפַל) one word of all his good promise which he promised: I 8^{56}, Jos 21^{43} 23^{14} (both D^{2}).

25. That all the people of the earth may know, etc.: I 8^{60}, Jos 4^{24} (D^{2}).

---

[*] The sign ↑ indicates that all occurrences of any particular phrase are cited. The sign RD denotes the Deuteronomic Redactor, i.e. the prime editor of Kings.

26. That J" he is God (lit. the God הָאֱלֹהִים) ; there is none else : I 8^{60}, Dt 4$^{35.\ 39}$.

27. לָשׂוּם שְׁמִי שָׁם To put my name there : I 9^{3} 11^{38} 14^{21}, II 21$^{4.\ 7}$ (referring to I 9^{3}), Dt 12$^{5.\ 21}$ 14^{24}. In Dt the more ordinary phrase is to cause his name to dwell there לְשַׁכֵּן שְׁמוֹ שָׁם, 12^{11} 14^{23} 16$^{2.\ 6.\ 11}$ 26^{2} ; cf. No. 64.

28. כָּל־הַיָּמִים All the days (i.e. for ever) : I 9^{3} 11$^{36.\ 39}$, II 8^{19} 17^{37}, Dt 4^{40} 5^{29} (^{26} Heb.) 6^{24} 11^{1} 14^{23} 18^{5} 19^{9} 28$^{29.\ 33}$, Jos 4^{24} (D^{2}), 1 S 2$^{32.\ 35}$ (Redactor), Jer 31^{36} (Heb.^{35}) 32^{39} 33^{18} 35^{19}. Thus the expression used absolutely[*] appears to be purely Deuteronomic. In I 8^{40} Dt 4^{10} 12^{1} 31^{13} it is defined, and to some extent limited, by the added words, that they (ye) live upon the land.

29. Shall go and serve other gods, and worship them : I 9^{6} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{19}), Jos 23^{16} (D^{2}) ; cf. Dt 11^{16} 17^{3}. The phrase עָבַד אֱלֹהִים אֲחֵרִים serve other gods, occurs also Dt 7^{4} 13$^{6.13}$ ($^{7.\ 14}$ Heb.) 28$^{36.\ 64}$, Jer 16^{13}, Jg 10^{13} (Deut. compiler), Jos 24$^{2.\ 16}$ (E), 1 S 8^{8} 26^{19} ; cf. Jer 44^{3}. Other gods, with serve not preceding as governing verb, but closely following with suffix in reference, is found I 9^{9} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{22}), II 17^{35}, Dt 8^{19} 13^{2} (Heb.^{3}) 28^{14} 30^{17} 31^{20}, Jer 11^{10} 13^{10} 16^{11} 22^{9} 25^{6} 35^{15}, Jg 2^{19} (Deut. compiler). Other gods, without serve : I 11$^{4.\ 10}$ 14^{9}, II 17$^{7.\ 37.\ 38}$ 22^{17} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{25}), all R^{D}, II 5^{17}, Dt 5^{7} 6^{14} 11^{28} 18^{20} 31^{18}, Jer 1^{16} 7$^{8.\ 9.\ 18}$ 19$^{4.\ 13}$ 32^{29} 44$^{5.\ 8.\ 15}$, Jg 2$^{12.\ 17}$ (Deut. compiler), Ex 20^{3} (E) 23^{13} (J), Hos 3^{1}, 2 Ch 28^{25}†.

30. לְמָשָׁל וְלִשְׁנִינָה For a proverb and for a byword : I 9^{7} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{20}), Dt 28^{37}, Jer 24^{9}†.

31. דָּבַק בְּ Cleave to ; of strange wives, I 11^{2} ; of sins of Jeroboam, II 3^{3} ; of cleaving to J", II 18^{6}, Dt 4^{4} 10^{20} 11^{22} 13^{4} (^{5} Heb.) 30^{20}, Jos 22^{5} 23^{8} (both D^{2})—all the occurrences in this special moral sense.

32. הָלַךְ אַחֲרֵי Go after ; a false god, I 11$^{5.\ 10}$ 21^{26}, II 17^{15} (all R^{D}), I 18$^{18.\ 21}$, Dt 4^{3} 6^{14} 8^{19} 11^{28} 13^{2} (^{3} Heb.) 28^{14}, Jg 2$^{12.\ 19}$ (Deut. compiler), Jer 2$^{5.\ 23}$ 7^{9} 11^{10} 13^{10} 16^{11} 25^{6} 35^{15}, Ezk 20^{16} ; cf. Hos 2$^{5.\ 13}$ ($^{7.\ 15}$ Heb.). Of following J": I 14^{8} (R^{D}) 18^{21}, Dt 13^{4} (^{5} Heb.), 2 Ch 34^{31}, Hos 11^{10}†.

33. עָשָׂה הָרַע בְּעֵינֵי י׳ Do that which is evil in the sight of J" : I 11^{6} 14^{22} 15$^{26.\ 34}$ 16$^{19.\ 25.\ 30}$ 21$^{20.\ 25}$ 22^{52} (^{53} Heb.), II 3^{2} 8^{18} (‖ 2 Ch 21^{6}) ^{27} (‖ 2 Ch 22^{4}) 13$^{2.\ 11}$ 14^{24} 15$^{9.\ 18.\ 24.\ 28}$ 17$^{2.\ 17}$ 21$^{2.\ 8}$ (‖ 2 Ch 33$^{2.\ 6}$) $^{15.\ 16.\ 20}$ (‖ 2 Ch 33^{22}) 23$^{32.\ 37}$ (‖ 2 Ch 36^{5}) 24$^{9.\ 19}$ (‖ 2 Ch 36$^{9.\ 12}$), 2 Ch 29^{6}, Dt 4^{25} 9^{18} 17^{2} 31^{29}, Jg 2^{11} 3$^{7.\ 12}$ 4^{1} 6^{1} 10^{6} 13^{1} (all Deut. compiler), Nu 32^{13} (JE), 1 S 15^{19}, Jer 52^{2}†. Cf. 2 S 12^{9}, Is 65^{12} 66^{4}, Jer 32^{30}, Ps 51^{4} (^{6} Heb.).

34. עָשָׂה הַיָּשָׁר בְּעֵינֵי י׳ Do that which is right in the sight of J" : I 11$^{33.\ 38}$ 14^{8} 15$^{5.\ 11}$ 22^{43} (‖ 2 Ch 20^{32}), II 10^{30} 12^{2} (^{3} Heb.) (‖ 2 Ch 24^{2}) 14^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 25^{2}) 15$^{3.\ 34}$ (‖ 2 Ch 26^{4} 27^{2}) 16^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{1}) 18^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 29^{2}) 22^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{2}), Dt 12^{25} 13^{18} (^{19} Heb.) 21^{9}, and with the addition of הַטּוֹב that which is good, 6^{18} 12^{28}. Elsewhere only Ex 15^{26} (JE or D ?), Jer 34^{15}.

35. מִלֵּא אַחֲרֵי י׳ Go fully after J" : I 11^{6}, Dt 1^{36}, Jos 14$^{8.\ 9.\ 14}$ (JE recast by D^{2}), Nu 32$^{11.\ 12}$ (JE)†.

36. הִתְאַנֵּף Be angry : I 11^{9}, II 17^{18}, Dt 1^{37} 4^{21} 9$^{8.\ 20}$†.

37. וְהָיָה אִם־תִּשְׁמַע And it shall be, if thou wilt hearken : I 11^{38}, Dt 28$^{1.\ 15}$; with pl. תִּשְׁמְעוּ 11^{13} ; cf. 15^{5} 11^{28}. In the same way (obedience the condition of a promise) כִּי תִשְׁמַע Dt 13^{18} (^{19} Heb.) 28$^{2.\ 13}$ 30^{10}, אֲשֶׁר תִּשְׁמְעוּ 11^{27}.

38. הִשְׁמִיד מֵעַל פְּנֵי הָאֲדָמָה Destroy from off the face of the earth : I 13^{34}, Dt 6^{15}, Am 9^{8}† ; cf. Jos 23^{15} (D^{2}). הִשְׁמִיד destroy, passive נִשְׁמַד, is very frequent in Dt (27 times) ; cf. Driver on Dt 1^{27}.

39. הִכְעִים Vex (J", by treatment wholly undeserved. RV 'provoke to anger' is inaccurate) : I 14$^{9.\ 15}$ 15^{30} 16$^{2.\ 7.\ 13.\ 26.\ 33}$ 21^{22} 22^{53} (^{54} Heb.), II 17$^{11.\ 17}$ 21^{6} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{6}) ^{15} 22^{17} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{25}) 23$^{19.\ 26}$, 2 Ch 28^{25}, Dt 4^{25} 9^{18} 31^{29} 32^{16}, Jer 7$^{18.\ 19}$ 8^{19} 11^{17} 25$^{6.\ 7}$ 32$^{29.\ 30.\ 32}$ 44$^{3.\ 8}$. Elsewhere, with J" as object, only six times. With Pi'el (כִּעֲסוּנִי), Dt 32^{21}.

40. מֵעַל הָאֲדָמָה הַטּוֹבָה הַזֹּאת From upon this good land : I 14^{15}, Jos 23$^{13.\ 15}$ (D^{2})†. The usual phrase in Dt of the land of Canaan is הָאָרֶץ הַטּוֹבָה the good land ; cf. Driver, Deuteronomy, p. lxxxi.

41. עַל כָּל־גִּבְעָה גְּבֹהָה וְתַחַת כָּל־עֵץ רַעֲנָן On every high hill, and under every green (or spreading) tree : I 14^{23}, II 17^{10}, Jer 2^{20}. With the variation עַל הַגְּבָעוֹת on the hills, II 16^{4} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{4}), Dt 12^{2}. Cf. Ezk 6^{13} Jer 3$^{6.\ 13}$ 17^{2}, Is 57^{5}.

42. כְּכֹל־תּוֹעֲבֹת (כְּתוֹעֲבֹת) הַגּוֹיִם According to (all) the abominations of the nations : I 14^{24}, II 16^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{3}) 21^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{2}), 2 Ch 36^{14}, Dt 18^{9}.

43. הוֹרִישׁ Drive out (used of the expulsion of the nations of Canaan by J") : I 14^{24} 21^{26}, II 16^{3} (‖ 2 Ch 28^{3}) 17^{8} 21^{2} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{2}), Dt 4^{38} 9$^{4.\ 5}$ 11^{23} 18^{12}, Jos 13^{6} 23$^{5.\ 9.\ 13}$ (all D^{2}), Jg 2$^{21.\ 23}$ (Deut. compiler), Ps 44^{2} (^{3} Heb.). Elsewhere only Ex 34^{24}, Nu 32^{21}, Jos 3^{10} (all JE).

44. גִּלּוּלִים Idol-blocks (a term of opprobrium) : I 15^{12} 21^{26}, II 17^{12} 21$^{11.\ 21}$ 23^{24}, Dt 29^{17} (^{16} Heb.), Lv 26^{30} (H), and 39 times in Ezk.†

45. כָּל־נְשָׁמָה Anything breathing (lit. any breath) : I 15^{29}, Dt 20^{16}, Jos 11$^{11.\ 14}$ (D^{2}) ; כָּל־הַנְּשָׁמָה Jos 10^{40} (D^{2}), Ps 150^{6}†.

46. הֲבָלִים Vain things (applied to idolatrous symbols) : I 16$^{13.\ 26}$,[*] Dt 32^{21} ; cf. Jer 8^{19} 14^{22}. So with cognate verb, וַיֵּלְכוּ אַחֲרֵי הַהֶבֶל וַיֶּהְבָּלוּ they followed vanity and became vain, II 17^{15}, Jer 2^{5}.

47. לֹא אָבָה (לְ)הַשְׁחִית Would not destroy : II 8^{19} 13^{23}, Dt 10^{10}.

48. מָחָה שֵׁם פ׳ מִתַּחַת הַשָּׁמָיִם Blot out the name from under heaven : II 14^{27}, Dt 9^{14} 29^{20} (^{19} Heb.), the only occurrences of the exact phrase.

49. שָׁמַר לַעֲשׂוֹת Observe to do : II 17^{37} 21^{8} (‖ 2 Ch 33^{8}), 1 Ch 22^{13} (^{12} Heb.), Dt 5$^{1.\ 32}$ (^{29} Heb.) 6$^{3.\ 25}$ 7^{11} 8^{1} 11$^{22.\ 32}$ 12$^{1.\ 32}$ (13^{1} Heb.) 15^{5} 17^{10} 19^{9} 24^{8} 28$^{1.\ 15.\ 58}$ 31^{12} 32^{46}, Jos 1$^{7.\ 8}$ 22^{5} (D^{2}).

The following phrases, though not derived directly from Deuteronomy, are characteristic of the editor of Kings in common with Jeremiah, whose writings exhibit strong Deuteronomic affinities :—

50. כִּי שִׁמְךָ נִקְרָא עַל־הַבַּיִת הַזֶּה That thy name is called over this house (in token of ownership) : I 8^{43} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{33}), Jer 7$^{10.\ 11.\ 14.\ 30}$ 32^{34} 34^{15}. The phrase is also used of the chosen people, Dt 28^{10}, Jer 14^{9}, Is 63^{19}, 2 Ch 7^{14} ; of Jerusalem, Jer 25^{29} ; of Jerusalem and the chosen people, Dn 9$^{18.\ 19}$; of Jeremiah, 15^{16} ; of the nations, Am 9^{12}.

51. שִׁלַּח מֵעַל פָּנַי (פָּנָיו) Dismiss from before my (his) face : I 9^{7}, Jer 15^{1}. So, but with a different verb, הִשְׁלִיךְ cast away, II 13^{23} 17^{20} (מִן־ in place of מֵעַל), Jer 7^{15} ; הֵסִיר remove, II 17$^{18.\ 23}$ 23^{27} 24^{3}, Jer 32^{31}.

52. כָּל־עֹבֵר עָלָיו יִשֹּׁם וְשָׁרַק Every one that passeth by it shall be astonished and shall hiss : I 9^{8}, Jer 19^{8} 49^{17} 50^{13} ; cf. Jer 18^{16}, La 2^{15}, Zeph 2^{15}.

53. שָׁב מִדַּרְכּוֹ הָרָעָה Return from his evil way : I 13^{33}, Jer 18^{11} 25^{5} 26^{3} 35^{15} 36$^{3.\ 7}$. Elsewhere Jon 3$^{8.\ 10}$, Ezk 13^{22} (מִדַּרְכּוֹ הָרָע)†. With pl. their evil ways, II 17^{13}, 2 Ch 7^{14}, Zec 1^{4}†. Cf. Jer 23^{22}, Ezk 3^{19} 33^{11}.

54. הִנְנִי מֵבִיא רָעָה אֶל (עַל) Behold, I will bring evil upon : I 14^{10} 21^{21}, II 21^{12} 22^{16} (‖ 2 Ch 34^{24}), Jer 6^{19} 11^{11} 19$^{3.\ 15}$ 35^{17} 45^{5}†.

55. עֲבָדַי (עֲבָדָיו) הַנְּבִיאִים My (his) servants the prophets : II 9^{7} 17$^{13.\ 23}$ 21^{10} 24^{2}, Jer 7^{25} 25^{4} 26^{5} 29^{19} 35^{15} 44^{4}. Elsewhere Am 3^{7}, Zec 1^{6}, Ezr 9^{11}, Dn 9^{10}.

Other resemblances with Jeremiah, from the later chs. of 2 K, are given by Driver, LOT p. 193 (^{6} 203).

Phrases and modes of expression wholly or nearly peculiar to the editor of Kings are as follow :—

[*] The same phrase כָּל־הַיָּמִים all the days, used in a strictly limited sense of the lifetime of an individual (for all his, thy, etc., days) is non-Deuteronomic. Cf. the writer's note on 1 K 5^{15}.

destruction of his own house, I 14^{16} 15^{30}. In the summary of the character of kings of Israel a regular formula appears—he did not depart from } he walked after (in) } the sins of J. } which he he clave to } caused Israel

he walked in the way of J. and in } to sin.
his sin (sins) }

So I $15^{26.}$ (Nadab) ^{34} (Baasha) 16^{26} (Omri), II 3^{3} (Jehoram) 10^{31}, cf. ^{29} (Jehu) 13^{2} (Jehoahaz) ^{11} (Jehoash) 14^{24} (Jeroboam II.) 15^{9} (Zechariah) ^{18} (Menahem) ^{24} (Pekahiah) ^{28} (Pekah). Of the people of Israel, II 13^{6}. In all these cases the antecedent of the relative אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא is not יָרָבְעָם but חַטֹּאות יר׳; cf. II 17^{21}. I 16^{30} (Ahab), II 17^{22} חַטֹּאות יר׳ the sins of J. without אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא וג׳ which he caused, etc.: I 22^{52} ([^{53} Heb.] Ahaziah), II 23^{15} אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא אֶת־יִשְׂרָאֵל, referring not to חַטֹּאות (omitted), but to יָרָבְעָם J., who made Israel to sin. In I 16^{13} the sins of Baasha and Elah, and in II 21^{11} of Manasseh (אֲשֶׁר הֶחֱטִיא אֶת־יְהוּדָה), are spoken of in the same terms.

57. Reference to David as the ideal standard of a righteous king: I $3^{3.\ 6.\ 14}$ 9^{4} $11^{4.\ 6.\ 33.\ 38}$ 14^{8} $15^{3.\ 5.\ 11}$, II 14^{3} 16^{2} 18^{3} 22^{2}.

58. לְמַעַן דָּוִד אָבִיךָ (עַבְדִּי) For David thy father's (my or his servant's) sake: I $11^{12.\ 13.\ 32.\ 34}$, II 8^{19} 19^{34} 20^{6}; cf. I 15^{4}†.

59. A lamp (נִיר) for David (figurative of a lasting posterity): I 11^{36} 15^{4}, II 8^{19} (‖ 2 Ch 21^{7}); cf. Ps 132^{17}.

60. הָלַךְ לִפְנֵי י׳ Walk before J″: I 2^{4} 3^{6} $8^{23.\ 25}$ (‖ 2 Ch $6^{14.\ 16}$) 9^{4} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{17}). Elsewhere the Hithpa'el is used הִתְהַלֵּךְ לִפְנֵי י׳, II 20^{3} (‖ Is 38^{3}), 1 S 2^{30}, Gn 17^{1} (P) 24^{40} (J) 48^{15} (JE), Ps 56^{13} (^{14} Heb.) 116^{9}.

61. לֹא יִכָּרֵת לְךָ אִישׁ מֵעַל כִּסֵּא יִשְׂרָאֵל There shall not fail thee (lit. be cut off to thee) a man on the throne of Israel: I 2^{4} 8^{25} (‖ 2 Ch 6^{16}) 9^{5} (‖ 2 Ch 7^{18}); cf. Jer 33^{17}.

62. בָּנָה בַיִת לְשֵׁם י׳ Build a house to the name of J″: I 3^{2} $5^{3.\ 5}$ ($^{17.\ 19}$ Heb.) $8^{17.\ 20.\ 44.\ 48}$. The original is 2 S 7^{13} He shall build a house to my name, quoted in I 5^{5} (^{19} Heb.) 8^{19}.

63. There hath been (was) none like thee (him) before thee (him), etc.: I 3^{12}, II 18^{5} 23^{25}.

64. לִהְיוֹת שְׁמִי שָׁם That my name might be there: I $8^{16.\ 29}$, II 23^{27}. Cf. No. 27.

65. Heart perfect (שָׁלֵם) with J″: I 8^{61} 11^{4} $15^{3.\ 14}$; cf. II 20^{3} (‖ Is 38^{3}). The adj. is thus used in application to the heart, elsewhere only eight times in Ch.

66. הֵרַע (לַעֲשׂוֹת) מִכֹּל־אֲשֶׁר (הָיוּ) לְפָנָיו Did (hast done) evil above all that were before him (thee): I 14^{9} $16^{25.\ 30.*\ 33}$; cf. II 17^{2} 21^{11}.

67. מַשְׁתִּין בְּקִיר Every man child (lit. mingens ad parietem): I 14^{10} 16^{11} 21^{21}, II 9^{8}. Only besides 1 S $25^{22.\ 34}$.

68. עָצוּר וְעָזוּב Shut up and left at large (i.e. all; every one being supposed to fall under one of the two categories†): I 14^{10} 21^{21}, II 9^{8} 14^{26}, Dt 32^{36}†.

69. וּבִעַרְתִּי אַחֲרֵי I will utterly sweep away: I 14^{10} 21^{21}†; הִנְנִי מַבְעִיר אַחֲרֵי I 16^{3}†.

70. Him that dieth to M. in the city shall the dogs eat; and him that dieth in the field shall the fowls of the air eat: I 14^{11} 16^{4} 21^{24}†.

71. הִתְמַכֵּר לַעֲשׂוֹת הָרַע בְּעֵינֵי י׳ Sold himself (themselves) to do that which is evil in the sight of J″: I $21^{20.\ 25}$, II 17^{17}†.

72. לֹא סָר מִן־ Turned not aside from: I 15^{5} 22^{43}, II 3^{3} $13^{2.\ 6.\ 11}$ 14^{24} $15^{9.\ 24.\ 28}$ 17^{22}; with מֵאַחֲרֵי from after, II 10^{29} 18^{6}; with מֵעַל lit. from upon, II 10^{31} 15^{18}.

73. רַק הַבָּמוֹת לֹא סָרוּ עוֹד הָעָם מְזַבְּחִים וּמְקַטְּרִים בַּבָּמוֹת Howbeit the high places were not taken away; the people still sacrificed and burnt incense in the high places: I 22^{43} (^{44} Heb.; אַךְ for רַק), II 12^{3} (^{4} Heb.) 14^{4} $15^{4.\ 35}$; cf. I $3^{2.\ 3}$ 15^{14}, II 16^{4}.

The extent and limits of the passages which are due to the editor's hand are noticed below in dealing with the composition of Kings.

4. DATE OF THE EDITOR.—As Kings now stands, the earliest possible terminus a quo for the composition of the book is the date of the latest event related, viz. Jehoiachin's release from prison in the 37th year of his captivity, i.e. B.C. 561, some 25 years after the fall of Jerusalem. As, however, the writer states that the privileges granted by the Babylonian king to Jehoiachin were continued 'all the days of his life' (II 25^{30}), the strong presumption is created that the words were not penned so early as B.C. 561, but some time later, viz. subsequently to the death of Jehoiachin, whenever that may have taken place.

Agreeable to such an exilic date as is implied by the last two chs. of 2 K are certain passages in the body of the work which seem to presuppose the captivity of Judah. These are I 11^{39} II $17^{19.\ 20}$ $23^{26.\ 27}$, and perhaps, though not so clearly, I $9^{7\text{-}9}$ II $20^{17.\ 18}$ $21^{11\text{-}15}$ $22^{15\text{-}20}$. To these we may add the reference in I 4^{24} (Heb. 5^{4}) to Solomon's dominion as extending over all the kings 'beyond the River,' a statement which, as referring to the country W. of the Euphrates, implies that the writer is living in Babylonia on the E. side of the river.*

On the other hand, however, there are certain indications which show that the first editing of Kings must have taken place prior to the final decay and fall of the Judæan monarchy.

Chief among these is the use of the phrase 'unto this day' (עַד־הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה) in the statement that the condition of affairs which the writer is describing still continues to exist up to the time of writing. If this phrase always or most frequently occurred in the course of lengthy narratives excerpted by the editor from his sources, there might then be room for the theory that a statement which was true as it stood in the old pre-exilic narratives had, through oversight on the part of an exilic editor, been allowed to stand after, through changed conditions, it had lost its force, or rather had become untrue and misleading. But, as a matter of fact, the expression is employed in connexion with terse statements of facts derived from the 'annals,' and in such cases can be due to no other hand than that of the editor himself, who, in using the phrase, either formulates his own statement, or intelligently admits a statement which he is able to verify.

The cases of the use of 'unto this day,' which ought to be noticed as implying the continued existence of the kingdom of Judah, are the following:—I 8^{8} (the ends of the staves of the ark still to be seen projecting from the Adytum into the Holy place†); 9^{21} (the Canaanites still subjected by Israel to forced labour, as they had been under Solomon); 12^{19} (the division between the ten tribes and the house of David still in existence); II 8^{22} (Edom still successful in shaking off the yoke of Judah); 16^{6} (the Edomites still hold Elath, from which the Judæans were expelled by Rezin, king of Syria‡). The other occurrences of 'unto this day' do not necessarily presuppose pre-exilic times, but may be cited to prove the frequency of the formula as employed by the editor of Kings:—I 9^{13} 10^{12}, II 14^{7} $17^{23.\ 34.\ 41}$.§

---

* LXX (B, Luc.) prefixes (Luc. καὶ) ἐπονηρεύσατο, i.e. וַיָּרַע, before מכל וג׳, probably correctly.

† The most plausible explanation of the phrase is that of Ewald, Antiquities, 170, 'kept in (by legal defilement) and exempt.' For this use of עָצוּר cf. Jer 36^{5}; Niph'al נֶעְצָר 1 S 21^{8}. Other explanations are quoted by Driver on Deut. l.c.

* The phrase עֵבֶר הַנָּהָר, implying an exilic standpoint, is found again in Ezr $4^{10.\ 11.\ 16.\ 17.\ 20}$ $5^{3.\ 6}$ $6^{6.\ 8.\ 13}$ $7^{21.\ 25}$ 8^{36}, Neh $2^{7.\ 9}$ 3^{7}. The rendering of RV text in 1 K 4^{24} 'on this side the River,' is quite impermissible, this being a direct violation of the constant meaning of עֵבֶר—country lying across or on the other side of a river.

† It is noticeable that in LXX of this passage the words 'unto this day' have disappeared, the excision being doubtless due to some later scribe who knew that in his own time their purport had ceased to be true.

‡ Reading אֱדֹם, אֲדוֹמִים, in place of ארם, ארומים.

§ In II 10^{27} עַד־הַיּוֹם, occurring in a lengthy narrative, must have been written prior to the destruction of Samaria (Kuenen, Ond. § 25^{14}), and is thus due to the source and not to the editor.

Again, it seems to be clear that, at the time when the editor is writing, the Davidic dynasty still possesses a monarch reigning in Jerusalem. David has, and is still to have, a lamp before J″ at Jerusalem continually (see above, No. 59 of the editor's phrases). The expression 'before J″ at Jerusalem' of I 11^{36} implies further that the temple is still standing intact, a point which is also assumed in the dedication prayer of I 8^{15-53} which owes its present form to the Deuteronomic editor. Throughout this prayer the leading petition is that supplication made in or towards J″s temple built by Solomon may meet with a favourable answer (vv.$^{29.\ 30.\ 31f.\ 33.\ 35.\ 38.\ 42.\ 44.\ 48}$). We may notice also I 9^3 which likewise occurs in a section in which the editor's hand is prominent: 'I have hallowed this house which thou hast built, to put my name there for ever; and mine eyes and my heart shall be there perpetually.'

Upon these grounds it may be concluded that the main editing of Kings must have taken place prior to the destruction of the Judæan kingdom, and that such sections of the book as imply an exilic standpoint are therefore of the nature of later redactional additions and interpolations.

For the work of this principal editor, influenced as we have seen him to be by the spirit and language of Deut., the terminus a quo is the discovery of Deut. in the year B.C. 621, the terminus ad quem the destruction of Jerusalem B.C. 586. And since the editor's standpoint seems to indicate that he wrote before the glamour of Josiah's reformation had wholly or nearly faded during the latter days of the Judæan monarchy, the assumption is fair that he undertook and completed his book not later than B.C. 600.*

5. LATER EDITORS.—From the preceding examination and conclusion as to the date of the main redaction of Kings it is clear that the pre-exilic book must have received certain additions at the hands of a later editor or editors before it attained the form in which we possess it. The chief of these additions is the appendix, which carries the history down to the year B.C. 561. To this appendix belongs certainly II 24^{10}–25^{30}, and, presumably, 23^{31}–24^9. The conclusion of the pre-exilic book has, however, probably been worked over by the second editor, and so adapted to receive his addition that it is now impossible exactly to discover its position.

Any of the vv.$^{25.\ 28}$ or even ^{30a} of ch. 23 might have formed a conclusion scarcely more abrupt than the present conclusion ch. 25^{30}. Ch. 23^{29a}, if it is not exactly imitated in style in ch. 24^{1a}, must be by the same hand, i.e., presumably, the hand of the second editor. But, again, it is unlikely that the first editor should have appended the usual summary of a reign in v.^{28} without mentioning the manner of the king's death. The statement of v.^{25b} seems at first sight to presuppose the writer's acquaintance with the characters of all the succeeding kings of Judah, but need not necessarily do so. Cf. the somewhat stereotyped formula of I 14^{9a} with reference to Jeroboam.

Upon the other passages above mentioned as implying an exilic standpoint see below (Composition). It is noticeable that, apart from the difference of standpoint involved in the destruction of the Judæan kingdom and the Exile, the mould of mind of the second editor is essentially the same as that of the first editor. The same Deuteronomic mode of thought is couched in the same phraseology, while in the appendix the structural method of the first editor is faithfully imitated. Thus, if the main Deuteronomic editor or redactor be cited under the sign $\mathrm{R^D}$, it is reasonable to employ the sign $\mathrm{R^{D2}}$ in referring to the second editor of the same school of thought.†

Kings, as it stands in the Hebrew Bible, has, again, undergone still later revision than that of $\mathrm{R^{D2}}$. This is clear from certain variations in form and order between the MT and the recension of the text which is represented by the LXX. While in some cases the condition of the LXX text is greatly inferior to that of MT, yet, on the other hand, it is clear that in a number of sections LXX preserves a superior arrangement in order, or a simpler form, of narrative which points to the fact that MT has suffered dislocation and interpolation at the hands of a reviser or revisers of a date later than the separation of the two recensions. As instances of this we may notice I 4^{20-34} (Heb. 4^{20}–5^{14}) 5–7 (Heb. 5^{15}–7) in the main, 8^{1-13} 11^{1-13}, and the position of MT 21 after 19, so that 22 succeeds 20 without a break in the narrative. Consideration of such points as must here be raised is best reserved for a sectional criticism of the composition of the book.

6. SOURCES AND COMPOSITION OF KINGS CONSIDERED IN DETAIL.*—I 1^1–2^{46}. Narrative of the events which led to the establishment of Solomon as the successor of David. It is generally assumed, and with great probability, that this section originally formed part of the document 2 S 9–20, which gives a history of David. $2^{2.\ 3}$ is due to $\mathrm{R^D}$ (see above, phrases of R^D, Nos. 1–6, 60, 61).

A point of interest in connexion with the homogeneity of the narrative is the fact that after 2^{35a} LXX (B, Luc.) inserts καὶ ἡ βασιλεία κατορθοῦτο ἐν Ἰερουσαλήμ, i.e. MT 2^{46b} with the reading בירשלם for ביר שלמה. The correct position of the sentence seems to be at the end of v.^{35}, from which in MT it was separated by the insertion of the Shimei section. Solomon's establishment in the kingdom resulted from the death of his powerful adversaries, Adonijah and Joab, and could not have been much enhanced by the death of Shimei some three years later. The fact that in LXX these words precede v.^{35b} suggests that this latter may be a later insertion made to complete the information supplied by v.^{35a}.

3^1–11^{43}. History of Solomon's reign. The narrative follows a well-defined plan. The kernel is 5^1–7^{51} (Heb. 5^{15}–7^{51}), the description of Solomon's building operations, with its sequel, ch. 8. Around this are grouped (chs. 4. 9. 10) a series of notices, for the most part brief, illustrative of the king's wisdom, magnificence, and prosperity. Ch. 3 forms an introduction to the whole, detailing Solomon's request for wisdom, with a signal instance of its exercise: ch. 11, as a conclusion, gives a description of the circumstances which paved the way for the disruption of the kingdom.

3^1, as it stands in MT, is out of place. There can be little doubt that, together with $9^{16.\ 17a}$, it originally formed part of the document embodied in ch. $4^{20ff.}$. See ad loc.

$3^{2.\ 3}$ expresses disapprobation of Bāmā worship, based upon the law of Deut. which restricts sacrifice to the central sanctuary. Similar notices by $\mathrm{R^D}$ are found elsewhere in Kings (see phrases, No. 73). The old narrative treats Bāmā worship as a matter of course; cf. v.^{4} 18^{30} 19^{10} etc.

Though vv.$^{2.\ 3}$ of 3 both exhibit the influence of Deut., it is scarcely possible to assign both to one author $\mathrm{R^D}$. In v.^{3} the subject, as in vv.$^{1.\ 4}$, is Solomon, while in v.^{2} the people are specified. V.^{3} simply places two facts side by side without any attempt at correlation:—Solomon loved J″, only he sacrificed and burned incense on the high places; v.^{2} supplies an explanation:—This Bāmā worship was a popular custom, due to the fact that the house of J″ was not yet built. Hence v.^{3} is the work of $\mathrm{R^D}$, and opens the account of Solomon's reign by introducing the narrative of the vision at Gibeon; v.^{2} proceeds from a later editor, who, with a view to explaining Solomon's conduct, inserted the phrase, which he found to be frequent elsewhere, v.^{2a}, together with the explanation which follows, v.^{2b}, and, in order to illustrate this latter, probably moved v.^{1}, which mentions the fact of the house of J″ heing not yet built, from the position which it properly occupies in ch. 4 LXX. In LXX of ch. 3, v.^{1} is wanting and v.^{2} fragmentary.

* So Kuenen, Onderzoek, § 26; Wellhausen, Composition, p. 298 ff., etc. König, on the contrary, holds that the editor of Kings compiled his work not earlier than B.C. 588, i.e. during the Exile (Einleitung, § 53^3).

† In speaking of a second Deuteronomic editor ($\mathrm{R^{D2}}$) it is not, of course, intended dogmatically to assert that all passages assigned to such a writer must have flowed from the same pen, since it is obvious that more than one Deuteronomist may have had a hand in the revision of Kings. $\mathrm{R^{D2}}$ denotes a Deuteronomic redactor or redactors of the Bk. of Kings who lived in exilic or post-exilic times.

* The following criticisms upon the narratives of Kings are, in the main, taken, directly or in an abridged form, from the writer's Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings, which is in course of preparation by the Oxford University Press.

3^{4-15} is an ancient narrative, to some extent revised by R^{D}, whose hand may be traced in vv.$^{6. 8a. 12. 14}$ (phrases Nos. 2. 3. 8. 9. 57. 60. 63). Probably also v.^{15}, at least in its present form, is due to R^{n}, since if according to v.^{4} 'the great high place' was at Gibeon, it is difficult to understand why Solomon should have returned to Jerusalem to offer sacrifice, except from the Deuteronomic standpoint. The phrase 'ark of the covenant of J″' is mainly a D expression. 3^{16-28} is an old narrative in its original form.

4^{1-19}, which gives a list of Solomon's officers of state, may be supposed to be derived from 'the book of the annals of Solomon.'

The list has received one later addition, viz. v.^{4b}. The statement that 'Zadok and Ahiathar were priests' is no part of the register in its original form as an official state document. This naturally headed the list with the name of the high priest of the time, Azariah, the son of Zadok. The insertion was made hy R^{n} or by someone still earlier, who wished, as a matter of historical interest, to notice that Zadok and Abiathar were priests at the commencement of the reign. It is noticeable that in this case only is there omission of the name of the father of any official. The sentence at the end of v.^{19} should he emended, after Klostermann, וְנָצִיב אֶחָד עַל כָּל־הַנִּצָּבִים אֲשֶׁר בָּאָרֶץ 'and one officer was over all the officers who were in the land,' the allusion being to Azariah of v.^{5}.

4^{20-34} (Heb. 4^{20}–5^{14}) appears in LXX (B, Luc.) in a form somewhat different from MT. $4^{20. 21. 25. 26}$ and part of v.^{24} ('from Tiphsah . . . the river') do not appear, but are to be found in the addition at the end of ch. 2^{46}. At the close of 4^{19} the text continues in the following order:—vv.$^{27. 28. 22-24. 29-34}$, after which follow ch. 3^{1}, ch. $9^{16. 17a}$. Thus the commencement of v.^{27} 'And these officers provided,' etc. (וְכִלְכְּלוּ הַנִּצָּבִים הָאֵלֶּה וג׳, not, as RV, 'and those officers,' etc.), hinges directly on to the section 4^{7-19}, which enumerates the officers and their respective districts. This explains הָאֵלֶּה 'these' of v.^{27}, which is otherwise anomalous. There can be no question that the text of the section as preserved by LXX is complete in itself, and bears the stamp of originality rather than the somewhat confused account of MT.

The disturhing factors in MT appear to have heen vv.$^{20. 21. 25}$.* These, which contain no very precise information, were added prohahly not from a written source, hut from oral tradition, hy a post-exilic scrihe, who desired reference to the happy times under Solomon's golden age. The insertion led to the dislocation of vv.$^{27. 28}$, causing them to be placed after vv.$^{22. 23. 24}$. Prohahly the same hand excerpted the notice ahout Pharaoh's daughter and her dowry from its true position after v.^{34}, dividing it and placing part at the heginning of ch. 3 (for the reason given ahove, $3^{2. 3}$), and part as a sequel to the mention of Gezer in ch. 9^{15}.

5^{1}–7^{51} (Heb. 5^{15}–7^{51}).† The main document, represented by chs. 6. 7, appears to have been one, and was probably derived from the temple archives. 5^{3-5} has been amplified by R^{n} upon the lines of 2 S 7 (phrases, Nos. 10, 62). In 5^{12} the idea and phrase 'as he promised him' (כַּאֲשֶׁר דִּבֶּר־לוֹ) are Deuteronomic,‡ and thus the first half of this verse ought probably to be assigned to R^{n}.

In 5^{15-18} the relationship of the 70,000 + 80,000 workmen to the 30,000 of $5^{13. 14}$ is obscure,§ and probably points to a difference of source. So Ewald and Stade; the latter noticing that הלבנון 'the Lebanon,' of v.^{14}, is in v.^{15} called ההר 'the mountain.'

The narrative of 6. 7 has been much worked over in post-exilic times. In 6^{1} the exact coincidence in length of the period of 480 years from the Exodus to the commencement of Solomon's temple, with the period which extends from this latter point to the return from the Exile, is scarcely accidental, and marks the verse as a post-exilic insertion. LXX places 6^{1} between vv.$^{18. 17a}$ of 5, into which position it has probably crept from the margin. In its place we have $6^{37. 38a}$, which give the date of laying the foundation of the temple and of its completion. This position for these latter verses is accepted by Wellhausen (Composition, p. 267), though not by Stade. 6^{7} intrudes itself very awkwardly into the midst of the account of the side chambers, and, if forming a part of the original description, must, at any rate, be out of place. In 6^{8a} read, with LXX (B, Luc.), Targ. הַתַּחְתֹּנָה 'the lowest,' in place of הַתִּיכֹנָה 'the middle.' 6^{9} (omitting גבים ושדרת, with B, Luc.) ought to follow 6^{10}.

6^{11-14}, which is omitted by LXX, is not, as is generally assumed by critics, the work of R^{n}, but is due to a post-exilic editor, who shows acquaintance with the Law of Holiness (H) and the Priestly code (P). The section contains some D phrases, such as could, and did, pass from D into P, but other expressions belong solely to P or to H. V.^{14} is by the same hand as vv.$^{11-13}$, v.^{9a} being repeated in order to round off the interpolation and attach it to the preceding narrative. The following special marks of authorship should be noticed:—

V.^{12} אִם־תֵּלֵךְ בְּחֻקֹּתַי If thou wilt walk in my statutes. Never in Dt; twice in Jer $44^{10. 23}$. In H, Lv 26^{3} (cf. 18^{4}), and con stantly in Ezk (whose connexion with H is well ascertained; Driver, LOT^{8} p. 49 ff.) $5^{6. 7}$ 11^{20} $18^{9. 17}$ $20^{13. 16. 19. 21}$.† Cf. the phrase הָלַךְ בְּחֻקּוֹת הַגּוֹיִם walk in the statutes of the nations, Lv 18^{3} 20^{23} (H).

וְאֶת־מִשְׁפָּטַי תַּעֲשֶׂה and wilt execute my judgments. The exact phrase (with J″ as spokesman—my judgments) helongs to H; Lv 18^{4}, Ezk 5^{7} 11^{12} 18^{17} 20^{24}, 1 Ch 28^{7}. In 1 K 11^{33b} the passage helongs to R^{n}, but the words וְחֻקֹּתַי וּמִשְׁפָּטַי are an exilic insertion, as is shown by their omission in LXX. Even with מִשְׁפָּטָיו his judgments, הַמִּשְׁפָּטִים the judgments, the phrase is not specially characteristic of Dt;* 26^{16} 33^{21} (blessing of Moses in Appendix); elsewhere Neh 10^{29}. Similar H phrases are found in Lv 18^{5}, Ezk $20^{11. 13. 21}$, Lv 19^{37} 20^{22} 25^{18}, Ezk 11^{20} 20^{19} 36^{27}.

לָלֶכֶת בָּהֶם to walk in them (the judgments). So exactly only in Lv 18^{4} (H). D's phrase is לָלֶכֶת בִּדְרָכֵי י׳ 'to walk in the ways of J″.'

V.^{13} וְשָׁכַנְתִּי בְּתוֹךְ בְּנֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל And I will dwell in the midst of the children of Israel. Very distinctive of P; Ex 25^{8} 29^{45}, Nu 5^{3} 35^{34}, Ezk 43^{9}. No occurrences in D. With the whole verse cf. Lv $26^{11. 12}$ (H).

6^{15-22}, which gives an account of the interior of the building, has been much corrupted by later glosses. Thus in v.^{16} לְקֹדֶשׁ הַקֳּדָשִׁים 'for the most holy place,' a phrase which belongs to P, has been added to explain לִדְבִיר 'for an adytum.' Other more serious interpolations (omitted in LXX) are הוּא הַהֵיכָל, 'that is, the temple,' in v.^{17}, vv.$^{18. 21}$ (except last 4 words in Heb.) ^{22b}. In vv.$^{15. 16}$ emend קוֹרוֹת הַסִּפֻּן 'rafters of the ceiling,' הַקּוֹרוֹת 'the rafters,' with LXX (B, Luc.), Vulg., Pesh. in place of קירות הספן, הקירות. V.^{19} is probably due to R^{n} (notice the phrase 'ark of the covenant of J″'). By its omission we are able, with a slight emendation, to plausibly restore the original statement of vv.$^{17. 20a}$ 'And 40 cubits was the house before the adytum. And the adytum was 20 cubits long, and 20 cubits broad, and 20 cubits high; and he overlaid it with pure gold.' In v.^{20b} we may emend (with LXX, B, Luc.) וַיַּעַשׂ for וַיְצַף, and thus, with the last 4 words of v.^{21}, we read, 'and he made an altar of cedar wood before the adytum, and overlaid it with gold.' Stade would omit all references to the use of gold-plating or gilding in Solomon's temple, but in so doing he appears to go further than is warranted by the state of the text.†

---

* 4^{26} properly helongs to ch. 10, where it occurs in LXX (B, Luc.) in connexion with v.^{26}.

† Upon the text of this section Stade's article, 'Der Text des Berichtes über Salomos Bauten,' ZATW, 1883, p. 129 ff., is most invaluahle.

‡ Cf. Dt 1^{21} 6^{3} 9^{3} al. Driver (Comm. on Deut. lxxxi) cites from D fifteen occurrences of באשר דבר י׳ (ל), hesides instances from the compiler of Judges and Joshua.

§ According to 2 Ch $2^{16. 17}$ the former consisted of 'the strangers that were in the land of Israel.' Of this difference, however, there is no hint in the text of Kings.

* D's usual phrases are שָׁמַר מִשְׁפָּטִים לַעֲשׂוֹת observe judgments to do them; 5^{1} 7^{11} 11^{32} 12^{1}, 2 K 17^{37} לִמַּד מִשְׁפָּטִים לַעֲשׂוֹת teach (someone else) judgments to do them; $4^{1. 5. 14}$ 6^{1}.

† Cf. the writer's Notes on the Hebrew Text of Kings, p. 73 f.

6^{23-28} runs smoothly when, following the clever suggestion of Stade, v.^{26} is inserted between v.^{23a} and v.^{23b}.

$6^{29.\,30}$ (omitted in LXX) is a gloss. V.^{29} is clearly by the same hand as v.^{18}, and v.^{30} is redundant after ^{22a}, and also out of place.

$6^{32.\,35}$ may also readily be recognized as due to the author of vv.$^{18.\,29}$. Notice the late usage of the perf. with weak ו, וְקָלַע, וְצִפָּה.

6^{33b} is rendered intelligible by the emendation מְזוּזוֹת רְבֻעוֹת 'doorposts standing foursquare,' after LXX (B, Luc.)

7^{1-12}, the account of Solomon's further activity as a builder, appears to be free from later interpolation, doubtless because it did not possess so great an interest for post-exilic times as did the description of the first temple.

In v.^{2b} read 'three' (B, Luc.) for 'four,' in agreement with the statement of v.^{3};* v.^{5b} וּמוּל פֶּתַח אֶל־פֶּתַח 'and door was over against door' (partly following B, Luc.), instead of 'and light was over against light,' a statement already made in v.^{4b}; v.^{7b} עַד־הַקּוֹרוֹת 'to the rafters' (Vulg., Pesh.), in place of עַד־הַקַּרְקַע; v.^{9b} וּמֵחֲצַר בֵּית י׳ 'and from the court of the house of J″' (cf. v.^{12}), for וּמִחוּץ rendered by RV 'and so on the outside.'

7^{15-22} has been much mutilated and obscured by glosses. These were added for the purpose of describing the 'wreaths of chain-work' (גְּדִלִים מַעֲשֵׂה שַׁרְשְׁרוֹת) and the 'lily work' (מַעֲשֵׂה שׁוּשַׁן), of which there appears to have been no mention in the original account; cf. the summary vv.$^{41.\,42}$. The glosses are v.^{17a} (down to שַׁרְשְׁרוֹת) in its present form, vv.$^{19.\,20a.\,22}$. The original description may be restored by the aid of LXX.

In 7^{24} read שְׁלֹשִׁים בָּאַמָּה 'for 30 cubits,' in place of 'for 10 cubits.'

7^{27-37} is in a very disordered condition, and but little help in reconstruction can be obtained from the Versions. Stade's rearrangement and emendation is well worthy of notice. He distinguishes between two parts of the carriages of the lavers: the מְכוֹנָה the movable base 4 cubits in height, mounted upon wheels of 1½ cubits in diameter, and the מַעֲשֵׂה־כֵן the pedestal, 1½ cubits high, fitted on to the top of the מְכוֹנָה and containing the socket in which the laver was placed.

7^{38-45} is substantially correct as it stands in MT (read הַסִּירוֹת 'the pots,' in v.^{40a} after LXX, Vulg., in place of הַכִּירוֹת 'the lavers').

7^{46-51} is somewhat disordered. The vv.$^{48b-50}$, which describe, or rather summarize, the making of golden vessels by Ḥiram, are to be regarded as a later gloss. The remainder should take the following order: v.^{47} (emending the first half verse, after LXX B, אֵין מִשְׁקָל לַנְּחשֶׁת אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה אֶת־כָּל־הַכֵּלִים הָאֵלֶּה מֵרֹב מְאֹד מְאֹד 'There was no weight to the brass wherewith he made all these vessels, because it was exceeding much'), v.^{46}, v.^{48a} (emending, with LXX, Luc., וַיִּתֵּן ש׳ 'and S. placed,' instead of וַיַּעַשׂ ש׳ 'and S. made'), v.^{51}.

8^{1-13}, the dedication of the temple, is an old narrative revised by later hands under the influence of P. In LXX vv.$^{1-5}$ appear in a much shorter form, which shows no trace of abridgment, and certainly presents substantially the original account as it left the hand of Rᴰ.

The phrases of P to be noticed are—v.^{1} 'all the heads of the tribes, the princes of the fathers'; v.^{4b} the distinction between the priests and the Levites (contrast in the original account vv.$^{3.\,6.\,10.\,11}$ where the priests alone are mentioned); v.^{5} עֲדַת יִשְׂרָאֵל 'the congregation of Israel,' and the verb הַנּוֹעָדִים 'that were assembled,' used in a ceremonial connexion. Beside these we find, in LXX as in MT, v.^{4a} the phrase אֹהֶל מוֹעֵד 'the tent of meeting,' mainly characteristic of P, and perhaps here substituted for an original הָאֹהֶל 'the tent' (cf. ch 1^{39}); v.^{6} קֹדֶשׁ הַקֳּדָשִׁים 'the most holy place' (cf. above on 6^{16}); and vv.$^{8.\,10}$ הַקֹּדֶשׁ 'the holy place,' i.e. the outer room of the temple, called הַהֵיכָל in $6^{17.\,33}$ 7^{21}. The hand of Rn may be seen in the phrase 'ark of the covenant of J″' vv.$^{1.\,6}$, in v.^{8b} (see above, date), and probably in v.^{9b}.

The two vv.$^{12.\,13}$ are found in LXX (after the section vv.$^{14-53}$) in a fuller form than in MT, which, as is shown by Wellhausen (Composition, p. 271), presupposes, after the correction of a few translator's errors, a text substantially superior to MT. The addition at the close, which points to an original text, 'is it not written in the Book of the Upright,' must also be regarded as genuine.

8^{14-66} presents throughout clear indications that it owes its present form to Rᴰ (phrases, Nos. 2, 3, 6–8, 11–26, 28, 50, 60–62, 64, 65). The final portion (vv.$^{62-66}$) may perhaps exhibit an older narrative into which Deuteronomic additions have been incorporated, but the remainder, and especially the central prayer of dedication, has been so thoroughly amplified by the editor that it is impossible to discover any older kernel upon which he may have based his work. The choice of subjects in the successive divisions of the prayer seems for the most part to have been suggested by the catalogue of curses contained in Dt 28^{15-68};—cf. v.^{33} 'When thy people Israel be smitten down before the enemy,' with Dt 28^{25}; v.^{35} 'When heaven is shut up, and there is no rain,' with $28^{23.\,24}$; v.^{37} 'pestilence,' with 28^{21}; 'blasting, mildew,' with 28^{22}; 'locust, caterpillar,' with $28^{38.\,39.\,42}$; 'if the enemy besiege,' etc., with $28^{49ff.}$ (especially v.^{52}); 'whatsoever plague, whatsoever sickness,' with $28^{22.\,27.\,35.\,59-61}$; v.^{46} 'If they sin against thee . . . and thou deliver them to the enemy, so that they carry them captive,' etc., with $28^{36.\,37.\,64-68}$.

The division of the prayer vv.$^{46-49}$, which brings forward the possibility of a general captivity of Israel in punishment for sins, is considered by Wellhausen (Composition, p. 270), Stade (Geschichte, i. p. 74), Kamphausen (in Kautzsch, Die Heilige Schrift) to be marked by its contents as not earlier than the Exile, and therefore later than Rᴰ.* Against this view may justly be cited the vagueness of the terms of v.^{46} 'so that they carry them away captive unto the land of the enemy, far off or near,' and the fact that the writer (v.^{48}) appears to regard the temple as still standing during the period of the Exile: 'and pray unto thee towards their land . . . the city which thou hast chosen, and the house which I have built for thy name.' But the chief argument for the pre-exilic date of the passage is to be derived from comparison of Dt 28, which, as has been noticed, forms to some extent the model of the prayer. This ch. 28 is regarded by all critics as being, if not an integral portion of D (chs. 5–26),† at least closely akin to D in standpoint and date, and thus certainly pre-exilic. Yet, notwithstanding, vv.$^{36.\,37.\,64-68}$ threaten a captivity of the nation in language decidedly more definite than that of the passage of the prayer which has been called in question. We may therefore be content to regard these verses as containing nothing necessarily opposed to the supposition of a pre-exilic authorship, and so, as of one piece with the whole, vv.$^{22-53}$.‡

9^{1-9}, the account of Solomon's second vision, is coloured throughout by the phraseology of Rᴰ (phrases, Nos. 3, 28, 29, 30, 51, 52, 57, 60, 61). Owing to the terms in which this section speaks of the exile of Israel and the destruction of the temple (vv.$^{7-9}$§), it is regarded by Kuenen, Wellhausen, Stade, and Kamphausen as the work of Rᴰ² in exilic times. Such a conclusion, however, is by no means inevitable. The terms of v.^{3} (see above, date) go quite as far to prove a pre-exilic position as do the words of vv.$^{6-9}$ to argue a post-exilic point of view; nor are the terms of these latter verses so definite as to preclude the opinion that they were penned by Rᴰ cir. B.C. 600 (see above on 8^{46-49}). If vv.$^{7-9}$ do imply an exilic standpoint, vv.$^{6-9}$ (and not the whole section) will belong to R^{D2}, vv.$^{1-5}$ to R^{D}.

* אַרְבָּעִים וַחֲמִשָּׁה חֲמִשָּׁה עָשָׂר הַטּוּר 'forty and five, fifteen in a row,' can refer only to הָעַמּוּדִים 'the pillars,' and not, as RV, to הַצְּלָעֹת (fem.).

* Wellhausen and Stade seem to regard these verses as determining the exilic date of the whole section, vv.$^{19-66}$. Kamphausen assigns vv.$^{44-53}$ to D².

§ Especially v.^{8}, where עֶלְיוֹן must be emended עִיִּים (cf. Mic 3^{12} ‖ Jer 26^{18}, Ps 79^{1}) 'and this house shall be ruinous heaps.'

9^{10}–10^{29} consists mainly of a series of short notices drawn from the same sources as chs. 4. 5 (Heb. 4–5^{14}). The originals appear to have been cut up and pieced together with no great skill; but whether the arrangement throughout is due to R^{D}, or later hands have employed themselves in altering the sequence of the narrative, is not clear. In LXX (B, Luc.) the arrangement is somewhat different, but scarcely superior, to that of MT.

One single original document appears to be represented by $9^{10. 17. 18. 19. 15. 20. 21. 22. 23}$, and these verses may very well have originally taken this order, the completion of Solomon's building operations being first narrated, and then followed by an account of the forced levy raised to carry out these works. After v.^{23} there probably followed in the original a list of the names of the chief officers (שָׂרֵי הַנִּצָּבִים). The statement of v.^{24b} connected by R^{D} to v.^{24b} by the particle אָז 'then,' is probably from the same document. Next to the account of the king's building activity—his most important work, there would naturally follow mention of his achievement next in importance—the provision of an efficient shipping for the increase of his wealth from external sources. This succeeds in 9^{26-28} 10^{11}. But reference to the ships naturally leads up to mention of the imports introduced by their means, as we see in 9^{28} 10^{11}, and the use to which these rare and valuable materials were put. Thus there follows $10^{12. 14-22}$. The general subject of imports suggests allusion to a specially important item—horses from Egypt, apparently first introduced into the kingdom in any considerable numbers by Solomon, $10^{26.* 28. 29}$.

Thus the disturbing factors introduced into this main account are seen to be $9^{11-13. 14. 16. 24a. 25}$, $10^{1-10. 13. 23-25. 27}$. Notice in $9^{11. 16. 24}$ the awkward pluperfects pointed by the order—subject preceding verb, פַּרְעֹה מֶלֶךְ־מִצְרַיִם עָלָה, חִירָם מֶלֶךְ־צֹר נִשָּׂא אֶת־שׁ׳, אַךְ בַּת־פַּרְעֹה עָלְתָה, and marking the passages as mere excerpts from sources which, in describing a regular sequence of events, must have read וַתַּעַל בַּת־פַּרְעֹה, וַיַּעַל פַּרְעֹה, וַיִּנַּשֵּׂא חִירָם. In v.^{11b} אָז יִתֵּן וגו׳ cannot represent the apodosis of v.^{10}, since אָז used in this connexion (in place of ו consecutive) would be quite without analogy. Moreover, even if v.^{11b} could form the apodosis, the parenthesis v.^{11a} would come in with very great awkwardness. V.^{18} has already, with 3^{1}, been referred to its true position after 4^{34} (Heb. 5^{14}). From the same source would seem to be derived v.^{24a}, while v.^{25}, though clearly alien to its immediate context, cannot definitely be assigned to any special source. $10^{1-10. 13}$ is an ancient narrative introduced at this point to illustrate Solomon's wealth and wisdom, much in the same way as 3^{16-28} serves to depict his discernment in judgment; and the two stories may very possibly be derived from the same source. Finally, $10^{23-25. 27}$, couched in vague and generalizing language, are probably relatively late in origin, and are here introduced to give the finishing touch to the picture of Solomon's prosperity.

11^{1-13}, in its present form, is coloured by the hand of R^{D} (phrases, Nos. 3, 27, 29, 31–33, 35, 36, 57, 58, 65). The view that the latter portion of this section is not earlier than the Exile (R^{D2}; so Kuenen vv.$^{9-13}$, Kamphausen, vv.$^{9. 10}$) is based upon the words of v.^{9} 'who had appeared unto him twice,' and presupposes that the narrative of the second vision, ch. 9^{1-9}, comes from the hand of R^{D2}; but upon this opinion see ad loc. On the other hand, the fact that vv.$^{11-13}$ speak of a division of the kingdom but make no mention of an exile, favours their pre-exilic authorship. 11^{1-8} appears in LXX in a somewhat differently arranged and briefer form, which is, in the main, correct.†

11^{14-22} seems, as it now stands, to be somewhat confused. Hadad, though but 'a little lad' at the time of his flight into Egypt, at once finds favour with Pharaoh, and receives from him a house, an allowance, and land. He then, in spite of his extreme youth, marries the sister of Pharaoh's queen, Tahpenes, and his son Genubath is brought up in the palace with Pharaoh's sons. The form Adad (אֲדַד) of v.^{17a}, as a variation of Hadad (הֲדַד), creates further suspicion as to the integrity of the narrative.

H. Winckler (Alttest. Untersuchungen, 1–6) very skilfully distinguishes and reconstructs two narratives which have been interwoven. The one speaks of an Edomite Hadad, who, as a child, is carried into Egypt by his father's servant, and brought up by Pharaoh's queen. The other makes Adad a Midianite prince, who flees with his adherents into Egypt, taking with him certain Edomites from Paran, and is well received by Pharaoh, who gives him for wife the sister of his queen. A son, Genubath, is born to him, but of his fate we are not informed.

In 11^{23-25} of MT the short account of Rezon appears to have assumed its present position at the hands of a later reviser of the text. LXX (B, Luc.) omits vv.$^{23-25a}$ (down to 'all the days of Solomon'), and then, in place of the impossible MT, presupposes a text זאת הָרָעָה אֲשֶׁר עָשָׂה הֲדַד וַיָּקָץ בְּיִשְׂרָאֵל וַיִּמְלֹךְ עַל־אֱדֹם 'This is the evil which Hadad did; and he abhorred Israel, and reigned over Edom.' This seems to be correct both in reading and position, referring as it does the latter part of v.^{25} to Hadad, and adding the necessary summary as to his relationship to Solomon. The definiteness, however, of the statement, 'This is the evil,' suggests that in the original narrative some explicit account of Hadad's aggressions must have intervened after v.^{22}.

The short reference to Rezon, thus omitted by LXX, has been inserted between v.^{14a} and v.^{14b}; but clearly by a later hand. So placed, it breaks the connexion of the Hadad story, and necessitates the resumption καὶ Ἀδὲρ ὁ Ἰδουμαῖος, v.^{14b}, repeated from v.^{14a}. The notice is ancient and genuine, but its original position cannot now be accurately determined.

11^{26-40} seems to have originally formed part of a history of Jeroboam, and perhaps belongs to the same source as 12^{1-19} 14^{1-18}. As the narrative stands in Kings it has probably undergone some abbreviation at the commencement, in order to fit it on to the preceding account of Solomon's 'adversaries.' Notice the summary form of the introduction v.^{28} and the phrase of R^{D} 'at that time' (בָּעֵת הַהִיא) v.^{29}. Vv.$^{31-39}$ show signs of expansion at the hands of the editor (phrases, Nos. 2, 3, 11, 27, 28, 34, 38, 57–59).

Not improbably the speech has received some few later additions. In v.^{33} וְחֻקֹּתַי וּמִשְׁפָּטַי 'and my statutes and my judgments,' is wanting in LXX, and the use of these terms after לַעֲשׂוֹת 'to execute' rather than לִשְׁמֹר 'to keep' being characteristic of H (see on 6^{12}), the two words may reasonably be suspected to be a later insertion. LXX also omits אֲשֶׁר שָׁמַר מִצְוֹתַי וְחֻקֹּתָי 'who kept my commandments and my statutes,' at the end of v.^{34}, and, though the phrase is Deuteronomic, yet the repeated אֲשֶׁר has something of the awkward ring of an interpolation. The omission of the close of the speech by LXX (end of v.^{38} 'and I will give thee Israel'; v.^{39}), taken in connexion with the reference of v.^{39}—the affliction of the seed of David, but not for ever—suggests that this also may be an addition of exilic or post-exilic times; though, as Kuenen points out, the statement of v.^{39} need not imply an exilic standpoint; cf. 2 S 7^{14b}. The use of the imperfect with weak ו (ואענה) is perhaps another mark of the late hand.

After the account of the disruption of the kingdom (1 K 12), the composition of the narrative takes the form indicated above in dealing with the editor's method. Into the framework of the history, constructed by the editor, are embedded—

(i.) Short notices which give an epitome of historical events. These have reference to both the N. and S. kingdoms, and were no doubt generally, if not in every case, extracted by R^{D} from the two books of 'Annals' to which he so constantly makes reference. From the character of this narrative it is to be inferred that R^{D} made use of just so much of his sources as was necessary to form an outline sketch of the history, often summarizing in a few words matter which lay before him in greater detail; cf. the recurring phrase 'and there was war between M. and N. continually,' I 14^{30} $15^{6. 16. 32}$, and also the brief passing reference to wars in I 14^{19} 22^{45} (^{46} Heb.), II 13^{12} $14^{15. 28}$.

To this epitome are to be assigned I 14^{21}–16^{34} 22^{41-53}, II 8^{16-29} 10^{32-36} 12^{17} (Heb. ^{18})–13^{13} 14^{22}–17^{6} (except 14^{8-14} 16^{10-18}).

[*] This verse originally stood in combination with 4^{26} (Heb. 5^{6}); see on 4^{20-34}.

[†] Notice especially in v.^{8b} the text of Luc. ἐθυμία καὶ ἔθυε, i.e. מַקְטִיר וּמְזַבֵּחַ וגו׳ in place of מַקְטִירוֹת וּמְזַבְּחוֹת. Solomon himself burnt incense and sacrificed to the strange gods, but this fact has been toned down by some later hand into the statement of MT. Syntax, however, has suffered in the process (we should expect at least הַמַּקְטִירוֹת הַמְזַבְּחוֹת).

(ii.) Lengthy narratives, generally incorporated in their original form, and exhibiting only here and there the marks of R^{D}'s hand, chiefly in the expansion of speeches. These are in most cases, as is clear from their religious tone, the work of prophetical writers. In some cases, however, the narratives have to do with the affairs of the temple and its priesthood, and exhibit such a minuteness and apparent accuracy of detail that they must be regarded as due to priestly hands, and were probably derived from the temple archives. These are II 11^{1-20} 12^{4-16} ($^{5-17}$ Heb.) 16^{10-16} 22^{3}–23^{24}.

12^{1-24}. In this narrative vv.$^{15.17.21-24}$ appear to be additions of a later hand. V.^{15}, with its reference to the prediction of Ahijah, probably presupposes $11^{31ff.}$ in its present form, and must in this case be due to R^{D}. Vv.$^{21-24}$, standing in close connexion with v.^{15} (cf. v.^{15} 'for it was a thing brought about of J",' v.^{24} 'for this thing is of me'), give a Judaic turn to the originally impartial narrative of vv.$^{1-20}$, and are scarcely consistent with the statement of 14^{30}, which is based upon the contemporary 'Annals.' Notice further, that while v.^{20} speaks only of the tribe of Judah, vv.$^{21.23}$ are careful to make reference also to the tribe of Benjamin. V.^{17}, which stands in an awkward position, and is absent from LXX, is probably a later gloss, though not by the same hand as vv.$^{15.21-24}$, since it makes no reference to Benjamin.

12^{26-33}. Judging by the stress which R^{D} lays upon Jeroboam's cult of the calves as the cause of all subsequent deflection of Israel from the pure worship of J" (phrases, No. 56), it is probable that this narrative has obtained its present casting at his hands, though there is no reason hence to infer that any detail of fact is underived from the older source. Kuenen (Onderzoek, § 25^{4}) observes justly, 'Jeroboam's measures with reference to the worship must already have been related in older narratives, but it is only natural that the Redactor, when dealing with a matter which so specially excited his interest, should not fail to set before us his own construction and his own verdict.' Vv.$^{32.33}$ serve to introduce the story of ch. 13.

13^{1-32}. The style of the language in this narrative shows traces of decadence :—cf. וְנָתַן perf. with weak ו v.^{3}, צִוָּה אֹתִי, דִּבֶּר לִי vv.$^{9.17}$, apparently first written as passives צֻוֵּיתִי, דֻּבַּר לִי (cf. Wellhausen, Comp. p. 280), and perhaps מַתָּת v.^{7}—and this fact, together with the anachronism 'in the cities of Samaria' v.^{32} (cf. II $17^{24.26}$ 23^{19}), and the non-mention of the names of the principal actors, marks the narrative as being of comparatively late origin. It may be thought to have been a story previously current in the form of oral tradition, and to have assumed a literary form shortly after the event predicted—the destruction of the altar at Bethel—had come about. Notice the precision of the statement 'Josiah by name' v.^{2}. The style is about contemporary with that of the annals of Josiah's reformation, II $23^{1-15.19-24}$, where the perf. with weak ו is used with some frequency: vv.$^{5.8.10.12.14.15}$.

It is, however, by no means to be hence inferred that the story is of the character of a vaticinium post eventum. Such a view presupposes that it, together with the notice of II 23^{15-18}, was inserted into Kings subsequently to the redaction of R^{D} (Wellhausen, Comp. p. 280; Kuenen, Ond. § 25^{4}); whereas, on the contrary, ch. $12^{25ff.}$ appears to have been carefully edited by R^{D} so as to lead up to the story, and the resumption of the main narrative in $13^{33.34}$, forming a link to 14^{1-20}, constructs of the history a harmonious whole. If the story be merely a very late Judæan fiction, the point of the details as to the disobedience and punishment of the Judæan prophet seems to be quite inexplicable.

The narrative of 14^{1-18} * exhibits very clear traces of the hand of R^{D} in Ahijah's prophecy vv.$^{7-16}$ (phrases, Nos. 3, 8, 13, 29, 32, 34, 39, 54, 56, 57, 66–70), with which should be compared the prophecies of Jehu son of Hanani against Baasha 16^{1-4}, of Elijah against Ahab 21^{20-24}, and of the young prophet against the house of Ahab II 9^{6-10}.

Narratives of the Northern Kingdom.—I 17–19. 20. 21. 22^{1-38}, II $1^{2-17a\alpha}$ $2^{1-18.19-22.23-25}$ 3^{4-27} $4^{1-7.8-37.38-41.42-44}$ 5. $6^{1-7.8-23.24-33}$ 7. $8^{1-6.7-15}$ 9^{1}–10^{28} $13^{14-19.20.21}$ (14^{8-14}). This great group consists of narratives dealing with the affairs of the kingdom of Israel. The stories are in most cases of some length, their high descriptive power and sympathetic feeling indicating that they have their origin in the kingdom to which they relate; and this conclusion is substantiated by such touches as 'Beer-sheba which belongeth to Judah' I 19^{3}, 'at Beth-shemesh which belongeth to Judah' II 14^{11}. No blame is anywhere attached to the calf-worship of Bethel and Dan, the efforts of Elijah and his successor being wholly directed to the rooting out of the foreign cult of the Tyrian Ba'al.

Certain peculiarities of diction probably belong to the dialect of North Palestine.

The following may be noticed:—

Suffix 2 f. sing. ־ֵכִי, pl. ־יְכִי; Kĕthîbh II 4^{2} לָכִי, ^{3} שְׁכֵנָיְכִי, ^{7} נִשְׁיֵכִי, בָּנָיְכִי. Elsewhere sing. Ca 2^{3}, Ps $103^{3.4}$, Jer 11^{15} (text corrupt), pl. Ps $103^{3.4.5}$ 116^{7}. Cf. Syriac suff. 2 f. sing. ܟܝ—, pl. ܟܝܢ—.

Personal pronoun 2 f. sing. Kĕthîbh אַתִּי:—II $4^{16.23}$ 8^{1}. Elsewhere Jg 17^{2}, Jer 4^{30}, Ezk 36^{13} †. Cf. Syriac ܐܢܬܝ. So probably Kĕthîbh הָלַכְתִּי II 4^{23} stands for אַתְּ הָלַכְתְּ, as in Syr. ܗܠܟܬܝ for ܐܢܬܝ ܗܠܟܬ (Duval, Gramm. Syr. p. 174 f.).

Demonstrative pronoun f. הֹו II 6^{19}. Cf. Aramaic דָּא.

Infin. constr. verb ל״ה with suff. בְּהִשְׁתַּחֲוָיָתִי II 5^{18}, perhaps presupposing form without suff. הִשְׁתַּחֲוָיָה with termination as in Aram. (cf. Dalman, Gramm. Jüd.-Pal. Aram. p. 289 f.).

Relative שֶׁל in מִשֶּׁלָּנוּ (if not a textual error) II 6^{11}. So Jg 5^{7} (N. Palestine) 6^{17} 7^{12} 8^{26} (probably Ephraimitic), and uniformly in Ca (exc. title 1^{1}). Elsewhere only in exilic or post-exilic writings. In Phœnician the relative is אש with prosthetic א.

Preservation of ה of article after prep. ב: II 7^{12} בְּהַשָּׂדֶה.

Kĕthîbh אֵיכֹה=where? II 6^{13}. Elsewhere only Ca 1^{7} bis. Cf. Aram. אֵיכָא, ܐܝܟܐ. עַד־הֵם, עַד־אֲלֵיהֶם II $9^{18.20}$.

Construction with the suff. pronoun anticipating object (akin to Syr.): I 19^{21} בִּשְּׁלָם הַבָּשָׂר, 21^{13} אֶת־נָבוֹת . . . וַיְעִדֻהוּ.

Indefinite use of אֶחָד a certain: I $19^{4.5}$ 20^{13} 22^{9} (cf. v.^{8}) II 4^{1} 8^{6}; add I 21^{1} after LXX (B, Luc.). Elsewhere only I 13^{11} (perhaps for אַחֵר another), Jg 9^{53} 13^{2}, 1 S 1^{1}, 2 S 18^{10}, and late Ezk 1^{15} $8^{7.8}$ etc.

To these may be added a few roots which betray the influence of Aramaic: שֶׂפֶק I 20^{10}, מְדִינוֹת $20^{14.15.17.19}$ (elsewhere only very late), חֹרִים $21^{8.11}$, הַשִּׁלָה II 4^{28}.

There is also a fair number of ἅπαξ λεγόμενα, some of which take the place of ordinary words, and thus may be dialectical: e.g. שִׁנֵּס gird, I 18^{46} (for חָגַר, אָזַר), אֲכִילָה food, 19^{8} (for אֹכֶל, אָכְלָה, מַאֲכָל); but of others nothing can be affirmed.

The narratives are clearly not all by one author. (i.) Some are histories of Elijah and Elisha, or of movements which they initiated in the direction of religious reform. (ii.) In others the fate of the kingdom is regarded from a political standpoint, and this as determined mainly by the action of the king; though here also prophets play an important part as advisers and announcers of the oracle of J". Thus both classes have a religious colouring or motive, and may equally be regarded as the work of men of prophetic training, perhaps members of the guilds which we see coming into prominence in some of the Elisha stories.

(i.) To the former class belong I 17–19. 21,

* Upon the LXX version of this narrative in its relationship to MT, see Winckler, Alttest. Untersuchungen, p. 12 ff.; Kittel, History of the Hebrews, ii. p. 206 ff.; and the writer's Notes on the Heb. Text of Kings, where the whole question of the interrelationship of the two forms of the history of Jeroboam (11^{46}–14^{20}) is discussed at length, pp. 163–169.

II $1^{2-17a\alpha}$ $2^{1-18.\,19-22.\,23-25}$ $4^{1-7.\,8-37.\,38-41.\,42-44}$ 5. 6^{1-7} $8^{1-6.\,7-15}$ 9^{1}–10^{28} $13^{14-19.\,20.\,21}$.

Of these I 17–19 forms a continuous narrative. From the abruptness of v.^{1}, no reason being assigned for Elijah's threat, and no point of connexion existing for 'hence' (מִזֶּה), v.^{3}, it may be inferred that the commencement of the story has been omitted or abbreviated by R^{D}, and the specification 'Elijah the Tishbite, etc.,' thus represents his summary introduction. The sequel also, in strict accordance with $19^{15.\,16}$, is lacking, only one part of J″'s commission being fulfilled, vv.$^{19-21}$.

I 21 is clearly out of place in MT, breaking the connexion between ch. 20 and its sequel ch. 22, and LXX is no doubt correct in placing this narrative immediately after ch. 19. The dislocation may have been due to the desire to bring the prophecy of Ahab's death (21^{19}) nearer to the account of its occurrence ($22^{35\text{ff.}}$), and perhaps in a minor degree to the description of the king's mood as 'chafing and sullen' (סַר וְזָעֵף) in 20^{43} as in 21^{4}. Most critics (Wellhausen, Driver, Kamphausen, Kittel; but Kuenen is uncertain, Ond. § 25^{7}) assign I 21 to the same author as I 17–19. Thus Wellhausen cites as points of contact the central position occupied by Elijah, his eagle-like swoop upon Ahab at the right moment, and the formulæ וַיְהִי אַחַר הַדְּבָרִים הָאֵלֶּה 'and it came to pass after these things' 21^{1} (but cf. LXX) as 17^{17}, וַיְהִי דְבַר י׳ אֶל־א׳ 'And the word of J″ came to E.' 21^{17} as וּדְבַר י׳ הָיָה אֶל־א׳ 18^{1}.

On the other hand, it may be maintained that Elijah is not really the central figure as in I 17–19. He does not appear upon the scene until v.^{17}, and then takes scarcely a more conspicuous position than Micaiah in $22^{8\text{ff.}}$. The king and his action form the centre of interest both at the beginning and end of the narrative. Further, Kuenen notices the absence of any reference in 21 to 17–19, and vice versâ, the murder of Naboth forming the single crime of Ahab and Jezebel in the one story, while in the other the sole pivot is the struggle between J″ and Ba'al. This, however, is a point of slight moment, and no definite conclusion can be reached as to the relative authorship of the two sections.

More important is the question of the connexion of I 21 with its natural sequel II 9^{1}–10^{28}. Critics generally argue or assume that the latter section is by a different author from the former, and most (Wellhausen, Driver, Kamphausen, Kittel) assign II 9 f. to the writer of I 20. 22, II 3^{4-27} etc. (see below). The argument against identity of authorship of I 21 and II 9 f., as stated by Wellhausen, is based upon the supposed discrepancy in detail. While in I 21 it is the vineyard of Naboth which is mentioned, and this is described in v.^{1} as 'hard by the palace of Ahab' (אֵצֶל הֵיכַל אַחְאָב), II 9^{21-26} alludes to the חֶלְקַת נָבוֹת, i.e. the portion or estate of Naboth, which lay outside the city. Again, I 21^{13} records only the death of Naboth, while II 9^{26} speaks also of the blood of his sons as calling for vengeance.

On the other hand, the following considerations clearly make for the unity of the two narratives:—

II 9^{21b}, the meeting of Joram son of Ahab with Jehu actually upon the estate of Naboth is a touch of high dramatic power which demands that the writer should not merely have known the story of Naboth (proved by vv.$^{25.\,26}$), but should actually have written it down himself as an introduction to the sequel II 9 f. Hence a presumption is created in favour of our Naboth narrative being the story thus written.

The parallels between the prediction I $21^{19.\,23}$ and the fulfilment II $9^{25.\,26.\,36}$ cannot be insisted upon, because I $21^{19\text{ff.}}$ has been largely amplified by R^{D} (phrases, Nos. 32, 39, 43, 44, 54, 67–71), and it is not now possible certainly to determine the original kernel of Elijah's prediction. It should, however, be noticed that the usual method of R^{D} is to expand rather than to excise, and, if this plan has here prevailed, the original speech must be contained in vv.$^{19.\,20.\,23b}$. The disagreement in points of fact between I 21 and II 9 proves upon examination to be non-existent. Ahab's dispute with Naboth arose in the first instance about a vineyard adjoining the palace; but this was only a portion of Naboth's estate (חֶלְקָה), the whole of which would lapse to the king, supposing that the family of Naboth became extinct. And I 21^{15}, where Jezebel tells Ahab to go down and take possession of the vineyard, clearly implies the extirpation of the whole family; in the statement 'for Naboth is not alive, but dead,' the name Naboth means Naboth and his sons, just as much as in v.^{15} 'thy blood, even thine,' means the blood of Ahab and his son.

More decisive, however, is the question of the supposed unity of II 9^{1}–10^{28} with I 20. 22, II 3^{4-27} 6^{8}–7^{20}. If this be granted, the diverse authorship of I 21 and II 9 f. seems necessarily to follow, since I 21 can scarcely be regarded as of one piece with I 20. 22. The place where the dogs lick the blood of Ahab, 22^{38}, is discordant with 21^{19}, and in general the interest of the writer of 20. 22—mainly, if not wholly, political—and his sympathetic feeling for the king of Israel, preclude the supposition that he is also the author of the Naboth story.

Wellhausen cites the following coincidences in phraseology of II 9 f. with I 20. 22, etc.:—חֶדֶר בְּחֶדֶר 'a chamber within a chamber,' II 9^{2}, I 20^{30} 22^{25}; חַכֵּה 'tarry,' II 9^{3} 7^{9}; רֹכֵב הַסּוּס 'horseman,' 9^{18} 7^{14};* הָפַךְ יָדָיו 'turn the hands,' II 9^{23}, I 22^{34}; תָּפַשׂ חַי 'take alive,' II 10^{14} 7^{12}, I 20^{18}; and the root חרא II 10^{27} 6^{25}. The importance of this collection is, however, open to doubt, since it contains no striking phrase, but only such as might be expected to occur in narratives nearly contemporaneous, and having, in the main, the same subjects in common.

On the other hand, a point of phraseology, apparently hitherto overlooked, sharply separates between II 9 f. and I 20. 22, etc., and seems absolutely to preclude the theory of a common authorship. This is the title which is ordinarily applied to the king in the course of the narrative.

I 20. 22, II 3^{4-27} 6^{8}–7^{20} are bound together by the use of a common title. In all, the writer's phrase is 'king of Israel,' and the proper name of the king, if it occurs at all, is in nearly every case reserved for the necessary specification at the commencement of a section.

II 9, on the other hand, agrees with I 21 in exhibiting a regular preference for the proper name simply, without further title.

The facts are as follow:—

I 20. Ahab king of Israel, vv.$^{2.\,13}$; king of Israel 11 times, viz. vv.$^{4.\,7.\,11.\,21.\,22.\,28.\,31.\,32.\,40.\,41.\,43}$; the king, vv.$^{38.\,39\,bis}$; Ahab simply, v.^{14}.

I 22. King of Israel 17 times, viz. vv.$^{2.\,3.\,4.\,5.\,6.\,8.\,9.\,10.\,18.\,26.\,29.\,30\,bis.\,31.\,32.\,33.\,34}$; the king, vv.$^{15\,bis.\,16.\,35.\,37b}$.

II 3^{4-27}. King of Israel 8 times, viz. vv.$^{4.\,5.\,9.\,10.\,11.\,12.\,13\,bis}$; Ahab simply, v.^{5} (probably from another source); the king Joram, v.^{6}.

II 6^{8}–7^{20}. King of Israel 7 times, viz. $6^{8.\,9.\,10.\,11.\,12.\,21.\,26}$; the king 10 times, viz. $6^{28.\,30}$ $7^{2.\,6.\,12.\,14.\,15.\,17\,bis.\,18}$.

II 9. Joram or Jehoram simply 9 times, viz. vv.$^{14\,bis.\,16\,bis.\,17.\,21.\,22.\,23.\,24}$; once Jehoram the king, v.^{15}; and once Jehoram king of Israel in direct distinction from 'Ahaziah king of Judah,' v.^{21}; never king of Israel simply. The double occurrence of Joram in v.^{16} is specially to be noticed, since, on account of the proximity of 'Ahaziah king of Judah,' the specification king of Israel might have been expected.

Similarly, in I 21 Ahab simply is usual; 9 times (omitting the prophecy vv.$^{21-26}$), viz. vv.$^{2.\,3.\,4.\,8.\,15.\,16.\,20.\,27.\,29}$. Ahab king of Samaria, v.^{1}; Ahab king of Israel, v.^{18}.

Now though this agreement in form of reference cannot be pressed to prove identity of authorship

[*] In 7^{14} MT vocalizes רֶכֶב סוּסִים, but LXX renders B ἐπιβάτας, Luc. ἀναβάτας, i.e. רֹכֵב (or רֹכְבֵי) for רֶכֶב.

for I 21 and II 9, any more than can the fact that I 17–19 always speaks of Ahab simply, be used to connect this section with I 21, because different writers may easily have employed the same obvious citation of the proper name; yet the fact of the disagreement in form of reference between I 21 and I 20. 22, etc., ought to be emphasized as demonstrating diversity of authorship. It is true that in I 20. 22, etc., the general use of king of Israel may be explained as prompted to a large extent by contrast to ‘king of Syria’; but this does not sufficiently account for the almost total omission of the king's proper name, which would certainly have occurred far more frequently had the author of II 9 been the writer of these narratives. Contrast especially I 22, II 3$^{4-27}$, where (excepting 3^{6}) the names of Ahab and Joram are never mentioned in spite of the close connexion with ‘Jehoshaphat king of Judah,’ with II 9, where in connexion with ‘Ahaziah king of Judah’ the usual form of citation is Joram, Jehoram simply. And, again, notice the use of the king simply 5 times in I 22, 10 times in II 6^{8}–7^{20}, where the desire for distinction from ‘the king of Syria’ cannot have been in the writer's mind, and the occasion might have been suitable for the use of the king's proper name.

By this point, therefore, the diverse authorship of I 20. 22, etc. and II 9 seems to be proved, and this dissociation adds weight to the arguments which have been put forward above in favour of the unity of II 9^{1}–10^{27} with I 21.

II 1$^{2-17a\alpha}$ is out of a different source from the preceding Elijah narratives. This fact is marked by the form of the name אֵלִיָּה vv.$^{3.\ 4.\ 8.\ 12}$, peculiar to this section, and generally by the inferior literary merit of the composition. The story is probably much later than I 17–19, II 21 and its sequel.

II 2$^{1-18}$, Elijah's translation, links itself closely on to some of the longer Elisha narratives which follow, as their introduction; but also might have formed a suitable close to the Elijah history, of which we possess a fragment in I 17–19, if this can be thought to have gone on to embody also a history of Elisha. The following coincidences between the narratives are worthy of notice, and suggest that I 17–19, II 2$^{1-18}$ 4$^{1-37}$, to which we may add II 5, may be the work of one author. In the case of II 8$^{7-15}$ 13$^{14-19}$ the evidence is too slight to build upon.

The short Elisha stories are probably popular tales handed down orally at first, and not put into writing until some considerable time after the longer narratives.

(ii.) The second class includes I 20. 22$^{1-38}$, II 3$^{4-27}$ 6$^{8-23.\ 24-33}$ 7 (14$^{8-14}$).

All these, with the exception of 14$^{8-14}$, deal in the same style with the same subject—Israel's relations with Syria, and may not improbably flow from one hand. Notice especially the close bond of connexion between I 22$^{4.\ 7}$ and II 3$^{7.\ 11}$.

II 14$^{8-14}$, which stands apart from the other narratives, is marked as probably N. Palestinian by its tone, and especially by the reference of v.^{11} ‘in Beth-shemesh, which belongeth unto Judah.’

It does not appear that any of the group of N. Palestinian narratives has undergone important editorial revision. The fact that the speech of Elijah in I 21$^{19\text{ff.}}$ has been amplified by R$^{\text{n}}$ has already been noticed. This is also true of the speech of the young prophet who was deputed by Elisha to anoint Jehu, II 9$^{7-10}$. II 3$^{4.\ 5}$, which serves summarily to introduce the succeeding narrative, is probably not of one piece with this latter, but is rather to be assigned to the ‘Annals’ (cf. II 1^{1}). II 9^{29} belongs to the scheme of R$^{\text{n}}$.

Traces of later interpolation are not numerous. In I 18 the reference to the 400 prophets of the Asherah is probably to be regarded, with Wellhausen, as a later insertion. Notice the absence of את before נְבִיאֵי הָאֲשֵׁרָה, and the omission of all mention of such prophets in vv.$^{22.\ 40}$. The insertion seems to exhibit a late confusion of the Asherah with the goddess Ashtoreth (see ASHERAH).

The statement of v.^{31b} in the same narrative looks like a quotation of the exact words of P in Gn 35^{10}; and, if this be the case, vv.$^{31.\ 32a}$, which appear to describe the building of a new altar, will form a later addition to the statement of v.^{30b} which speaks merely of the repair (וַיְרַפֵּא) of the old altar of J″. It should not, however, be overlooked that the giving of the name of Israel to Jacob is related also in J (Gn 32^{29}), and that the relationship of 1 K 18^{31b} to the passage of P may be nothing more than an easy verbal coincidence. In this case vv.$^{31.\ 32a}$ may represent a detailed description of that which is first summarily stated in v.^{30b}, much in the same way as Gn 27$^{24-29}$ stands related to Gn 27^{23}.

In the narrative of I 20 the grounds upon which Wellhausen regards the reference to the parts played by anonymous prophets (vv.$^{13.\ 14.\ 22.\ 28.\ 35-43}$) as later additions are inconclusive.[*]

I 22^{28b}, which is omitted in LXX (B, Luc.), is certainly an interpolation, derived from Mic 1^{1} for the purpose of identifying Micaiah with Micah the Morashtite. The plural עַמִּים regularly denotes ‘peoples,’ i.e. foreign nations generally, and is seldom or never used of Israel.

Very possibly also vv.$^{35b\beta.}$ (from וַיִּצֶק ‘and the blood ran out,’ etc.)^{38} may not have formed part of the original narrative of Ahab's last battle. In LXX (B, Luc.) v.$^{35b\beta}$ precedes v.$^{35b\alpha}$ ‘and he died in the evening.’ V^{38}, for which v.$^{35b\beta}$ prepares the way, hinges awkwardly on to the apparent close of the narrative in v.^{34}, and seems to be intended to satisfy the prophecy as to Ahab's death in 21^{19b}, though the scene of the event differs from that of the prediction.

II 17$^{7-18.\ 21-24}$ is the commentary of R$^{\text{n}}$ (phrases, Nos. 3, 29, 32, 33, 36, 39, 41, 43, 44, 46, 51, 53, 55, 56, 71, 72, and cf. Driver, LOT^{6} p. 203) upon the short historical notice 17$^{3-6}$.[†] Vv.$^{19.\ 20}$ are certainly a later insertion, subsequent to the commencement of the Judæan exile, and due to R^{D2}. The opening of v.^{21} כִּי קָרַע וג׳ 'For he rent,' etc., clearly refers immediately to the statement of v.^{18} וַיִּתְאַנַּף . . . וַיְסִרֵם 'was very angry . . . and removed them,' but the sequence is destroyed by the interpolation, כִּי v.^{21} being deprived of all point. The whole reference of the section is to the causes which brought about the rejection of the kingdom of Israel, no reference being elsewhere made to Judah except in v.^{13}, where וּבִיהוּדָה 'and unto Judah,' is probably by the same hand as vv.$^{19. 20}$.

[*] The verb גהר is not elsewhere found.

[*] Kuenen (Ond. § 25^{10}) agrees with Wellhausen's verdict upon vv.$^{13.\ 14.\ 22.\ 28}$, but inclines to regard vv.$^{35-43}$ as of much greater antiquity, and of a piece with the narrative of ch. 20.

[†] Possibly composite. Cf. Winckler, AT Untersuchungen, 15–25.

Stade (ZATW vi. 163 f.) regards 17$^{7-17}$ as an exilic addition, later than R^{D}, upon the grounds that the writer of these verses ascribes Molech-worship (v.^{17a}) and Assyrian star-worship (v.^{16b}) to the Northern kingdom—the abuses which later on were rife in the Southern kingdom under Manasseh (II 21$^{3. 6}$), and also because certain phrases appear to exhibit the influence of Jeremiah; cf. v.^{13} 'Turn ye from your evil ways,' with Jer 18^{11} 25^{5} 35^{15} 36$^{3. 7}$; 'J″ testified,' etc., with Jer 7$^{25ff.}$, 11$^{7ff.}$; v.^{15b} 'and they followed vanity,' etc., with Jer 2^{5}. The reflections embodied in these verses are, however, in strict accordance with R^{D}'s plan which runs throughout his work, as the number of phrases above cited as characteristic of his hand sufficiently shows, nor is it at all unnatural that the editor who worked not many years after Josiah had removed from the kingdom of Judah the foreign abuses of Manasseh's reign, should ascribe the same kind of religious abuses to the kingdom of Israel, side by side with the worship of J″ under the form of a calf. Nor, again, need the phrases above mentioned imply dependence upon the written prophecies of Jeremiah, any more than need other phrases used by R^{D} elsewhere (Nos. 50–55) in common with Jeremiah go to prove that R^{D} and Jeremiah were one and the same person. All that clearly emerges from the fact of such resemblances is that the two writers were members of one prophetic school of thought, i.e. the Deuteronomic (cf. Driver, LOT^{6} p. 203 at end).

The narrative of II 17$^{24-41}$ is certainly composite. Vv.$^{32. 41}$, in speaking of the races which were settled by the Assyrian king in the cities of Samaria, say that they 'feared J″,' while retaining the worship of their own national deities. In v.^{34}, on the contrary, it is stated with great emphasis that they 'feared not J″.' Again, while vv.$^{24ff.}$ refer exclusively to the foreign settlers, and only mention the introduction into their midst of a single priest of Israelitish nationality (v.^{28} אֶחָד מֵהַכֹּהֲנִים), to whom was due their instruction in the worship of J″; vv.$^{34b-40}$ are couched in such terms as can refer only to Israelites as such, of however mixed and renegade a strain. Notice especially vv.$^{35. 38}$ the reference to the Deuteronomic covenant; v.^{36} 'J″, who brought you up out of the land of Egypt.'

Thus this latter section must be regarded as a later addition to the narrative of Kings (R^{D2}; phrases, Nos. 3, 16, 28, 29, 49), referring probably to the Samaritans of post-exilic times. V.^{40b} rounds off the interpolation by the repetition of v.^{34a}, the statement of the older narrative to which the later writer attaches his addition. Vv.$^{24-34b. 41}$, on the other hand, form, in part at least, an ancient narrative embodied by R^{D}.

Stade (ZATW vi. 167 ff.) regards vv.$^{24-28. 41}$ as the original kernel which has received the later extension vv.$^{29-34a}$. Possibly this latter may be assigned to R^{D} himself; v.^{32b} resembles I 12^{31}, and in v.^{34a} עַד־הַיּוֹם הַזֶּה 'unto this day,' is an expression commonly employed by R^{D}.

II 18$^{1-8}$ is mainly the work of R^{D} (phrases, Nos. 3, 31, 63, 72), based upon the notices of vv.$^{4. 7b. 8}$. Vv.$^{7b. 8}$ are probably drawn in substance from the 'Annals.' With regard to v.^{4} this is not so clear. The verse shows marks of a late style (perf. with weak ו, as in 21$^{4. 6}$ 23$^{5ff.}$), and sketches the outline of a religious reformation which appears in all essentials to have resembled and anticipated the reformation of Josiah. Hence some critics regard the notice as a late and unhistorical interpolation (cf. Stade, Geschichte, i. 607 f., ZATW iii. 8 ff., vi. 170 ff.; Wellhausen, Comp. 291).

The occurrence of a reformation under Hezekiah is supported by 18^{22} (which must, with the rejection of 18^{4}, be likewise branded as a later misconception), and perhaps also by the statement of Jer 26^{17-19a}, which speaks of the influence exercised upon Hezekiah and all Judah by the preaching of Micah the Morashtite. Micah 1^{5b} MT mentions the Bāmôth of Jerusalem for reprobation; but this passage must not be pressed, because LXX, Pesh., Targ. presuppose a different reading.*

Certainly Isaiah does not appear to have had in view any centralization of J″s cultus, such as was prominent in Josiah's reformation, but his attacks upon the idol-worship (2$^{8. 18. 20}$ 31^{7}; cf. 10$^{10. 11}$), tree-worship (1^{29}), and necromancy (8^{19}), which seem to have been rife in the kingdom of Judah, are in agreement with such a movement in the direction of the pure worship of J″. Probably, therefore, as is allowed by Stade (Ges. loc. cit.), the statement of v.^{4b} is based upon authentic information as to such a reform, and this has been later on expanded in v.^{4a}, under the influence of the accomplished fact of Josiah's reformation.

II 18$^{9-12}$ is a notice from the 'Annals,' introduced by the synchronism of R^{D} v.^{9a}, and closed by his comment v.^{12}. The notice is identical with 17$^{5. 6}$.

II 18^{13}–20^{19} = Is 36^{1}–39^{8}.†

II 18$^{14-16}$, which is not found in Is, is distinguished from 18$^{13. 17ff.}$ by the form of the name חִזְקִיָּה Ḥizḳiyyah (instead of חִזְקִיָּהוּ Ḥizḳiyyahu), which occurs also in 18$^{1. 10}$ ('Annals'). 18$^{14-16}$ appears to be in strict agreement with the Assyrian record (Taylor Cylinder, col. iii.; cf. COT i. p. 286, ii. p. 1), and is probably a genuine excerpt from the 'Annals.'

It is generally agreed that the narrative of Is 36^{1}–39^{8} cannot be traced to Isaiah himself, but must be of a considerably later date. Notice the mention of Sennacherib's death (Is 37^{38} = 2 K 19^{37}), which did not happen until B.C. 681, twenty years after the campaign against Jerusalem, and certainly later than the death of Isaiah. Again, it seems to be clear that the Isaiah section (except 38$^{9-20}$ from another source) must have been extracted from our Book of Kings by the editor of Is 1–39.

Certain phrases which are due to R^{D} in the Kings narrative appear also in Is; cf. 'for David my servant's sake' II 19^{34} ‖ Is 37^{35}; 'How I have walked before thee in truth and with a perfect heart, and have done that which is good in thy sight' II 20^{3} ‖ Is 38^{3}; and the redactional phrases 'In those days' II 20^{1} ‖ Is 38^{1}, 'At that time' II 20^{12} ‖ Is 39^{1}. Kings is also superior to Is in the account of Hezekiah's sickness. Is 38$^{4-8}$ has been abbreviated; 38$^{21. 22}$ is misplaced.

The Kings narrative II 18$^{13. 17}$–20^{19} seems to represent a combination of three sources. Stade (ZATW vi. 174) notices that Isaiah's threat against Sennacherib occurs three times in similar terms: 19^{7} 19^{28b} 19^{33}. The contents of Sennacherib's letter (19$^{10-13}$) merely repeat in brief that which has already been said by the Rabshakeh (18$^{28-35}$). Again, it is highly improbable that Sennacherib, after hearing the news with regard to Tirhaḳah (19^{9a}), should have imagined that the mere dispatch of a letter would be likely to compel Hezekiah's submission, after the failure of previous verbal negotiations. The true sequel to 19^{9a} seems to be 19$^{36f.}$; upon receiving information of Tirhaḳah's hostile movement, Sennacherib raises the siege of Jerusalem and returns to Assyria. We have, then, two separate accounts of the Assyrian campaign, 18$^{13. 17}$–19$^{9a. 36f.}$; 19^{9b-35} 19^{9b} having probably been slightly modified by the redactor. Further, the section 19^{9b-35} itself appears to be composite in character. The taunt song vv.$^{21-28}$, with its accompanying sign vv.$^{29-31}$, stands apart from the prosaic statement vv.$^{32-34}$. לָכֵן, 'therefore,' of v.^{32} answers, not to anything in the prophecy preceding, but to v.$^{20b\beta}$ אֲשֶׁר הִתְפַּלַּלְתָּ שָׁמַעְתִּי 'Whereas thou hast prayed . . . I have heard,' and, as has been noticed above, vv.$^{28b. 33}$ are duplicates of the same statement. Thus vv.$^{21-31}$, generally regarded by critics as an authentic prophecy of Isaiah, appear to have been inserted into the midst of the prophetical history 19$^{9b-20. 32-34}$, v.^{21a} representing the redactor's link.

* חַטָּאת 'sin,' parallel to פֶּשַׁע transgression, as in v.^{4a}. The reading of MT is, however, accepted by Kittel, who regards the rendering of the Versions as merely a simplification (History, ii. 357).

† In addition to the authorities cited at the end of this article, cf. the Literature given under Isaiah, especially Dillmann, Jesaia, 1890, p. 310 ff.; Cheyne, Introduction to the Book of Isaiah, 1895, p. 212 ff. (where, however, the writer proceeds upon the assumption that Kings was not compiled until after B.C. 588).

The narrative of 20$^{1-19}$ probably belongs to the author of one of the two preceding narrative sections. Cheyne, following Duhm, selects the second narrative 19$^{9bff.}$ Notice, as a point of connexion, the occurrence of a prayer of Hezekiah in each section: 19$^{15ff.}$ 20$^{2f.}$. Very possibly the chronological notice at the beginning of 18^{13}, 'In the 14th year of king Hezekiah,' properly refers to the events of 20$^{1-19}$, and occupies its present position upon the false assumption that Sennacherib's invasion took place in the same year as Hezekiah's sickness and recovery. This arrangement is probably due to R^{D}, who removed the note of time from its true position at the head of the narrative of 20$^{1ff.}$, replacing it by his synchronistic phrase 'In those days.' Notice the reference to Assyria in 20^{6}. The whole verse from וּמִכַּף 'and from the hand, etc.,' must be due to the author of the mistaken synchronism. Cf. the latter half with 19^{34}.

The 6th year of Hezekiah for the fall of Samaria, B.C. 722 (18^{10}), cannot be reconciled with the 14th year for Sennacherib's campaign, B.C. 701 (18^{13}), and it seems the best course to regard this latter date as true for the sickness of Hezekiah and the embassy of Merodach-Baladan, which will then fall cir. B.C. 714. Thus Hezekiah's reign may be supposed to have closed B.C. 699, i.e. some 15 years after B.C. 714 (20^{6a}).

The short prophecy of 20$^{17. 18}$ has probably been worked over by R^{D2} in post-exilic times, when Babylon, and not Assyria, was the oppressor.

II 21 is throughout the work of R^{D} (phrases, Nos. 11, 13, 27, 42–44, 49, 54, 55, 66; and cf. Driver, LOT^{6} p. 203) based upon very brief notices (vv.$^{3. 4a. 5. 6a. 7a. 16a}$), derived, presumably, from the 'Annals.' Vv.$^{10-15}$ appear to presuppose the captivity of Judah, and must therefore, in their present form, be assigned to R^{D2}.

II 22^{3}–23^{25} is a continuous narrative, probably drawn from the temple archives. Deuteronomic phrases are found in 23$^{3. 19. 25}$ (phrases, Nos. 3, 6, 20, 39, 63), and in the speech of Huldah 22$^{15-20}$ (phrases, Nos. 29, 39, 54; and cf. Driver, LOT^{6} p. 203), which seems to show signs of revision by R^{D2} in exilic times. Certainly this later editor is responsible for the addition at the close of the narrative 23$^{26. 27}$ (phrases, Nos. 11, 39, 51), which strikes a note strangely alien to the enthusiasm of the pre-exilic author in view of Josiah's reformation (cf. especially vv.$^{22. 25}$).

Upon II 23^{29}–25^{30} see above (Later editors). 25$^{22-26}$ is a much abbreviated account of the events described in Jer 40^{7}–43^{6}, to which source R^{D2} clearly owes his information. Jer 52, on the other hand, seems to be a later addition to the prophet's book (notice the closing words of ch. 51, 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah'), excerpted from 2 K 24^{18}–25^{30}, naturally with omission of 25$^{22-26}$, as having been already related in fuller detail.

KING'S POOL.—See POOL.

KING'S VALE, THE (עֵמֶק הַמֶּלֶךְ, AV the king's dale).—The place where the king of Sodom met Abram, Gn 14^{17} (τὸ πέδιον βασιλέως). Here also the childless Absalom erected in his lifetime a monument to himself, 2 S 18^{18} (ἡ κοιλὰς τοῦ βασιλέως). See HINNOM (VALLEY OF), p. 388^{a}; SHAVEH (VALE OF), and JERUSALEM, p. 584^{a}.

KINSFOLK.—Although 'kinsfolk' is itself plural (see FOLK), and is so treated in Job 19^{14} 'My kinsfolk have failed,' and Lk 2^{44} 'They sought him among their kinsfolk' (ἐν τοῖς συγγενέσι [WH -εῦσιν]), it is also found with an s added, giving the irreg. plur. 'kinsfolks,' in 1 K 16^{11} 'Neither of his kinsfolks, nor of his friends'; 2 K 10^{11}, 2 Mac 8^{1} 15^{18}, Lk 21^{16}. The NT Revisers have dropped the s in Lk 21^{16}, and the Apocr. Revisers in 2 Mac, but in 1 K 16^{11} the OT Revisers have kept it. In 2 K 10^{11} RV prefers 'familiar friends,' the Heb. expressing no reference to kinship (מְיֻדָּעָיו, cf. LXX γνωστούς, the same word as is tr^{d} 'acquaintance' in Lk 2^{44}). For the form 'kinsfolks' cf. Strype, Life of Archbp. Whitgift, 1597, '[Geta] asked him, if those whom he had put to death had no parents, kinsfolks, nor friends'; and Bacon, Essays, 'Of Parents and Children' (Gold. Treas. ed. p. 24), 'The Italians make little difference betweene Children and Nephewes or neere Kinsfolkes.' J. HASTINGS.

KINSMAN.—This is the proper singular form of 'kinsfolk,' with the fem. form 'kinswoman.' 'Kinsman' is the tr^{n} in OT mostly of גֹּאֵל gô'ēl (see GOEL), and in NT of συγγενής. In Apocr. συγγενής is so tr^{d} twice, Sir 41^{21}, 2 Mac 12^{39}, and ἀδελφός twice, To 3^{15} 7^{4} (RV 'brother'). In Ru 2^{20} AV gives 'next kinsman' as the tr^{n} of gô'ēl; RV changes this into 'near kinsman,' and gives 'near kinsman' instead of the simple 'kinsman' for all the other occurrences of gô'ēl in Ruth. In Ru 2^{1} the Heb. Kethibh מְיֻדָּע means strictly no more than 'acquaintance,' but whether we adopt this reading or that of the Ḳerê מוֹדַע, 'kinsman' is plainly the meaning. Hence RV rightly retains the AV translation.

Kinswoman occurs Lv 18$^{12. 13. 17}$, Pr 7^{4}; and RV adds Lk 1^{36} 'Elisabeth thy kinswoman,' for AV 'thy cousin Elisabeth,' the word 'cousin' (wh. see) having become contracted in application since 1611. The Greek of TR is συγγενής, but the weight of authority is in favour of the late fem. form συγγενίς, which edd. (except Tr.) adopt.

Dictionary of the Bible

VOLUME III

PREFACE

THIS DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE, as stated in the Preface to Volumes I. and II. already published, is intended as a contribution towards furnishing the Church for the great work of teaching. It is a Dictionary of the Old and New Testaments, together with the Old Testament Apocrypha, according to the Authorized and Revised Versions, with constant reference to the original tongues. Every effort has been used to make the information it contains as full, reliable, and accessible as possible.

1. As to fulness. In a Dictionary of the Bible we expect an explanation of all the words occurring in the Bible which do not explain themselves. The present Dictionary meets that expectation more nearly than any work hitherto published. Articles will be found on all the Persons and Places that are mentioned in the Bible, on its Archæology and Antiquities, its Ethnology, Geology, and Natural History, its Theology and Ethics, and on such words occurring in the Authorized or Revised Version as are now unintelligible or liable to misapprehension. Much attention has been given to the language, literature, religion, and customs of the nations around Israel. The Versions have been fully treated. Articles have been contributed on the Apocalyptic and other uncanonical writings of the Jews, as well as on such theological or ethical ideas as are believed to be contained in the Bible, though their modern names are not found there.

2. As to reliability. The writers have been chosen out of respect to their scholarship and nothing else. The articles have all been written immediately and solely for this Dictionary, and, except the shortest, they are all signed. Even the shortest, however, have been contributed by writers of recognized ability and authority. In addition to the work upon it of authors and editors, every sheet has passed through the hands of the three eminent scholars whose names are found on the title-page.

3. As to accessibility. The subjects are arranged in alphabetical order, and under the most familiar titles. All the modern devices of cross-reference and black-lettering have been freely resorted to, so that in the very few instances in which allied subjects have been grouped under one heading (such as MEDICINE in this volume) the particular subject wanted will be found at once. Proper Names are arranged according to the spelling of the Revised Version, but wherever it seemed advisable the spelling of the Authorized Version is also given, with a cross-reference. The Abbreviations, considering the size and scope of the work, will be seen to be few and easily mastered. A list of them, together with a simple scheme for the uniform transliteration of Hebrew and Arabic words, will be found on the following pages.

It is with devout thankfulness that the Editor sees this third volume of an arduous though congenial work issued within reasonable limits of time. The fourth volume is in progress, and may be looked for next year. He has pleasure in again expressing his thanks to many friends and fellow-workers, including the authors of the various articles. But especially he desires to thank the members of the editorial staff, the publishers, the printers, and (without mentioning others whose names have already appeared in the Preface to Vols. I. and II.) Mr. G. F. HILL of the Department of Coins and Medals in the British Museum for assistance and advice in the preparation of the illustrations to the article on the MONEY of the Bible.

⁂ Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, have the sole right of publication of this DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE in the United States and Canada.

DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE

KIR (קִיר).—The name of a country and nation. It occurs in the following passages:—(1) Am 9[7] Ḳir is the land from which God brought the Aramæans (Syrians), as He led the Israelites from Egypt, etc. It must, after this analogy, be a country remote from the principal seat (i.e. Damascus) of the Aramæans in Amos' time. The LXX reads 'depth,' 'pit' (βόθρος, i.e. קער). (2) 2 K 16[9] After the capture of Damascus, the Aramæans were carried captive to Ḳir by the king (Tiglath-pileser III.) of Assyria. This would indicate that Ḳir was under Assyrian dominion, and, again, at a considerable distance from the region of Damascus near the borders of the Assyrian empire. But the name of the country was wanting in the LXX originally (B), and inserted later (A, etc. Κυρηνήνδε) from the Hebrew text (after Symmachus). Therefore this passage is suspicious; see Field, Hexap. pp. xxii, 682. (3) Am 1[5] threatens indeed: the people of Aram shall go into captivity unto Ḳir (LXX 'the one called as ally,' ἐπίκλητος, קרא?). But this passage also seems to be interpolated from Am 9[7]. If Ḳir was the original home of the Aramæans (Am 9[7]), the Assyrians would never have deported them back to their old country, where they would have found remainders of the original stock of their nation, and would have, by union with them, become strong again and dangerous to the king of Nineveh. The Assyrians, as well as other nations, deported their captives always to countries where they were strangers, separated by language and race from the inhabitants of the new country, and therefore forced to rely upon the government which had settled them there. Consequently, the name Ḳir in this passage is strange, and to be used only with caution. (4) Is 22[6] an attack on Jerusalem is described, evidently that of the Assyrian army under Sennacherib (cf. 2 K 18): 'And Elam bare the quiver with chariots of men* and horsemen, and Ḳir (LXX συναγωγή, cf. קרה?) uncovered (עֵרָה) the shield' (i.e. prepared it for fighting). Consequently, Ḳir was among the allies or subjects of the Assyrians, and was a warlike nation. (5) Also Is 22[5] seems to belong here: מְקַרְקַר קִר וְשׁוֹעַ אֶל־הָהָר, RV 'a breaking down (others, surrounding) of the walls (sing.!) and a crying to the mountains,' LXX ἀπὸ μικροῦ ἕως μεγάλου πλανῶνται ἐπὶ τὰ ὄρη, Vulg. 'scrutans murum et magnificus super montem.' The passage was rendered by Cheyne (following Delitzsch, Paradies, 236), 'Ḳir undermineth, and Shoa is at the mount.' Klostermann, Bredenkamp, Cornill, Winckler (Alttest. Untersuch. 177, who conjectures, 'who stirs up Ḳoa' and Shoa' against the mountain') have, however, given up the paronomasia and corrected Ḳir to Ḳoa' (קוֹעַ), a nation mentioned together with Shoa' in Ezk 23[23]; the Ḳutû or Ḳû of the Assyrian inscriptions, a warlike nomadic tribe S.E. of Assyria, chiefly on the banks of the modern rivers Dijâlâ (the Gyndes of the classics) and Adhem adjoining the Sutû, i.e. the biblical Shoa'. This agrees with Is 22[6], where Kir is a neighbour of Elam. It results that we have to try the same emendation also in this passage (Is 22[6]), and indeed the LXX reads there consonants which come nearer to קוע than to קיר, likewise in Am 9 (where קער=original קוע). See, further, art. KOA, footnote.

It is very probable, then, that in all passages the same pastoral people Ḳoa' קוע, were originally meant. The corruption of one may have caused that of the other places. (For the Assyrian and Babylonian texts see Delitzsch, Paradies, 233; Schrader, *KAT*² 425). The country Gutium, Gutî, which is mentioned as early as B.C. 3000 in inscriptions, seems to be the same as Ḳutî, Ḳutû, Ḳû, which is only the later spelling.* The inhabitants seem to have been always Semites, so that their relationship to the Aramæans, who appear in cuneiform inscriptions first in Southern Babylonia, is very plausible. Otherwise, the cuneiform inscriptions have been searched in vain for a nation Ḳir. The ancient versions (Aq., Vulg., partly LXX, Targum) were guessing when they introduced the Libyan Cyrene, which is absurd.† By those to whom the emendation of Ḳir to Ḳoa' seems too bold, the conjecture may be hazarded that some day the name Ḳir will be discovered in the same region E. of the Lower and Middle Tigris, where various nomadic tribes roamed with the rapacious Shoa' and Ḳoa'. But the emendation seems more plausible.

W. MAX MÜLLER.

KIR (OF MOAB) (קִיר־מוֹאָב, τὸ τεῖχος τῆς Μωαβ(ε)ίτιδος, murus Moab).—One of the chief towns of the land of Moab, coupled with Ar of Moab, Is 15[1]. Since in the Moabite tongue ḳîr=Heb. 'îr or 'ār, it is conceivable that Kir of Moab and Ar of Moab are identical. The almost universally accepted identification of Kir of Moab with the modern Kerak rests upon the Targum on Isaiah, where Kir is rendered by Kerakka (so also apparently Ar of Moab). This may have been a native name which has survived, or it may be a rendering of that name which has supplanted it. The modern name of Kerak can be traced back as belonging to the place in early times. Under the form Χαρακμῶβα it appears in the acts of the Council of Jerusalem A.D. 536, and in the geographers Ptolemy and Stephanus of Byzantium. The Crusaders discerned the strategic importance of the place as commanding the trade route from Egypt and Arabia into Syria. Under king Fulco of Jerusalem, A.D. 1131, a castle was built there, of which extensive remains may yet be seen. Saladin in A.D. 1183 unsuccessfully besieged it; it fell into his hands in A.D. 1188. The contributions which the Chroniclers of the Crusades make to the localizing of the site are full and interesting; it was then the chief city of Arabia Secunda, or Petracensis; it is specified as in the Belkâ, and distinguished from Moab or Rabbat, and from Mons Regalis or Montreal. The Crusaders further identified it with Petra, or gave that name to it; an error which the Greek Church has perpetuated, for the Greek bishop of Petra has his seat at Kerak. It is frequently referred to in writers of the Christian period as Charak-Moba (also Mobu-Charax), corrupted to Charakōma, Characmucha, Karach, and Kara. On the question of the identity of Kir of Moab with Kir-hareseth or Kir-heres see art. on these names.

---

* 'Of men' may be a gloss, see Duhm.

* Perhaps occurring also in Egyptian texts as Gut, see W. M. Müller, Asien, p. 281.

† More modern guesses: the Κῦρος or Κύρρος, river of Armenia, the modern Kur (Michaelis). But this name has k not ḳ, and is too far north. Bochart proposes Κουρήνη (Ptol.) in Eastern Media, but this place is obscure and too far east. Furrer suggests the region near Antioch called Κύρρος, Κυρρεστική, but this name was given only in later times in imitation of a Macedonian city (see Mannert).

The Wady el-Kerak runs S.E. from the head of the bay of the Dead Sea, which lies east of the peninsula el-Lisân, uniting with the Wady 'Ain Franji about 10 miles up. Kerak is situated on a lofty spur between these two ravines, and is about four thousand feet above the level of the Dead Sea. The sides of the hill descend steeply some thousand feet to the bottom of the valleys, but the height on the other side is much greater, so that the town is commanded by hills on every side. (This may explain 2 K 3[25 end]). Such a position was for ancient warfare almost impregnable. The great weakness must have been want of water, and there are remains of enormous rock-hewn cisterns. The city was surrounded by a wall of great thickness, which had but two entrances—one on the N.W., the other on the S., each being approached by a long tunnel cut through the solid rock. There are remains of five great towers; but further investigation seems needed to decide what is ancient Moabite work, and what is due to mediæval engineers.

A map of the town is given in de Saulcy, La Mer Morte, 8, 20.

KIRAMA (A Κιραμά, B Κειράμα, AV Cirama), 1 Es 5[20].—The people of Kirama and Gabbe returned from Babylon under Zerub., 621 strong. In Ezr 2[26] Ramah and Geba (הָרָמָה, A Ῥαμά, B Ἀράμ); cf. Neh 7[30] (Ἀραμά). The form in 1 Es is due to the definite article הָ being read as הַ.

KIR-HARESETH (קִיר־חֲרֶשֶׂת, τοῖς κατοικοῦσι Δέσεθ μελετήσεις, Vulg. murus cocti lateris, Is 16[7]; in 2 K 3[25] pausal form קִיר־חֲרָשֶׂת, AV Kir-haraseth, LXX τοὺς λίθους τοῦ τοίχου καθῃρημένους, Vulg. murus fictilis) or KIR-HERES (קִיר־חֶרֶשׂ, κειράδες αὐχμοῦ, murus fictilis, Jer 48[31. 36]; in Is 16[11] pausal form קִיר־חָרֶשׂ, AV Kir-haresh, LXX τεῖχος ἐνεκαίνισας, Vulg. ad murum cocti lateris).—These two names are to be taken as slight variants of one and the same proper name denoting a place in the country of Moab, evidently regarded as a place of the first rank, of great strength and importance. The natural conclusion that Kir of Moab is meant is a conjecture, but has received general assent.

The LXX and Vulgate regard these names, however, as phrases, the meaning of which is sought by an attempted Hebrew etymology. That they were so regarded when the vowel points were added to the text need not be assumed, though some traditional etymology may have influenced the pointing. Certainly, the etymologies suggested connecting them with ḳîr, 'a wall,' and some Hebrew word denoting 'clay,' or its manufactured products such as 'bricks' or 'pottery,' do not lead to any convincing result. That ḳîr also denoted a 'fortress or walled city' in Hebrew seems assumed to meet the case; a 'city of potsherds' or a 'brick fortress,' even with the explanation 'because the chief seat of Moabite pottery,' is too obviously lame. Such a meaning would go against the identification with modern Kerak. The top of a steep hill is unlikely to be a 'seat of pottery,' and the accounts of the remains there point to the ancient walls being of stone, not brick.

There does not seem any call to seek a Hebrew etymology. If it was a Moabite name, and the variations in spelling and vocalization suggest its being foreign to the Hebrew scribes,* then we must turn to the native tongue for an etymology. There we find that ḳîr is the Moabite for 'town,' walled or fortified. The second element of these names is not, however, preserved in the scanty remains of the Moabite tongue (cf., however, the place name MḪRT in line 14 of Mesha's Inscription). Palmer (The Desert of the Exodus, p. 472 f.) says that ḫâriṭ means 'mound' in the language of the modern inhabitants. The obvious difficulty is that an interchange of ṭ and s is unusual; we should expect rather ḫareš than ḫares as representing modern ḫariṭ. The modern language of Moab would need detailed examination before a decisive rule could be laid down.† Of a somewhat similar Assyrian word for 'mount' (often a wooded hill), both forms, ḫuršu and ḫursu, exist side by side.

If the commonly received identification of the place with Kir of Moab and that with modern Kerak be correct, we might regard 'mountain fortress' as a suitable name; but that does not establish the etymology in the absence of direct evidence from native sources. All that is said of Kir-heres, etc., seems to suit Kerak well enough, and the Targum on Isaiah renders Kir-hareseth by Kerak toḳpehon, which perhaps points to a 'cliff' fortress of some kind. See, further, art. KIR OF MOAB.

KIRIATH (קִרְיַת).—A town noticed with Gibeah as belonging to Benjamin, Jos 18[28]. Both the text and the site are uncertain, but the latter may possibly be found at Ḳuriet el-'Enab, 'town of grapes,' west of Jerusalem, which is often called simply Ḳurieh by the inhabitants. See SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii. This village, on the road from Jaffa to Jerusalem, is also now called Abu Ghôsh, from a celebrated chief so named. It is remarkable for its fine Norman church, built in the 12th cent. A.D..

It is held, however, by most OT scholars that in Jos 18[28] Ḳiriath is a mistake for Ḳiriath-jearim,

---

* 'Ḫarosheth of the Gentiles' (Jg 4[2. 13. 16]) is a similar name, and both it and Ḫareseth may go back to Canaanite sources.

† There is a Ḳasr ḫaraša still, 35 minutes' walk above Derâ'a (ZDPV, 1895, p. 69 ff.).

יְעָרִים having been dropped through confusion with the following עָרִים. Not only does קִרְיַת bear the appearance of a construct, but the same conclusion is supported by the LXX, B καὶ πόλεις καὶ Γαβαωθιαρεὶμ (where Gibeath and Kiriath-jearim are mixed up), A πόλις Ἰαρὶμ, Luc. πόλις Ἰαρεὶμ (cf. Dillm. ad. loc., and Bennett in SBOT).

KIRIATHAIM (קִרְיָתַיִם).—1. A town in a ‘plain’ (שָׁוֵה) inhabited by the Emim at the time of Chedorlaomer's campaign (Gn 14^{5}), mentioned with Heshbon and Elealeh as built by Reuben (Nu 32^{37}), also mentioned with Kedemoth and Mephaath, farther south, and with Beth-peor, Baal-meon, and Beth-jeshimoth (Jos $13^{18.\ 19.\ 20}$). It appears as a Moabite town in Jer 48^{23}, Ezk 25^{9}, and on the stone of Mesha (line 10) is called Kiryathēn. It may be distinct from Kerioth (which see). According to the Onomasticon (s. Καριαθαεὶμ, Καριάθα), it lay 10 Roman miles west of Medeba. The site is uncertain, although many identify Kiriathaim with the ruin called Ḳarêyât, lying S.W. of Makaur (Machærus) and S. of Jebel 'Attârûs. It is probably to be sought towards the south of the Moab plateau, but may have been near Heshbon. Burckhardt's identification with et-Teim, 1½ miles W. of Medeba, is now generally abandoned.

LITERATURE.—Porter, Handbook, 300; Tristram, Land of Moab, 275, 305; G. A. Smith, HGHL 567 f.; Buhl, GAP 276 f.; Dillmann on Gn 14^{5} and Nu 32^{37}.

2. A city in Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites, 1 Ch 6^{76} [Heb.^{61}). In the parallel passage, Jos 21^{32}, it is called Kartan (which see).

KIRIATH-ARBA (קִרְיַת אַרְבַּע, in Neh 11^{25} קִ׳ הָאַרְבַּע).—A name which occurs repeatedly in the OT, always except in Neh 11^{25} with the explanation that it is another name for Hebron, Gn 23^{2} 35^{27} (both P), Jos 14^{15} 15^{13} (both JE) 15^{54} 20^{7} 21^{11} (all P), Jg 1^{10}. For the situation and history see art. HEBRON. Kiriath-arba is probably=Tetrapolis,* ‘four-towns’ (cf. בְּאֵר שֶׁבַע ‘seven wells’), the name possibly implying that the city had four quarters occupied by four confederate clans. If the name Hebron means ‘confederacy,’ it may have had a similar origin. In the MT of Jos 15^{13} 21^{11} 14^{15} Ḳiriath-arba is taken as=‘city of Arba,’ the latter supposed founder of it being called ‘the father of the 'Anaḳ,’ or ‘the greatest man among the 'Anakim.’ As Moore points out, however, the LXX has preserved the original reading in the first two of these passages, πόλις Ἀρβὸκ μητρόπολις (i.e. אֵם not אֲבִי) Ἐνάκ, and in 14^{15} הָאָדָם הַגָּדוֹל is another miscorrection. It may be noted further that these last two words gave rise to a curious piece of Rabbinical exegesis, ‘hā'ādām haggādôl’ being supposed to imply that Adam was buried at Kiriath-arba (Hebron), ‘the city of four saints,’ namely, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and Adam.

KIRIATH-ARIM, Ezr 2^{25}.—See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

KIRIATH-BAAL (קִרְיַת בַּעַל ‘city of Baal’).—See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

KIRIATH-HUZOTH (קִרְיַת חֻצוֹת ‘city of streets’ (?), LXX πόλεις ἐπαύλεων, which perhaps implies a reading חצרות instead of חצות).—One of the places to which Balak first went with Balaam, Nu 22^{39}. It seems to have been near Ir of Moab (v.^{36}), and may have been a suburb of that city. Tristram (Land of Moab, 305) is inclined to identify it with Kiriathaim, others (e.g. Knobel, Keil) think it is the same as Kerioth.

C. R. CONDER.

KIRIATH-JEARIM (קִרְיַת יְעָרִים ‘city of thickets’).—One of the chief towns of the Gibeonites, Jos 9^{17}, on the border of Judah and Benjamin (assigned to the former tribe in Jos $15^{9.\ 60}$ 18^{14}, Jg 18^{12}, to the latter in Jos 18^{28} if Kiriath [which see]=Kiriath-jearim). The position is more particularly described in Jg 18^{12}, where the Maḥaneh-dan (‘camp of Dan’), which was near Zorah and Eshtaol (Jg 13^{25}), is said to have been ‘behind’ (i.e. west of) Kiriath-jearim. Kiriath-jearim appears also to have been near Beth-shemesh (1 S 6^{21}), which was near Zorah. It may have been the city beyond the border of Benjamin where Saul first met Samuel (1 S $9^{5.\ 6}$, cf. 10^{2}). When the ark was sent back by the Philistines, it remained at Kiriath-jearim till the time of David (1 S $7^{1\text{f.}}$, 2 S 6^{2}, where the city is called Baale Judah [but בַּעֲלֵי is an error for בַּעַל]). In Jos 15^{60} it bears the name Kiriath-baal, ‘city of Baal,’ and it is the same place that is called in Jos $15^{9.\ 10}$ and 1 Ch 13^{6} Baalah. Its inhabitants seem to have been related to the Hebronites, 1 Ch 2^{50}. After the Captivity it is mentioned as re-peopled (Neh 7^{29}; Ezr 2^{25}, where Kiriath-arim [קִרְיַת עָרִים] is a clerical error for Kiriath-jearim [קִ׳ יְעָרִים]; 1 Es 5^{19}, where it appears as Kariathiarius). It is probably Kiriath-jearim that is referred to in Ps 132^{6}, where ‘the field of the wood’ is mentioned as the place where the ark was found. The prophet Uriah ben-Shemaiah, who was put to death by Jehoiakim, was a native of Kiriath-jearim (Jer $26^{20\text{ff.}}$). In the 4th cent. A.D. (Onomasticon, s. ‘Cariathiarim’), it was shown 9 Roman miles from Jerusalem, on the way to Diospolis (Lydda), but this would not be near Beth-shemesh or Zorah. In the upper part of the valley of Sorek an ancient ruined site called 'Erma exists, on the south side of a very rugged ravine. It is evidently a town, with a remarkable rock terrace, and wells in the valley to the east. This site (suggested by Henderson) is suitable, being within sight of the mouth of the ravine, beyond which lies Beth-shemesh in the more open part of the valley, east of Zorah and Eshtaol, which appears to answer to the ‘camp of Dan’ (Maḥaneh-dan). The ruin is on the ridge on which Chesalon (which see) stands, and therefore in the required position on the border which appears to have run north from Kiriath-jearim to Chesalon (Jos $15^{9.\ 10}$), or to have left Chesalon in Benjamin, north of the border which followed the valley of Sorek. The whole ridge is covered with copse to the present time. Possibly, Kiriath-jearim is noticed in the Tel el-Amarna letters (No. 106 Berlin) as Bîtû Bêlû or Beth Baal, a city revolting against Jerusalem (others suppose Jerus. itself to be so called in this passage); and it is remarkable that it was one of the few cities that submitted, without fighting, to the Hebrews.

Robinson's identification of Kiriath-jearim with Ḳuriet el-'Enab or Abu Ghôsh does not meet the requirements of Jg 18^{12} and 1 S 6.

LITERATURE.—The whole question of the site is fully discussed in SWP vol. iii. sheet xvii.; see also Henderson, Palestine (Index); G. A. Smith, HGHL 225 f.; Moore, Judges, 393 f.; Dillmann on Jos 9^{17}; Buhl, GAP (Index); Robinson, BRP^{2} ii. 11 f. (Smith, Moore, Dillmann, Buhl, all speak with more or less suspicion of the correctness of Robinson's identification with Ḳuriet el-'Enab, but decline to commit themselves to the 'Erma site, which Buhl pronounces to be still more improbable, and Smith remarks that it would place Kiriath-jearim very far away from the other members of the Gibeonite league. Neither of these writers, however, gives due weight to the position near Chesalon).

KIRIATH-SANNAH (קִרְיַת סַנָּה, πόλις γραμμάτων) occurs once (Jos 15^{49} P) as another and presumably an older name for Debir (wh. see). A third name was Kiriath-sepher (which see for site); and this, not Kiriath-sannah, was the reading of the LXX here.

To those who retain the Massor. reading the meaning is obscure. Gesenius (Thes.) takes Sannah for a contraction of Sansannah, and translates 'palm-city'; but, besides that the contraction is unlikely, one hardly expects a palm city in 'the hill-country.' Sayce (HCM 54), following a suggestion mentioned by Ewald (Gesch. i. 347 n.), translates 'city of instruction,' and uses the name to support his very precarious theory that Debir was a library and archive town of the Canaanites. He further suggests that the name may be present as Bit 'Sani in a fragmentary letter from Ebed-tob the vassal king of Jerusalem, in the Tel el-Amarna collection.

---

* So e.g. Moore and Hommel, the latter of whom identifies Kiriath-arba with the Rubûti of the Tel el-Amarna letters (AHT 234 f.), but see König's art. on the Ḥabiri in Expos. Times, March 1900. Sayce and Petrie make Rubûti=Rabbah of Jos 15^{60}.

A. C. Welch.

KIRIATH-SEPHER (קִרְיַת סֵפֶר, πόλις γραμμάτων; Καριασσώφαρ π″ γ″, B in Jg 1^{11}) is twice mentioned in the parallel passages (Jos 15$^{15f.}$, Jg 1$^{11f.}$, J) as the older name of a town which the victors called Debir. It is frequently identified with the present ed-Dhâherîyeh, a village which lies '4 or 5 hours S.W. of Hebron,' on a high road down Wady Khulil, and which is on the frontier of the hill-country towards the Negeb (see, however, Debir).

Many commentators from the earliest times, accepting the word as Heb., have translated with various shades of sense 'book town' (cf. LXX above, Vulg. civitas litterarum, Targ. אַרְכֵי ק״). Sayce (HCM 54) has based on this a theory about the condition of literary culture among the early Canaanites. The three town names yield him proof of the presence of an oracle, which gave rise to a library, and so attracted students to a university. It is utterly unwarranted to build so much on the uncertain etymology of a non-Heb. word. Smith (Hist. Geogr. 279 n.) suggests that the sense may be 'toll-town,' and he compares for the translation 2 Ch 2^{17}, and for the toll the town's position on a road into Syria. But the sense given to ספר is somewhat artificial. It is much more likely that traces of the same foreign root are to be found in Sephar of S. Arabia (Gn 10^{30}) and Sepharvaim (2 K 17^{24}). See the whole subject very fully and fairly discussed by Moore, Judges, 26 f.

KISEUS (Κεισαῖος).—The form in Ad. Est 11^{2} of Kish (Est 2^{5}), the name of the great-grandfather of Mordecai. See Kish, No. 4.

KISH (קִישׁ).—1. The father of Saul the first king of Israel (1 S 9^{1} 10^{21} 14^{51}, Ac 13^{21}). He was the son of Abiel of the tribe of Benjamin. In 1 Ch 8^{33} 9^{39} Ner and not Abiel is said to have been the father of Kish,[*] but there seems to have been some confusion in the text, due perhaps to the very elliptical character of the record or to the frequent recurrence of the same family names. The home of Kish and of his family was at Gibeah (rendered 'the hill of God' and 'the hill' both in AV and RV of 1 S 10^{5} and 10^{10}). He does not seem to have been in any way prominent, but to have been living the simple life of a small farmer, when his son was called to be king. 2. The uncle of the foregoing, the son of Jeiel or Jehiel (1 Ch 8^{30} 9^{36}). 3. The eponym of a family of Merarite Levites (1 Ch 23$^{21.22}$ 24$^{28f.}$, 2 Ch 29^{12}). 4. A Benjamite ancestor of Mordecai, queen Esther's cousin (Es 2^{5}). See Esther.

W. Muir.

KISHI (קִישִׁי).—A Merarite Levite, ancestor of Ethan, 1 Ch 6^{44} [Heb.^{29}]. In the parallel passage 1 Ch 15^{17} the MT has קוּשָׁיָהוּ, Kushaiah. In all probability the latter is the correct form of the name. It is supported by Luc. Κουσει in the first of the above passages. Kittel (in SBOT) prefers קִישָׁיָהוּ, or rather קִישַׁיָהוּ, pointing out that the LXX (B) in 1 Ch 6^{44} has Κεισαι = קִישִׁי, and in 15^{17} Κεισαῖος = קִישַׁיָהוּ (?).

J. A. Selbie.

KISHION (קִשְׁיוֹן).—A town allotted to Issachar (Jos 19^{20}), given to the Levites (21^{28}, where AV has Kishon). The parallel passage, 1 Ch 6^{72} (Heb.^{57}], reads Kedesh, which is taken (perhaps wrongly) by Dillmann and others to be a textual error for Kishion. The latter name has not been recovered, while there is a large ruined mound called Tell Ḳedes near Taanach in Issachar. See SWP vol. ii. sheet viii.

C. R. Conder.

KISHON (נַחַל קִישׁוֹן; B ὁ χειμάῤῥους Κεισών, other forms Κισών, Κισσών).—This is the ancient name of the stream which drains almost the whole of the great plain of Esdraelon and the surrounding uplands. All the waters from Tabor and the Nazareth hills, which reach the plain eastward of a line drawn from Iḳsâl to Nain, together with those from the N. slopes of Little Hermon, are carried into Wady esh-Sherrâr, and thence to the Jordan. The district between Little Hermon and Gilboa, reaching as far west as el-Fûleh, also inclines eastward, the waters flowing down Nahr Jalûd past Beisân into the Ghôr. The torrents from Little Hermon between Shunem and Nain, and all from the Galilæan hills west of Iḳsâl, make their way through the soft soil of the plain, to join the deep hidden flow of Kishon. The main supplies, however, come from the southern side. The longest branches of the river stretch up the lofty steeps of Gilboa away to the east of Jenîn. They are dry torrent-beds, save only in the rainy season, when they carry down foaming floods to swell the central stream. The most distant perennial source is 'Ain Jenîn, which rises in the glen behind the town. It is carried by a conduit to a well-built fountain in the centre of the place, and thence is distributed for irrigation among the gardens and orchards. By these much of the water is absorbed; and in summer the bed of the river a mile away is as dry as the surrounding plain. Copious springs in the neighbourhood of Ta'anûk and Khân Lejjûn, and many smaller sources along the southern border of the plain, send contributions to the volume of Kishon. About 3 miles east of Ḥaifa it is joined by the streams from the great fountains of Sa'adîyeh, which rise under the northern base of Mount Carmel, on the edge of the plain of Acre.

The Kishon ('crooked or tortuous' [?]) pursues a tortuous course, in a north-westerly direction, keeping well into the centre of the plain. It sweeps round by Tell el-Ḳassîs, breaks through a narrow pass on the north of Carmel into the plain of Acre, and enters the sea a little to the north of Ḥaifa. El-Muḳaṭṭa', 'the watercourse,' is the Arab name for this stream. The old name Kishon seems to have quite disappeared; but of its identity there is no reasonable doubt. If the 'waters of Megiddo' (Jg 5^{19}), by which clearly the Kishon and its branches in the neighbourhood of that city is meant, became a popular name, the Arabs may have exchanged Megiddo, which was meaningless to them, for Muḳaṭṭa', so closely resembling it in sound, the meaning of which they knew (G. A. Smith, HGHL^{1} 387), and which, besides, was every way appropriate; for el-Muḳaṭṭa' is par excellence 'the watercourse' of the district.[*] In the yielding soil of the plain it has hollowed out a great trench, often not less than 15 or 20 feet in depth, along the bottom of which the waters may creep almost unseen to the sea.

In the higher reaches the waters swiftly disappear with the advancing summer. The surface of the plain grows hard in the heat, and cracks in all directions, save only in the vicinity of springs, where, owing to the depth of adhesive mud, travelling is always dangerous. After entering the plain of Acre it is seldom dry, and from the fountains of Sa'adîyeh it flows in a constant sluggish stream, between deep banks, surrounded by thick jungle and marsh-land. This part has been reputed a haunt of crocodiles. In recent years Macgregor stands alone in claiming to have seen one of these reptiles while descending to the shore in his canoe (Rob Roy on the Jordan, pp. 398–404). A short distance from the sea the river is spanned by a wooden bridge; but save in times of flood it is easily forded along the sandbank thrown up by the waves at its mouth. From the bank southward, fringing the coast, stands a grove of beautiful date palms. Northward are great tracts of barren sandhills. The main ford is where the road crosses from Ḥaifa to Nazareth. Here a succession of bridges has been built, whose workmanship guaranteed their speedy demolition by winter spates. The means of crossing now are not different from what they were in the days of Sisera. The fords higher up are mostly safe in summer for those who know the locality of springs. In winter they are often quite impassable; to attempt them at that season without a qualified guide is to court disaster. The conditions change with great rapidity, intensifying the treacherous character of the river. A few hours of such rain as at times falls on the encircling mountains are sufficient to change the dry bed into the channel of a rushing stream, and the baked earth along the banks into a quagmire. If G. A. Smith's translation (HGHL^{1} 395) of Jg 5^{21},* 'torrent of spates,' be correct, it is entirely appropriate.

[*] Kittel (in Haupt's SBOT) and Kautzsch read the first clause of these verses, 'And Ner begat Abner.' See Abiel.

[*] Moore (Judges, 158 n.) rejects decidedly the attempt to find the name Megiddo in Muḳaṭṭa'.

The tides of conflict often rolled along the banks of the Kishon in this great battlefield of the ancient world, but its name is seldom mentioned in history. The first probable reference to it is in Jos 19^{11} 'the brook that is before Jokneam' (RV); Jokneam of Carmel being identified with Tell Keimûn, the allusion seems clear (but see Dillm. ad loc.). Kishon next appears in the account of Israel's victory over Sisera and his hosts (Jg 4^7, cf. Ps 83^9), and is enshrined in the song celebrating that glorious event, as an ally of the triumphant army (Jg $5^{19.\ 21}$), where a most realistic picture is given of the enemy's rout. The storm beat hard in the faces of the foe; the moistened soil, firm enough for the passage of footmen, yielded to the tread of cavalry; the terrified plunging of the horses as they sank in the deep mire threw their ranks into confusion, leaving them exposed to the onrush of the eager and agile highlandmen. The pitiless rain sent down swift cataracts from the hills, and soon Kishon in dark and sullen flood rolled onward to the sea. Any ford would then be difficult. The foreign horsemen knew none of them, and in vain efforts to escape they simply plunged into the river to die. The ground in the neighbourhood of Megiddo, where this battle appears to have been fought, is extremely treacherous, as the present writer had occasion to prove, even as late as the month of May (1892).

Kishon again figures in the narrative of Elijah's encounter with the false prophets (1 K 18^{40}). The scene of this famous contest is, with tolerable certainty, located at el-Maḥraḳah, 'the place of burnt sacrifice,' a rocky plateau at the eastern end of the Carmel range. Thence the doomed men were led down for slaughter in the Kishon. A path, steep but practicable, leads to the river just at the base of Tell el-Kassîs, 'hill of the minister,' or 'presbyter.' The bed of the Kishon after the prolonged drought was, of course, dry; but the down-rush from the coming storm would soon efface all evidence of the prophet's ghastly work. Close by this hill the grim tragedy was probably enacted. Kishon is not mentioned again in the sacred records, and the name does not occur in Josephus. Eusebius and Jerome mistakenly describe it as rising on Mount Tabor; Benjamin of Tudela (A.D. 1173) speaks of נַחַל קִישׁוֹן as descending from Mount Carmel. He evidently applies נַחַל קְדוּמִים (Jg 5^{21}) to the Belus, Nahr Na'amân, near Acre.

W. EWING.

KISS (verb, נָשַׁק, φιλέω and καταφιλέω; subst. נְשִׁיקָה, φίλημα).—A mark of affection or favour, given upon the lips, cheek, brow, beard, hand, clothing, even the ground trodden upon, etc., according as it bore less or more of the idea of respect or fear. As a common form of salutation, it had a place in the social life of ancient times, and still has in the East, which it no longer possesses in modern European countries, being limited by our latter-day reserve to the more tender relationships of life. The OT affords no phenomena regarding the kiss distinctive from the usages of ancient peoples other than Hebrew: in NT we find one peculiar form (see below, 5). The various circumstances and occasions in which the kiss, in some form or other, finds place may be enumerated as follows:—

1. The kiss as a token of domestic affection. The mother caressing her infant, fondling it with hands or lips, is so natural that probably we need not go further for the origin of kissing: we have, however, no instance of this mentioned in the Bible (but cf. 1 K $3^{19ff.}$). The extension of the kiss to other family relationships (in law and blood alike) is but natural: we may distinguish three cases. (a) Parents kiss their sons and daughters, Gn $31^{28.\ 55}$ 48^{10} (grandchildren), Ru 1^9. (b) Brothers and sisters kiss each other, Gn 33^4, Ca 8^1; in Gn 29^{11} Jacob kisses Rachel as her cousin; the male cousin having the same right as the brother (as among the Bedawîn, Wetzstein, ZDMG xxii. 93, 108). (c) Children kiss their parents, Gn 27^{26} 50^1 (Joseph kisses his dead father, on which see Schwally, Leben nach d. Tode, p. 8, and cf. the solemn kiss at the end of the orthodox rite of burial [Neale, Holy East. Ch. ii. 104^b]), Ru 1^{14}.

2. Connected with (a) we have (remembering that the relation of father to child was not without a stern element: in older times he had the power of life and death; see Benzinger, Heb. Archäol. 148) the kiss as a mark of condescension, 2 S 15^5 (Absalom kisses the people) 19^{39} (David kisses Barzillai); the king or prince as father of his people.

3. From (b) we may derive the kiss of friendship. From among brothers the privilege of kissing is carried into relations outside of the family strictly taken, Gn 29^{13} (Laban and Jacob), To 7^5 (Raguel and Tobias—cousins once removed); then among friends as such, 1 S 20^{41} (Jonathan and David). Meetings and partings were naturally the special occasions for the kiss;—a fortiori for the family kiss as under 1—1 K 19^{20}, To 10^{12}, Lk 7^{45a}, Ac 20^{37}; a still more fitting occasion was the reconciliation of friends, Gn 45^{15}, 2 S 14^{33}, Lk 15^{20}. Here, too, belongs the false kiss, Pr 27^6, Sir 29^5, Lk $22^{47.\ 48}$; also the kiss in a metaphorical sense, Ps 85^{10}, Ezk 3^{13} (AVm).

4. Again, from (c) we have the kiss as a mark of respect growing into reverence, 1 S 10^1, Pr 24^{26}, Lk $7^{38.\ 45b}$; see also Gn 41^{40} (but cf. Dillmann, Genesis, ad loc.); cf. the kissing of the royal hand, or the pope's sandal; slaves kissing the sleeve or skirt of their master, as still in the East; the conquered kissing the conqueror's feet, or the ground he treads upon ('licking the dust,' Ps 72^{9}, Is 49^{23}, Mic 7^{17}). Idols were kissed by their worshippers, 1 K 19^{18}, Hos 13^{2}, to which may be compared the kissing of the Black Stone in the Ka'ba at Mecca; towards the heavenly bodies as deities a kiss was thrown with the hand (Job 31^{27}).*

5. In NT and the subsequent usage of the Church we find the kiss as a token of Christian brotherhood: a holy kiss (φίλημα ἅγιον), Ro 16^{16}, 1 Co 16^{20}, 2 Co 13^{12}, 1 Th 5^{26}; a kiss of love (φίλημα ἀγάπης), 1 P 5^{14}. In time this became a regular part of the Church service as the 'kiss of peace' (ἀσπασμὸς εἰρήνης, osculum pacis, Const. Apost. ii. 57. 12, viii. 5. 5; Tertull. de Orat. 14). At first it was given promiscuously; later the men kissed the men, the women the women.

6. Finally must be mentioned the kiss as a token of love between the sexes, naturally seldom mentioned even in OT (Ca 1^{2}, and in a bad sense Pr 7^{13}), and, as might be expected, not at all in NT.

KITE.—There are two passages in AV (Lv 11^{14}, Dt 14^{13})† where 'kite' occurs as the tr. of אַיָּה 'ayyâh. In another passage (Job 28^{7}) AV gives 'vulture' for 'ayyâh. In all RV gives 'falcon.' In the first two passages RV tr. דָּאָה dâ'âh and דַּיָּה dayyâh, 'kite.' In both AV tr. 'vulture.' In Is 34^{15} RV tr. dayyôth, 'kites,' AV 'vultures.' Dâ'âh, dayyâh, and 'ayyâh refer to birds of prey of the falcon tribe. It is evident from the passages in Lv and Dt that the words are generic, and it is a waste of time to endeavour to fasten specific meanings on them.

There are three kites in Bible lands: (1) Milvus ictinus, Sav., the Red Kite, which may be the 'ayyâh. It is called in Arab. sa-f. It is common in winter, and in rainy weather the flocks of red kites sit motionless in rows on rocks and trees. (2) M. migrans, Bodd., the Black Kite, perhaps the dâ'âh or dayyâh. It is very common in Egypt, where it perpetually hovers over the towns and feeds upon garbage. It comes to Palestine and Syria in March, and soon spreads over the country. (3) M. Ægyptius, Gmel., the Egyptian Kite. It is distinguished from the former by its yellow bill and more deeply forked tail. It is found in Palestine chiefly in the Jordan Valley and adjacent ravines.

KITRON (קִטְרוֹן).—A Canaanite town in the territory of Zebulun, Jg 1^{30}. See KATTATH.

KITTIM (כִּתִּים, i.e. prop. 'Kitians' [note כִּתִּיִּים in Is 23^{12} Kt., Jer 2^{10}], people of כת [CIS I. i. 11], more usually כתי Kition [I. i. 10, 11, 14, 19, 88 etc.]; AV Chittim, so also RV in 1 Mac 1^{1} 8^{5}).—A people described in Gn 10^{4} as descended from Javan, and therefore belonging to the Greek or Græco-Latin races of the West, occupying territories stretching along the coasts of the Mediterranean Sea. Elishah, Tarshish, and Rodanim (Ῥόδιοι in LXX, better than Dodanim of MT), named in that passage alongside of Kittim, are now generally identified respectively with Sicily and Southern Italy, Spain, and Rhodes. As these are all islands or coastlands in the West, it is natural to look to the same region for the localizing of the Kittim. That they were islanders is explicitly asserted by the phrase current among the prophets, 'the isles of Kittim' (Jer 2^{10}, Ezk 27^{6}). But though distinctly Westerns in respect of geographical situation, they are represented as having been from the earliest times intimately associated with the civilized and commercial peoples of the extreme eastern limits of the Mediterranean coast. Thus Ezekiel (27^{6}) mentions 'the isles of K.' as supplying Tyre with boxwood, or more probably sherbin wood, a species of cedar, out of which the benches or decks of their costly and luxurious ships were constructed. And further, we find that the prophet in this passage places 'the isles of K.' between Bashan and Elishah, therefore west of the former and east of the latter, i.e. between Palestine on the east and Sicily or Italy on the west. In Is 23$^{1.12}$ Tarshish or Spain is said to hear from the land of K. of the fall of Tyre, which implies that the land of K. lay somewhere between Tyre and Tarshish. The country of the K., therefore, must have been an island situated somewhere in the eastern part of the Mediterranean, to the east at least of Sicily, and not very far removed from the coasts of Tyre. Josephus (Ant. I. vi. 1) points to the name of the city Kition or Citium in Cyprus as a memorial of the residence of the K. in that island. This writer also, most probably drawing his information from tradition current among the Jews of his day, states that the ancient name of Cyprus was Cethima, and that it received its name from Cethimus, the third son of Javan, who had settled there, and whose descendants held possession under the name of Kittim. Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus, whose life covers most of the 4th cent., makes use (Hær. xxx. 25) of the name K., in a wider sense, to include not only the inhabitants of Cyprus, but also those of Rhodes, and even of the coastlands of Macedonia. This, indeed, is quite in keeping with the later Jewish usage of this word. 'The ships of K.' in Dn 11^{30} are evidently those of the Romans, and 'the land of K.' in 1 Mac 1^{1} 8^{5} is evidently that of the Macedonians. In this late period the name was applied generally to the lands and peoples of the West. The reference to the Romans in Dn 11^{30} is quite distinctly to the expedition of Caius Popilius Laenas. This Roman general was sent in A.D. 168 against Antiochus Epiphanes, who had entered Egypt and attacked that country, quickly reducing him to submission and causing him hastily to withdraw to Syria. The story of the campaign is told by Polybius (xxix. 11) in language singularly like that employed in Daniel. See also Livy, Hist. xliv. 19, xlv. 11. This wider application of the name K. is quite in accordance with the usage of Josephus (Ant. I. vi. 1), who says that it is from the possession of the island of Cethima or Cyprus by Cethimus that 'all islands and the greatest part of the seacoasts are named Cethim by the Hebrews.' At the same time, just as here also in Josephus, it appears to be the unanimous opinion of antiquity that the original location of the K. was in the island of Cyprus.

In very early times the Phœnicians had sailed up and down in the Mediterranean, and, while trafficking in their wares far and near, they established colonies in several of the islands, and at points along the coast convenient as depôts for their foreign carrying trade. From its natural situation Cyprus must have early attracted their attention, and must soon have become their principal station in the conducting and extending of their trade with the West. Herodotus (Hist. vii. 90) distinctly states that most of the Cypriote cities had originally been Phœnician colonies. The Phœnician origin of Kition, a city in the south-east of the island, now Larnaka, is plainly witnessed to by Cicero (de Finibus, iv. 20), and naturally enough the Phœnician settlers in other parts of the island would carry with them the name of their oldest and principal foundation. These Phœnician settlements in Cyprus date from a very early age—it may be even before the days of Moses (Diodor. v. 55. 77; Herodot. i. 105; Pausan. i. 14. 6). After a time it would seem that these Phœnicians in Cyprus were joined by certain Canaanitish refugees, who had been driven out by the Philistines, and that they brought with them their moon goddess Atergatis (Derceto), whose temple was built at Old Paphos, while that of the Phœnician Baal was at Kition (see ASHTORETH). The existence of such Phœnician colonies in Cyprus is witnessed to also by the occasional references in history to the Kittim as subject to, or at least as claimed as subjects of, Tyre. It would seem that even as early as the days of king Solomon the K. were subject to the Tyrians, and compelled by Hiram to pay tribute (Jos. Ant. VIII. v. 3, c. Apion. 1. 18). Josephus also tells how Elulæus, king of Tyre, sailed against the revolted K., and reduced them again to submission (Ant. IX. xiv. 2). In the annals of Sargon the Cypriote kings are referred to as put under tribute in B.C. 709 (Schrader, COT^{2} ii. 96).

* 'Kiss the son' Ps 2^{12} (AV, RV text), is an extremely doubtful passage. The MT נַשְּׁקוּ בַר is prob. corrupt, and nothing is gained by simply substituting Heb. בֵּן for Aram. בַּר. Aq., Symm., Jerome (although in his Comm. on Ps he gives adorate filium) take בר='pure,' 'choice' (cf. RVm), and tr., respectively, καταφιλήσατε ἐκλεκτῶς, προσκυνήσατε καθαρῶς, adorate pure. The LXX δράξασθε παιδείας (cf. Targ. קַבִּילוּ אולפנא, Vulg. apprehendite disciplinam, and RVm), 'lay hold of instruction,' may imply a text קְחוּ מוּסָר. Lagarde emends (מוֹסְרוֹ) נַשְּׁקוּ מוֹסֵרוֹ 'put on his bonds' (cf v.^{3}), and this has been adopted by Kamphausen and Cheyne (Origin of Psalter, 351). But in his latest view of the passage (Book of Psalms, 2nd ed., and Jewish Religious Life after the Exile, 1898, p. 112) Cheyne substitutes נַשְּׁקוּ ('kiss' = 'do homage') for גִּילוּ ('rejoice') in v.^{11}, and drops בר, which, he says, is really a fragment of the word rendered 'with trembling' (ברעדה): thus—

Serve J″ with fear,
And do homage with trembling,
Lest he be angry, and your course end in ruin.

† The text of Dt 14^{13} is corrupt. For הָרָאָה read הַדָּאָה, and delete הַדַּיָּה (so Oxf. Heb. Lex., Siegfried-Stade, Dillm., Driver, Steuernagel, following Sam. and LXX).

It is not, however, to these Phœnician colonists that the name is given in Gn 10^4. The Phœnician K. may rather be set alongside of the Caphtorim (Gn 10^{14}), who are represented as Cushites, and of the sons of Ham, and as inhabiting some island or coastland near to Cyprus, in all probability Crete. The Japhethite K., as sons of Javan, belonged to the Greek family of nations—whether to the ancient pre-Hellenic Carian population of the island, or to some Hellenic tribe which had in early times settled there, can scarcely now be determined. Interesting inscriptions have been discovered near Larnaka, the ancient Kition, which, although figured in Phœnician letters, are yet composed in a Greek dialect. This seems to indicate that the people from whom these inscriptions have come down to us were a Greek people, ethnographically belonging to the family of Javan, retaining their language and modes of thought, but largely influenced by the presence of a Phœnician immigration. That they adopted the Phœnician letters and mode of writing is just the sort of result we should have expected, seeing that the Phœnician colonists were enterprising merchants, who would naturally lead in matters of commerce and correspondence with those around.

The last recorded words of Balaam are a prophecy of the destruction of Asshur and Eber by some conquering power coming in ships from 'the coast of Kittim' (Nu 24^{24}). It is quite evident that here the term מִיַּד כִּתִּים is used, not to describe the island of Cyprus, or any other exactly defined territory, but as indicating quite generally some great Western people which had made themselves a name, and become a terror among the nations. No doubt Asshur and Eber stand for the great powers of the East collectively, and the prophecy is a foretelling of the utter overthrow of the sovereignty of the Eastern monarchies by the advancing power of the great empires of the West. The beginning of the fulfilment was seen in the campaigns of Alexander the Great, but it was much more truly and permanently realized in the development and growth of the empire of the Romans. The phrase 'coast of Kittim,' therefore, does not mean Macedonia, nor Rome, but simply the Western power which, for the time being, is to the front, or gives promise of prominence and permanence in the immediate future. See CYPRUS.

KNEAD, KNEADING-TROUGH.—See BREAD, vol. i. p. 317^a.

KNEE, KNEEL (בֶּרֶךְ [Assyr. birku], in Dn 6^{10} Aram. בְּרַךְ, once Dn 5^6 Aram. אַרְכֻבָּה; 'kneel' is expressed by vb. בָּרַךְ in Qal,* 2 Ch 6^{13}, Ps 95^6 [all], cf. Aram. ptcp. בָּרֵךְ in Dn 6^{10} and Hiph. וַיַּבְרֵךְ used in Gn 24^{11} of causing camels to kneel. The LXX and NT terms are γόνυ, 'knee,' and γονυπετεῖν, 'kneel').—The knees appear repeatedly in Scripture as a seat of strength, and hence as weakened through terror, Job 4^4 ('thou hast confirmed the feeble knees'; cf. Is 35^3, He 12^{12}); Ezk 7^{17} ('all knees shall be weak as water'; cf. 21^7 [Heb.^{12}]); Dn 5^6 (the appearing of the handwriting upon the wall so terrified Belshazzar that 'his knees smote one against another'; cf. Nah 2^{10}). A psalmist complains that his knees are weak through fasting, Ps 109^{24}. Amongst the plagues denounced upon disobedience to the Deuteronomic law is this, 'The LORD shall smite thee in the knees . . . with a sore boil,' etc., where the reference appears to be to some form of elephantiasis (see Driver, ad loc.).

Kneeling down to drink (from their hands) was the attitude adopted by a portion of Gideon's warriors on the occasion of the famous test, Jg $7^{5.6}$ (where see Moore's note). One of the stages in the measurement of the depth of the river which Ezekiel saw issuing from the temple was that 'the waters were to the knees' (Ezk 47^4). Delilah made Samson sleep עַל־בִּרְכֶּיהָ Jg 16^{19}; the Shunammite's son sat upon his mother's knees till he died, 2 K 4^{20}; children were dandled upon the knees, Is 66^{12}.

Gn 48^{12} (E), 'And Joseph brought them out from between his knees' (וַיּוֹצֵא יוֹסֵף אֹתָם מֵעִם בִּרְכָּיו), is not perfectly clear, but the meaning probably is that Joseph took his sons away from Jacob's knees, before himself bowing down to receive the blessing (v.^{15} connects directly with v.^{12} in E's narrative, the intervening vv.$^{13.14}$ being from J).

In Gn 30^3 (E) Rachel gives Bilhah to Jacob 'that she may bear upon my knees' (וְתֵלֵד עַל־בִּרְכַּי); in 50^{23} (also E) the children of Machir the son of Manasseh were born upon Joseph's knees (יֻלְּדוּ עַל־בִּרְכֵּי יוֹסֵף); Job (3^{12}) asks, 'Why did the knees receive me?' (מַדּוּעַ קִדְּמוּנִי בִרְכָּיִם). In the first two passages at least † there appears to be an allusion to the custom of placing newly-born infants on the father's (or grandfather's) lap as a token of his recognition or adoption of them (cf. Hom. Od. xix. 401). Rachel thus undertakes to acknowledge Bilhah's children as her own, and Joseph recognizes Machir's children as his descendants (see

* The other conjugations have the sense of 'bless' (Piel), 'bless oneself' (Niph. and Hithp.), 'be blessed' (Pual). The pass. ptcp. Qal בָּרוּךְ also occurs 71 times with the meaning of 'blessed.'

† In Job 3^{12} Dillmann finds nothing more than a placing of the newly-born child on the knee of the midwife or the father, without any symbolical meaning (but see Duhm, ad loc.).

Kneeling as an attitude in worship is repeatedly mentioned in Scripture, 1 K 8^{54}=2 Ch 6^{13} (Solomon at dedication of the temple); 1 K 19^{18} ('the knees which have not bowed to Baal'; cf. Ro 11^{4}); Ezr 9^{5} (Ezra in confessing the iniquity of the foreign marriages); Is 45^{23} ('to me every knee shall bow'; cf. Ro 14^{11}, Ph 2^{10}, on which last see Lightfoot's note); Dn 6^{10} (when Daniel prayed three times a day); Ac 7^{60} (the dying St. Stephen); 9^{40} (St. Peter before the raising of Dorcas); 20^{36} (St. Paul praying with the elders of Ephesus); 21^{5} (a similar scene at Tyre); Eph 3^{14} (St. Paul's prayer for the 'Ephesians.'). A variation from this attitude is found in 1 K 18^{42}, where Elijah in praying for rain 'put his face between his knees' (וַיָּשֶׂם פָּנָיו בֵּין בִּרְכָּיו). The same mental feeling underlies the adoption of kneeling in addressing an entreaty to a fellow-creature, or in doing homage to a superior, 2 K 1^{13} (Ahaziah's officer in entreating Elijah to spare his life); Mt 17^{14} (the father of the epileptic boy came kneeling to Jesus [γονυπετῶν αὐτόν]); Mk 1^{40} (the leper); 10^{17} (the rich young ruler); Mt 27^{29} (the soldiers mocked Jesus by kneeling down before Him [γονυπετήσαντες ἔμπροσθεν αὐτοῦ, cf. Mk 15^{19} τιθέντες γόνατα προσεκύνουν αὐτῷ]). In Lk 5^{8} Simon Peter falls down upon his knees (προσέπεσεν τοῖς γόνασιν) as he cries, 'Depart from me: for I am a sinful man, O Lord.'

For the doubtful 'Bow the knee' of Gn 41^{43} see ABRECH. J. A. SELBIE.

KNIFE (חֶרֶב, מַאֲכֶלֶת).—Knives were originally of flint or sharp stone (Ex 4^{25} צֹר, Jos $5^{2.3}$ חַרְבוֹת צֻרִים).

Flint knives have been found in a cave at Antelias, near Beirût, amongst bones and charcoal; and also in a calcareous deposit on the old road along the sea-coast near the Nahr el-Kelb. It is said that flint knives are still used by the Bedawîn of the Syrian desert. The knives generally used in Syria are sheath-knives, and are stuck in the girdle. They are from 8 to 10 in. long, including the handle. They are used for every purpose for which a knife is required, and are formidable weapons. W. CARSLAW.

KNOCK.—See HOUSE, vol. ii. p. 435.

KNOP (a variant of knob and of knap [in knapweed], Old English cnaep) is used by our translators to render 1. כַּפְתֹּר kaphtōr, the spherical ornament on the stem and arms of the golden lampstand in the tabernacle (Ex 25^{32-36} and parll. pass. 37^{17-22}). The Greek translators have σφαιρωτήρ, the Vulgate sphærula, Luther Knauf (a kindred word). The 'knops' are easily recognizable in the familiar representation of the later 'candlestick' on the arch of Titus. For their relation to the rest of the ornamentation see TABERNACLE (sec. dealing with the golden candlestick). A similar knop is seen on the stem of the chalice which appears on the obverse of certain Jewish coins (see MONEY).

The same word, kaphtōr, occurs in two other passages of the OT, viz. Am 9^{1} (AV 'smite the lintel of the door,' marg. 'chapiter' [so RV] or 'knop'), and Zeph 2^{14} (AV 'the upper lintel,' marg. 'knops or chapiters'; the last is the rendering of RV). In the former passage the reference is clearly to the capitals or chapiters of the pillars in the schismatic temple of J" at Bethel, in the latter to those of the columns in the ruined city of Nineveh. The feature common to these capitals and the knops of the lampstand was doubtless the circular or rather spherical form (cf. the spherical capitals of the two pillars Jachin and Boaz, 1 K 7^{41}; see art. CHAPITER).

2. In our EV 'knops' is also the translation of an entirely different word פְּקָעִים, pĕḳāʿîm, of which the precise signification is still uncertain. It is used to describe the ornamentation on the cedar lining of the temple walls: 'And there was cedar in the house within, carved with knops (marg. 'gourds') and open flowers' (1 K 6^{18} RV). This must refer to some egg-shaped (cf. Targum, in loc.) ornament, carved in low relief, perhaps, as the margin proposes, the fruit of the citrullus colocynthus, which appears to bear in Hebrew the cognate name paḳḳûʿah—the 'wild gourd' of 2 K 4^{39}.* Two rows of the same ornamentation were introduced 'under the brim' of the great 'molten sea' which stood in the temple court (1 K 7^{24}). In this case, however, the knops were not the product of the artist's chisel, but were cast with the sea (ib.). See SEA (BRAZEN). A. R. S. KENNEDY.

KNOWLEDGE.—The word 'knowledge' is here considered, not generally, but only in the ethico-religious sense, or so far as there is an approximation in Scripture to a technical (theological) use of it. At the very beginning of the OT the probation of man is connected with the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (Gn 2^{17}). The view of 'knowledge' underlying this mythical narrative seems to be that which is brought out in Wellhausen's interpretation (Prolegomena^{2}, p. 316 f.). To know good and evil does not mean in Hebrew to have the moral consciousness developed; it means to be intelligent, 'to know what's what.' The desire to know is the desire to be like God—to possess His secrets, to wield His power, and so to be independent of Him. But the gratification of this desire, so the moral would originally run, always defeats itself. The impulse to know, the impulse which creates science and civilization, is indulged at a great cost. We build Babylon, and become conscious that we have lost Eden. That this appreciation of 'knowledge,' which pervades the sceptical passages in Ecclesiastes, underlies the third chapter of Genesis, is not to be denied; but neither can we deny that the myth is so treated by the writer as to make it yield an explanation of the transition in human history from innocence to guilt. The eating of the forbidden fruit was an act in which man lost the knowledge of God and acquired the knowledge of sin.

i. The OT everywhere assumes that there is such a thing as the knowledge of God, but it is never speculative, and it is never achieved by man. God is known because He makes Himself known, and He makes Himself known in His character. Hence the knowledge of God is in the OT=true religion; and as it is of God's grace that He appears from the beginning speaking, commanding, active, so as to be known for what He is, so the reception of this knowledge of God is ethically conditioned. The secret (סוֹד, lit. friendly conversation) of the LORD is with them that fear Him (Ps 25^{14}); the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the LORD are one (Is 11^{2}). On the other hand, an irreligious man is described as one who does not know God; and that though he is the priest ministering at the altar (1 S 2^{12}). The moral corruption of the last days of Israel is described by Hosea when he writes, 'There is no truth, nor loving-kindness, nor knowledge of God in the land' (Hos 4^{1}). The ethical content and value of this knowledge are seen also in ch. 6^{6} 'I desire mercy and not sacrifice, and the knowledge of God more than burnt-offerings.' It is in this sense of an experimental acquaintance with God's character, and a life determined by it, that a universal knowledge of God is made the chief blessing of the Messianic age. 'The earth shall be full of the knowledge of the LORD' (Is 11[9]); 'They shall all know me, from the least to the greatest' (Jer 31[34]). And this again is not because men have achieved it by speculative efforts of their own: 'All thy children shall be taught of the LORD' (Is 54[13]). Side by side with this practical knowledge of God the OT makes room for any degree of speculative agnosticism. God is great beyond all our thoughts: His ways are unsearchable (Job 5[9]). He is a God who hides Himself (Is 45[15]), and gives no account of His matters. But such agnosticism is not a rival of religion, of the knowledge of God: it is a part of it. The knowledge of God includes a recognition of His immensity, and part of man's worship must always be silence (Ps 65[1]). This is especially brought out in the Book of Job. The conception of true religion as the knowledge of God is probably the true antecedent and parent of some NT expressions for which affinities have been sought in the phenomena of Gnosticism. John (6[45]) quotes Is 54[13] (see above); and the key to the emphasis which he lays on 'knowing' God, or the truth, or Jesus Christ, is more likely to be found in such passages as are referred to above, than in modes of thought alien to Christianity.

* It has been pointed out (Löw, Aram. Pflanzennamen, p. 278) that פְּקַעַת in the Mishna denotes a ball of yarn (see this word and פְּקוּעָה in Levy, Neuheb. Wörterb. s.vv.).

ii. In the NT it will be convenient to take the different sections apart. (a) In the Gospels Christ appears first in the character of a teacher, moved with compassion for a people left without the knowledge of God, excluded from His kingdom because the key of knowledge—i.e. knowledge itself, the key which should open the door of the kingdom—has been taken away by its guardians (Lk 11[52]). He represents it as the chief privilege of His disciples that to them it is given to know the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 13[10-17]) —mysteries which kings and prophets had longed to see, but could not. He represents it as His own unique distinction that He alone has, and can communicate, the knowledge of God as the Father, in which true religion henceforth consists (Mt 11[25-27]). But here, as in the OT, it is no abstract conception that Jesus wishes to impart; to know God as Father is in reality to know that we are the children of God, and in knowing it to become His children. The new knowledge has to give a new character to our life, and if there is no trace of such a new character it is vain for us to say that we know the Father: we are in darkness in spite of all God has done to make Himself known. The ethical conditions of this knowledge are plainly stated in Mt 5[8], Jn 7[17]; and in Jn 17[3] it is identified with eternal life, the perfect blessing that the Son of God has come to impart. The proper relation to God is always conceived by St. John to be involved in the true knowledge of God; to know Him that is true and to be in Him that is true are all one. It is exactly this sense that the knowledge of God has in Hos 4. 6, or in Jer 31: there is no schism between the intellectual and the practical for the apostle or the prophet; the two are united in the integrity of the heart, which in Scripture is the organ of knowledge. When we read in Jn 8[32] 'Ye shall know the truth, and the truth shall set you free,' the freedom spoken of is probably not so definite in its application as in many places in St. Paul. The idea rather is that to be right with God puts one right, sets one free, in all other relations.

(b) In St. Paul's writings knowledge appears in many aspects. (a) In contrast with the wisdom of this world the gospel as a whole is conceived as a wisdom of God, which God has revealed in His Son and interpreted by His Spirit. There is, indeed, or there might have been, a natural knowledge of God (Ro 1[19f.], Ac 14[17]), but a knowledge of God in any sense bringing salvation is possible only through the reception of God's Spirit (1 Co 2). Such knowledge every Christian possesses; Christ is made to him wisdom (1 Co 1[30]), and he is chosen in sanctification of the Spirit and belief of the truth (2 Th 2[13]). But St. Paul speaks of knowledge in another sense. There are degrees of insight into the one great truth of God; there are truths which are not imparted to babes, but only spoken 'among the perfect' (1 Co 2[6]); there is a χάρισμα, a special spiritual gift, called 'the word of knowledge' (1 Co 12[8]), in which the Corinthians were rich; and though a χάρισμα was given to one for the good of all, we see that knowledge might be the possession of a few, or of a circle, not of the whole Church. To judge from 1 Co 2[9f.] one of the subjects with which this higher knowledge was concerned was eschatology—'all that God has prepared for them that love him.' But it had also more directly practical applications. An enlightened conscience in regard to the use of things indifferent was one mode of it. 'As touching things offered to idols, we know that we all have knowledge' (1 Co 8[1]). Christian intelligence generally was sufficiently developed to know that an idol is nothing in the world. But in some it was not sufficiently developed to know that this mere perception of a principle is no adequate guide to Christian conduct. It is not by principle merely, but by consideration of persons, circumstances, and consequences, that a Christian must act; in other words, not by knowledge but by love. Knowledge in this abstract sense is not without moral peril; it inflates the individual, whereas love builds up the body of Christ. All through the First Ep. to the Corinthians, knowledge as a gift distinguishing one Christian from another is subordinated in this way to love (chs. 8. 12. 13. 14).

(β) When we pass to the Epp. of the Captivity, knowledge has quite another position and emphasis. The gospel is confronted with a φιλοσοφία, which is at the same time a 'vain deceit,' something determined by human tradition and agreeing with 'the elements of the world,' Jewish or pagan (Col 2[8]); and in opposition to this philosophy, or as it would now be called theosophy, the Christian revelation is defined and expanded as the true wisdom of God. As a formal indication of the extent to which the gospel is here put under the point of view of 'knowledge,' Holtzmann (NT Theologie, ii. 237) quotes the following list of words from the Ep. to the Ephesians: ἀκούειν, ἀλήθεια, ἀληθεύειν, ἀποκάλυψις, ἀποκαλύπτειν, ἀποκρύπτειν, ἄφρων, γινώσκειν, γνῶσις, διδασκαλία, διδάσκειν, εἰδέναι, ἐπιγινώσκειν, ἐπίγνωσις, μανθάνειν, μυστήριον, νοεῖν, νοῦς, πλάνη, σκοτίζεσθαι, σκότος, σοφία, σοφός, σύνεσις, συνιέναι, φανεροῦσθαι, φῶς, φωτίζειν. This knowledge centres in Christ. He is the mystery of God, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden away (Col 2[2]). All the questions which man has to ask in the sphere of religion—questions as to the origination of the world, its natural unity, the place in it of the human race; questions as to the relation of humanity to God, its sin, reconciliation, and glory —must find their answer in Him. The doctrine of Christ in these Epistles is expanded into a Christian interpretation of the world, and this is the object of Christian knowledge. It is not to be the property of a class. St. Paul warns every man and teaches every man in every wisdom, that he may present every man perfect in Christ (Col 1[28]). As in the earlier Epistles, there is a certain eschatological reference in the knowledge or wisdom which is so emphasized here: Christ is conceived among the Gentiles as 'the hope of glory' (Col 1[27]), and St. Paul prays that the Ephesians may have the eyes of their hearts enlightened to know what is 'the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance in the saints' (Eph 1^{18}). Such inward illumination indeed is the aim of the letters; they can be summed up (Weiss, NT Theol. p. 428) in the prayer 'that the God of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of glory, may give unto you a spirit of wisdom and revelation in the knowledge of him' (Eph 1^{17}). In this last passage knowledge is ἐπίγνωσις, a word which as opposed to γνῶσις denotes full or further knowledge, and which, though frequent in St. Paul, is used besides only in He and 2 P. According to Cremer, it is always used of a knowledge which has the strongest influence on the religious life; it is combined with such expressions as τοῦ θεοῦ, ἀληθείας, τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ θεοῦ, τοῦ μυστηρίου τοῦ θεοῦ, τοῦ θελήματος τοῦ θεοῦ, τοῦ Κυρ. ἡμῶν 'Ι. Χ. It does not therefore suggest an abstractly intellectual view of Christianity—a theology, so to speak, as distinct from a religion; just as in the OT and in St. John, knowledge includes the spiritual and moral relation to its object, which answers to the nature of that object. Truth as truth is in Jesus is not only to be believed and known but done by the Christian (1 Jn 1^6). What St. Paul calls ἡ ἐπίγνωσις τοῦ θεοῦ is not only a deeper comprehension of the Christian revelation in itself, but a deeper insight into its practical significance and obligations.

(γ) In the Pastoral Epistles Christianity is conceived as a teaching or doctrine (διδασκαλία) more definitely than in any other part of the NT. Christians are those who have repented and come to the knowledge of the truth (1 Ti 2^4 4^3). To oppose the gospel is to resist the truth (2 Ti 3^8). But though the truth can be stated by itself, it is always of moral import. It is the truth 'which is according to godliness' (Tit 1^1), a διδασκαλία καλή and ὑγιαίνουσα. When men abandon it or reject it, it is from some moral unsoundness; they turn from the truth, and with itching ears heap up teachers 'according to their own lusts.' The 'knowledge falsely so called' (1 Ti 6^{20}), whether the ἀντιθέσεις justifies a reference to Marcion or not, is conceived as a morbid phenomenon opposed to the morally wholesome teaching of Christianity, and whoever is misled by it 'errs concerning the faith'—his religious life misses the mark.

(c) In the other books of the NT knowledge is not a characteristic conception. In 2 P it has a certain prominence ($1^{2f.}$ 2^{20} 3^{18}), in a sense more akin to that which it bears in the Pastorals than elsewhere; the ἐπίγνωσις or full knowledge of God, or of Jesus our Lord, is saving knowledge. We grow in it as we grow in the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ; the two processes of growth are one. It is morally efficacious for our deliverance from the pollutions of the world. In the Ep. to the Hebrews γνῶσις does not occur at all, and ἐπίγνωσις only in 10^{26} (cf. Tit 1^1, 1 Ti 2^4 4^3). But the whole Epistle may be regarded as a specimen of a particular kind of Christian γνῶσις. It recognizes the distinction between a less and more perfect apprehension of Christianity ($5^{11ff.}$ $6^{1ff.}$), and the writer exhibits his own 'knowledge' in that interpretation of the OT which makes its institutions and characters typical of Christ. This typological γνῶσις is quite different from the ἐπίγνωσις of the mystery of God, even Christ, which we find in the Pastoral Epistles; yet as a mode of representing the organic unity of the NT and the OT it may also contribute to a Christian philosophy. And some such thing—not in the sense of a speculation a priori, without ethical inspiration, but in the sense of an expression and interpretation of Christian faith, which shall be pervaded throughout by the spiritual virtue of that faith—seems to be set before us by the NT writers as the ideal of 'knowledge.'

KOA (קוֹעַ; Ὑχουε B, Λουδ A, Κουε Q; Targ. קוֹעָאֵי; Syr. ܩܘܥ; Aq. κορυφαῖον; Vulg. principes).—In Ezk 23^{23} 'the children of Babylon and all the Chaldæans, Peḳod, and Shoa' (שׁוֹעַ), and Ḳoa', all the children of Asshur with them,'—most probably the contracted form of Ḳutû, Ḳuti, the name of a people (also called Gutium, Guti), often mentioned in the Assyrian Inscriptions, whose home was to the N. of Babylon, in the mountainous district between the upper Adhem and the Dijâlâ (see the map in Del. Paradies; KAT^{2} ad loc.).* The following are the grounds for this conclusion. The inscriptions speak often of a country Su-êdin, Su-tium, or Suti; and as Ezk names together Peḳod (also Jer 50^{21}) and Shoa', so Sargon (Khors. inscr. l. 19: KIB ii. 55; cf. ll. 82, 123, 135 f.) mentions together among his conquests Puḳudu and Suti: elsewhere, moreover, in the inscriptions, the shorter form Su is found for Su-êdin, Su-tium: on these grounds, therefore, it is probable that the Shoa' of Ezk are the Suti of the inscriptions (S.E. of Ḳutu, in the direction of Elam). Further, as Ezk. couples together Shoa' and Ḳoa', so the inscriptions often couple together Su-êdin or Suti with Ḳutu:† a presumption thus arises that as Shoa' corresponds to Suti or Sutu, so Ḳoa' corresponds to Ḳutu, the only link in the complete proof that is missing being the fact that (according to Del.) the shorter form Ḳu (corresponding to Su) is not known to occur in the inscriptions. Nevertheless, the identification is a very probable one; and if, as Hilprecht's discoveries appear to have shown,‡ the Chebar was 'a large navigable canal near Nippur,' Ezekiel would not, speaking comparatively, have been far distant from any of the three peoples named in this verse. Both Sutu and Ḳutu are, as Winckler (Alttest. Unterss. 1892, 178) remarks, the standing foes of Assyria: the words in Ezk. 'all the children of Asshur,' are not, however, necessarily in apposition with these two names.§

Ges. (Thes.) defends the appellative sense principes; but his etymology, though ingenious, must be owned to be far-fetched and improbable. See, further, Schrader, KAT^{2} ad loc.; and especially Delitzsch, Paradies, pp. 234–6; and cf. art. KIR in the present volume.

S. R. DRIVER.

KOHATH (קְהָת) is known to us only from P and the Chronicler. According to these writers, he was the second of the three sons of Levi (Ex 6^{16}, Nu 3^{17}, 1 Ch $6^{1.16}$ 23^6). He had four sons, Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel (Ex 6^{18}, Nu 3^{19}, 1 Ch $6^{2.18}$ 23^{12}), and lived to the age of 133 years (Ex 6^{18}). In 1 Ch 6^{22} Amminadab is said to be the son of Kohath, but this is probably a clerical error for Izhar (cf. 6^{38}). His sister was Jochebed, the aunt and wife of Amram, and the mother of Moses (Ex 6^{20}, Nu 26^{59}). For the rebellion of his grandson Korah (Nu 16) see KORAH. Nothing further is related of K. personally, but we have fuller particulars of the fortunes of his descendants. Their history falls into three periods—(1) the wilderness wanderings and the settlement in Canaan, (2) the monarchy, (3) the period after the Exile.

1. At the time of the census taken by Moses in the wilderness of Sinai the Kohathites were divided into four families, the Amramites, the Izharites, the Hebronites, and the Uzzielites (Nu 3^{27}). The whole number of males from a month old was 8600 (3^{28}), and between 30 and 50 years of age 2750 ($4^{2.3.34-37}$). Their position in the camp was on the side of the tabernacle southward (3^{29}), and their chief at this time was Elizaphan the son of Uzziel (3^{30}). The office assigned to them by P during the wilderness wanderings was the carrying of the sanctuary and its furniture, after it had been prepared for travel by Aaron and his sons (3^{31} 4^{4-15} 10^{21}). In this respect the Kohathites, the family of Aaron, had a more honourable office than that given to the descendants of Gershon the elder brother, and they consequently precede the Gershonites in Nu 4, Jos 21, 1 Ch 6. 15, 2 Ch 29^{12}. In consequence of the greater holiness of their burden they carried it upon their shoulders (Nu 7^{9}), in contrast to the Gershonites and Merarites, to whom waggons and oxen were given ($7^{7.8}$). The Kohathites are also mentioned at the time of the census taken by Moses and Eleazar in the plains of Moab by the Jordan, when the whole number of Levites was 23,000 (26^{57}).

§ Winckler (with Bredenkamp and Klostermann) would read קוע for קיר (with שׁוע as pr. name) in Is 22^5. This is favoured also by W. Max Müller (in art. KIR above); but the two names are difficult to harmonize with מקרקר, except by giving this verb arbitrary meanings like 'surround' or 'stir up.'

At the allotment of Levitical cities by Joshua and Eleazar after the settlement in Pal., thirteen cities out of the territories of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin were assigned to the Kohathite descendants of Aaron (Jos $21^{4.13-19}$ [P]=1 Ch 6^{57-60}); and ten others out of the territories of Ephraim, Dan, and Western Manasseh to the rest of the Kohathites (Jos $21^{5.20-26}$ [P]=1 Ch $6^{61.67-70}$).

2. In the reign of David, as narrated by the Chronicler, we have several references to the Kohathites. The Kohathite family of Heman, together with the Gershonite family of Asaph and the Merarite family of Ethan or Jeduthun, were, acc. to this writer, specially set apart to administer the temple music (cf. 1 Ch 6^{31-47} $16^{41.42}$ 25^{1-7}, and see HEMAN). In accordance with this, at the bringing up of the ark into Jerus., of the large number of Kohathites who are said to have been present (1 Ch $15^{5.8.9.10}$), Heman and certain others took part in the music ($15^{17.19}$). Descendants of the four Kohathite families are mentioned as 'heads of the fathers' houses' when David divided the Levites into courses (1 Ch 23^{12-20}), and in 1 Ch $26^{1.23-31}$ the particular offices held by descendants of the first three families are given in detail. Kohathites are spoken of as taking part in the temple services in the reign of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20^{19}), and as co-operating with the other Levites in cleansing the temple under Hezekiah ($29^{12.14}$).

3. In the period after the Exile we find very few traces of the Kohathite family. The Berechiah, son of Asa, son of Elkanah, mentioned in 1 Ch 9^{16}, was probably a Kohathite. So also were the 'children of Shallum' who accompanied Zerubbabel (Ezr 2^{42}; cf. 1 Ch $9^{17.19}$, Neh 12^{25}, in last Meshullam).

The Kohathites (הַקְּהָתִי; in Nu 10^{21}, 1 Ch 20^{19} הַקְּהָתִים) are mentioned Nu $3^{27.30}$ $4^{18.34.37}$ 10^{21} 26^{57}, Jos $21^{4.10}$, 1 Ch $6^{33.54}$ 9^{32}, 2 Ch 20^{19} 29^{12}. Also called 'the sons of Kohath,' Ex 6^{18}, Nu $3^{19.29}$ $4^{2.4.15\,(2)}$ 7^{9}, 1 Ch $6^{2.18.22.61.66.70}$ 15^{5} 23^{12}, or 'the children of Kohath,' Jos $21^{5.20\,(2).26}$. For their history see above.

KORAH, DATHAN, ABIRAM (קֹרַח, דָּתָן, אֲבִירָם).—Most readers of the Eng. Bible are familiar with the story of Korah's rebellion, and of the terrible fate that overtook him and his followers. When we turn, however, to the record of these events (Nu 16), it is by no means easy to reduce it to a consistent or continuous narrative. The thread of the story is strangely broken, and we encounter remarkable repetitions (vv.$^{5.8.16}$). Here, as in many other cases, we are helped by the labours of those critics who have analyzed the contents of the Hexateuch.

There is reason to believe that three strata are present in the composition of Nu 16 and 17. This conclusion, which had been previously reached by various critics, was first placed on a thoroughly satisfactory basis by Kuenen (ThT (1878), p. 139 ff.), whose analysis has been substantially accepted by critics of such different schools as Baudissin, Cornill, Dillmann, Driver, Robertson Smith, and Wellhausen. Of the three narratives, the first two were originally quite independent of one another, while the third works over the material from the standpoint of a later age than that of the second writer.

I. We have a narrative from the well-known source JE, which has suffered very slight mutilation at the hands of the final redactor. It tells how Dathan and Abiram, descendants of Reuben, the oldest of Jacob's sons, rose against Moses, because they were jealous of the authority he claimed, and were disappointed with the results of his leadership. On being informed of their murmurings, Moses cited them to appear before him; but they refused to obey the summons, and repeated to his messengers their complaints (Nu 16^{12-14}). Moses, in anger (v.^{15}), went to their tents in company with the elders of Israel, and solemnly warned the people to withdraw from the neighbourhood of Dathan and Abiram, who, with all their households, were then swallowed up by the earth (vv.$^{28-34}$). 'This is a rebellion of laymen against the civil authority claimed by Moses' (Driver).

II. The author of the priestly narrative (P) relates quite a different story. Korah, at the head of 250 princes of the congregation, instigates a rebellion against Moses and Aaron, in the interests of the people at large against the tribe of Levi. 'All the congregation are holy,' says K. (v.^{3}), and as much entitled as the Levites to discharge religious functions. Moses invites them to put the matter to the proof by coming on the following day with their censers to offer incense. They accept the challenge (vv.$^{18.19}$), and, in the act of offering, they are consumed by fire from the Lord (v.^{35}). Their fate provokes the people, who murmur that Moses and Aaron had killed the people of the Lord (v.^{41}). A plague breaks out in consequence, which is only stayed by the atoning offering of Aaron (v.^{48}), The story of ch. 17 is the sequel, and comes from the same source, P. The blossoming of Aaron's rod is meant to establish, not his rights in opposition to those of other Levites, but to establish the prerogative of the tribe of Levi as represented by Aaron, in opposition to the other tribes as represented by their respective princes. Here, again, we have a rebellion of laymen, but directed this time against the ecclesiastical authority claimed by the tribe of Levi.

III. Another writer of the priestly school, whom we may designate, with Cornill, P^{x}, worked up the narrative at a later period. In his version of the story, K., at the head of 250 Levites, opposes, in the interest of the tribe of Levi, the monopoly of the priesthood claimed by Aaron (vv.$^{8-11}$). The test proposed by Moses is the same as in the second narrative (vv.$^{16.17}$, which are a repetition of vv.$^{6.7}$), and P's account of the fate of the rebels is adopted (v.^{35}) without change. From the hand of the latest writer come also vv.$^{36-40}$, which relate how the censers of the 250 were made into a covering for the altar, to be a memorial of the fate of the rebels.

It is evident that the two priestly narratives have quite different aims. In P there is no opposition between Levites and priests, but between non-Levites and Levites, whereas in P^{x} there is a sharp distinction between the tribe of Levi and the family of Aaron. (Note especially v.^{40}, where the moral of P^{x}'s narrative is thus given, 'that no stranger which is not of the seed of Aaron come near to burn incense before the Lord, that he be not as K. and as his company'). On the other hand, it is not quite certain whether, according to the original narrative of P, even K. himself was a Levite, for the words in v.^{1} 'the son of Izhar, the son of Kobath, the son of Levi,' may well come from the hand of the redactor. But in any case it is clear enough that all his 250 followers were not Levites; a conclusion which is confirmed, if confirmation were necessary, by Nu 27^3, where the daughters of Zelophehad plead that their father had no part in the rebellion of Korah. As Zelophehad belonged to the tribe of Manasseh, this plea need not have been offered if all K.'s followers had been Levites.

The differences between JE and P, and the original independence of their narratives, are equally apparent. JE knows only Dathan and Abiram, P knows only Korah; and, accordingly, the author of Dt 11^6, who is acquainted with the Jahwistic but not with the Priestly document, mentions only Dathan and Abiram.

The analysis of the two chapters may be given as follows (practically after Driver):—

P $16^{1a. 2b-7a. 18-24. 27a. 32b. 35. 41-50}$. ch. 17.
P^x $16^{7b-11. 16-17. 36-40}$.

The composite character of the narrative is borne out by the separation, after 16^1, of the two parties, Dathan and Abiram on the one hand, Korah and his company on the other. They act separately (cf. vv.$^{3-4}$ with vv.$^{12-15}$); they are addressed separately (cf. vv.$^{5-7}$ with vv.$^{25. 26}$); they are punished separately and differently (cf. v.^{31} with v.^{35}).

Traces of the welding process by which the narrative has assumed the comparative smoothness of its present form may be detected in v.^{7b} ('ye sons of Levi'), and in v.^{32b} ('and all the men that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods').

It cannot be over-emphasized that all the indications in the narrative point to the above result, and that literary differences combine with differences of agents and of motives to establish three distinct elements in the composition. 'Of course in itself a difference of motive is no ground for supposing that the narrative in which it appears is of composite authorship; that inference follows solely from the manner in which the difference is introduced . . . In itself an alliance between an ecclesiastical and a civil party is perfectly intelligible; but the literary analysis shows Nu 16 to be composite; and when the component parts have been separated into two groups, it is found that the actors in one group represent ecclesiastical interests, while they represent civil interests in the other. Such a coincidence cannot be accidental; the differences of person and motive (though they might have been combined in such a manner as to arouse no suspicion whatever that the narrative was composite) so coincide with literary differences as to corroborate the conclusion to which these point' (Driver, LOT^{5}, App. 523 f. [cf. ^{6} p. 65]).

We have thus disentangled three distinct narratives, of which the last two are memorials of the struggles that took place, and of the various stages that were passed through before the prerogatives of Levi were admitted by the other tribes, and those of the house of Aaron by the other Levitical families. At whatever date we place these last results, we may be certain that they were not reached without fierce opposition.

One or two remarks have still to be made on the text of Nu 16. In v.^{1} וַיִּקַּח, for which the LXX offers ἐλάλησεν, and which AV and RV both render 'took men' (supplying the last word), can scarcely be the correct reading. There is probably a copyist's error also in וְאוֹן בֶּן־פֶּלֶת 'and On the son of Peleth.' There is no mention of On in the subsequent narrative, nor does his name occur anywhere else in the OT. For Peleth we should doubtless read, as in Ex 6^{14} etc., Pallu, and perhaps, as Graf suggests, v.^{1b} should run thus: וְדָתָן וַאֲבִירָם בְּנֵי אֱלִיאָב בֶּן־פַּלּוּא בֶּן־רְאוּבֵן. In vv.^{24} and ^{27} Wellhausen and Driver agree in holding that the original reading was probably 'tabernacle of J″.'

KORAHITES (קָרְחִי), or SONS OF KORAH (בְּנֵי קֹרַח); AV has in Nu 26^{58} Korathites, and in Ex 6^{24}, 1 Ch 12^6 26^1, 2 Ch 20^{19} Korhites.—The inference from Nu 16^{32}, that the whole family of Korah perished along with their head, is checked by a note in 26^{11} to the effect that the 'sons of Korah died not.' This explanation was called for in view of the fact that a well-known guild connected with the second temple traced their descent to Korah. At one time the 'sons of K.' appear to have constituted one of the two great temple choirs, the Asaphites composing the other (see ASAPH). We have two groups of Pss (42–49 and 84. 85. 87. 88) whose superscription לִבְנֵי קֹרַח shows that they were taken from what was once the hymn-book of the Korahite choir. The musical service of the temple had been remodelled by the time of the Chronicler, when three guilds (Heman, Asaph, Ethan) had replaced the original two (Asaph, Korah). The Korahites have now become a guild of door-keepers (1 Ch 9^{18} /19 $26^{1. 19}$ etc.), although a reminiscence of their former functions as singers is found in 2 Ch 20^{19} (W. R. Smith, OTJC^{2} 205 n.). J. A. SELBIE.

L

L.—1. This symbol was proposed by de Lagarde (Genesis græce, 1868, p. 12) to denote the illuminated Purple Manuscript of the Greek Genesis at Vienna, one of the chief specimens of Christian book-illumination. The manuscript is designated VI by Holmes, and the text has been edited by him from a copy of Alter, 1795, in a publication preparatory to the great Oxford Septuagint (title: Honorabili, et admodum reverendo, Shute Barrington, LL.D. Episcopo Dunelmensi, Epistola, complexa GENESIN, ex codice purpureo-argenteo Cæsareo-Vindobonensi expressam; et Testamenti Veteris Græci, versionis septuaginta-viralis, cum variis lectionibus denuo edendi, Specimen. Dedit Robertus Holmes, S.T.P. Oxonii, MDCCXCV fol.). It is a parallel to the famous Codex Cottonianus Geneseos in the British Museum, and has not been used by Swete for his edition of the Greek OT (vol. i. 2nd ed. 1895),* because at that time it was not yet published in full facsimile. This has been done since in the splendid work, Die Wiener Genesis herausgegeben von Wilhelm Ritter von Hartel und Franz Wickhoff. Beilage zum xv. und xvi. Bande des Jahrbuches der Kunsthistorischen Sammlungen des Allerhöchsten Kaiserhauses. Mit 52 Lichtdrucktalfeln, etc. Wien (Prag, Leipzig), F. Tempsky, 1895 fol. (the Greek text in transcription, pp. 102–125). An exhaustive monograph on the pictures of the MS has recently been published by a pupil of Prof. V. Schultze of Greifswald, Willy Lüdtke, Untersuchungen zu den Miniaturen der Wiener Genesis (Inaugural Dissertation, Greifswald, 1897, 50 pp.). Lüdtke considers the volume as the first known manuscript of the Bible in which pictures are connected with the text, the first illustrated book of Bible story, and is inclined to assign it to the latter half of the 5th cent. E. M. Thompson (Handbook of Greek and Latin Palæography, 1893, p. 154) makes it probably of the latter half of the 6th cent.; Kenyon, of the 5th or 6th cent. The text is sometimes abbreviated, and several passages are very difficult to read; the MS is therefore less important for the textual criticism of the Greek OT; but it is a monument of the first rank in the history of Christian art. Attached to the codex are two leaves from the purple MS of the New Testament, called N.

2. In the criticism of the NT the symbol L is used to designate the Codex Regius, a manuscript of the Greek Gospels preserved in the National Library of Paris, now numbered 62. It was known already to Stephen, who called it η, as is stated in the volume by a later hand, 'Roberto Stephano η.' Scrivener (Introduction to the NT, 4th ed. (1894) p. 138) overlooked this η, and misunderstood, therefore, this entry when he wrote, 'it was even then in the Royal Library, although "Roberto Stephano" is marked in the volume.' Griesbach rated the MS very high: Tischendorf published it in full in his Monumenta sacra inedita, 1846. It is ascribed to the 8th cent., and was for a long time unique, as giving two alternative endings to the Gospel of Mark, namely—besides and before the received one, which is introduced by the heading ἔστιν δὲ καὶ ταῦτα φερόμενα μετὰ τό· ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ, a shorter ending, printed by Westcott-Hort after the one just mentioned. This wretched supplement, as Scrivener styles it, is separated in this MS from the words of the text (ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ) by an ornamented line, and introduced by the heading φέρεταί που καὶ ταῦτα. Recently it has been found in several Greek, Latin, Syriac, and Ethiopic documents, the nearest ally to L being a manuscript on Mount Sinai (Δ^{12}), ascribed to the 7th cent. The latter has the subscription εὐαγγέλιον κατὰ Μάρκον immediately after ἐφοβοῦντο γάρ; then follows the shorter supplement (whether introduced by the same formula as in L is not certain, the MS being defective at that place) with slight variations (om. καὶ before ἄχρι, adds ἀμήν after σωτηρία); after this comes ἔστιν δὲ καὶ ταῦτα etc. On the questions connected with the end of St. Mark see the monograph of Dean Burgon (1871); P. Martin, Introduction à la critique textuelle du NT, Partie pratique, tome ii. (1884); Westcott-Hort, NT, App. 28–51, with the additional notes to pp. 38 and 51 on p. 142 of the reprint of 1896; J. R. Harris, 'On the alternative ending of St. Mark's Gospel,' Journ. of Biblical Literature (1894), pp. 96–103; H. B. Swete, The Gospel according to St. Mark (1898), p. xcvi ff.; Th. Zahn, Einleitung in das Neue Testament (1899), ii. pp. 227–235, 237–240. The shorter ending had its origin probably in Egypt; there also L seems to have been written. On the third leaf of the MS is a note by a later hand, which might show where the MS was before it came to Europe, if it could be read and interpreted with certainty (a Georgios τοῦ Λιάσκόβιτη left some MSS εἰς τοῦ Ἰωάννου τοῦ Παύλου τὸ ὀσπίτιον). Facsimiles are to be found in Tischendorf, plate i. n. 7, plate iii. n. 7; Scrivener, plate ix. n. 21; P. Martin, Description technique des manuscrits grecs relatifs au NT conservées dans les bibliothèques de Paris (1884), plate 1.

EB. NESTLE.

LAADAH (לַעְדָּה).—A Judahite, the 'father' of Mareshah, 1 Ch 4^{21} (B Μαδάθ, A Λαδά).

LABAN (לָבָן, Λαβάν).—1. Son of Bethuel (Gn 28^{5}), grandson of Nahor, Abraham's brother ($22^{20.\ 22}$ 24^{24},—in 29^{5} 'son'=grandson), and brother of Rebekah (24^{29}; 25^{20}), uncle of Jacob on his mother's side (27^{43}; 28^{2}), and (after his marriage with Leah) his father-in-law as well. When Abraham and Lot migrated from Ḥaran (on the Belikh, a tributary of the Euphrates, in Mesopotamia) into Canaan (Gn $12^{4.\ 5}$), Nahor remained behind in Ḥaran; here his family grew up around him (22^{20-24}; the names, except in the cases of Bethuel and Rebekah, are, however, those of tribes); and Ḥaran (cf. 29^{4}), though the identification is not made expressly, is, there can be no doubt, the 'city of Nahor' (24^{10}), to which Abraham's servant took his way, when sent by his master to find a wife for Isaac from the land of his nativity. Laban's home (Gn 24^{10}) was in 'Aram (AV Syria) of the two rivers' (the Euphrates, in its upper course, and the Ḥabor); and so, like his father Bethuel (25^{20} 28^{5}), he is called specifically the 'Aramæan' (AV Syrian), 25^{20} $31^{20.\ 24}$ (cf. of Jacob, Dt 26^{5}). It is in connexion with the negotiations for Rebekah's hand that we first read of Laban. He is evidently the moving spirit in his father's house. He comes forward to receive Abraham's servant, listens to what he has to say, and takes the lead in the subsequent negotiations ($24^{29-33.\ 50.\ 53b.\ 55}$). It is no doubt true that in the East (cf. Gn $34^{11.\ 12}$, Ca 8^{8}) a girl's brothers have a prominent voice in the disposal of their sister's hand; but, independently of this, Laban seems clearly to throw his father Bethuel into the background. It has been observed that Laban already displays the grasping disposition which was manifested more fully afterwards in his dealings with Jacob: he is attracted by the ring and bracelets which Abraham's servant had given his sister (24^{30}).

* Its readings will find a place in the Apparatus of the larger edition, which is now being prepared by Brooke and M'Lean.

What we read about Laban subsequently relates exclusively to his dealings with Jacob (29^{10}–31^{55}). These have been described so fully in the art. JACOB (vol. ii. pp. 528–9, 533) that an outline will be sufficient here. Laban must now be pictured as quite an old man. Jacob, sent by his mother to her brother, arrives at Ḥaran, and quickly finds his uncle's house (29^{1-13}). He remains with him a month (29^{14}); at the end of which time Laban, no doubt discovering that his services as a shepherd are likely to prove valuable to him, asks him on what terms he will remain with him. He replies that he will serve him 7 years for his younger daughter Rachel. At the end of the 7 years Laban, by a ruse, passes off upon him his elder daughter Leah; and only permits him to have Rachel as well, on condition that he serves him for 7 years more (29^{15-30}). At the end of the second 7 years Jacob is anxious to return home; but Laban, reluctant to part with a profitable servant, invites him, with a show of disinterestedness, to name the terms on which he will continue in his service (30^{25-28}). Jacob thereupon proposes an arrangement by which, ostensibly, he will gain little or nothing, and with which, therefore, Laban immediately closes, but which, it soon appears, his son-in-law knows how to turn to his own advantage (30^{29-43}). Laban, envious of Jacob's increasing prosperity, now shows ill-will towards him; his sons (mentioned also in 30^{35}) complain that Jacob has taken away all their father's possessions: accordingly Jacob, after consulting with his wives (who both agree that their father has shown them no real affection, $31^{14.\ 15}$),* takes flight, accompanied by his family and their belongings (31^{1-21}). His father-in-law, considering that he has some kind of claim on the services and belongings of his son-in law, and vexed besides at the loss of the teraphim (which Rachel had stolen), starts in pursuit. On the way, apparently on the night before he came up with Jacob, 'as if an evil conscience preyed secretly upon him' (Ewald, Hist. i. 356), he is warned in a dream not to proceed against Jacob too violently (31^{24}). Overtaking the fugitives on the borders of Gilead, Laban remonstrates with Jacob on his ungrateful treatment of him, and especially for having carried away his daughters secretly, which was both an affront to them (31^{26b}), and an injury to his own feelings (31^{28}). Jacob, in reply, declares that he was afraid, if he told Laban, that he would retain his daughters by force; and then, after the incident with the teraphim (in which Laban is outwitted by his own daughter), he goes on to remind him of the long years which he has spent ungrudgingly in his service, and of the repeated attempts that Laban had made ($31^{7f.}$) to deprive him of his lawful earnings (31^{31-42}). Laban, conscious of the truth in Jacob's reproaches, makes no attempt to reply: he contents himself with protesting that everything which Jacob has is really his; and then seeks to close the dispute by representing himself as concerned for his daughters' welfare. Accordingly he proposes a covenant, the terms of which are—(1) that Jacob will in no way ill-treat his daughters; (2) that neither he nor Jacob will pass the boundary, marked by a heap of stones then thrown up, with hostile intent towards the other (see, further, on the object of this 'covenant,' above, ii. p. 529). The covenant having been solemnly ratified by both parties, Laban returns home, and is not mentioned again (31^{43-55}).

The character of Laban is not an amiable one. His sister and daughters all show duplicity and acquisitiveness; and Laban displays an exaggeration of the same qualities. His leading motive is evidently self-interest; and he is not particular in the choice of means for securing his ends. The ruse by which he passes off Leah upon his nephew instead of Rachel, is an unpardonable piece of deceit. In his subsequent dealings with his son-in-law, he does not treat him equitably. It is admitted by him, expressly in J (30^{27}), and by implication in E,—for the statements in 31^{38-41}, cf. v.^{6}, pass unchallenged,—that Jacob is a good servant; but Laban seeks to make out of him more than fair profits. In 30^{29-43} he betrays his grasping disposition by closing with an arrangement which, if carried out fairly, could not but have proved an inequitable one for Jacob, and in which, therefore, Laban had no right to be surprised if he found himself circumvented. In the narrative of E (31^{1-42})—which (vv.$^{8-12}$) differs from that of J in not representing Jacob as taking any unfair advantage of his father-in-law (cf. ii. p. 533, note)—Laban is charged with defrauding Jacob, and arbitrarily changing the wages that had been agreed upon, to suit his own ends (vv.$^{7.\ 41}$). And his daughters own ($31^{14.\ 15}$) that he is a hard and unnatural parent.

2. A place mentioned in the obscure verse, Dt 1^{1} (see Comm.; or above, art. DI-ZAHAB). Nothing can be said about it, except that if the verse describes a locality in the 'steppes of Moab,' Laban will be the name of a place in that neighbourhood, otherwise unknown; while if, as others suppose, the verse, at least in its original context, described places passed by the Israelites in their previous wanderings, it may be identical with the LIBNAH (which see) of Nu 33^{20} (which, to judge from v.^{17}, was near a Ḥazêroth, as was the case also with the Laban mentioned in Dt 1^{1}). S. R. DRIVER.

LABANA (Λαβανά), 1 Es 5^{29} = LEBANAH, Ezr 2^{45}.

LABOUR.—As a subst. 'labour' is now almost confined to what is called the abstract use—the act or state of labouring. Formerly it expressed also the fruit of labour, as Ex 23^{16} 'when thou hast gathered in thy labours (מַעֲשֶׂיךָ) out of the field'; Hab 3^{17} 'The labour (מַעֲשֵׂה) of the olive shall fail' (Davidson, 'the produce of the olive'). Hence the word is frequently in the plural, as Jn 4^{38} 'other men laboured, and ye are entered into their labours' (εἰς τὸν κόπον αὐτῶν, RV 'into their labour'). Knox, Hist. 92, has the word in the sense of 'effort,' 'Great labours were made to make them have a good opinion of the Masse.'

The verb is used with a trans. force in 2 Mac 2^{31} 'But to use brevity, and avoid much labouring of the work (τὸ ἐξεργαστικὸν τῆς πραγματ(ε)ίας παραιτεῖσθαι, RV 'to avoid a laboured fulness in the treatment'), is to be granted to him that will make an abridgement.' So in beg. of Pref. to AV 1611, 'Zeale to promote the common good, whether it be by devising any thing our selves, or revising that which hath bene laboured by others, deserveth certainly much respect and esteeme, but yet findeth but cold intertainment in the world.' Cf. Hall, Works, ii. 100, 'these are the men whose cure wee must labour'; Pref. to Rhem. NT, 1852, 'The poore ploughman, could then in labouring the ground, sing the hymnes and psalmes either in knowen or unknowen languages, as they heard them in the holy Church, though they could neither reade nor know the sense, meaning, and mysteries of the same.' J. HASTINGS.

* 'And hath also quite devoured our money,' i.e. the price paid for us by our husband, the gains accruing to Laban from Jacob's 14 years' service, some part of which he would, if generous, have naturally allowed his daughters.

LACE.—Lace is from Lat. laqueus, a snare, through the Old French laqs, las, and it is used in the sense of snare in Chaucer, Spenser, and others. Thus Chaucer, Legend of Good Women, 600—

> 'But love had broght this man in swiche a rage,
> And him so narwe bounden in his las,
> Al for the love of Cleopataras,
> That al the world he sette at no value.'

Then it is used for any cord or band, as Fuller, Holy Warre, 123, 'Pitie it was that Rahabs red lace was not tied at his window.' This is the meaning of the word in AV, where it occurs only as tr. of פָּתִיל pâthîl,* Ex 28^{28} ('And they shall bind the breastplate by the rings thereof unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue') 28^{37} $39^{21.\,31}$; and of κλῶσμα in Sir 6^{30} 'her bands are purple lace' (κλῶσμα ὑακίνθινον, AVm 'a ribband of blue silk'; RV 'a ribband of blue'; Fritzsche, 'purple-blue threads'; Bissell, 'hyacinthine threads'). Cf. Shaks. Winter's Tale, III. ii. 174—

> 'O, cut my lace, lest my heart, cracking it, > Break too.'

LACEDÆMONIANS.—The word Λακεδαιμόνιοι occurs only once in LXX, and its Eng. equivalent only once in RV, viz. 2 Mac 5^{9}. Jason, the head of the Hellenizing party in Jerus., who had bought the high priesthood from his brother Onias III. during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes, was himself outbidden and expelled from the office by Menelaus his brother (Jos. Ant. XII. v. 1 and XV. iii. 1), or, according to 2 Mac 4^{23}, the brother of Simon, a former governor of the temple. On a false report of the death of Antiochus, Jason made an unsuccessful assault upon Jerus.; but, after causing great loss of life among his fellow-citizens, he was driven an outcast to the land of the Ammonites, from there to the court of Aretas an Arabian prince, then into Egypt, and lastly to the L., in whose country he died a dishonoured exile. The reason of his ultimate recourse to the latter people was the alleged kinship between the Jews and the Greeks, resting on the supposed connexion between Peleg and the Pelasgians, a prehistoric people mentioned as living in different parts of Greece and coasts of the Ægean Sea. Peleg, however, or Phaleg, whose name implies 'division' (Jos. Ant. I. vi. 4), the ancestor of Abraham and the son of Heber,—the eponymous ancestor of the Hebrew race,—was (Jos. ib.) the great-grandson of Noah, and belonged to the Semitic family. The Pelasgians, on the other hand, were part of the Indo-European stock, and afterwards mingled with the Hellenes in Greece, and with the Carians, Lydians, and Phrygians in Asia Minor.

LACHISH (לָכִישׁ, LXX Λαχείς, twice with the art. τὴν Λαχείς Jos $10^{32\text{f.}}$, in Jos 15^{39} B Μαχής, B^{ab} Λαχής; Vulg. Lachis).—An important fortified town in Judah. Its king, Japhia, formed a league with four other Canaanite kings, viz. those of Jerus., Eglon, Hebron, and Jarmuth, to smite the Gibeonites, as they had made peace with Israel (Jos $10^{1\text{ff.}}$, JE mainly). Joshua overcame the united forces, and the kings fled to a cave in Makkedah, where they were pursued by the Israelites, who rolled stones against the mouth of the cave. Later, the kings were taken out, humiliated, and hanged on five trees. At sunset, by command of Joshua, their bodies were taken down and placed in the cave, at whose mouth stones were again rolled. The siege of L. by Joshua, according to D^2, occupied parts of two days (vv.$^{31.\,32}$). When it was taken, all the inhabitants were put to the sword.

The place is next mentioned in the list of cities built by Rehoboam for defence, by which it may be understood that he re-fortified the town (2 Ch 11^{9}). Amaziah fled to L. from a conspiracy in Jerus., but he was pursued and slain there (2 K 14^{19} ‖ 2 Ch 25^{27}). The prophet Micah inveighs against L. as 'the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion, for the transgressions of Israel were found in thee' (Mic 1^{13}), an enigmatical utterance, the conjectures regarding the meaning of which will be found in Nowack's Comm. ad loc. When Sennacherib made his raid on the kingdom of Judah, he took all the fortified cities, including L. (2 K $18^{13.\,14}$, Is 36^{1}). The scene of the siege is depicted in an Assyr. sculpture, now in the British Museum. To this place Hezekiah sent messengers with immense gifts and promises of submission, to induce the Assyr. king, who was there encamped, to abandon the campaign (2 K $18^{14\text{-}16}$). In reply, Sennacherib despatched a great host against Jerus. (2 K 18^{17} ‖ Is 36^{2}). But his forces were miraculously destroyed, and he returned to Assyria, abandoning his conquests (2 K $19^{35.\,36}$ ‖ Is $37^{36.\,37}$, 2 Ch 32^{21}). The account in 2 Ch 32^{9} mentions the envoys sent to Hezekiah, but not the expedition against Jerus., as it says of Sennacherib, 'but he (himself laid siege) to L., and all his power with him.' When c. 120 years later, Nebuch. king of Babylon, destroyed the kingdom of Judah and carried the people into captivity, L. was one of the cities taken (Jer 34^{7}). On the return of the Jews, L. was one of the places re-occupied, but it is noticeable that while each of the other places is spoken of as being occupied 'with the villages thereof,' 'Lachish and the fields thereof' are referred to as if the occupation was but feeble (Neh 11^{30}). It is not mentioned in the NT, nor in the Apocrypha.

Scholars are now generally agreed that L. is to be identified with Tell el-Ḥesy, a mound in the rolling country between the maritime plain and the Judæan hills, 16 miles E. of Gaza, a little to the north. This identification was first proposed by Conder, who sees in the radicals of the modern name a reminiscence of the ancient, though the change in the second radical from כ to ח is unusual. The position of Tell el-Ḥesy corresponds fairly with Jerome's description of L. in the Onomasticon. He says: 'Lachis in tribu Juda . . . et nunc est villa in septimo milliario ab Eleutheropoli euntibus Daromam.' Eleutheropolis is the modern Beit Jibrin, 10 miles from Tell el-Ḥesy, which nearly coincides. Daroma may be the Shephelah, or low country, in which Tell el-Ḥesy is situated. Another equally important mound, Tell en-Nejileh, is found $3\frac{1}{2}$ miles to the south of Tell el-Ḥesy, about the same distance from Beit Jibrin. Both have springs at their base. These two mounds seem to represent L. and Eglon, which were within easy marching distance, as Joshua took Eglon on the day that he left L. (Jos 10^{35}). As Eglon disappears from history earlier than L., and as the remains on the top of Tell en-Nejileh are earlier than those on the top of Tell el-Ḥesy, Petrie regards the former as Eglon and the later as Lachish. However, until systematic excavations are conducted at Tell en-Nejileh, the matter should not be held to be finally settled.

The site of Tell el-Ḥesy is admirably suited for a town, as the original dwellings stood on a bluff facing east, some 60 feet above the Wady el-Ḥesy, and were further protected by ridges to the west. During the course of centuries the remains accumulated, until the last occupation stood some 120 feet above the stream-bed. In 1890, Petrie, excavating for the Pal. Explor. Fund, studied the tell, during a short season, in cuttings around its sides, arriving at conclusions which the present writer's more extended work, covering four seasons, modified, but did not materially alter. One-third of the mound being chosen, it was cut down, layer by layer, each layer representing a distinct occupation, until the virgin soil was reached. We have thus the plans of eight cities, the second built on the ruins of the first, the third on the ruins of the second, and so on. This series of superimposed constructions is due to the material. Each city was built of mud-brick, which requires nothing but mud-brick for its foundation. The cities were approximately dated by the objects found in situ. The first three or four towns occupied an area about ¼ mile square, while the later towns confined themselves to a space about 100 yards square, and may thus be regarded as a series of forts, as almost all are flanked by thick walls. The earliest town was distinguished by peculiar styles of pottery, which have been named Amorite. It also contained a group of unique bronze implements. It is fortified by a strong wall and tower, and may be dated at about B.C. 1700. City II. is dated by scarabs at about B.C. 1500. City III. was buried under a thick bed of ashes. Outside one of its chambers was discovered a cuneiform tablet, which from its style and contents is shown to belong to the period of the Tel el-Amarna tablets, which were letters sent to Amenhotep III. and IV. of Egypt, about B.C. 1450, by their allies and dependants in Syria, Palestine, and farther east. It mentions the name of Zimridi, who, as we learn in a tablet from Jerus., was governor of L., murdered in that city by servants of the Egyp. king. The hopes suggested by the discovery of this tablet are far-reaching. The date B.C. 1450 for this city is confirmed by scarabs found here. In City IV. (B.C. 1400–1000) Phœn. pottery prevails. Here iron objects first appeared, but these were found in all the superimposed cities. In City V. (about B.C. 1000) and City VI. (about 800) Jewish ware is prevalent. City VI. has a great accumulation, from which we infer a long occupation. The red and black figured Greek pottery is common in Cities VII. and VIII., suggesting B.C. 500–400 as the limits of these occupations. The absence of coins and of Roman and Seleucidan remains shows that the site was deserted after B.C. 400.

* Elsewhere pâthîl is rendered in AV 'bound' Nu 19^{15}; 'ribband' Nu 15^{38} (RV 'cord'); 'thread' Jg 16^{9} (RV 'string'); 'line' Ezk 40^{3}; 'bracelets' Gn 38^{18} (RV 'cord') 38^{25} (RV 'cords'); 'wires' Ex 39^{3}.

The remains at Tell el-Ḥesy thus correspond admirably to the history of Lachish. One of the earlier cities undoubtedly fell a prey to Joshua, a later one was fortified by Rehoboam, and we may point with considerable confidence to the thick walls of City VI. as the fortifications taken by Sennacherib, whose sculptures commemorating the event bear a striking resemblance to Tell el-Ḥesy.

We have, however, in considering the identification, to count with the phrase of Jerome, 'nunc est villa.' While the tell shows no late remains, the adjacent fields are strewn with Roman pottery, and 3 miles away is the slight ruin of Umm-Lakis [but see Clermont-Ganneau, Bibl. Res. in Pal. i. (1896) p. 438], containing Roman remains, which was formerly identified with L. and which Petrie translates, 'her [? ; see Mound of Many Cities, p. 141] mother was Lachish.' He suggests that soon after the return of the Jews from exile they removed the settlement to Umm-Lakis. The name is pronounced Laggis by the Arabs, who pronounce a ק like hard g. A change from כ to ק is not common. But either in the fields near Tell el-Ḥesy, or at Umm-Lakis, we have late ruins which may easily represent the town still inhabited in the time of Jerome.

LACK is both a subst. (=want) and a verb (=be deficient in, want). Thus as subst., Ex 16^{18} 'he that gathered little had no lack'; Job 4^{11} 'The old lion perisheth for lack of prey'; Ph 2^{30} 'to supply your lack of service toward me' (τὸ ὑμῶν ὑστέρημα; RV 'that which was lacking in your service'); 1 Th 4^{12} 'that ye may have lack (χρείαν, RV 'need') of nothing.' Cf. Elyot, Governour, ii. 263, 'To the one and the other is required the vertue morall called fortitude, whiche as moche as it is a vertue is a Mediocritie or meane betwene two extremities, the one in surplusage, the other in lacke'; T. Lever, Sermons, p. 83, 'Some doo raveyn and spoyll that which is not their owne, and be ever in lacke and neede.' Lever uses the subst. in the plu. also, Sermons, p. 74, 'These be verye small thinges towardes the amendment of so many lackes, in so great a multitude.'

As a verb 'lack' is both trans. and intrans. Thus Ja 1^{5} 'If any of you lack wisdom, let him ask of God.' Cf. Ro 2^{20} Tind., 'An informer of them which lacke discrecion'; Pr. Bk. 1549 (Communion), 'And if there be any of you, whose conscience is troubled and grieved in any thing, lacking comfort or counsel, let him come to me, or to some other discreet and learned priest, taught in the law of God, and confess and open his sin and grief secretly, that he may receive such ghostly counsel, advice, and comfort, that his conscience may be relieved.' The intrans. use, though Abbott (Shaks. Gram. § 293) gives it in his list of 'trans. verbs rarely used intransitively,' is often found in AV. Thus Ps 34^{10} 'The young lions do lack, and suffer hunger'; 1 Co 12^{24} 'having given more abundant honour to that part which lacked.' Cf. Pr. Bk. 1552 (Com.), 'there lacketh nothing but the guests to sit down'; and Hall, Works, ii. 51, 'Either will or ability lacked in them.'

Earle (Psalter of 1539, p. 267) points out that, in place of 'lack' of previous versions, AV often has 'want.' He quotes Ps 23^{1} 'therefore can I lack nothing' in 1539, 'I shall not want' in 1611; Jg 18^{10}, Lk 15^{14}. And he explains that the word 'lack' had in the meantime suffered depreciation from the use of it as a common interpellation by stall-keepers to passers-by: What d'ye lack, what d'ye lack? To Earle's examples add Ja 1^{4} Tind. 'lacking nothing,' AV 'wanting nothing'; and for the subst., 'for lacke of knowlage' in the Camb. MS of Ridley's Brefe Declaration, reprinted by Moule (p. 95), changed in the Oxford and 'modernized' MS into 'want.'

LAD.—In OT the only word tr^{d} 'lad' is נַעַר naʿar (33 times), and in NT παιδάριον (once, Jn 6^{9}). Like naʿar in Heb., 'lad' has always been used colloquially in Eng. for 'servant.' Once RV changes 'lad' into 'servant,' 2 K 4^{19} 'And he said to a lad (הַנַּעַר, RV 'his servant'), Carry him to his mother.' Tindale uses the word of Joshua, Ex 33^{11} 'And when Moses turned agayne in to the hoste, the ladd Josua his servaunte the sonne of Nun departed not out of the tabernacle' (AV 'his servant [RV 'minister'] Joshua the son of Nun, a young man'). Once the Rhem. version translates παῖς by 'lad,' Mt 17^{18} 'the ladde was cured from that houre' (AV and all previous versions 'child,' RV 'boy').

J. HASTINGS

LADAN (לַעְדָּן).—1. A name occurring in the genealogy of Joshua, 1 Ch 7^{26} (Λαδδάν). 2. A Gershonite family name, 1 Ch $23^{7.8.9}$ (B Ἐδάν, A Λεαδάν) $26^{21\ ter}$ (B Χαδάν, Λαδάν bis, A Λεδάν bis, Λααδάν). In 6^{17} it appears as LIBNI (wh. see).

LADDER (סֻלָּם, κλίμαξ).—1. Jacob in his dream at Bethel saw a 'ladder' set up on the earth and reaching to heaven (Gn 28^{12}). The Heb. word occurs only here, and though LXX renders it by κλίμαξ it has been doubted whether 'ladder' conveys its exact meaning.* The heights near Bethel are said to present the appearance of steps from certain points of view, and it has been conjectured that in Jacob's dream the piled-up rocks around him were transformed into a vast stairway on which angels went and came (Dillm. and others note that the angels are conceived as wingless. See ANGEL, vol. i. p. 94^{a}). The visionary 'ladder' was a symbol to Jacob of the communication with God which was open to him, and Christ alluded to it in claiming that this communication between heaven and earth would be perfected in Himself (Jn 1^{51}). See Bush, Notes on Genesis; Dods, Genesis, in loc. 2. In 1 Mac 5^{30} ladders are mentioned among the preparations for the siege of Dathema. The use of scaling ladders for attacking fortified walls was general in ancient warfare. Such ladders are represented on Egyptian and Assyrian monuments, as well as on later classical remains. See Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, i. 243; Erman, Ancient Egypt, 533; Layard, Nineveh, ii. 372; Rüstow u. Köchly, Geschichte des Griechischen Kriegswesens, 205, 320; Rich, Rom. and Gr. Antiquities, s.v. 'Scalæ.'

* Henderson (Expos. Times, Jan. 1893, p. 151 f.) contends that Jacob's 'ladder' was really a temple-tower similar to the Babylonian E-Sagila.

JAMES PATRICK.

LADDER OF TYRE (ἀπὸ τῆς κλίμακος Τύρου; Vulg. a terminis Tyri; Syr. 'from the borders of Tyre,' 1 Mac 11^{59}; Talm. סולמא דצור; 'κλίματος in Alex. 64, 93 ist vielleicht vorwitzige* Aenderung des unverstandenen Ausdrucks,' Grimm, Handbuch zu den Apokryphen, loc. cit.).—This was evidently a prominent landmark; it is given as the northern limit of the territory to the captaincy of which Antiochus VI. promoted Simon Maccabæus (1 Mac 11^{59}; Jos. Ant. XIII. v. 4). In describing the situation of Acre, Josephus mentions it again, as a mountain lying about 100 stadia to the north (BJ II. x. 2). The mountains stand round the plain of Acre almost in the form of a semicircle, terminating S.W. and N.W. in the bold promontories of Carmel and Râs en-Naḳûrah, which drop precipitously on the shore. Between the base of Carmel and the beach there is a strip of land, leaving room for a highway, which affords free communication between the plain of Acre and that of Sharon. The cliffs of Râs en-Naḳûrah, on the contrary, plunge straight into the waves, and the journey northward is made with difficulty over the height. This has led many to identify Râs en-Naḳûrah with the 'Ladder' to be scaled before the land of the Tyrians could be approached. But when this obstacle is surmounted, a not less formidable barrier is interposed between the traveller and Tyre by Râs el-Abyaḍ, 'the white promontory,' Pliny's Promontorium album, at a few miles' distance, on the northern edge of a pleasant vale. The cliffs of this headland 'of white indurated marl interlaced with seams of dark-coloured flint,' fall from a great height, sheer into the sea. Along the face of the precipice a pathway has been cut, to be traversed not without danger; the crags rising steeply from the edge on one hand, and on the other a perpendicular descent, the waves booming among the rocks and caves 200 ft. below. The ascent to this path is cut after the manner of a staircase. This, perhaps, has led some to identify the Ladder of Tyre with Râs el-Abyaḍ. But the same was true of Râs en-Naḳûrah before certain recent alterations (PEF Mem. i. 192). Asher hazards the conjecture that Benjamin of Tudela intended this place by חוֹמַת צור (vol. ii. p. 75).

A study of the locality together with the statement of Josephus (BJ II. x. 2) has convinced the present writer that the name Ladder of Tyre was not applied to either of these promontories alone. Speaking in succession of the mountains of Galilee and Carmel, Josephus says that which the natives call the Ladder of the Tyrians 'is the highest of all.' Râs en-Naḳûrah, which is only 223 ft. high, does not answer the description; neither does Râs el-Abyaḍ, which, in addition, is not visible from Acre. It could apply only to the lofty ridge N. of the plain, measuring some 8 miles across, and rising to a height of over 1000 ft., which, as it sinks seaward, throws off three distinct headlands, terminating abruptly on the shore: Râs el-Musheirifeh, Râs en-Naḳûrah, and Râs el-Abyaḍ. The two former, being close together, are often spoken of as one under the name of the second. These western spurs, barring the approach to the Phœnician plain, doubtless suggested the name, 'Ladder of the Tyrians,' applied to the whole mountain.

LADE.—The mod. form 'load' occurs in AV 1611 twice, Is 46^{1} 'your carriages were heavie loaden,' and Ps 68^{19} 'Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits.' Elsewhere the form is 'lade,' which is now used only of ships. T. Fuller, Holy and Profane State, p. 359, says, 'The ship may have Castor and Pollux for the badge, yet notwithstanding have S. Paul for the lading.'

J. HASTINGS.

LADY.—This word occurs six times in AV, translating three different words. (1) גְּבֶרֶת gĕbhereth, which means 'mistress' and is so translated everywhere else (viz. Gn $16^{4.8.9}$, 2 K 5^{3}, Ps 123^{2}, Pr 30^{23}, Is 24^{2}), is translated 'lady' in Is $47^{5.7}$, a trⁿ which has come down from Wyclif. RV retains 'lady,' but Amer. RV prefers 'mistress.'

(2) שָׂרָה sârâh, the name of Abraham's wife, signifies 'princess,' which is its tr. in 1 K 11^{3} and La 1^{1} in AV and RV. But in Jg 5^{29}, Est 1^{18} AV gives 'lady,' which RV changes to 'princess' in the second passage; the same change should have been made in the first also. In Is 49^{23} both have 'queen,' with AVm 'princess.'

(3) In NT κυρία, which occurs only 2 $\mathrm{Jn}^{1.5}$, is translated 'lady,' a trⁿ which again comes from Wyclif. In this case the trⁿ is much disputed, some taking the word as a proper name. See art. JOHN, EPISTLES OF, vol. ii. p. 740 f.

As in the sense of master 'lord' has nearly passed out of use, except in its application to Christ, so 'lady' in the sense of mistress is rapidly passing away, except in reference to the Virgin Mary.* The Douay version of La 1^{1} was originally 'How doth the citie ful of people sit solitarie: how is the ladie of the Gentils become as a widow?' But the modern editions have 'mistress' for 'ladie.' Cf. Gn 16^{4} Wyc. 'And Agar seigh that sche hadde conseyved, and sche dispiside hir ladi'; and Is 47^{7} Cov. 'and thou thoughtest thus, I shalbe lady for ever.'

J. HASTINGS.

LAEL (לָאֵל, BA Δαήλ, Luc. Δαουήλ; O.L. [Lyons MS] Dael;—apparently an error extending through all known copies of the LXX, and earlier than the O.L.).—A Gershonite Levite, Nu 3^{24}. The name means 'belonging to God,' and is interesting as being almost the only example in OT of such a formation (preposition + divine name). The idea expressed by it 'appears to rest on a reflection which must have been foreign to the highest antiquity' (Nöldeke, WZKM, 1892, p. 314, quoted in Gray, Heb. Proper Names, p. 207; cf. also Wellhausen, Reste^{2}, p. 7). The nearest Semitic parallel to it adduced by Nöldeke is the Palmyrene לשמש 'belonging to the sun.'

J. A. SELBIE.

LAHAD (לַהַד).—A Judahite family name, 1 Ch 4^{2} (B Λαάθ, A Λάδ).

LAHAI-ROI.—See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

---

* Suggested perhaps by ὁρίων which follows.

* In the 'glosses' as they were called, i.e. marginal notes, to the fragment of NT printed by Tindale in 1525, there occurs at Mt 1^{25} 'it followeth not that Joseph knew our lady afterward.' In the notes to the NT of 1538, 'Mary' is substituted for 'our lady.'

LAHMAM (לַחְמָם, perh. textual error for לַחְמָס, which is adopted by RVm Lahmas, following LXX Μαχές and Luc. Λαμμάς).—A town of Judah, noticed with others near the foot of the hills, Jos 15[40]. There is a ruin called el-Lahm, near Beit Jibrîn, which is a possible site (cf. Tobler, Dritte Wanderung, 129; SWP vol. iii. sheet xx.). C. R. CONDER.

LAHMI. — The name given in our copies of Chronicles to a certain Philistine giant. The statement is: 'And smote Elhanan . . . Lahmi the brother of Goliath the Gittite' (1 Ch 20[5]). But the parallel statement is: 'And smote Elhanan . . . the Bethlehemite Goliath the Gittite' (2 S 21[19]). Any one who will compare these, as written in Hebrew characters, will find reason to think that one is a copy of the other, and that one copyist or the other misread his copy. Probably the reading in Samuel is correct, and the word Lahmi (אֶת־לַחְמִי) is properly a part of the word Bethlehemite (בֵּית הַלַּחְמִי), the giant in question being a relative and namesake of the Goliath whom David slew (but see art. DAVID, vol. i. p. 562ᵇ, and cf. Driver, Text of Sam. p. 272). W. J. BEECHER.

LAISH (לַיִשׁ).—1. The original name of the town of Dan (wh. see), Jg 18[7. 14. 27. 29]. The variation Leshem (wh. see) occurs in Jos 19[47 bis]. 2. The father of Palti or Paltiel, to whom Michal, David's wife, was given by Saul, 1 S 25[44], 2 S 3[15].

LAISHAH (לַיְשָׁה), Is 10[30].—The name of a place connected with Gallim, and mentioned here along with other localities in Benjamin and Judah. If Gallim be Beit Jâla near Bethlehem, Laishah would also be in that neighbourhood.

LAKE.—The inland waters which may be classed under the term lakes are of two kinds—open and closed. Open lakes, in which the water is fresh, have an outlet in the form of a river or stream by which the unevaporated waters escape; while, in the case of closed lakes having no outlet, the water they receive from streams or springs is evaporated as fast as it enters, and as a general result the water of such lakes is salt or brackish. Of both of these varieties we have examples in the cases of the three principal lakes of Palestine; those of Hûleh (Merom), Galilee (Tiberias), and the Dead Sea. In the case of the first two, the waters of the Jordan descending from their sources in the Lebanon, augmented by many other streams flowing in from the east and west, enter from the north and pass out from the south; finally entering at the northern end of the Dead Sea, they pass off into the air by evaporation, there being no outlet from this great reservoir (see MEROM, WATERS OF; GALILEE, L. OF; DEAD SEA). These lakes being each described under their own names, only a few points by which they are connected with each other need be noticed here.

(1) The physical origin of the Jordanic lakes.—As the great line of fault and dislocation of the strata known as 'the Jordan-Arabah fault' is now recognized as the primary cause of the valley, or line of depression, of that name, it may be inferred that the existence of the lakes is due to unequal subsidence in the primeval floor of this line of valley; the lake basins representing portions where the depression of the original bed was greater than the intervening portions now occupied by the river Jordan.* In addition to this cause, which may be called mechanical, it is not improbable that volcanic action during the Miocene and Pliocene periods may have played an important part in the formation of these great hollows. The evidences of volcanic action all along the eastern side, and, to a limited extent, along the western side, of the Jordan valley are shown in the vast sheets of lava of the Jaulân, Gilead, and Moab; and it seems a fair inference that the withdrawal of such enormous quantities of matter from the underground magma, and its extravasation at the surface, may have resulted in producing subsidences in the bed of the Jordan valley similar to those known to exist in other volcanic regions, such as Auvergne in Central France and the countries bordering the Mediterranean.

(2) Relative levels.—The surface of the Lake of Hûleh is 7 feet below that of the Mediterranean, and its depth slight; that of the Sea of Galilee 682 feet below the same level; and that of the Dead Sea 1292 feet: thus the fall between the L. of Hûleh and that of Galilee is 675 feet in a distance of 10 miles, being about 67 feet per mile, that between the L. of Galilee and the Dead Sea 610 feet in a distance of 65 miles, being at the rate of nearly 9·4 feet per mile; the Jordan is therefore, at least in its upper section, a rapid stream. The above distances are measured in a direct line.

Besides these three most important lakes, we may mention—

(a) L. Phiala (Birket er-Râm), lying at the southern foot of Hermon, a lake, circular in form and about half a mile in diameter, which occupies the crater of an extinct volcano; one of the great group of Trachonitis.*

(b) Birket el-Jish.—Another small lake of volcanic origin, occupying the crater of a truncated cone called Jebel Jish, not far from Safed, on the western side of the Jordan valley.

(c) The Damascus Lakes.—These shallow sheets of water, which in summer are converted into swamps, are fed by the Abana (Nahr Barada) and Pharpar (Nahr Taura) 'rivers of Damascus' (2 K 5[12]). These streams, issuing from the ravines in the Lebanon, by whose springs they are fed, pour their life-giving waters over a tract of the Syrian Desert in which the city of Damascus is situated; and, assisted by an ancient system of canals and conduits, spread fertility over an area of several hundred square miles, converting it into a garden remarkable both for the richness and the variety of the vegetation, which has been a theme of admiration for all travellers. The Abana traverses the city itself, and its waters are distributed by seven canals and conduits (see DAMASCUS). Looking at the beneficent effects of the waters of these rivers on the soil of Syria, Naaman seems to have been fully justified from his point of view in exclaiming, 'Are not Abana and Pharpar, rivers of Damascus, better than all the waters of Israel?' E. HULL.

LAKKUM (לַקּוּם, B Δωδάμ, A ἄκρου, Luc. Λακούμ).—A town of Naphtali, Jos 19[33]. It is mentioned in the Onomasticon as Λακούμ, but the site has not been recovered.

LAMA.—See ELI, ELI, LAMA SABACHTHANI.

LAMB is used to render various Hebrew terms, of which the most frequent are the following: 1. כֶּבֶשׂ kebes, LXX ἀμνός, with its feminines kibsāh and kabsāh, ἀμνάς, EV 'ewe lamb,' whence by metathesis the less common forms כֶּשֶׂב keseb and כִּשְׂבָּה kisbāh. Kebes is said to occur 87 times in

---

* It should be recollected, however, that these supposed local depressions occurred not from a nearly horizontal floor, but from one inclined from north to south; in other words, from the sources of the Lebanon to the original floor of the Dead Sea—a slope of over 2000 feet in a distance of about 150 miles.

* Described by S. Merrill (East of the Jordan, 14 (1881)), Tristram (Land of Israel, 589, 2nd ed.).

Ex, Lv, and Nu (all in passages belonging to P) in connexion with the ritual of the various sacrifices. It most nearly corresponds to our 'lamb,' being very frequently employed with the qualification 'of the first year' (בֶּן־שָׁנָה lit. 'son of a year'). In a number of passages the Revisers have sought to bring out more clearly the distinction between the masc. and the fem. forms by rendering kebes more uniformly 'he-lamb' (as opp. to kibsāh 'ewe-lamb,' Nu 6^{14} etc.), see Nu $7^{17ff.}$ $28^{3ff.}$ $29^{2ff.}$, Lv $14^{13.\ 21}$.

2. שֶׂה seh, which strictly denotes 'a head of small cattle' (צֹאן), i.e. a sheep or a goat, and therefore lacks the precision of kebes (cf. Ex 12^5 'Your [Passover] lamb (שֶׂה) shall be without blemish, a male of the first year, ye shall take it from the sheep (כְּבָשִׂים) or from the goats'). In a few passages our EV have 'sheep' where, as in Ex 12^5 just quoted, the context points to 'lamb' as the more appropriate rendering, so e.g. Lv 22^{27}.

3. כַּר kar, perhaps a he-lamb at a stage intermediate between the kebes and the 'ayil (אַיִל) or ram. Kārîm are mentioned as delicacies Dt 32^{14}, Am 6^4, as coveted spoil 1 S 15^9, and as tribute Is 16^1, 2 K 3^4 (Mesha's to the king of Israel; cf. RVm and Comm. in loc.).

In three passages of the Greek translation the obscure word קְשִׂיטָה ḳĕsîṭah is wrongly translated 'lambs' (see art. KESITAH).

We have seen how frequently lambs are mentioned in connexion with the sacrifices of the Priests' Code. Of these may be singled out the daily morning and evening sacrifice—the תָּמִיד tāmîd of later Judaism; cf. Dn $8^{11ff.}$ and Mishna passim—at each of which 'a male of the first year, without spot,' was offered (Ex $29^{38ff.}$, Nu $28^{3ff.}$); the Sabbath tāmîd, when the number of lambs was doubled (Nu $28^{9f.}$); the sacrifices at the great festivals such as Pentecost, when nine lambs in all were offered, and Booths, when the daily number rose to fourteen (Nu $29^{13ff.}$, but seven only on the eighth day, v.^{36}). To a different category belong the mother's offering of a lamb after childbirth (Lv 12^6), and the leper's of 'two he-lambs and one ewe-lamb of the first year' (Lv $14^{10ff.}$). For the special case of the Passover lamb, see art. PASSOVER.

The flesh of the lamb was naturally esteemed a delicacy among the Hebrews as elsewhere (Dt 32^{14}, Am 6^4; also 2 S $12^{3ff.}$, Nathan's parable of the ewe-lamb). It was forbidden, however, to kill a lamb till it was a week old (Ex 22^{30}, Lv 22^{27}), and even then the dam and her offspring must not be killed on the same day (Lv 22^{28}).

It was inevitable that so familiar and characteristic a creature as the lamb should supply Hebrew writers with a variety of figures. Thus the gambolling of lambs in the spring-time suggests itself to the author of the Book of Wisdom as a suitable figure for the exuberant and praiseful joy of the Hebrews on the occasion of the exodus from Egypt (Wis 19^9; cf. a similar figure in Mal 4^2 [Heb. 3^{20}]). In Hebrew, as in other literatures, the lamb is the symbol of innocence and gentleness, as opposed to cunning and ferocity. 'What fellowship,' asks ben-Sira, 'hath the wolf with the lamb?' (Sir 13^{17}; cf. Horace, Epod. iv. 1); yet one of the most striking features of the Messianic age is the cessation of this hereditary antipathy, when 'the wolf shall dwell with the lamb' (Is 11^6; cf. 65^{25}). The lambs are the special object of the Messiah's care (Is 40^{11} טְלָאִים ṭĕlā'îm, ἄρνας). In the spirit of this prophecy we find that 'feed my lambs' (τὰ ἀρνία μου) was part of the Master's threefold charge to Peter (Jn 21^{15}).

The lamb as the synonym of guileless innocence and gentleness, further, is appropriated by Jeremiah, who, all unsuspicious of the wiles of his enemies, describes himself as 'a gentle lamb' (Jer 11^{19} RV), a figure repeated in the familiar portrait of the suffering Servant of J″, who is also portrayed 'as a lamb that is led to the slaughter' (Is 53^7 RV).[*] The influence of the latter passage in shaping the Messianic Hope of Judaism cannot be over-estimated. Thus it is generally admitted that it, above all, was in the Baptist's mind when he pointed to our Lord with the words, 'Behold the Lamb of God[†] (ὁ ἀμνὸς τοῦ θεοῦ) which taketh away the sin of the world' (Jn $1^{29.\ 36}$; cf. Ac 8^{32}). It is not impossible, however, that there may also be included a reference to the lamb of the daily sacrifice and even to the lamb of the approaching Passover (see Westcott, in loc.), since the writer of the Fourth Gospel beyond a doubt declares the Saviour upon the cross to be the true Paschal Lamb (see esp. Jn 19^{36}; cf. for St. Paul 1 Co 5^7). This expiatory aspect of our Saviour's death is also emphasized by St. Peter in his application to Christ of the technical attributes of the sacrificial victim, 'a lamb without blemish and without spot' (1 P 1^{19}; cf. Ritschl, Die christl. Lehre v. d. Rechtfertigung^{2}, 1882, ii. 176, 177).

There remains the oft-recurring (twenty-seven times) symbol of the Book of Revelation, in which our Lord is figured as the 'Lamb' (note ἀρνίον throughout, not ἀμνός), first introduced in 5^6 'as though it had been slain' (ἀρνίον . . . ὡς ἐσφαγμένον). This is not the least striking of the points of contact—even though the terms used are not identical—between the Apocalypse and the Fourth Gospel (see the latest commentary, Bousset, Die Offenbarung Johannis, 1896, p. 206), and in so far supports the opinion of those who seek the source of the apocalyptic symbol in the Paschal Lamb rather than in Is 53^7 (for the whole question see the commentaries and works on NT theology). The lamb in early Christian symbolism is beyond the limits of a Dictionary of the Bible (see art. LAMB in Smith's Dict. of Christian Antiquities).

LAME, LAMENESS.—See MEDICINE.

LAMECH (לֶמֶךְ, Λάμεχ).[‡]—1. A descendant of Cain, Gn $4^{18ff.}$ (J). He is said to have married two wives, Adah and Zillah (v.^{19} the first mention of polygamy in the Bible), the former of whom became the mother of Jabal and Jubal, the latter of Tubal-cain (v.$^{20ff.}$). Legend ascribed to Lamech the following somewhat enigmatical utterance, which has been preserved by J in poetical form:—

> 'Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
> Ye wives of Lamech, hearken unto my speech;
> For I slay (have slain?) a man for wounding me,
> And a young man for bruising me.
> If Cain shall be avenged sevenfold,
> Truly Lamech shall be avenged seventy and sevenfold.'

The above is frequently called 'the sword-lay,' being supposed to be a glorification by Lamech of the weapons forged by his son Tubal-cain, by the aid of which he can defy his enemies and defend himself, instead of having to look, like Cain, to God for protection. This is the generally accepted interpretation of modern scholars (those who are curious to make acquaintance with Jewish and patristic fancies may refer to Smith's DB, s. 'Lamech'), and there can be little doubt that it is mainly correct. Wellhausen (Composition d. Hex. 305), it is true, thinks it is precarious to explain the lay from its present context, with which it may have a purely accidental connexion. That is to say, he sees no necessity for connecting Lamech's language with Tubal-cain's invention, but would recognize in it only a piece of characteristic Oriental bravado (the calling in of the wives is characteristic too, parallels being found amongst the Arabs) uttered by one clan (or chieftain) against another. Holzinger substantially accepts Wellhausen's explanation.

[*] The terms are different, however, in the original: כֶּבֶשׂ in Jer 11^{19}, שֶׂה in Is 53^7.

[†] Cf. also the pseudepigraphic work, The Testaments of the Twelve Patriarchs: 'Honour Judah and Levi, for from them shall arise for you the lamb of God (ὁ ἀμνὸς τοῦ θεοῦ), saving all nations by grace' (Test. Josephi 19).

[‡] Dillm. and Holzinger agree (against Budde) that the name למך is unintelligible from Hebrew, but that Arabic may give the meaning juvenis robustus. Ball ('Genesis,' in SBOT), following Hommel (PSBA, March 1893), considers Lamech 'to be an easy adaptation of Bab. Lamga, "the Servant" (of Merodach), another title of Sin, synonymous with Ubara in the name Ubara-tutu, "vassal of Merodach," the 'Ωτιάρτης (or rather 'Ωτάρτης) of Berosus, and father of Ξίσουθρος, the hero of the Flood, who corresponds to the Hebrew Noah.'

2. A descendant of Seth and father of Noah, Gn 5[25f. 28. 30f.] (P), 1 Ch 1[3]. From the coincidence of the names Lamech and Enoch in the Cainite genealogy of J (Gn 4) and the Sethite genealogy of P (ch. 5), as well as the very close resemblance between a number of other names in the two lists, it is generally held that we have before us two recensions of one and the same list, the object of the one being to trace the descent of the human race to an ancestor called Cain, the other to one called Seth. Delitzsch, while opposing this, agrees with Wellhausen, that, together with the genealogy 4[16-22] terminating in Lamech and his three sons, there was in the Jahwistic document another genealogy which started from Adam and terminated in Noah and his three sons, and that this has been displaced by the genealogy of P (ch. 5). Wellh. finds the conclusion of J's narrative in 5[29], its opening perhaps in 4[25f.].

LAMED (ל).—The twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet, and as such employed in the 119th Psalm to designate the 12th part, each verse of which begins with this letter. In this Dictionary it is transliterated by l.

LAMENTATION.—See MOURNING.

LAMENTATIONS, BOOK OF—consists of five poems, whose subject is the sufferings of Judah and Jerusalem during the siege and subsequent to the capture of the city by the Chaldæans (B.C. 586). The description of the woes of the people is interspersed with confessions of sin, exhortations to repentance, and supplications for a return of the divine favour.

I. NAME AND PLACE IN THE CANON.—In Hebrew Bibles the title of the book, taken from its opening word, is 'Ekhah (אֵיכָה = How!). Another name, which occurs in the Massoretic subscription and in the Talmud and Rabbinical literature, is Kînôth (קִינוֹת), to which correspond the Θρῆνοι of the Sept. and the Threni, Lamentationes, Lamenta of Jerome and the Fathers. In the Heb. Canon (according to German MSS) the book is placed among the Kĕthûbhîm or Hagiographa, and forms one of the five Megillôth or Rolls (Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther). These were read in the Synagogue service on stated occasions every year, Lamentations on the 9th of Ab, the anniversary of the destruction of the temple. In the Sept. as in the Eng. Bible, Lamentations immediately follows Jeremiah. That this was not the position in which the Sept. translators found it, is held by some to be proved by the circumstance, noted by Nöldeke, that the tr[n] of the two books is not from the same hand, Jer being a comparatively free rendering of the original, while Lamentations is rigorously literal and marked by numerous Hebraisms. When the latter book attained to its present position in the Alex. Canon, it came to be regarded more and more as an appendage to its predecessor, until Jeremiah-Lamentations could be reckoned a single book like Judges-Ruth. This result was reached all the more readily in some quarters owing to a fancy for reckoning the canonical books of the OT as twenty-two, the number of letters in the Heb. alphabet. (See Ryle, Canon of the OT, 219 f., and Wildeboer, Entstehung des AT Kanons, 76 f.).

II. STRUCTURE OF THE BOOK.—The first four chapters are acrostic poems, of which the first, the second, and the fourth contain each 22 verses which open with the Heb. letters in succession. Ch. 3 contains 66 verses, and each letter is repeated thrice, having three successive verses assigned to it. Ch. 5 is not acrostic, but contains 22 verses. In chs. 1 and 2 the verses consist of three members, in 4 of only two, while in 3 each verse has but a single member. It is the division of these members, however, which characterizes the four poems we are discussing. The Kînah or elegy is marked by a peculiar rhythm which differentiates it from ordinary Hebrew poetry. De Wette, Keil, Ewald, and others helped to elucidate the nature and laws of the elegiac measure, but to Budde belongs the merit of having thoroughly investigated and explained the subject. His conclusions are set forth mainly in an essay in the ZATW (1882, pp. 1–52); but the Eng. reader will find all that is essential in an interesting article contributed by the same author to the New World (March 1893), under the title 'The Folk-Song of Israel in the mouth of the Prophets.'

The characteristic features of the elegiac measure are that each verse-member (there may be one or more members in a verse) is divided by a cæsura into two unequal parts, of which the second is the shorter (the proportion is generally 3 : 2), and that this second part, instead of balancing and reinforcing the first, as is usual in the Heb. poetry, is frequently an imperfect echo of it, or not parallel in thought to it. (See Driver's LOT[6] 458). Budde has proved that this was the strain affected by the 'mourning women' in their lamentations for the dead. In Jer 9[17], where these are summoned to utter a dirge, the 'limping verse,' as Budde calls it, is introduced with great effect (vv.[19. 21. 22]) alternately with the ordinary evenly-moving verse. There are numerous other instances of its occurrence in the OT, of which we may cite the magnificent passage Is 14[4b-21] (ode on the king of Babylon), Ezk 19, and Am 5[2] (cf. Driver's note on this last passage). The prophets seem to have adopted this measure whenever they desired to make an unusually deep impression. It is obvious that all the associations connected with it rendered its employment in Lamentations specially suitable. 'The singer or singers employed this versification because it afforded them the surest way of putting their listeners into a mood corresponding to their melancholy utterances. High and low, learned and unlearned, old and young, man and woman, all understood this melody, all felt themselves transported by it to the bier of their relatives or neighbours, and were carried away by it to bewail their people, their city, themselves' (Budde). The plaintive melancholy cadence can be fully appreciated only in the original Hebrew, but its effect can be approximately reproduced even in English. Take as an example 1[5]—

'Her adversaries are become the head,
    Her enemies prosper;
For the Lord hath afflicted her
    For the multitude of her transgressions:
Her young children are gone into captivity
    Before the adversary.'

(It is greatly to be regretted that this peculiar rhythm is not exhibited in the RV, although in Kautzsch's AT it is reproduced very effectively in German by Baethgen).

The text of Lamentations is in some instances corrupt, and it is not easy to bring every verse under Budde's scheme. Still, not a little success has been achieved by this critic and others in restoring the original text of the Ḳînah. See, further, art. POETRY.

From all this it is evident that in poems such as those that make up Lamentations we have no simple spontaneous outburst of grief, but the result of conscious effort and of not a little technical skill. While ch. 5 is not in the Ḳînah measure (it is only accidentally that vv.[2. 3. 14] conform to it), something of the same effect is produced by the assonances (u, nu, anu, enu, inu, unu), which recur 44 times (Reuss), and to which there is no parallel in the OT except in Ps 124.

III. ANALYSIS OF THE CONTENTS.—Each of the five poems is complete in itself, and forms a well-rounded whole, independent alike of its predecessor and its successor. This was admitted even by Eichhorn, who ascribed all the five to Jeremiah, but held that they were composed by the prophet at different times and when in different moods. Attempts have indeed been made to trace a progress either in the historical situation (de Wette), or in the thoughts (Ewald), from one chapter to another. The former failed completely to accomplish his self-imposed task, and the scheme of the latter can be carried through only by discovering in the Lamentations features that are absent and ignoring others that are present. Ewald certainly lays himself open to the sarcastic remark of Thenius, that upon such principles a connexion could be established between the most disparate elements in the world. Let any careful student judge whether it is correct to say with Ewald that chs. 1 and 2 contain the bitterest and, as yet, hopeless complaints; that in ch. 3, which is the turning-point, the poet reaches comfort at least for himself; that in ch. 4 lamentation indeed recurs, but now the people break in with the language of prayer and hope; while in ch. 5 we have nothing but prayer, offered by the whole community, whose tone is sad indeed, yet composed and hopeful. No doubt Ewald exhibits here an attractive model from which the author or authors might have worked, but they have not done so. Nay, so far from there being any traceable connexion between the different poems, it is no easy matter sometimes to discover connecting links between the verses of the same poem. The truth is that the nature of the subject did not readily admit of logical development, and it may have been partly for this reason and as a mnemonic device that the acrostic scheme was adopted in the first four chapters (its absence in ch. 5 has never been satisfactorily explained). In chs. 2 and 4 the verses have the firmest, in 1 and 5 the loosest connexion. In the light of the foregoing remarks it will be understood that the following scheme of analysis, which is mainly Löhr's, is largely provisional.

Ch. 1 contains two divisions—(a) vv.[1-11b] spoken by the poet (with the exception of [9c]); (b) vv.[11c-22] spoken by the city (with the exception of [17]). The ever-recurring themes are the abandonment of the city by her allies, the distress of her inhabitants, the pride of the enemy. In v.[8] there is already a confession that Jerusalem has been justly punished for her sins, and in [9c] already a cry to God, which is repeated in [11c]. In vv.[12-16], where the city is supposed to speak, we have an appeal to passers-by, to whom under a variety of figures the misery of Zion is described. In v.[17] the poet suddenly speaks again in his own person, but in vv.[18. 19] it is once more the city that appeals to all peoples, and in vv.[20-22] addresses a prayer to J″ to execute vengeance on the foes who had gloried in Jerusalem's misfortunes.

In ch. 2 the situation reminds us of Jer 14[15-18]. There are two main divisions—(a) vv.[1-12]. The daughter of Zion has been crushed down by the judgment of J″, all her political glory has faded, her temple has been destroyed, the city and its inhabitants have suffered alike. The agonies of the siege, the despair of the citizens, the terrible scenes due to famine, are realistically depicted; (b) vv.[13-22]. The poet turns to the people with mingled warnings and consolation. The sin of Jerusalem, especially of her false prophets, and the scorn that has overtaken the latter, are held up to view; the nation is invited to turn to J″ in supplication (vv.[18. 19]), and it responds in the prayer of vv.[20-22].

Ch. 3 is the most important from a religious point of view, and is also constructed with the most art. It differs from the other chapters in being spoken in the 1st person singular, although we should perhaps understand the 'I' not of an individual, but of the people collectively, after the manner of Pss 31. 34. 35. 51, and many of the later psalms.[*] The chapter may be arranged under three divisions. (a) Vv.[1-18] touchingly describe the utter desolation of the people, but at the mention of God in v.[18] a ray of hope darts into the soul of the speaker, who after the parenthetical passage (vv.[19-21]) passes on to fulfil in (b) a didactic function (vv.[22-51]). The inexhaustible compassion of God is insisted upon, the purposes of grace which He may have in His visitation are suggested, all tending to enforce the call to repentance. (c) In vv.[52-54] there is a return to the tone of complaint, which soon passes, however, into joyful confidence (vv.[55-58]) that God will hear and deliver, while vv.[59-66] breathe a prayer for vengeance on the nation's foes. (As to the interpretation of vv.[56ff.] and the question of a precative perfect, see Ewald's Heb. Syntax, Kennedy's tr. p. 15; Driver's Heb. Tenses^{3}, pp. 14, 25; Davidson's Heb. Syntax, p. 63).

Ch. 4 closely resembles in structure ch. 3. There are two main divisions, the first of which falls into two subdivisions. (a) Vv.[1-11], of which vv.[1-6] exactly balance vv.[7-11]. The בְּנֵי צִיּוֹן of the one is parallel to the נְזִירִים of the other; in both sections there is a description of the sufferings occasioned by famine, and a tracing of these to the anger of J″ (v.[12], which breaks the connexion, probably owes its origin simply to the necessities of the acrostic scheme). In (b) there are three subdivisions—(1) vv.[13-16] treat of the sin and the punishment of the priests and the prophets; (2) vv.[17.20] of the sin and the punishment of the king and his courtiers, who looked in vain to Egypt for help; (3) vv.[21. 22] address a word of threatening to Edom and of comfort to Israel.

Ch. 5, like ch. 1, is wanting in consecutive thought. It opens with a prayer that J″ would look upon the reproach of His people, which is described from a variety of points of view (vv.[2-18]). Zion's desolation suggests, by way of contrast, J″'s abiding power, upon the ground of which the poet repeats his appeal for help (vv.[20-22]). The last verse being considered one of ill omen, the Jews were accustomed in reading to repeat after it the preceding verse. For a similar reason the same usage was followed in connexion with the last verse of Isaiah, Malachi, and Ecclesiastes.

[*] So Calov, Hupfeld, Reuss, Cheyne, Smend (see esp. ZATW, 1882, p. 62 ff.). On the other hand, Budde (Klagelieder, 92 f.) contends for the individual sense of the 'I,' by which he supposes the author of the poem to have intended an eye-witness (most likely Jeremiah) of the destruction of Jerusalem.

IV. AUTHORSHIP.—Both in Jewish and in Christian circles a tradition has long prevailed that the book was written by Jeremiah. We will examine—

(a) The External Evidence.—While the Heb. Bible is silent as to the authorship of Lamentations, it is otherwise with the Sept., where the book opens thus: καὶ ἐγένετο μετὰ τὸ αἰχμαλωτισθῆναι τὸν Ἰσραὴλ καὶ Ἰερουσαλὴμ ἐρημωθῆναι ἐκάθισεν Ἰερεμίας κλαίων καὶ ἐθρήνησεν τὸν θρῆνον τοῦτον ἐπὶ Ἰερουσαλὴμ καὶ εἶπεν ('And it came to pass, after Israel was led into captivity and Jerusalem laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping, and lamented with this lamentation over Jerusalem, and said'). It has been urged that these words, which sound like the rendering of a Heb. original, imply a notice to the above effect in the Heb. MS from which the Sept. translator worked. The Vulg. opens with words which reproduce in Lat. the above Gr. sentence, with the additional phrase et amaro animo suspirans et ejulans, and these words in italics imply, acc. to some, the existence of yet another Heb. original. In ch. 5, moreover, Vulg. has the heading Oratio Jeremiæ prophetæ. The superscription of the book in Pesh. also supports the same tradition.

There are, however, two circumstances that greatly weaken the force of the above evidence. Firstly, the absence of any allusion to Jeremiah in the MT would be utterly inexplicable if such a notice as occurs in the Sept. had ever stood in the Hebrew. As every student knows, it was far more the tendency of copyists to add than to suppress. Secondly, the place of the book in the Heb. Canon, not attached to Jer, but included among the Kěthûbhîm, is hard to reconcile with its prophetic authorship. As Driver remarks, at least three centuries separated the Sept. from Jeremiah, and its notice quoted above may be merely an inference founded on the general resemblance of tone which the Lamentations exhibit to such passages as Jer 8^{18}–9, 14–15, and on the reference assumed to be contained in $3^{14.\,53\text{-}56}$ to incidents in the prophet's life (Jer 20^{7} $38^{6\text{ff.}}$). It was doubtless a similar feeling that gave rise to the extraordinary conflate reading τῷ Δαυὶδ Ἰερεμίου, which is the title in some MSS of Ps 137 (Cheyne). According to Löhr and Gerlach, the καὶ ἐγένετο, etc., of the Sept. was written in order to connect Lamentations with the prophecies of Jeremiah, probably at the time when it was an object to reduce the number of books in the Canon to twenty-two. It need scarcely be added that the statements of the Fathers, the superscription in the Targum, and the citations from the Talmud, have no independent value as evidence in regard to the authorship.

There has been much discussion as to the meaning of 2 Ch 35^{25} 'And Jeremiah lamented for Josiah, and all the singing men and singing women spake of Josiah in their lamentations unto this day, and they made them an ordinance in Israel, and behold they are written in the lamentations.' The question is whether the words we have italicized refer to our book of Lamentations. If so, we should have a tradition as early as the days of the Chronicler (c. B.C. 250) in favour of Jeremiah's authorship of at least a portion of its contents. Thenius answers the above question in the negative, holding that the Kînôth referred to were a collection of lamentations for the dead sung on the occasion of the burial of the kings of Judah. In this collection Jeremiah's lament for Josiah may easily have had a place, but our book never formed part of it. On the other hand, a great many of the leading OT scholars of the day understand the Chronicler to refer to the canonical book of Lamentations. Löhr offers three reasons for this conclusion: (1) it is hard to believe that there were extant other lamentations by Jeremiah outside the Canon; (2) the Chronicler might readily have referred such passages as La 2^{6} and 4^{20} to Josiah; (3) an uncritical writer like the Chronicler might easily have committed a blunder into which Jos. (Ant. X. i. 5) probably and Jerome certainly fell. The words of the latter in commenting on Zec 12^{11} are, 'super quo (Josia) lamentationes scripsit Jeremias, quæ leguntur in Ecclesia et scripsisse eum Paralipomenon testatur liber.' The same interpretation of the Chronicler's language is supported by Nöldeke, Cornill, Wildeboer, W. R. Smith, and Budde.* If it be correct, it gives us a testimony in favour of Jeremiah's connexion with Lamentations, dating from about the same period, and entitled to much the same consideration as the testimony of the Sept. which we have just examined. As the external evidence is manifestly insufficient to decide the question, we are thrown back upon—

(b) The Internal Evidence.—At the first glance this may seem to be in favour of Jeremiah's authorship, which has been strongly maintained by Keil and others. The verdict of modern criticism, however, is given for the most part against the traditional view. The undoubted affinities of all the five chapters with Jer (see a list of similarities in Driver, LOT^{6} 462*d*) are recognized by critics of all schools, but are explained on the ground that this prophet's works were the favourite study of the author or authors of Lamentations, who were in such sympathy with his spirit that the book might be entitled 'Lamentations of the sons of Jeremiah' (Cheyne).

There are several passages which militate against Jer.'s authorship. La 2^{9} ('Her prophets find no vision from the LORD') might almost be pronounced decisive. In this same verse, moreover, חָזוֹן is used in a special sense which meets us for the first time in Ezk 12^{27}. A number of other instances are cited by Cornill (Einleit.^{2} 247) where the language shows such a dependence upon Ezekiel (who did not publish his prophecies before B.C. 570), that Jeremiah's authorship seems out of the question. La 4^{17} does not sound like the language of Jeremiah, who never shared the hopes of those who looked for help to Egypt. La 4^{20} could hardly be spoken of Zedekiah by one who judged him as Jeremiah did. Chs. 1 and 5 imply an acquaintance with Deutero-Isaiah, while ch. 3 contains echoes of the later psalms and of Job (which probably dates at the earliest from the Exile). In his Job and Solomon, Cheyne adduces the following parallels with the latter book—La $3^{7.\,9}$=Job 19^{8}, La 3^{8}=Job 30^{20}, La 3^{10}=Job 10^{16}, La $3^{12.\,13}$=Job 7^{20} $16^{12.\,13}$, La $3^{14.\,63}$=Job 30^{9}. The dependence of the elegies upon Job is more likely than the converse supposition.

A circumstance that may have some bearing on the question of authorship, is that the order of the letters ע and פ is different in chs. 2–4 from what it is in ch. 1. In the latter the normal order is followed, in the other three chapters פ precedes ע (a phenomenon which occurs also in the correct text of Ps 34 as well as in Pr 31 [according to the LXX], probably also in Ps 9 f., and, according to Bickell, in Nah 1; cf. Budde, Klagelieder, 70 f.). Even if we suppose, with Thenius, Ewald, Nägelsbach, and others, that at one time the order of the Heb. alphabet was not definitely fixed, it is hardly likely that one and the same author would have followed different orders in two successive poems. This would indicate, then, that at least ch. 1 is from a different hand from chs. 2–4.

* Budde points out, however, that the Chronicler does not attribute all five poems to Jeremiah, but apparently only one of them, the other four being assigned to the 'singing men and singing women' (Klagelieder, p. 73).

In regard to the linguistic aspect of the question, it may be mentioned that Löhr (ZATW, 1894, Heft 1; cf. Driver, LOT^{6} 463) subjects the vocabulary of Jeremiah and of Lamentations to a comparison, the result of which is that while the words common to both are four times as numerous as those found only in Lamentations, yet the latter contains a great many words not found in Jeremiah. These words, moreover, are without exception important, while the common use of words like אִישׁ or בֵּן, of course, proves nothing as to community of authorship (e.g. שׁ for אֲשֶׁר, which occurs in La $2^{15.16}$ 4^{9} 5^{18}, is unknown to Jer). Many of the above considerations tell not only against Jeremiah's authorship but against—

V. The Unity of the Book.—While there is comparative agreement amongst modern critics that Jeremiah is not the author, there has been much diversity of opinion as to the number of authors whose work is to be traced in the book. W. R. Smith argued strongly that the book is a unity (art. 'Lamentations' in Encycl. Brit.^{9}), but the prevailing tendency at present is decidedly adverse to this opinion. It is pretty generally agreed that at least ch. 3 is by a different and later hand than the rest of the book. Budde formerly (ZATW, 1882) agreed with Stade, who is content to go this length, and who assigns 1. 2. 4. 5 to a single author. Thenius holds 2 and 4 to be Jeremiah's, while 1. 3. 5 are assigned each to a separate author. A considerable number of modern critics divide the book into three groups in the following chronological order (2 and 4) (1 and 5) (3). This, which was the scheme of Nöldeke, has gained the adherence of Löhr, Cornill, Wildeboer, and now (Klagelieder, 1898, pp. 74 ff.) substantially of Budde.* Another arrangement of the book is that of Cheyne (Jeremiah in 'Men of the Bible' series), which also recognizes three groups (1. 2. 4) (3) (5). On this question criticism has not yet spoken the last word.

VI. Place and Date of Composition.—Upon these two points there are differences of opinion even amongst those who support Jeremiah's authorship of the book. The freshness of the pictures has often been adduced as an argument for an early date. It may be said, however, that while there is something that appeals to the imagination in the old picture of the faithful prophet sitting down to lament the fate of the city which had turned a deaf ear to his warnings, it is a psychological improbability that a man of Jeremiah's spirit should have turned out acrostic poems, and especially such a laboured work of art as ch. 3 amidst blackened ruins where the fire had hardly cooled, and in streets where the blood had hardly dried. Hence, even if the poems were his, we should have to think of a relatively late date for their composition, when the bitterness of the moment had given place to calm reflection. (With this tallies 5^{20} 'so long time'). Thenius, who regarded 2 and 4 as genuine productions of Jeremiah, dated the one at about B.C. 581 (prior to the third deportation after the murder of Gedaliah), and the other at a later period, during the prophet's sojourn in Egypt. Löhr formerly fixed upon 550 as an approximate date for the completion of the book. This would allow sufficient time to account for the references to Ezekiel. In a later work (1893) Löhr is willing to come down as late as 530, but objects to a post-exilic date, because he holds that the Ḳînah measure, although found in Deutero-Isaiah, cannot be traced in any post-exilic work (not occurring in Hag, Zec, Mal, Jl, or Jon). Wildeboer finds nothing in the contents of the book to compel us to fix upon the close of the Exile as the terminus ad quem for the publication of Lamentations. Some of the elegies might well have been composed in Babylon by an exile who did not share the sanguine expectations of Deutero-Isaiah, or even in Judæa by one who had returned with Zerubbabel in 536. Wildeboer thinks, however, that the latest possible date is 516, the year when the rebuilding of the temple was finished. But if the possibility of Lamentations being post-exilic is admitted, some plausibility must be conceded to Cheyne's suggestion (Founders of OT Criticism, 356) that as the church of the second temple composed its own psalms, it is far from impossible that it preferred to indite fresh elegies for use on the old fast-days. There were details enough in the historical books to enable a poet possessed of dramatic imagination to draw the pictures in Lamentations. The tone of the book, however, is inconsistent with the contention of Fries (ZATW, 1893), that chs. 4 and 5 belong to so late a period as that of the Maccabees. This is conclusively proved by Löhr (ZATW, 1894), who exhibits the complete contrast between the Maccabæan Psalms, where the people protest that they suffer in spite of their innocence, and the Bk. of Lamentations, which confesses throughout that the nation's suffering is due to the nation's sin.

LAMP (לַפִּיד, נֵר, λύχνος, λαμπάς).—The first of these words is tr^{d} 'torch' in Nah 2^{4} and Zec 12^{6} (AV and RV); and in Gn 15^{17}, Jg 7^{16}, Job 41^{19}, Ezk 1^{13} the same tr^{n} is adopted by RV in place of 'lamp' of AV. The other Heb. word, as well as the Gr. λαμπάς,* may mean torch likewise, but is more properly lamp, with oil and wick, as in the description of the golden candlestick (Ex 25^{31-37}) of the tabernacle, and those made by Solomon for the temple (2 Ch $4^{20.21}$), which were kept burning all night (Ex $30^{7.8}$, Lv 24^{2}).

The common lamps of Pal. were of terra-cotta, as we have abundant evidence from the numerous specimens found in all parts. Glass lamps of Egyp. or Phœn. make might have been known, and bronze lamps are not infrequently found. Very little is known of the lamps used in Egypt. Herod. (ii. 62) describes them as flat saucers filled with a mixture of salt and oil, on the top of which floated the wick. The oldest form of lamp found in Pal. is not unlike that described by Herodotus. It is like a shallow saucer, the rim of which, on one side, is pinched together, forming a narrow channel through which the wick passed (see Fig. 1). This style is called Phœn., and is found in the tombs and ruins of the oldest cities in Phœnicia and Palestine (PEFSt, 1893, p. 14; and Bliss, Mound of Many Cities, p. 87). The more common forms are oblong, but not open like the above. There is a saucer-like depression in the upper surface, at the bottom of which there is an orifice for the admission of the oil into the lamp, and another opening at the extremity for the admission of the wick. At the opposite end there is often a small handle (see Figs. 2 and 3: Fig. 3 is bronze). Sometimes the form is circular, an open saucer-shape, with a smaller saucer inverted in the larger (see Fig. 4). This form of lamp, especially No. 2,* with or without the handle, is called Roman, and was doubtless commonly used in the time of Christ, and is most probably the kind referred to in the parable of the Ten Virgins (Mt 25). They hold little oil, and would soon need replenishing. The peasants of Syria and Pal. use these lamps still, although petroleum has in most places taken the place of olive oil for lighting. An open glass or terra-cotta cup with a piece of rag for a wick is often seen in the poorer peasants' houses, and this they frequently keep burning all night. The people of the country do not like to sleep without some light in the house, and a dim one furnished by such a lamp suits their purpose. In illuminations at weddings and on feast-days this open style of lamp is much employed. The wick used is a small one drawn through a piece of cork and left to float on the surface of the oil.

Lamps appear to have been kept burning before the teraphim (images of ancestors); hence the words 'the lamp of the wicked is put out' (Job 18^6 21^{17}) may have originally meant that the wicked shall have no male descendants to fulfil this duty of placing a lamp before his image (so Schwally, Leben nach dem Tode, 40). LANCE.—See SPEAR.

LANCETS (רֹמַח 1 K 18^{28}).—A mistaken correction in modern edd. of the original reading of the AV of 1611, 'lancers,' i.e. 'lances,' properly spears used for hurling. Both forms of the word are old, 'launcetis' being the later Wyclifite form in this passage. AV of 1611 adopted the 'launsers' of the Bishops' Bible (spelling it 'lancers,' however), and the change into 'lancets' was not made before 1762. Cf. Scrivener's Introduction to the AV, pp. xlvi, xlvii. See SPEAR.

LAND LAWS.—See LAW (in OT) and SABBATICAL YEAR.

LANDMARK (גְּבוּל).—An object, such as a stone, a heap of stones, or a tree with a mark in its bark, intended to fix the limit of a field, a farm, or the property of an individual. In Palestine these landmarks are scrupulously respected; and in passing along a road or pathway one may observe from time to time a stone placed by the edge of the field from which a shallow furrow has been ploughed, marking the limits of cultivation of neighbouring proprietors.

In order to perpetuate the observance of the rights indicated by landmarks in the Mosaic ritual, a curse is pronounced against the surreptitious removal of a landmark belonging to one's neighbour (Dt 19^{14}, for the meaning of which see Driver, ad loc.). In Egypt the land had to be re-measured and allotted after each inundation of the Nile, and boundary-stones placed at the junction of two properties. A collection of such objects is to be seen in the Assyrian Room, British Museum.

LANGUAGE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT.—1. Names.—(a) The greater part of the Old Test. is written in the language called by the Assyrians 'the tongue of the west country' (Winckler, Die K. I. Sargons, p. 72, l. 423, etc.),* by biblical writers 'the lip of Canaan' (Is 19^{18}), or 'Jewish' (2 K 18$^{26.28}$; cf. Neh 13^{24}), by the Rabbis 'the Sacred Tongue' (Sotah, vii. 2, etc.), or 'the Text' as opposed to 'the Targum' (Bab. Megillah, 18*a*, etc.), or 'the language of the Law' as opposed to 'the language of the doctors' (Weiss, Studien zur Mischnahsprache, p. 9). The Palestinian † Rabbis further apply to it the term 'Hebrew' (Jerus. Megillah, p. 19, etc.), and the absence of this name in the OT can be due only to accident; it is the term regularly employed by Greek-speaking Jews (first occurring, it would seem, in the Pref. to Sir; used also by Josephus, Ant. I. i. 2), and it can only be through ignorance that Philo substitutes 'Chaldee' for it. The name 'Hebrew' was adopted by early Christian writers (e.g. Ac 21^{40}), and with the spread of Christianity it migrated into Asiatic, African, and European languages; some of which have also adopted from the Rabbis the name 'Sacred Tongue.'

(b) The portions of the OT which are not in Hebrew are in the language called Aramaic in the Bible (2 K 18^{26} etc.) and Talmud (Bab. Shabbath, 12*b*, etc.), and not infrequently 'Targum' in the latter (Bab. Megillah, l.c.), 'Syriac' in the LXX and sometimes in the Talmud (Jerus. Sotah, vii. 2). It would seem that the name 'Chaldee' does not belong properly to this language, although the Aramæans and Chaldees are sometimes juxtaposed in old inscriptions (Sennacherib, ed. G. Smith, p. 36). It is probable that the use of the name for 'Aramaic' is due to the comparison of Dn 1^{4} with 2^{4}; and the identification of the two appears in the notes of Jerome and Ibn Ezra on the latter passage, though the LXX translator of Dn 2^{27} appears expressly to avoid it. In Syriac works, probably through similar reasoning, 'Chaldee' is sometimes said to mean 'Old Syriac' (Thes. Syr. s.v. 'Kaldaya'); but in very late times the 'Chaldæans' are identified with the 'Nestorians,' probably on the ground of their geographical position (Badger, Nestorians, i. 181; cf. Rassam, 'Biblical Lands,' in the Proceedings of the Victoria Institute). In Aramaic are written (1) Dn 2^{4}–7^{28}, (2) certain documents quoted in Ezr 4^{7}–6^{18} and 7$^{12-26}$, ostensibly in their original language; it is, however, noticeable that the connecting narrative is also in Aramaic; (3) Jer 10^{11}, regarded by some as an interpolation, while others endeavour to account for the transition on rhetorical grounds. There are besides several places in the OT where the writers appear to lapse into Aramaic, possibly through the fault of their copyists. In Jos 15^{25} the adjective חֲדַתָּה, in the name 'New Hazor,' is Aramaic; in 14^{8} an Aramaic word (המסיו) is substituted for the Hebrew of the word 'melted' in the phrase 'melted our heart' (cf. Dt 1^{28}). Sporadic cases of words which are Aramaic both in derivation and grammatical form occur in Is 30^{28}, Ezk 24^{26} 33^{30}, Ps 116^{12}, possibly Job 37^{13}, Dn 11^{23}, and elsewhere.

(c) The employment of other languages than these in the OT does not exceed the quotation of isolated words and phrases, or calling attention to varieties of nomenclature. Besides the Aramaic equivalent for Gilead cited in Gn 31^{47}, Egyptian is quoted ib. 41$^{43.45}$ (JE), Moabite Dt 2^{11}, Ammonite ib. v. ^{20}, Sidonian and Amorite ib. 3^{9}, Tyrian 1 K 9^{13}, Persian (?) Est 3^{7}, Babylonian (?) Dn 4^{5}, perhaps Philistian Is 2^{6}. Moreover, it may be observed that, in speaking of dignitaries, biblical writers are ordinarily (not invariably) careful to give them their native titles: see Ex 15^{15}, Jos 13$^{3-21}$, Ezk 23^{6}, Hos 10^{5}, Est 1^{3} 4^{12} 8^{10}, Dn 3^{2} etc.

2. Antiquity.—The Hebrew language may be appropriately termed the Israelitish dialect of Canaanitish. Outside the OT the chief pre-Alexandrian monuments of the Israelitish dialect which we possess appear to be an inscribed weight in the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford, found at Nablûs, and the Siloam inscription (Driver, Notes on Samuel, p. xv), probably of the age of Hezekiah. But of other Canaanitish dialects we possess far earlier monuments. The oldest of these are the glosses of the Tel el-Amarna tablets (see Winckler's edition in the KIB, 1896). The writers of these epistles sometimes accompany their Assyrian with a Canaanitish equivalent, using, of course, the cuneiform character for both (examples are 181. 5 khalkaat, explained by abada, 'perished'; 189. 16 ana shamē by shamima, 'heavenward'; 191. 24 sise by suusu, 'horse'; 189. 18 kakkadunu by rushunu, 'our head'). It may be noted as a peculiarity of the writers' dialect that the substantive verb in it would appear to have drawn some of its tenses from the stem in use in Phœnician (and Arabic), and others from the stem in use in Hebrew (and Aramaic). 'If you say kuna,' says one writer, 'I will answer yahya' (149. 36). These tablets are assigned to the 15th cent. B.C., but the existence of the Canaanitish language is certified for a yet earlier period by some of the loan-words found in Egyptian monuments, some of which go back to the 16th century or earlier. The bulk, however, of these loan-words occur in papyri of the 14th and 13th cents. B.C. Maspero, who first brought this fascinating subject into prominence (in his Epistolographie Égyptienne, 1873), thought that during those centuries the employment of Semitic words was in fashion among the upper classes in Egypt; and if this opinion be correct, it follows that the Canaanitish language must by then have reached a high state of development. This opinion, however, was not shared by J. H. Bondi, who, in his dissertation on these words (Leipzig, 1886), collected as many as sixty-five of them; while a still greater number was collected by W. Max Müller (in his Asien und Europa, 1893), who has since (in the volume dedicated to Ebers, 1897) tracked out a few in the celebrated Papyrus Ebers, which deals with medical prescriptions. Whether their introduction into Egyptian was the work of the upper or the lower classes, the variety of the spheres of thought to which they belong is such as to allow of their being compared with the words afterwards borrowed by the Copts from the Greeks. The unsatisfactory nature of the Egyptian transcription renders them somewhat less amenable to grammatical analysis than the Tel el-Amarna glosses. Of the remaining monuments of the Canaanitish language, the inscription on a patera dedicated to Baal-Lebanon in Phœnician (CIS i. No. 5) is probably the oldest, while the Mesha stele (of the time of Jehoshaphat of Judah) approaches most nearly to the Israelitish idiom, being in Moabitic; of the other Phœnician inscriptions, that of Byblus (CIS, i. 1) approximates to Hebrew, but the most important is doubtless the Eshmunazar inscription (CIS i. 3), about the time of Alexander the Great. From Palestine the Canaanitish language was carried by Phœnician colonists to Africa, the islands and harbours of the Mediterranean, and Spain. Here it was supplanted first by Greek, and then more extensively by Latin; but would seem to have survived as a spoken language down to the 5th cent. B.C., and perhaps later.

---

* Delitzsch (Handwörterbuch, s.v. 'ḫilāni') suggests that Hittite is meant here. It would seem, however, that the words are easily explicable as Canaanitish (cf. Jer 22^{14}), and B. Meissner (Noch einmal das Bît Ḫillāni, 1893) thinks this does not admit of a doubt.

† In the Babylonian Gemara עברי at any rate sometimes means a foreign language, e.g. Shabbath, 115*a*.

3. Origin.—The Canaanitish language belongs to the Semitic family, and is closely allied to the Arabic, i.e. the language made world-famous by the conquests of Mohammed and his successors. These are the only languages of the Semitic family that have, in regular use, (1) a prefixed article, leading to a variety of syntactical rules; (2) an interrogative prefix of a single letter,[*] as well as a syllabic prefix of the same import (Dt 32^{6}); (3) a series of passive conjugations, formed by a change of vowel from the active;[†] (4) a regular conjugation Niphal;[‡]—Canaanitish has, moreover, considerable remnants of (5) a case system; (6) an infinitive system; (7) a mood system identical with those of classical Arabic. The theory represented in the grammar of J. Olshausen (Brunswick, 1861), according to which the relation of Hebrew to Arabic is that of daughter to mother (in the sense in which these metaphors may be used of languages), is that which best suits the facts;[§] and indeed the proximate ancestors of Hebrew forms can in the great majority of cases be easily found in Arabic. The apparent absurdity of deriving so ancient a language as Canaanitish from one of which the earliest monuments in our possession are so recent, disappears in the face of the overwhelming evidence which comparative grammar can produce. The earliest specimens of classical Arabic that have come down to us are not, indeed, earlier than the 6th cent. A.D.; and though numerous inscriptions in other dialects have been discovered in both S. and N. Arabia, the dialect of the Koran is scarcely represented in any stone monuments earlier than the composition of that book. There is, however, no doubt that the Mohammedans inherited a literary language, which prevailed over the greater part of the Arabian peninsula, with slight differences of dialect. But for the early history of that language we cannot go to Mohammedan writers, but are left to what we can infer.

The line of investigation to be followed is the same as that applied by M. Pictet to the Indo-European languages, and which employs the assumption (called by M. Lenormant 'the true principle') that, where kindred nations which have separated call objects or institutions by the same names, and there are no signs of those names having been borrowed independently, they must have possessed the names and the objects, etc., before they parted. A comparison therefore of the Hebrew and Arabic names for a variety of things should give us something like a correct idea of the state of Arabian society when the Canaanites first migrated northward. The result would seem to be the following:—

The nation from which the Canaanitish colonies emanated must before that event have attained as high a level of development as any Oriental State uninfluenced by Europe has reached. Society was already organized on the basis of the family, for the languages have identical names for 'father-in-law,' 'mother-in-law,' 'son-in-law,' and 'daughter-in-law,' which necessarily imply it; but the family was polygamic, since the relation of 'fellow-wife' is indicated by the same name with the proper phonetic changes. The treble system of naming in use in Arabia would seem to have existed also, since the Canaanites retain all three words for 'naming' and 'names,'[*] but have apparently ceased to distinguish between them accurately; and the castes of freemen and slaves were already distinct. The life of the people was passed partly in villages, partly in towns, with streets and squares, and defended by walls. The same cereals were cultivated in the fields, many of the same pot-herbs in the gardens, mostly the same fruits in the orchards and plantations, and the same animals domesticated as afterwards in Canaan; and the chief agricultural processes had already been invented and named. Various trades were exercised in the towns: there were smiths and carpenters who understood the use of the saw, the axe, and the adze; there were money-changers with scales,[†] and there were money-lenders.[‡] The last two trades imply some acquaintance with arithmetic, and the Arabs before the Canaanitish migration possessed special names for 'thousands' and 'myriads.' Money-lending implies the calculation of days, and this is based on astronomical observation, the beginnings of which already existed, for some of the constellations[§] were already named. Writing already existed,[‖] and, it would seem, an alphabet,[¶] and certain styles of elegant composition were already practised.[] Religion had already taken shape: men could distinguish between the sacred and the profane, they had a pilgrimage, and learned various ceremonies, including, probably, genuflexions and prostrations. The prophetic profession seems to have existed in a variety of forms. Custom had already to some extent become stereotyped in the form of law.

It is probable, therefore, that the Canaanites issued from a country where a classical language was spoken and written. Some tribes may have carried that language with them into their new home; but, in the case of those whom we know best, it would appear to be a vulgar dialect of Arabic which formed the basis of the language. Many curious parallels can be found between the language of the Bible and the dialects of Arabic spoken in Egypt and Syria in the present day.[††] While in general simplifying the structure of the ancient language, they contain many relics of the classical rules. The classical language from which both are derived must therefore have flourished long before the 15th cent. B.C., for which time the existence of the later language is certified. The elaborate syntax and accidence which the early poetry of the Arabs exhibits would seem to have been codified more than two thousand years before that poetry was composed. It is in favour of this result that the Arabs have no accurate notion of the commencement of their literature, or of the time when any of their classical metres was invented. Yet those metres imply the whole of the grammatical system, which can only have been the product of organized study. That all trace of the schools and colleges of early Arabia should have perished is noteworthy, but scarcely extraordinary, if we consider what such isolated monuments as the Mesha stele or the Iguvine tablets imply as to the extent of literatures that have wholly perished.

---

[*] The Aramaic of Daniel also has this.

[†] The biblical Aramaic as well as that of the papyri shows some traces of these passives. The Hebrew of the OT shows considerable relics of a passive of the first form, which the grammatical tables cannot recognize. The punctuators identified it with Pu'al, the passive of ii. עֻבַּד Is 14^{3} and שֻׁטַּף Lv 6^{21} are striking cases.

[‡] This conjugation is given in the Assyrian paradigms.

[§] Vollers, in his review (ZA, 1897) of Nöldeke, Zur Grammatik des Kl. Arabischen, thinks that work will tend to modify this view; but see the author's reply in the same volume.

[*] כנה in Arabic, 'to address by an indirect name,' i.e. to call a man by his son's name, 'father of so-and-so,' instead of by his own. In the Aghāni the narrators often point out how the Caliph kannānī, 'called me Abū so-and-so' to do me honour. In Syriac the word merely means to 'name'; in Hebrew, Is 45^{4} 'to call by a family name,' Job 32^{21} 'to flatter.' It would seem clear that the Arabic practice (extraordinary as it is) lies behind both the Heb. and Syr. usage. The word laḳab, in Arabic 'title,' serves to give a verb to the Hebrew שֵׁם: אֲשֶׁר נִקְּבוּ בְּשֵׁמוֹת 'whose names have been mentioned,' Nu 1^{17}.

[†] מֹאזְנַיִם is a case of popular etymology. The root וזן being lost in Hebrew, the word was popularly derived from אֹזֶן 'an ear.' The Carthaginians have a similar word, Rev. Ass. v. 12.

[‡] The Heb. נשה, of which the construction is peculiar, seems evidently connected with nasī'ah, 'deferred payment.'

[§] See Hommel's article in the ZDMG, 1892.

[‖] The word סֵפֶר seems to be the Arab. zibr, which occurs in the earliest Arabic known to us. See Mu'allaḳah of Labid. The Assyr. satar is used in early Arabic also. The meaning 'to write' is lost in Hebrew, but lies behind the sense of שֹׁטֵר.

[¶] הגה has the sense of Arab. hajā, 'to articulate,' in several passages: Pr 8^{7}, Is $59^{3.\,13}$.

[] It seems difficult to separate the word מְשֻׁגָּע used with נָבִיא Hos 9^{7}, מִתְנַבֵּא Jer 29^{26} (cf. 2 K 9^{11}), from the Arab. sij', 'rhymed prose,' the traditional style of the Kāhins. The Heb. הִגָּיוֹן was compared by Meier with the Arab. hijā. מָשָׁל and mathal appear to be also independent.

[††] Some examples are given by W. Wright in his Arabic Grammar (2nd ed.) and his Comparative Grammar. The form הֶעֱלִיתֻנוּ (Nu 20^{5}) is vulgar (ḳataltūnā for ḳataltumūnā). The uses of יַעַן can be illustrated by those of ya'nī in languages that borrow from Arabic. The use of אֲשֶׁר as a final and explanatory particle would seem to be a vulgarism. الذى is so used in some Arab. dialects, and likewise in modern Armen. the relative wor has taken the place of yethē 'that.' Perhaps the Heb. עָשָׂה 'to do,' is the Arab. ghashiya vulgarly used; cf. Lisān al-'arab, xix. 363. 5.

The evidence for the priority of Arabic grammar to the development of the Canaanitish language is to be found partly in what may be termed the residues which Canaanitish exhibits. Of these, examples are to be found (1) in the spelling, (2) in the grammatical forms, (3) in the syntax.

(1) As examples of orthographic residues, we may notice (a) the employment of א to represent the sign of prolongation of the vowel o in a number of words in which the Arabic has the consonantal א preceded by a short a (e.g. רֹאשׁ, צֹאן, יֹאמַר; see Böttcher, Lehrbuch, i. p. 245). In some other words the letter א is still written without affecting the pronunciation. It would seem clear that the tribes who migrated from Arabia to Canaan had already found difficulty in pronouncing the consonantal Aleph, which indeed many still regard as the hardest of the Arabic consonants. They pronounced ā for a', a pronunciation which indeed the Arabic grammarians tolerate in poetry. But while this ā in Arabic was either retained or reduced in the direction of ē, the immigrants pronounced it as well as other Arabic ā's (with rare exceptions) as ō. The writing צֹאן for ẓōn therefore is a case in which an old spelling is retained after it has become doubly unsuitable to represent the correct pronunciation; and in all cases where this letter represents anything but the soft breathing, it must be regarded as a remnant from an earlier language, or due to false analogy. The perpetual interchange which we notice in the OT between roots ל״א and roots ל״ה shows that the consonantal א could no longer be pronounced at the end of a word. But from etymological orthography of this sort we can infer with certainty the existence of a literature in which the orthography agreed not only with etymology, but with the actual pronunciation; in other words, the existence of written documents in Arabic earlier than the Canaanitish migration.

(b) Of no less interest as an etymological remnant is the employment of the letter ה at the end of words to represent the lengthening of a vowel, a peculiarity which the Phœnician dialects apparently do not share with the Hebrew and Moabitic. This mode of writing has two obvious sources. In Arabic the pausal form of nouns ending in atun is ah, and in this form the h is pronounced as a consonant (Heb. הּ), as we learn from its treatment in verse: thus martabah is made to rhyme with intabah, in which the h is radical (Hariri, ed. 1, p. 64), etc. This pausal form has in Hebrew ousted the other. That it is everywhere pronounced ā for ah is a phenomenon to be easily illustrated from Hebrew itself (in which the āh of the feminine suffix has a tendency to sink into ā), and from many other languages. But the Phœnicians did not adopt this pausal form, retaining the t in the absolute as well as in the construct state. Hence one of the sources of this employment of the letter h was wanting in their language.

The second source of this phenomenon is to be found in the masculine suffix of the third person. Relics of the Arabic hu are not infrequent, but ordinarily (as in modern Arabic locally) that suffix is reduced to ō. When modern Arabic is written, the h is retained (see e.g. Ḳaṭa'if al-laṭāif, Cairo, 1894, p. 51, etc.), and the same is the case frequently in Hebrew and in Moabitic. In all these cases, however, it is an etymological remnant.

(c) As a third case of etymological writing, we may note the employment of the sign שׂ to represent s. This orthography is characteristic of the older forms of Hebrew, Phœnician, and Aramaic, falling gradually into disuse in all of them. Now we know that the words which in Hebrew are written with שׁ almost invariably correspond to Arabic words with sh. Since a great number of the words which in Arabic have the sibilant that corresponds with ס have that letter in Hebrew also, the desire to avoid confusion may well have perpetuated the old spelling in the cases where a sh had come to be pronounced s. We learn, moreover, from the well-known passage in Jg 12^{6} that in parts of Palestine only one of these sibilants could be pronounced.

(2) Of the grammatical residues, which are numerous, we need merely notice the variation in the second and third persons plural of the imperfect between the forms ūn and ū. All distinction in meaning between these forms is clearly lost; at most it can be said that some writers have a predilection for one form rather than the other. Classical Arabic, however, distinguishes them very decidedly: the dropping of the n with its vowel is a sign of the subjunctive or jussive mood, and is not an isolated phenomenon, but belongs to a system. What renders the treatment of these forms by the Hebrews peculiarly interesting is that the vulgar Arabic written by Jews, Christians, and even Mohammedans, exhibits the same phenomenon. Such writers as Jephet Ibn Ali are well acquainted with both forms: only the sense of their proper employment fails them.

(3) As a syntactical residue we may instance the treatment of the numerals. Here the Arabic rule is very simple, and its ground can easily be seen. One part of it is that the numbers 11–99 take after them the accusative singular. If the usage of the Hebrew OT be tabulated, the only expression for it seems to be that with words which from their nature are constantly coupled with numerals the Arabic rule is fairly regularly observed; with others the plural is more common, but the singular optional. Thus in Jg 8^{28} 'The land rested forty year,' but v.^{30} 'Gideon had seventy sons'; Jg 9^{2} speaks of 'seventy man,' but v.^{24} 'the seventy sons of Jerubbaal,' v.^{56} 'his seventy brothers.' In Jos the rule is sometimes observed with the word 'man,' but other variations occur which stamp the language as patois-like and ungrammatical: the following examples of the syntax of the word 'twelve' taken from Jos 3 and 4 show how unsettled was the usage in eveu so ordinary a matter. 3^{12} שְׁנֵי עָשָׂר אִישׁ, 4^{2} שְׁנֵים עָשָׂר אֲנָשִׁים, 4^{4} שְׁנֵים הֶעָשָׂר אִישׁ; $4^{3.9}$ שְׁתֵּים עֶשְׂרֵה אֲבָנִים, 4^{8} שְׁתֵּי עֶשְׂרֵה א׳. The rule seems to be similarly observed when numerals precede the word אֶלֶף 'a thousand,' owing to ancient calculations, whereas the old rule about the syntax of words following אֶלֶף seems to be equally often observed and forgotten. From the practically regular observance of the Arabic syntax in the case of the word 'year,' which from its nature must be constantly coupled with numerals, it seems reasonable to infer the antiquity of the Arabic rules. The ordinary style of the OT exhibits therefore in this case, as in the last, a survival from an older language.

At what time the Canaanitish language first began to be written cannot be determined; but it seems certain that there can have been no break of any length between the writing of Arabic and the writing of Canaanitish; the etymological remnants would otherwise be inexplicable. Thus the writing of aiment in French for aime must be inherited from a generation who both pronounced and wrote aiment or amant; had French been first written by persons who pronounced the word aime, the nt could never have been introduced. We cannot know either whether the Canaanitish orthography was gradually formed or became fixed at a definite epoch. The evolution of Ethiopic from Sabæan, which offers some striking analogies to that of Canaanitish from Arabic, is in favour of the latter supposition. Those who made Ethiopic a written language abandoned some of the Sabæan letters and introduced others. Those who gave Canaanitish a literature omitted some six or seven of the letters of the old Arabic alphabet, but added none. It is probable, then, that the double pronunciation of the six letters בגדכפת, with which we are familiar in Hebrew, Phœnician, and Aramaic, was not yet noticeable. The lost letters are to some extent the same as those which are no longer pronounced in many of the countries where Arabic is spoken, albeit they are still written. In Canaanitish th coalesces with שׁ, dh with ז, kha with ח, ḍād and ẓā with צ, ghain with ע. This rule holds good ordinarily, but human speech is subject to fluctuations, and irregular correspondence (as e.g. חדל Arab. khadhala, נעדר Arab. ta'adhdhara) need not always imply independent roots, where the significations are clearly akin. In the case, moreover, of the other letters the Canaanitish dialect shows considerable deviation from the Arabic, sometimes in a manner that can be paralleled from dialects the peculiarities of which are noted by Arabic grammarians. Thus it would appear that there was a tendency to shift from mediæ to tenues (e.g. מסך, Arab. מזג; כחד, Arab. גחד; תף, Arab. דף; שלף, Arab. שלב ; שׁפע, Arab. שׁבע ; פור, Arab. בור), which can be paralleled from what has happened in other languages (e.g. modern Armenian as compared with ancient). The Canaanitish language shows further considerable confusion of the gutturals: besides the tendency to pronounce ק for ב (e.g. בקר for בכר, עקש for עבשׁ, צחק for צֿהך), we find ח for ע (קרחה, Arab. קרעה), ה for ח (e.g. בזה, Syr. בזח, Arab. מוח), ב for ח̇ (בבה for Arab. חבו), etc. There is also considerable confusion of the sibilants (ס for ז in נמע, ס for צ in ספק, ז for צ in זעיר, etc.), and of the liquids (e.g. נקב for לקב, רשן for רשם, סלה for סמת); moreover, the letter ת is frequently displaced by the emphatic ט, e.g. קטל for קתל, etc., and מ by ב (e.g. נשב for נשם, ערברב for ערמרם, בחן for מחן). Further phenomena which often meet us in vulgar dialects are the frequent assimilation of the nasal n before another consonant (cf. Ital. mese for mensem, mod. Armen. gigni for gingni, 'he falls'), and the misplacement of the aspirate. Indeed, in Canaanitish as well as in the older Aramaic and in some of the S. Arabian dialects, an initial breathing seems regularly to be aspirated when it is a grammatical prefix, and sometimes when it is radical (so הפך for אפך); but, on the other hand, the Hebrew sometimes substitutes the soft breathing for the aspirate (cf. אימה with Arab. היבה), especially in the middle of a word (so עֵד 'a witness' for עהד 'one who knows'; cf. Jer 29²³ יודע ועד; דור through דאר for דהר). Where two of these irregular changes occur in the same word, it often becomes unrecognizable; and the occasional transposition of radicals introduces great difficulty: just as some mod. Armenian dialects have tepur for phethur, so Hebrew has צוה for וצה, לוה for ולה; cf. עצם for Arab. עמץ. The chief grammatical differences between Arabic and Hebrew are due (1) to the loss of the final vowels, which in the older language have syntactical value; (2) to the exaggeration of the accent, resulting in the strengthening of some vowels and the loss of others; (3) to the tendency to simplify, which explains the loss of whole series of forms in many of those languages that have grown out of the decay of classical idioms. In the opinion of some, the language has by these changes gained in vigour what it has lost in finesse—a matter which must be left to the individual taste.[*]

Of the families of words in use in Canaanitish, it would seem that more than half can be identified with roots known to the lexicographers of classical Arabic; but the waywardness which characterizes human speech has not failed to leave its mark on the treatment of the old words in respect both of their preservation and the evolution of their significations. Thus Canaanitish and classical Arabic have the same word for 'peace,' but different words for 'war'; the same for 'to eat,' but different for 'to drink'; the same for 'near,' but different for 'far'; the same for 'low,' but different for 'high'; the same for 'gold,' but different for 'silver'; the same for 'to ride,' but different for 'to sit' and 'to stand'; the same for 'ass,' but different for 'horse,' though the same for 'horseman.' In several of these cases, and in numerous others, while the same words or the same families are retained in both languages, the meaning in one or other has been so generalized or specialized as to render the introduction of another necessary in order to represent the original meaning. In some cases it is likely that neither language retains the original sense; but in most it would seem that, in spite of the late date of our Arabic documents, the Arabic signification is prior; and good service has been done by those acquainted with both languages since the days of the Talmudists in tracking out the development of these significations.

A few familiar cases are—(1) the Hebrew for 'to say' אמר, in Arab. 'to command': that 'to command' is the original sense is shown by occasional relics of that meaning in the OT (2 S 1⁸), and by the derivative התאמר 'to be proud,' a sense which can scarcely be connected with the Hebrew 'to say,' but derives very naturally from the Arab. 'to play the prince or commander,' like the words השתרר (Nu 16¹³), התנשא (ib. 16³). (2) זר, in Heb. 'to act insolently,' in Arab. 'to increase': a relic of the older usage seems to be found in Dt 18²⁰ 'the prophet who shall add to speak in my name words which I have not commanded him': the Latin loquetur ultro would exactly illustrate the transference of ideas. (3) The Hebrew חלל 'to profane,' and החל 'to begin,' seem both traceable to the Arab. חל 'to loosen,' whence both ideas flow by a course of reasoning exactly similar to that illustrated in the evolution of the Aramaic שרה. In several cases what we have in Canaanitish is apparently an expression current in the mouths of the vulgar exalted into a classical phrase: the Hebrew words for 'handmaid' and 'family' would appear to have a very obvious etymology in Arabic (cf Koran, iv. 28; Romance of Saif, i. 28), which, however, would exclude them at the first from the mouths of the well-bred. A certain number of alterations in meaning can be explained by popular misapplications, e.g. the Canaanites use for 'blind' the word which in Arab. means 'one-eyed,' for 'deaf' the word which in Arab. means 'dumb.'

It is not in our power to gauge the whilom wealth of the Hebrew language,[*] and far more of the copious Arabic vocabulary may have been retained by the Canaanites than is ordinarily supposed. Most of the books of the OT offer examples of hapax legomena that can be satisfactorily explained from the Arabic, whether in the form of antiquated phrases for which the ordinary language employs other synonyms (e.g. Dt 27⁹ הסכת, Arab. uskut, 'be silent,' in every way parallel to the herald's 'O yez'), or of dialectic words (e.g. נצב, Arab. niṣāb, Jg 3²²), or of words which there is no reason to suppose to have been rare, but which for one reason or another the biblical writers have not elsewhere occasion to employ (e.g. עֲטִישָׁה 'sneezing,' Job 41¹⁸).

Arabisms in this sense can be found not only in the latest biblical writers,[†] but even in the fragments of Ben-Sira, and in the New-Hebrew of the Mishna.* As borrowing from the Arabs is highly improbable, and in many cases shown by the phonetic changes to be impossible, the whole stock of words common to Canaanitish and Arabic must have constituted the linguistic capital of the former language. The parallelistic style, which is probably earlier than the migration, served to retain in use many synonyms which might otherwise have disappeared;† but without a far greater mass of literature than has come down to us we could not pronounce without hardihood on the original bulk of the Canaanitish vocabulary, or deny any genuine Arabic root a place in it.‡

[*] Of many of the elegances of Arabic grammar there are faint traces in the OT. The Arab. rubba 'many a,' appears once, Pr 20⁶. Of the broken plural the only real example in the OT appears to be זְכוּר plural of זָכָר; in other cases its meaning is lost, even though its form be present, e.g. קְלֹקֵל Nu 21⁵. In Böttcher's Lehrbuch the most is made of these relics as well as of supposed remains of the dual of verbs and pronouns. The syntax of the Book of Joshua seems to show that there was a time when the old rules of the article were in danger of being lost (3¹⁴ 7²¹ 8¹⁰· ³³), but this (like Is 36⁸· ¹⁶) may be due to corruption of the text. A remarkable relic is in Jer 22¹⁸ הוֹי אָחוֹת, which resembles the āh added in Arabic, wā Zaidāh, 'alas, Zaid!' (Vernier, Gram. Arabe, § 565).

[*] In the Concordance published at Warsaw, 1883, roots are given in large type, verbs (counting each conjugation separately) are marked with a circle, and nouns with a star. According to computations made for this article, the numbers are respectively 2058, 2930, 3937.

[†] So Ec 9¹ בור 'to try,' Arab. bāra; in Lisān al-'arab, v. 153, several curious passages of old authors are cited in which this word occurs. The etymology is given by Ges. Thes., but omitted in the Oxf. Heb. Lex. 2²⁰ יָאֵשׁ can scarcely have been thought out by the writer from the biblical נואש, but must represent an old word (Arab. ya'isa). A few striking Arabisms may be collected here. Gn 28¹² סֻלָּם 'a staircase,' Arab. sullam; 40¹⁶ חֹרִי 'white bread,' Arab. ḥuwwārī; 42²⁷ אַמְתַּחַת 'baggage,' Arab. amti'at, plur. of matā' (it is curious that Mohammed uses this word in Koran, xii. 25, where this verse is represented 'when they opened their baggage matā-'ahum'. The change of ע to ח is caused by the following ת: in Egypt it is now customary to say שמחת for שמעת, ארבחת for ארבעת [Tantavy, Grammaire, p. v.]); Ex 5⁴ תַּפְרִיעוּ

4. Secondary Sources.—Of the roots and words which the Hebrew vocabulary contains, a great number cannot be identified in the Arabic dictionary. Of these, however, some seem to have been current in Arabia before the migration, for we find them in the Ethiopic language, which we know to have sprung from a S. Arabian dialect.§ A few more are stamped as Arabic by their occurrence in S. Arabian inscriptions.‖ But this still leaves a great number unaccounted for. We have therefore to recognize in Canaanitish a non-Arabic element, and must endeavour to account for its origin.

According to the biblical account, the patriarchs and their families having acquired Hebrew in Canaan, sojourned in Egypt, but retained their own language, which was brought back to Canaan. Although the seclusion of the Israelites in Egypt, on which some of the narratives insist, would account for their failing to adopt the language of Egypt, their dependent position there would lead us to expect that their Hebrew would be affected by their long exile from Canaan, and that their literature would show traces of Egyptian, which other Canaanitish monuments would fail to exhibit. This expectation is not fulfilled. If the hieroglyphic vocabulary* be collated with the Hebrew, the cases in which they show any correspondence are extremely rare, and these cases seem to belong to a period prior to the separation between the Egyptian and Semitic races: in any case, the fact that they are mostly Semitic and not specifically Hebrew words, shows that they were not learned by the Israelites in Goshen. The Coptic vocabulary is indeed far more illustrative of Hebrew; but this is due mainly to the extensive borrowing of Canaanitish by the Egyptians at a period to which reference has been made; and in many cases the words are Semitic with purely Canaanitish forms, and words which, while isolated in Coptic, belong to extensive families in Semitic. The few words in Hebrew which may be justly regarded as Egyptian are such as may easily have been brought by travellers.† It is, however, surprising that the historians of the Egyptian episode in Exodus are acquainted with scarcely any of the Egyptian technicalities which we should have expected them to introduce, e.g. the words for taskmasters, magicians,‡ pyramids, and that one of the writers excerpted should suppose that the Egyptians spoke Hebrew (Ex 2^{10}). One of the authors copied in Gn is better informed on this point (42^{23}), but even his employment of Egyptian words is inconsiderable. Very different is the amount contributed to Canaanitish by the language of Assyria. We learn from the Tel el-Amarna tablets that in the 15th cent. B.C., while Palestine was under Egyptian suzerainty, the official language of communication was Assyrian, albeit the Canaanites had a language of their own. The employment of Assyrian as an official language points, however, to a yet earlier period of Assyrian supremacy. The language known as Assyrian is indeed Semitic, but greatly mixed with foreign elements, and with the consonantal system seriously deranged: it is therefore probable, where Canaanitish and Assyrian have words in common which are unknown to the other Semitic languages, that the former has borrowed from the latter. These words have been the subject of some classical monographs;§ and they are such as affect the whole character of the syntax, pronouns, conjunctions, prepositions,

† So Job 16^{19} 'my witness (עֵדִי) is in the heavens, and my testis שָׂהֲדִי in the heights'; 18^5 שְׁבִיב parallel to אוֹר; Pr 22^{25} תֶּאֱלַף parallel to לָקַחְתָּ; 27^3 נֵטֶל parallel with כֹּבֶד. The retention of חָרוּץ (Phœn.) and כֶּתֶם (Egyp.?) as names for 'gold' is perhaps due to poetical necessity.

‡ Some parallels between the expressions of the Arabs and the OT are put together by G. Jacob, Studien in Arabischen Dichtern, iv. (Halle, 1897), and by E. Nestle, Marginalien, p. 58 ff. A longer list could be got from the commentaries of A. Schultens and F. Hitzig. Some curious cases are: 'when their foot slippeth' (Dt 32^{35} etc.), for 'when misfortune befalls them,' in Arabic zalla 'l-ḳadam (Koran, xvi. 96); commencing letters with 'and now' (2 K 5^6 10^2), in Arabic ammā ba'du, i.e. 'after compliments': 'swallowing my spittle' (Job 7^{19}) used for 'resting a moment' as in Arabic; 'hast thou listened in the council of God,' etc. (Job 15^8), bears a curious likeness to the theory that the Jinns used to listen there and so learn mysteries (Koran, xv. 18). The phrase חִלָּה פָּנִים 'to curry favour' is perhaps to be explained from the Arab. khalā in Koran, xii. 9, 'the face of your father shall be clear (yakhlu) for you.' Much of the 'eloquence' of the Koran can be illustrated from that of the OT, e.g. 'ask the village' for 'the people of the village' in Koran, xii. 82, resembles Dt 9^{28}.

§ See the Hebrew dictionaries, s.vv. אבן, אש, אשכל, בוא, חבר, חמם, חץ, ידה, יצא, ירה, כבר, למר, ננה, נגש, נשא, נשך, סמך, עבה, עוף, פנה, צמר, צמר, קשר, רוץ, רחק, רשע, שחת, שבב, שכם, תקע. Specially interesting identifications are those of the Heb. מְתִים 'men,' מֶלְתָּחָה (2 K 10^{22}), מַלְתָּעוֹת (Ps 58^7). With the familiar Heb. הִגִּיד 'he told,' perhaps Eth. aghada should be compared; with מֵרֵעַ 'a paranymph' mar'āwī=nuptiator; with מָעַל 'to rebel' ma'let=defectio.

‖ So, e.g., the preposition בַּעֲבוּר, and חלה (with the same meaning as in Eshmunazar's epitaph) in the glossary to Mordtmann's article in Mittheilungen des K. Museums zu Berlin, 1893.

* Pierret, Vocabulaire Hieroglyphique, Paris, 1876.

† One of the few philological observations of interest in the Haggadah is the suggestion of R. Nehemiah (first occurring in Pesikta, ed. Buber, p. 109*b*) that אָנֹכִי is the Coptic anok: God, he thought, addressed the Israelites (Ex 20^2) in Egyptian because they had forgotten Hebrew. This view appears for the last time, perhaps, in Peyron's Lex. Copt. Egyptian words occurring as such in the OT were collected in the last century by Jablonski (Opuscula, vol. i., republished Leyden, 1805); Wiedemann's Sammlung Ægyptischer Wörter (1883) reduces the list to meagre dimensions. A great collection of kindred Egyptian and Semitic words was made by Schwartze in his Altes Ægypten, 1842 (p. 1000 sqq.); whereas Uhlemann, de Vet. Ægypt. lingua (1851), endeavoured to collect those which might reasonably be supposed to have been borrowed by the Hebrews. If we take no account of (a) proper names, (b) words of pre-Semitic antiquity, (c) words borrowed by the Egyptians, the number left is small; יְאֹר, Copt. iaro; אָחוּ (Gn 41^2), Hier. āχu, Copt. aχi; דְּבִיר (a shrine), Hier. ṭeber, Copt. tabir, Abel, Kopt. Untersuchungen, 422; if the theories expounded in that work be correct, it will be difficult to deny קרם (Ex 21^6 etc.; cf. Copt. kros) and כִּכָּר an Egyptian origin; and the last has been regarded as Egyptian by good authorities. שַׁעַר of Gn 26^{12} seems to be rightly compared with Copt. shaar, and מִין 'a species' with Copt. mini (a native Egyptian word according to Abel, l.c. 28). De Rougé (Chrestom. i. 56) suggests that אִי 'island' is Egypt. aa, and (ib. 40) identifies snehem with סָלְעָם (Lv 11^{22}).

‡ Wiedemann, while offering an Egyptian etymology for חרטם, allows that it is probably Hebrew.

numerals, familiar adverbs, as well as political, commercial, legal, and religious terms.[*] It is not improbable that one of the most characteristic of the Hebrew idioms is due to the influence of Assyrian.[†] The study of the Assyrian monarchs' annals and letters also reveals phrases which form part of the rhetorical capital of the Hebrew authors,[‡] which it is probable were originally imitations of the Assyrian style. The Aramaic language has also inherited some of the Assyrian wit which the Canaanites did not adopt.[§]

There remain, however, a number of Canaanitish words which cannot be identified from any of the sources that have been enumerated. Several of these were probably tribal words of the communities that migrated northwards, and, though ancient and Semitic, never formed part of the old classical language; while others may have belonged to the classical language, though they have become obsolete in all its other descendants. It is likely, moreover, that a considerable number of Canaanitish words were learned from the Canaanitish aborigines. A race that may be named in this connexion, the Hittites, has left monuments the decipherment of which has occupied many scholars without as yet leading to any satisfactory result. An eminent Assyriologist has recently endeavoured to identify the Hittites with the Armenians (Jensen, Hittiter und Armenier, 1898); and since the Hittite race at one time played an important part in Palestine, we should expect, if Jensen's conjecture were correct, to find some considerable illustration of the Canaanitish vocabulary in the Armenian language. The mixed nature of that language (of which the basis is Indo-germanic) renders its employment for the explanation of Hebrew extremely hazardous; and many tempting identifications of words can be shown to be due to pure accident.[‖] The local names of Palestine, of which the Bk. of Joshua in particular furnishes a great number, throw less light than might be expected on the character of the aboriginal languages employed there. The greater number seem very certainly Semitic, albeit they not infrequently, both in vocabulary[¶] and grammatical form,[*] exhibit traces of an older language than that known to us as Canaanitish. A considerable number of these names can be traced to the 15th cent. B.C., and even earlier, in Egyptian and Assyrian records. An un-Semitic remnant there is, but its linguistic character is difficult to fix.

5. Progress of the Language.—The Tel el-Amarna tablets represent the country as settled in States, somewhat as we find it described in the Bk. of Joshua. The States in which Canaanitish was spoken must have acquired the language either prior to their separation, or posterior to it if that consisted in the hegemony of the community whose native language it was.

Dialectic differences developed as the Canaanites began to write, each dialect preserving something which the others discarded,[†] but also evolving peculiarities of its own. It would not, however, appear that the Canaanites down to a late period had any difficulty in understanding each other. Jeremiah (27^{3}) expects his message to be understood by Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, and Sidonians; and the tombstone of Eshmunazar contains phrases which seem to imply some acquaintance on that king's part with the Hebrew Scriptures.[‡] When David succeeded in welding together an Israelitish empire, it would seem that he took steps to make the language of Israel[§] (rather than that of Judah) official; and to the extent of the elements of grammar such as were taught in the schools the Israelitish language was thereafter uniform. These elements would, however, appear to have been exceedingly meagre. The scientific spirit would seem to have failed the ancient Israelites absolutely;[‖] and it is the same habit of mind which seeks to codify the order of nature and to find regularity in human speech. The Israelites could indeed distinguish and despise a foreign pronunciation,[¶] and set value on correct speech;[] but it is improbable that their power of judging this matter went beyond questions of intonation and accent: throughout the OT there is scarcely a grammatical term to be found; and though several of the writers have a fondness for etymologizing,[††] the cases in which modern scholars regard their efforts as successful are rare. The result of the want of grammatical training is apparent in even the most classical portions of the OT. Where the writers have to do with quite ordinary words and notions, their language is regular; but so soon as this region is left, it becomes tentative, and it is partly due to the variety of these experiments that the Hebrew grammars reach a bulk that is out of all proportion to the literature with which they have to deal. Thus, where the prophets have to address companies of women, we find no certainty about the grammatical terminations; Isaiah (32^{9-12}) tries three different ways of forming the imperative to be employed in such a case; Ezekiel (13^{20-22}) tries three ways of forming the pronominal suffix. The attempts made to form the infinitives of the conjugation Niphal, and indeed of all the derived conjugations, are very varied. Other curious specimens of uncertainty as to the right form are to be found in Jos $6^{17.\,25}$, Dt 2^{35} 3^{7}, Jer 51^{9} etc.

[*] In Frd. Delitzsch's Handwörterbuch some 160 words and roots can be illustrated from Hebrew, but not from Arabic. Examples of the words referred to above are sha (Heb. שׁ, whence, perhaps, אֲשֶׁר), ki-i (כִּי), ūlā (perhaps אולי), itti (אֵת), a-a-ka (אֵיכָה), a-ta-a (עַתָּה), ēsh-tē (עשתי), ma-a-du (מְאֹד), is-su-ri (אִפַּר), na-sī-ku (נסך). Other examples of common words in which Canaanitish and Assyrian agree against the S. Semitic group are: אָדָם, אוּלָם, אור, אֲשֶׁר, אֵיב, אנשׁ, אָרַשׁ, אשר; הדה; זִק (dart); יפה; לקח; מעט, מצא; נאד, ניא (hinder); נשק (kiss); סכל (fool); ספר (mourn); עבות, עבור (produce); שאר (body); שמר (guard); תמך (maintain). היכל is said to be a Sumerian word, borrowed first by the Assyrians, and from them by the Canaanites.

[†] i.e. the waw conversive. Most of the Assyrian chronicles exhibit only one tense, the Heb. imperfect. It would seem possible that the annalistic employment of this term in Hebrew was at first an imitation of the Assyrian, which then developed idiomatically.

[‡] So 'to open the ear' (K. 95. 15 in S. A. Smith, KT Assurbanipals); 'to break in pieces like a potter's vessel' (Sargon, passim); טוֹב לֵב for 'cheerfulness,' יֹשֵׁב בַּשָּׁמַיִם as an epithet of the Deity, etc. Many cases are collected by Karppe in his articles in the Journal Asiatique, ser. 9, vol. x.

[§] The phrase אכל קרצי occurs in the Tel el-Amarna tablets. In Budge's notes to 'Rabban Hormizd' some interesting illustrations of this are given.

[‖] אַגָּן is Armenian, according to Lagarde (Ges. Abh. p. 8). A word that may possibly be Armenian is צִיּוּן 'a stele' or 'monument' (2 K 23^{17}, Jer 31^{21}, Ezk 39^{15}), Arm. siun 'a pillar.' This is an old Armenian word = Greek κιών with the proper changes. Lagarde first thought כֹּמֶר (Hos 10^{5} etc.) 'a priest,' borrowed from the Arm. khurm, but afterwards reversed his judgment. חֹלֶד 'a mole' is temptingly like Arm. khlourd 'a mole,' which might seem a derivative of khlem 'to pluck up,' 'root out'; but from Lagarde's Arm. Stud. it appears to have another derivation.

[¶] e.g. אֶלְתְּקֵה Jos 19^{44}, perhaps Arab. iltiḳā 'battle,' Koran, iii. 11, etc. Perhaps the form אֶלְתְּקֹן has preserved the tanwīn.

[‡] Compare especially line 12 with Is 37^{31} שֹׁרֶשׁ לְמַטָּה וּפְרִי לְמָעְלָה; elsewhere the adverb used with שֹׁרֶשׁ is תַּחַת. תֹּאַר (ib.) in the sense of 'beauty' occurs Is 53^{2}. תַּחַת הַשָּׁמֶשׁ is a favourite phrase with Ḳoheleth, who, however, is probably later than the inscription. The commencement bears a curious likeness to Hezekiah's hymn, Is 38^{16}.

[††] Ezk 20^{29} is perhaps the most curious.

The state in which the text of the OT has come down to us renders it difficult to speak positively on this matter; but perhaps the result of a comparison of the few duplicate texts which we possess is such as to show that philological considerations did not concern the editors and copyists who were also the authors of the historical texts. The alterations introduced merely through the absence of any idea of accuracy and without any religious or political interest, such as are to be observed in the parallel texts of Jos $15^{15\text{-}19}$ and Jg $1^{11\text{-}15}$, Is $2^{2\text{-}4}$ and Mic $4^{1\text{-}3}$, or Is 36–39 and 2 K 18–20, suggest the impossibility of basing a grammatical system on books so preserved; for it is clear that the copyist's licence extends so far as the substitution not only of synonyms, at least for ordinary ideas, but of what to the copyist seemed optional grammatical forms for one another, this latter licence including not only orthography, but what seem to us most serious syntactical variations, resulting in what to the rigid grammarian might seem grave errors, though the general sense is not affected. It is unfortunate that the duplicate texts of Ps 14 and 53, Ps 18 and 2 S 22, and of the oracles common to Nu, Is, and Jer, in which the language is from the nature of the subject choice and obscure, reveal an amount of licence on the copyist's part that is far greater than what appears where the texts are easy. How much, therefore, that is abnormal in our text is due to the original authors and how much to the hands through which it has passed, cannot without fresh discovery of MSS be ascertained; but it seems likely that if there had been Hebrew grammarians as well as writing-masters in any pre-Christian century, the sphere of the optional in Hebrew grammar would have been reduced to narrower limits. There are forms in the existing text of the OT which might suggest vast surmises as to the extent to which a Palestinian could have observed the rules of Arabic grammar without being unintelligible.*

Owing to the fact that the language was never fixed by organized study, the distinction of dialects and periods is hazardous; and the very different opinions that excellent scholars have held about the time and place to which portions of the OT belong, show that there is little definite to be said about these matters. We learn from Jg 12^{6} that an Ephraimite could not pronounce the letter שׁ correctly; but it by no means follows that his writing would show any signs of this inability. Some scholars have attempted to distinguish two dialects in the OT, others three (North Palestinian, South Palestinian or Simeonic, and Jewish: so Böttcher, Lehrb. i. 15 ff.), but it may be doubted whether there is a single grammatical form which can with safety be said to belong to one dialect rather than another. If it be the case that revisers have introduced uniformity where there were previously marked differences, we cannot now get behind their work. It is, however, possible to note in several of the OT narratives peculiar words or usages which may have been characteristic of the tribes from which those narratives emanated, though the extent of the literature at our command does not justify us in asserting this positively. Thus מוֹרָה (Jg 13^{5}) may be Danite for 'razor' (Arab. mūsā), שֹׁמֵעַ (Jg 11^{10}) Gileadite for 'witness' (Eth. samā'ī; cf. Pr 21^{28}), נוע Manassite for 'to rule' (Jg 9^{13}). Several other curious phrases occur in the history of Gideon, and several in those of Ehud (Jg $3^{15\text{-}29}$) and Samson (Jg 13–16); perhaps some of those in the last two narratives are not Israelitish at all, but Moabitic and Philistian; and indeed in Jg 16^{25} the form שחק seems clearly intended to be Philistian, but is certainly not exclusively so. In the parts of the 2nd Bk. of Kings which treat of the northern kingdom, scholars have tried to detect much local phraseology; and the same has been tried with the prophecies of Hosea, Amos, and others. The general uniformity of the language renders the term 'dialect' inapplicable to these minute nuances of style, which for the most part may be characteristic of individual writers rather than of regions.

The chief characteristics of the Israelitish dialect were probably fixed by the time of the consolidation of the united kingdom under David; and it is not probable that from that time to the first captivity it altered very seriously. The comparatively settled state of the country being favourable to the growth of the arts and the development of professions, a certain number of words continued to accrue from foreign sources, chiefly Assyria* and Egypt, but to some extent also India† and Greece,‡ while old words were utilized to express new ideas, or old roots to form fresh derivatives. In the case of the sacerdotal profession we can apparently trace the formation of a terminology on somewhat the same lines as that by which the terminology of Mohammedan tradition was afterwards formed. The inability of the language to form compounds somewhat limits the resources of the inventors of words; the same form has to do duty for 'to contaminate' and 'to declare impure,' the same for 'to expiate' and 'to offer as an expiatory sacrifice.' Lexicography is slightly more represented in the OT than grammar, albeit it is curious that in the one case where a technical term is defined at length (Dt 15^{2}) that term (שְׁמִטָּה) does not recur elsewhere. The wealth, however, of the old Arabic language seems to have been so great that the preservation rather than the invention of words was desirable.§

6. Periods.—With regard to the periods of the language of the OT it is generally agreed that the Bks. of Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Ecclesiastes, and Daniel display sufficient difference from the style of most of the remaining books to justify the application of some term like New Hebrew to the language in which they are composed. All these books have in common the Apparently, the use of īn and īm to form the plural was optional, see Mic 3^{12} quoted in Jer 26^{18}. From Jer 25^{3} and Ezk 14^{3} it might seem that the preformative of the 4th and 7th conjugation might be pronounced א.

‡ One of the early Rabbis suggested that מְכֵרוֹת in Gn 49^{5} was the Greek word μάχαιρα (R. Eleazar quoted in Levy, NHWB, iii. 116). The identification is tempting, as the word is exceedingly obscure; but it is not certainly right. One other pre-exilic word פִּלֶגֶשׁ is certainly identical with the Greek παλλακίς (known to Homer); it is un-Semitic in form, and would seem to belong to a monogamous community; and can be derived without much difficulty from Greek roots. The word לַפִּיד (Ex 20^{18} etc.) seems to be a contraction of the Aram. לַמְפִּיד, which in its turn can scarcely be anything but the Greek λαμπάδ-; for it has no Semitic affinities, and means 'a meteoric light,' which is the very sense the word has in old Greek writers (e.g. Æschylus, Choëph. 590, λαμπάδες πεδάοροι, mentioned among physical terrors). How this word got into Hebrew and Aramaic seems a mystery. פּוּךְ of 2 K 9^{30} etc. seems to be the Greek φῦκος, and is certainly identical with Lat. fucus; but the meaning of the Greek word does not quite agree. In post-exilic times the immigration of Greek words is easily intelligible, but very few can be detected with certainty. רַפְסֹדֹת of 2 Ch 2^{15} [Eng.^{16}] has a Greek appearance, but cannot be identified; אַפִּרְיוֹן of Ca 3^{9} is in the same case. The identification of לִשְׁכָּה with λέσχη has found little favour.

employment of Persian * or Aramaic † words for ideas which the older Hebrew was quite equal to expressing, as well as for ideas which perhaps were not known to the older Hebrews; and Ecclesiastes in particular is marked by the introduction of several particles ‡ which seem foreign to the older language, and which seem to imply that the writer had been schooled in some very different vehicle of expression. These particles were inherited by the post-biblical literature, with some others which are probably as old as Ḳoheleth, though not employed by him. Whether some of his turns of expression were suggested by the necessity of translating from the Greek cannot at present be determined; this ingenious writer has every appearance of being a great innovator in language, and indeed seems to say so (12^{9}). Esther shares with Ecclesiastes some of the new particles, and from the nature of its subject-matter exhibits the Persian element very markedly. The Hebrew of Dn, though marked by conscious imitation of 'the Bible' (9^{2}), which is not always, perhaps, felicitous (10^{16} compared with Is 21^{3}), lapses occasionally into phrases that are characteristic of the very latest style,§ and also has some Syriasms that are peculiar to itself.‖ The language of the four remaining books is practically the same, although the Persian element is less apparent in Ch, which, on the other hand, exhibit grammatical formations which seem Mishnic ¶ rather than biblical, and Syriac  rather than Hebrew.

Were more of the historical parts of the Apocrypha preserved in their original language, it is probable that it would chiefly differ from this New Hebrew in the introduction of Greek words, such as are found in great numbers in the Mishna, but the occurrence of which in the later Hebrew of the OT as a characteristic of lateness seems doubtful. If the Bk. of Ruth belongs to the early part of this period, its author has kept it free from the most characteristic phrases of the New Hebrew, while employing several expressions which, though isolated, appear to be antique.

It is certain that a considerable portion of the rest of the OT was already known to the writers of these works and constituted their classical literature; and of this collection the largest amount that can be assigned to a single period with certainty consists of the Bks. of Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Deuteronomy, the genuineness of the greater portion of the first two being ordinarily admitted, while there seem cogent reasons for assigning the fifth book of the Pentateuch to about the same epoch. This may therefore be called the 'classical' period of the language, though the portions of Isaiah which belong to the close of the Exile seem to surpass them in brilliancy. All these books show signs of literary ambition: 'Isaiah' claims, with justice, the possession of a scholar's tongue (50^{4}); Jeremiah is conscious of the effects of his oratory (23^{29}), and dictates for a reading public (36^{23}); many chapters of Ezk reveal study and preparation; the value which Dt claims for its 'words' could scarcely be more strongly expressed than in 6^{6-10}. These writers inherited some prophetic phraseology from earlier prophets (Jer 23^{31}, where a verb 'to nĕ'um' is coined, meaning to use the characteristic phrase of the prophets), and, indeed, some prophetic commonplace (so Jer 25^{30} seems to give the traditional proem to a prophecy, the words recurring from Am 1^{2} and Jl 4^{16}); but it is probable that in the main their language represents that of the ruling and official class at Jerusalem in its last century of independence. It is not unnatural that there should be a group of words and phrases which are peculiar to Dt and Jer, and another group peculiar to Jer and Ezk.

The greater portion of the OT, however, does not consist of works produced by single individuals, embodying their ideas in their own language, but of the work of schools or societies, who compiled, abridged, and edited. The main streams have perhaps been separated by critics with success; but each of these main streams is made up of a variety of smaller rills, so to speak, which cannot be localized. Owing to the variety of the documents, written and oral, poetical and prose, which are utilized in one place or other of the series which extends from Gn to 2 K, we have a great variety of idioms exemplified, of which only in rare cases we can define either the time or the locality. The only cases which deserve much attention are, of course, those for which the ordinary language has synonyms. In the Bk. of Leviticus a word (עָמִית) is used eleven times for 'neighbour' which may be said to occur nowhere else; this must clearly be indicative of dialect, but it is not known which. In the 'law of the slave' (Ex 21^{1-12}), a phrase (בְּגַפּוֹ) for 'by himself' occurs three times which is not known elsewhere. In the episode of Esau (Gn 27) words occur for such common notions as 'to touch' (מוש), 'to plot' (מתנחם), 'a quiver' (תלי), 'a deceiver' (מתעתע), 'a superior' (גביר), which occur nowhere else. All of these would seem to be dialectic; and the last, which is the masculine of a word that occurs frequently in the feminine, is certainly so. The story of Joseph (Gn 37–50) has a whole vocabulary of its own; as dialectic there may be characterized the words for 'just' (כן), 'sack' (אמתחת), 'restore to his place' (השיב על כנו), 'load' (טען). The word for 'just,' which occurs five times in this narrative, but for which in the same sense we have to go to Syriac authors, must certainly have met us elsewhere in the OT, if we possessed other documents of the same place and the same time as those to which the original story of Joseph belonged. Although many of the expressions which the documents employed by the compilers contain must have been as unintelligible to them as they are to us, the cases in which they endeavour to interpret or to emend them are rare. A case of an emendation occurs in Jg $3^{22.23}$, but both alternatives are obscure to us. In 1 S 9^{10} attention is called to the ancient import of a word, and in Gn 14^{14} a hard word is glossed, but in neither case is the ancient philology unequivocally confirmed by modern. Where we have parallel narratives (as in Gn $15^{2.3}$, Dt 1^{41}, and Nu 14^{44}) we can sometimes trace the remains of ancient interpretations of difficulties. The reason that these glosses are so few is probably to be found in the fact that with the Hebrews as with the Arabs a book is rather the possession of an individual or a family (Dt 31^{25}) than of the public; the skeleton writing almost necessitates an authorized exponent. A second reason is probably to be found in the tendency to abridge, which has reduced the Israelitish literature to so small a compass.

Whether it is possible to obtain any fixed linguistic epochs in the classical and ante-classical literature seems exceedingly doubtful. It is indeed possible to tell Aramaisms by phonetic rules; but as Aramaisms meet us in very early literature,—e.g. one of the characteristic words in the story of Jephthah is an Aramaism, a word which occurs also in Deborah's song,[*]—no argument as to date can be drawn from their occurrence, except when they belong to the classes already noticed. From the fact that the Canaanitish and Aramaic peoples have the same modification of the old Arabic alphabet, which they, indeed, subsequently developed somewhat differently,—from the fact that the oldest Aramaic most resembles Canaanitish, and that one of the oldest Canaanitish inscriptions which we possess contains an Aramaic word,[†] it would seem that the two nations though speaking different languages migrated simultaneously, and, until the final extinction of Canaanitish, did not cease borrowing from each other's vocabulary. We should obtain more fixed points from the internal growth of the language, if the literature were sufficiently large to enable us to name with precision the inventors of words; but this we are not able to do. Most of the passages that might seem of use for the history of particular words, turn out not to be so. In Jer 23^{36} the use of the word massā for 'oracle' is emphatically forbidden; but we find it employed nevertheless by authors far later than Jeremiah (Mal 1^{1}). The words of Dt 24^{8} seem to imply the existence in some form of the technical rules of Lv 13 and 14, but it is impossible to say how many of the terms there employed existed in the time of the Deuteronomist. A very little of the sacerdotal terminology can be traced back to those ancient times before the Canaanites separated into nations,[‡] but for the origin of most of it we have no data.

The poetical books have been left out of the above considerations, because choice and archaic language is characteristic of the poetry of all nations, and the widely divergent dates assigned by the best scholars to various psalms show the difficulty that is felt in distinguishing the really archaic from affected archaism. The five poetical books of the OT would seem to have emanated from different schools, and the Psalms and Proverbs probably also contain materials collected from very different ages. That they emanated from schools is shown by the predominance in each of a peculiar vocabulary, which in the case of the Psalms would seem to have been inherited by the authors of the much later Psalms of Solomon. The obscurity and rarity of the expressions is in other cases no clue to the date of the Psalms, for some of the least intelligible phrases are found in compositions which are agreed to be exceedingly late.[§] The Proverbs are remarkable as professing to embody the compositions of non-Israelites, but the chapters in which these are collected may perhaps have been translated, as indeed the text of Pr 25^{1} implies that the proverbs of Solomon were. The nature of the collection prevents it from preserving much of the popular language, as the proverbs of most nations do, and as a collection of sayings current among the Israelites, such as those to which the prophets occasionally refer (cf. Jer 23^{29} 31^{29}, Ex 11^{7}), would undoubtedly have done. But these exhibit the remains of a somewhat developed philosophical, or perhaps we may say mystic vocabulary, and are marked by the further recurrence of several phrases, which, though not technical, seem to have been employed only in the school of the writers.[*] The Book of Job, which is ostensibly non-Israelitish throughout, is probably, from a linguistic point of view, the most remarkable in the OT, though to what extent (if at all) it contains non-Israelitish materials cannot with the present evidence be determined. Choice and obsolete phrases seem to be paraded here, as in the artificial poetry of the Arabs; but the commentary which may originally have accompanied them has not been handed down. Modern criticism is inclined to ascribe this book to a series of writers; but if so, they must have had access to the same sort of literature, for even a portion of such doubtful authenticity as the Elihu speeches differs from the rest, not so much in the quality of the language as in the quantity of obscure and striking expressions, many of which can here be interpreted (like those in the rest of the book) from the Arabic and Aramaic languages. It is probable that the Canticles preserve more of the popular style than any other portion of the OT poetry. The matter is such that the employment of a rustic dialect lends it a special charm; but the dialect cannot any more than the others be located. The language of the Lamentations has some peculiarities of its own, but also has much in common with that of the Psalms.[†]

The separation of the sources and the fixing of the dates of the pieces composing the OT has been attempted with varying success by modern critics. Neither the earliest nor the latest verse in the OT can be named with certainty, but there is probably none either earlier than 1100, or later than 100 B.C. That the earliest fragments were in verse must not be hastily assumed, since the Oriental peoples employ verse not only to commemorate, but also to glorify the past;[‡] and, owing to the considerations that have already been urged, the verses which are occasionally quoted in the older historical books in connexion with particular events must, until further discoveries of literature, be located rather by religious and political than by linguistic data.

The continuity of the Hebrew language would seem to have been finally snapped with the taking of Jerusalem by the Romans; circumstances having forced the survivors of that catastrophe to adopt some other idiom for the ordinary needs of life, though it has not ceased to carry on a sort of existence to this day, partly as a learned language, partly as a vehicle of communication for members of the Jewish community throughout the world. The commencement of its decay is no doubt to be dated from the time when acquaintance with another language was necessary for high offices of State; and this would seem to have been the case in Hezekiah's time (Is 36^{11}), and was probably the case earlier. During the first exile and after it, acquaintance with some other language was requisite, not only for the official, but for the ordinary householder; and though Nehemiah busied himself with the maintenance of the Jewish language in its purity ($13^{21ff.}$), his own style gives us no exalted notion of his standard in that matter. The question, however, of the precise epoch at which Hebrew ceased to be a living language is fraught with considerable difficulty, owing to the dearth of materials for settling it. Josephus, who survived the Fall of Jerusalem, says (BJ, Preface, [*] יְתַנּוּ. Moore in his valuable commentary says such an Aramaism is impossible in Old Hebrew; but is not this a 'Machtspruch'? Similarly, Dillmann tries to explain away שַׁלִּיט in Gn 42^{6}. קְרָב of 2 S 17^{11}, יָקָר of Jer 20^{5}, are also Aramaic. If the form ḳaṭṭāl be everywhere Aramaic, as it seems to be, it would be difficult to point to any portion of the OT that would be certainly free from Aramaism (see Hos 8^{6}, 1 S 15. 19). Another striking case of a word known only from the Aramaic is תַּחֲלִימֵנִי in Hezekiah's ode (Is 38^{16}).

§ 1), that being a Hebrew, he had written a history of the war in his native language; but when he proceeds to state that the whole East, down to the remotest of the Arabs, had access to that work, such a description applies better to Aramaic than to Hebrew. The passages in the writings of the Rabbis which bear on this question are too late to give trustworthy information.[*]

7. Biblical Aramaic.—The earliest Aramaic documents which we possess are the inscriptions first published by E. Sachau in the Collections of the Berlin Museum for 1893, which certify the existence of a written Aramaic language for the early part of the 8th cent. B.C., or earlier, just as the inscriptions on weights and indorsements on Assyrian contracts, collected in the second volume of the CIS, certify it for the latter half of the 8th cent. and later. The opinion of M. Maspero, (l.c.) that evidence for the existence of the Aramaic language is to be found in far earlier Egyptian documents, is now accepted by Egyptologists. As has already been observed, the oldest Aramaic is without a number of the characteristics that serve to distinguish the later language from Canaanitish; but it seems possible that this phenomenon is in part due to the influence of the Canaanitish orthography, since the Aramaic representation of the letters th and dh does not seem derivable from the Canaanitish and old Aramaic sh and z, whereas it is easily derivable from those letters themselves. In grammar this language shows some striking affinity with the S. Arabian dialect Sabæan; but in vocabulary the earliest Aramaic seems to agree remarkably with Canaanitish, and though several words which are ordinary in Aramaic only figure in poetical language in Heb., this is what is frequently found in the case of kindred nations.

The area within which the Aramaic language was employed seems even in Babylonian times to have been very great; we have Aramaic inscriptions and papyri found in Syria, Babylonia, Egypt, and Arabia, which there are good grounds for regarding as earlier than Cyrus. Its employment even in the 8th cent. B.C. as a diplomatic language (Is 36[11]) implies an Aramaic hegemony either in politics or literature of some previous century; for it seems clear that the only languages ever employed in this way are such as have for one of these reasons become important to members of many nationalities. The Aramaic verse in Jer (10[11]) is shown by the form of the word 'earth,' and the termination of the word 'shall perish,' to belong to the earliest form of Aramaic of which we have cognizance; but the fact that the ordinary Aramaic for 'earth' occurs in the second half of the verse shows that no confidence can be placed in the tradition, and it is highly probable that the old Aramaic forms should be restored throughout. The influence of Assyrian on the old Aramaic was very considerable in matters affecting vocabulary—such as to leave a permanent mark on the language; but on the grammar and syntax it would seem to have had either less effect or a different effect from that which it exercised on Canaanitish. The accession of the Persians to world-empire seems to have again largely affected the Aramaic vocabulary; and the documents in Ezra which belong to the Persian period bear witness to the influx of Persian words, which, if these documents are genuine, the language must almost at the commencement of that period have undergone. The idiom of these documents agrees remarkably with that of the papyri edited in CIS (ii. Nos. 145 ff.), which some scholars have suspected of Jewish origin. The Aramaic parts of Daniel are characterized by a distinctly more modern idiom than that of Ezra; and, indeed, contain such decidedly Hebrew constructions that it is evident that either their author thought in that language, or they represent a translation from it. Of the Aramaic inscriptions which have been discovered, perhaps those of Palmyra approach most closely to the language of Daniel. The language has begun to assimilate Greek words, but there is as yet no regular system of transliteration. The language is rigidly distinguished from the later Christian Aramaic by the preservation of the old passive forms, by the fact that the emphatic form still has the force of the definite article, as well as by certain peculiarities of grammar and orthography. The later Jewish Aramaic, while in some of these matters it has developed uniformly with the Christian dialect of Edessa, in others has retained the older forms, and in vocabulary differs widely from all Christian dialects, save that known as Palestinian Syriac. Unlike the language of Canaan, Aramaic held its ground during the integrity of the Roman Empire in the East, developing a variety of dialects and of scripts, and, though ousted in the seventh and succeeding centuries by Arabic, it has still representatives in the dialect of the Christians of Mesopotamia, which the missionaries Stoddart, and, more recently, Macleane, have endeavoured to provide with grammar and vocabulary, and in some other less known dialects.

LITERATURE.—The history of the earliest grammatical studies in Hebrew is sketched by W. Bacher, 'die Anfänge der Heb. Grammatik,' in ZDMG xlix. 1–62 and 334–392; for the few notices of grammar to be found in the Talmuds see further A. Berliner, Beiträge zur Heb. Grammatik im Talmud u. Midrasch, Berl. 1879. Bacher's papers carry the history of Hebrew grammar and lexicography down to the end of the 10th cent.; while the invention of the vowel-points is connected with the labours of the Massoretes, the first actual author of a grammatical treatise was the Gaon Saadya (ob. 941), whose work, however, exists only in quotations; to the 10th cent. belong the Risalah of Jehudah Ibn Koraish, ed. Barges and Goldberg, Paris, 1842, the Mahbereth or dictionary of Menahem Ibn Saruk (ed. H. Filipowski, Lond. 1854; see also Siegmund Gross, Menahem B. Saruk, Breslau, 1872), and the Teshubhah or 'Response' of Dunash B. Labrat (ed. R. Schroter, Breslau, 1866; cf. S. G. Stern, 'Liber Responsionum,' Vienna, 1870); to the 11th cent. the 'Book of Hebrew Roots' of R. Jonah, called Abu 'l-Walid Merwan (ed. by A. Neubauer, Oxford, 1875, cf. Neubauer, 'Notice sur la lexicographie Hébraique,' in Journ. Asiat. 1861), and his grammar, called Harrikmah (ed. Goldberg, Frankf. 1866). See further for this early period Ewald u. Dukes, Beiträge zur Geschichte der ältesten Auslegung u.s.w. des A. Testamentes, Stuttgart, 1844. We are brought nearer to modern times by the works of Abraham Ibn Ezra, Moz'ne l'shon hakkodesh (ed. Heidenheim, Offenbach, 1791), Sefer Sahuth (ed. Lippmann, Fürth, 1827), and Safah B'rurah (ed. Lippmann, Fürth, 1839); see also Bacher, Abraham Ibn Ezra als Grammatiker, Strassburg, 1881. To the same century belongs the lexicon of Solomon Ibn Parbon, completed at Salerno, 1160 (ed. S. G. Stern, Pressburg, 1844; cf. M. Weiner, Parchon als Grammatiker u. Lexicograph, Offen. 1870). Still more important were the grammatical and lexicographical works of David Kimḥi (1160–1235), whose Michlol has been often printed, first at Constantinople, 1534; see also J. Tauber, Standpunkt u. Leistung des R. D. Kimhi als Grammatiker, Breslau, 1867. His dictionary, called Sefer hashshorashim, has also been repeatedly printed, most recently by Biesenthal and Lebrecht, Berlin, 1847.

The European study of Hebrew and Chaldee commences with the grammars and dictionaries of Sebastian Munster and Pagninus, 1525–1543; in the next century the Thesaurus Grammaticus of J. Buxtorf, Basel, 1663, was of considerable importance. In this century the works of W. Gesenius have, notwithstanding many rivals, maintained their popularity; his Hebrew grammar, which first appeared at Halle, 1813 (followed by the more elaborate Lehrgebäude, Leipzig, 1817), has repeatedly been re-edited and translated; the 26th edition, revised by E. Kautzsch, appeared in 1896 at Leipzig, and was translated by Collins and Cowley, Oxford, 1898. Of Gesenius' rivals the most eminent was H. Ewald, the author of both a larger and a smaller grammar; the 8th edition of the former, called Ausführliches Lehrbuch der heb. Sprache, appeared at Göttingen, 1870, the Syntax of which was translated by Kennedy, Edinburgh, 1879. Other important works on Hebrew grammar are J. Olshausen's Lehrbuch, Brunswick, 1861; Fr. Böttcher's Ausführliches Lehrbuch, Leipzig, 1866 (in many respects the fullest that has yet appeared); B. Stade's Lehrbuch, Leipz. 1879 (these three do not touch the syntax); F. E. König, Hist.-krit. Lehrgebäude, Leipzig, 1881–1897. Driver's Hebrew Tenses (3rd ed., Oxford, 1890); Harper's Elements of Hebrew Syntax (London, 1890); and Wickes' Treatises on Hebrew Accentuation (Oxford, 1881–1887), are of great importance. Lexicography is mainly represented by various editions of the dictionaries of Gesenius (Handwörterbuch, Leipzig, 1810, 13th ed. by Buhl, 1899; new edition by Brown, Briggs, and Driver in course of publication; Thesaurus, 1835–1858, finished by E. Rödiger); while these can be supplemented by the Concordances, of which that by Mandelkern, Leipzig, 1896, is the newest and fullest. The grammar of the Aramaic parts of the OT has been treated most recently by K. Marti in Petermann's series, Leipzig, 1896, and H. Strack, Leipzig, 1896. Some of the more important monographs on special questions have been noticed above; but the various journals devoted to the study of the OT, e.g. the American Hebraica and the German ZATW, as well as those devoted to Jewish literature and to Oriental study, contain more articles of importance than can be noticed here—1899. LANGUAGE OF THE APOCRYPHA.—The Apocrypha may with fair accuracy be described as a collection of works emanating from Jewish communities in the period between the close of the OT Canon and the commencement of that of the NT. Most of these books seem to have been composed in Hebrew, a few in Aramaic, and the rest in Greek; but as they were preserved in the Christian community, the Hebrew and Aramaic originals were at an early time lost or neglected, and their place taken by Greek translations; and in the case of some, which never acquired lasting authority, the Greek translation itself has been lost, and the work preserved, if at all, in secondary versions. This has occurred in the case of the Books of Enoch and of Jubilees, which are known chiefly through Ethiopic versions; while the Fourth Book of Ezra, the Apocalypse of Baruch, and the Assumption of Moses, are known in secondary translations,—in the first case in a variety of languages, in the second in Syriac, and in the third in Latin. Books 2 and following of Maccabees are known to have been written in the language in which we possess them (Greek); and the same is probably the case with the Epistle of Jeremy; but the remaining books would seem to be all translations, though it is not always easy to distinguish Hellenistic Greek from translated Hebrew. The most ambitious in point of style is the Wisdom of Solomon, which few even now regard as a translation; yet the proof that it is one is difficult to elude; for 14[10] 'for that which is made shall be punished together with him that made it' is clearly a mistranslation of a sentence that is quoted in the Midrash on Gn 48 (Rabba, § 96) כשם שנפרעין מן העובד כך נפרעין מן הנעבד 'just as the worshipper is punished so is that which was worshipped,' the translator's mistake being due to his giving the verb עבד its Aramaic sense 'to do or make,' whereas the author used it in its Hebrew sense 'to worship.' It may be added that the Greek of this verse (τὸ πραχθὲν σὺν τῷ δράσαντι κολασθήσεται), which really means 'that which has been done shall be punished together with him that did it,' shows signs of mistranslation that could have been detected without the aid of the original. It is, however, certain that the translator's object was rather to provide a masterpiece of Greek rhetoric than to reproduce his original faithfully; and in the absence of materials it seems impossible to fix with precision the limits of the work translated, or the character of the original language, which must in any case have shown signs of Greek influence.

That the book called Ecclesiasticus or the Wisdom or the Proverbs of Jesus Ben-Sira was originally written in Hebrew we know from the statement of the Greek translator in his preface; but the date of the disappearance of the original is a matter of obscurity. Jerome professes to have seen it. The writings of the earlier Rabbis contain a certain number of quotations from it, which are collected by Cowley and Neubauer (A portion of the Orig. Hebrew of Ecclus., Oxford, 1896); this collection, however, requires considerable reduction. The reason for its disappearance is doubtless to be found in the passage in the Gemara of B. Sanhedrin (f. 100*b*), in which it is asserted that a Jew would risk his eternal salvation by reading it; the passages, however, which are cited there both for and against this opinion, seem very inadequate for either purpose. From these quotations we should gather that the author used a language similar to that of the Mishnic authors, i.e. a highly developed New Hebrew; and this there seems no reason to doubt, though it is likely that the quotations are not scrupulously accurate. In an essay by the present writer, published in 1890, reasons were brought forward for thinking that many of the differences between the Greek and the Syriac versions, both of which were made from the original, could be solved by the assumption that the writer used New Hebrew words; and that the writer used a nine-syllable metre, of which the base was a foot called in Greek Bacchic, consisting of a short, a long, and a short: the middle syllable being invariably long, whereas the others were common. Ben-Sira, however, professes to be in the main a compiler from the OT (24[29]), which he doubtless imitated constantly; but in this he is doing himself an injustice.

In 1896 a leaf was brought over from Cairo containing a portion of Ecclus. in Hebrew, followed by the discovery of other portions, published in the work mentioned above, while yet other portions await publication.* The present writer has shown grounds (The Origin of the Orig. Heb. of Ecclus., Oxford, 1899) for thinking this Hebrew a retranslation made in the 11th or 12th cent. A.D., partly from the Syriac and partly from a Persian version of the Greek.†

The remaining poetical book in this series, the Psalms of Solomon, would seem to have been rendered into Greek by a specially skilful hand: had we the original, it is probable that it would reveal little difference in expression from many Psalms in the Psalter ascribed to David.

Of the post-biblical historical writing of the Jews occasional fragments are to be found in the Talmud, e.g. B. Kiddushin, f. 66*a*. The old forms are still retained, though the writer introduces without scruple vulgarisms of his own age. It is probable that the historical portions of the Apocrypha were in a style similar to this, but of course we cannot be sure. The Book of Judith is known to have been written in Hebrew from 3[9], where the word 'saw' evidently is a mistranslation of a Hebrew word signifying 'plain' (משור); the statement of Jerome that Chaldee was the original language of the book, must therefore be regarded as inaccurate. Attempts that have been made to find mistranslations from the Hebrew in the other books, e.g. in Tobit by F. Rosenthal (Vier Apocryphische Bücher, 1885), and in 1 Mac by the same scholar (das erste Makkabäerbuch, 1867, p. 6) seem to have produced no convincing result. The title of the latter, which is handed down by Origen, sarbcth sarbane 'historiæ historiolarum' seems certainly Aramaic, and indeed Syriac (Thes. Syr. col. 4323. 4), and it is unlikely that a Hebrew book would have a title of this sort.

The prophetic and apocalyptic style is represented by works ascribed to Baruch, Ezra, and others. The Book of Baruch consists very largely of phrases taken from the OT, and hence the elaborate reconstruction of the original by Kneucker (Leipzig, 1879) probably gives a correct idea of the author's style. In the Apocalypse of Baruch some relics of the original Hebrew can, it has been thought (R. H. Charles in his edition, pp. xliv–liii) be discerned in errors of the translation; and the same is said to be the case with the Assumption of Moses (R. H. Charles in his edition, pp. xxxix–xlv). Too little of the original language can in any case be recovered to enable us to speak with certainty of its character.

LANGUAGE OF THE NEW TESTAMENT.—The subject of this article is the species of Greek in which our canonical NT Scriptures are written.

A person familiar with Attic Greek, who should take in hand for the first time a Greek NT, could not fail to be struck by its peculiar idiom. Apart from traits which distinguish one portion of the volume from another (see V. p. 41 below), the language in general would seem strange to him—by reason of the admixture of popular, not to say plebeian, terms in its vocabulary; by its occasional outlandish and hardly intelligible phrases and constructions; by the meagre use of the connectives and other particles by which the earlier writers give balance, shading, and point to their periods; by the comparative avoidance or irregular use of the genitive absolute, attraction, and other syntactical devices for securing compactness and gradation in the presentation of thought; and throughout by a style which, though often monotonous, is conspicuous for its directness and simplicity; a style which, while it shows occasionally the digressions and broken or anacoluthic sentences characteristic of colloquial and uneducated utterance, is seldom encumbered with parentheses or protracted and entangled periods; a style obviously the expression of men too simple, self-forgetful, and earnest to pay much heed to literary elegancies or the established rules of the rhetorician.

Before considering in detail the characteristics of this variety of Greek, thus distinctly marked in vocabulary, construction, and style, we must notice briefly its name, its origin, and its history.

(a) Name.—Some of the names proposed for this peculiar idiom are evidently too restricted in their reference, as respects time or place or both (as, 'the ecclesiastical dialect,' 'the Alexandrian dialect,' 'Palestinian Greek'). Others, like 'Jewish Greek,' 'Jewish-Christian Greek,' though intrinsically appropriate, have failed to gain currency. But the appellation 'Hellenistic Greek,' first suggested apparently by the younger Scaliger, is now almost universally accepted. Protests on the ground that this name not only fails to indicate in what direction the language deviates from ordinary Greek (and consequently is less descriptive than 'Hebraic' or 'Aramaic Greek' would be), but is also inherently tautological or meaningless, because tantamount to 'Greekish Greek,' are powerless to dislodge it. Its adoption has been favoured, doubtless, by the use of Ἑλληνιστής in Ac (6^{1} 9^{29} 11^{20} var. lec.) as the designation of grecizing or Greek-speaking Jews. The application of the term 'dialect' to the Gr. of a particular locality and period is infelicitous, since that term has already been appropriated by the idiom of the several branches of the Greek race.

(b) Origin.—The literary supremacy of Athens (c. B.C. 500–B.C. 300) had caused her dialect, the Attic, gradually to supplant the forms of the language used by the other families of the Gr. race; and the diffusion of Greek was much furthered through the conquest and colonization of the East by Alexander the Great and his successors. In this process of diffusion, however, the Attic dialect itself was modified by the speech and usages of the nations among which it spread, till at length there arose a cosmopolitan type of Greek known as the 'Common Dialect' (ἡ κοινή, sc. διάλεκτος), a prominent abode of which for two centuries or more before the Christian era was the empire of the Ptolemies and their capital Alexandria. Here dwelt myriads of expatriated Jews, to whom in time their native or ancestral tongue became so unfamiliar that a Gr. translation of their sacred books was prepared to meet their needs (approximately between B.C. 285 and B.C. 150; see SEPTUAGINT). To this version much of the reverence felt for the Heb. originals was soon transferred, and its common use by all Jews resident outside of Palestine did much to fix and perpetuate the type of Greek it represents. That Greek, after undergoing the modifications resulting inevitably from the use of separated localities and intervening generations, furnished the vehicle by which the revelation of God through Jesus Christ was given to the world.

Its origin discloses its fitness for its providential office. It embodied the lofty conceptions of the Heb. and Christian faith in a language which brought them home to men's business and bosoms. It was an idiom capable of such use as not to forfeit the respect of the cultivated (see, for example, Ac $17^{22\text{ff.}}$ $26^{24\text{ff.}}$); yet, in substance, it was the language of everyday life, and hence fitted for the dissemination of the gospel by preaching wherever Greek was spoken. It differs evidently from the language of writers like Philo and Josephus, who, though of Heb. extraction, addressed themselves to the educated classes and aspired after idiomatic elegance of expression. It occupies apparently an intermediate position between the vulgarisms of the populace and the studied style of the litterateurs of the period. It affords a striking illustration of the divine policy in putting honour on what man calls 'common.'

(c) History.—The true nature, however, of this noteworthy idiom was for a time in certain quarters unrecognized. This is surprising in view of the deviations from the classic standard which stare one in the face from every page of the NT. Moreover, the educated man among the apostles frankly confesses his lack of the graces of classic diction (1 Co $2^{1.4}$ 1^{17}, 2 Co 11^{6}); and competent judges of Greek among the early Christians, such as Origen (c. Cels. vii. 59 f., Philocalia, iv., ed. Robinson, p. 41 f.) and Chrysostom (Hom. 3 on 1 Co 1^{17}), not only are forward to acknowledge the literary inferiority of the biblical language, but find evidence in that fact both of the divine condescension to the lowly and of the surpassing dignity of the contents of revelation in that, though destitute of the charms of polite literature, it could yet command the allegiance of the cultivated. Leading scholars of the Reformation period also (Erasmus, Luther, Melanchthon, Beza) held in the main the same correct opinion. But early in the 17th cent. this opinion encountered emphatic dissent, which led to a discussion (known as the 'Purist Controversy') which was protracted for more than a century, and conducted at times with no little heat. The heat was largely due to the circumstance that those who denied the classic purity of NT Greek were thought by their opponents to dishonour the divine author of the book. But if these over-zealous champions of the divine honour had had their way, they would have disproved the claim of the volume to be the production of Greek-speaking Jews of the 1st cent., and have nullified the philological evidence it affords that, at that epoch, there entered a new and transforming energy into the realm of human thought. We see the foolishness of God to be wiser than men. (A full bibliography of this instructive controversy, with a critical estimate of the arguments advanced on both sides, is given in Schmiedel's Winer, § 2).

The peculiarities of the NT language will be most conveniently exhibited in connexion with the several elements entering into its composition, viz.—

I. The later or 'Common' spoken Greek.
II. The Hebrew or spoken Aramaic.
III. The Latin and other foreign tongues.
IV. The religious or distinctively Christian element.

To the consideration of these will be subjoined—

V. A summary view of the peculiarities of Individual Writers.
VI. Some of the linguistic Problems in the NT, with the aids to their solution.
VII. A glance at the Bibliography of the subject.

The peculiarities noticed in the first four divisions may be classified as (A) Lexical, and (B) Grammatical:—The former comprising—a. New Words, and b. New Meanings; the latter, a. Peculiarities of Form, and b. Peculiarities of Construction or Syntax.

At the outset it should be noted that not a little uncertainty still exists with regard to many points of detail; and the limits of the present exposition will restrict for the most part the examples and specifications given to a few representative particulars.

I. THE 'COMMON' OR SPOKEN GREEK.—(A) In its Lexical relations:—a. New words. A few of the NT words commonly reckoned as belonging to later Greek are the following:—

ἀβαρής, ἀγαλλιάομαι, ἀγνόημα, ἀδηλότης, ἄθεσμος, ἀθετέω, ἀκαιρέομαι, ἀκατάλυτος, ἀκατάπαυστος, ἀλεκτοροφωνία, ἀλληγορέω, ἀμετάθετος, ἀμετανόητος, ἀνάδειξις, ἀναθεωρέω, ἀναντίρρητος, ἀναπολόγητος, ἀνάχυσις, ἀντιδιατίθημι, ἀντοφθαλμέω, ἀνυπότακτος, ἀπαράβατος, ἀπελπίζω, ἀπερισπάστως, ἀποθησαυρίζω, ἀποκαραδοκία, ἀποκεφαλίζω, ἀπρόσιτος, ἀστοχέω, ἀτενίζω, βραβεῖον, γογγύζω, γονυπετέω, δεισιδαιμονία, διαγνωρίζω, διαγρηγορέω, διαυγάζω, διαφημίζω, διερμηνεύω, διθάλασσος, διοδεύω, δίψυχος, δουλαγωγέω, δυσερμήνευτος, ἐγγίζω, ἐγκακέω, ἐγχρίω, ἐθνικός, ἐκδαπανάω, ἐκδικέω (etc.), ἔκθαμβος, ἐκπλήρωσις, ἐκτένεια, ἐξαρτίζω, ἐξισχύω, ἐπιθανάτιος, ἐπισκηνόω, ἐπιχορηγέω, ἑτερόγλωσσος, εὐαρεστέω, εὐδοκέω, εὐθυδρομέω, εὐκαιρέω, εὔκοπος, ἡμιώριον, ἤρεμος, θηριομαχέω, θριαμβεύω, ἱματισμός, ἰσότιμος, καθημερινός, καταβαρέω, καταγωνίζομαι, κατάκριμα, κατάλυμα, καταντάω, καταπονέω, κατοπτρίζομαι, κενοδοξία, κερματιστής, κωμόπολις, μεθερμηνεύω, μεταμορφόω, μετριοπαθέω, νεωτερικός, ὁδηγός, οἰκοδομή, ὀψώνιον, παλινγενεσία, πάντοτε, παραχειμασία, παρείσακτος, παρεισέρχομαι, παρεπίδημος, περιλάμπω, περιοχή, πορισμός, προελπίζω, προσεγγίζω, πρόσκαιρος, προσκληρόω, ῥᾳδιούργημα, σημειόω, σκωληκόβρωτος, στρατολογέω, στρατοπεδάρχης, συνκατάθεσις, συνβασιλεύω, συνμερίζω, συνοδία, συνπνίγω, συνυποκρίνομαι, τελώνιον, τετράδιον, τετράρχης, τρίστεγος, υἱοθεσία, ὑπερπλεονάζω, ὑπογραμμός, ὑπολιμπάνω, ὑποτύπωσις, φίλαυτος, φιλήδονος, χειρόγραφον. Several verbs in -όω (e.g. ἀνακαινόω, δολιόω, δυναμόω, χαριτόω), -ίζω (e.g. αἰχμαλωτίζω, ἀναθεματίζω, ἀνεμίζω), -εύω (e.g. αἰχμαλωτεύω, γυμνιτεύω, μαθητεύω, μεσιτεύω) are either of later coinage or modifications of earlier endings.

These may serve as specimens of the difference between the vocabulary of the NT and that of the classic writers. But it must be remembered that our imperfect knowledge makes it impossible to say how many such words, apparently late, are merely old words reappearing after a period of disuse—a phenomenon often exemplified in our own vernacular; or how far, again, they may have been long current in colloquial speech, although remaining foreign to the language of literature, as, for example, the swarm of everyday deities catalogued by Augustine in his de Civitate Dei, iv. 8, 11, 21, are alien to the Jupiter, Juno, and the rest that make up the literary 'properties' of the poets.

But this list of specimen words brings to view certain general characteristics of the NT vocabulary; for example, its employment of terms which in the earlier Greek are distinctly literary and even poetic. To some such already given may be added the following: ἀγέλη, ἀδάπανος, ἀδημονέω, αἰσθητήριον, ἀλυσιτελής, ἀμάω, ἄμεμπτος, ἀμέριμνος, ἀναθάλλω, ἀνακράζω, ἀνήμερος, ἀπαλλοτριόω, ἀπέραντος, ἀπόδημος, ἀποφθέγγομαι, ἀποτομία (-μως), ἀποψύχω, ἀσάλευτος, ἀσχήμων, ἄτακτος, ἀτιμάζω, αὐγάζω, αὐθάδης, αὔξω, αὐτόχειρ, αὐχέω, ἄφαντος, ἀφρίζω, βαρέω, βαστάζω, βρέχω, βρώσιμος, γενετή, δέσμιος, διαυγής, διηνεκής, δόλιος, ἔκδηλος, ἐκμάσσω, ἐκτελέω, ἐμβατεύω, ἐμπαίζω, ἐμφανίζω, ἐνάλιος, ἐπαιτέω, ἐπακροάομαι, ἐπικέλλω, ἐπισφαλής, ἐρείδω, ἐριθίζω, ἐσθής, εὐδία, εὐσχημοσύνη, εὐφροσύνη, ἤπιος, ἠχέω (ἦχος), θανάσιμος, θεοστυγής, θύελλα, θυμομαχέω, ἰκμάς, ἱμείρομαι (ὁμ.), κακόω, καύχημα, κενόω, κλαυθμός, κλέος, κλύδων, κολλάω, κραταιός, κυρόω, λάμπω, μαγεύω, μαστίζω, μητρολῴας, μόχθος, μυελός, μωμάομαι, νυστάζω, ὀδύνη, οἰκτιρμός, ὅρασις, οὐρανόθεν, πανοικεί, πανπληθεί, παραλογίζομαι (etc.), παροτρύνω, πενιχρός, πιάζω, πολυποίκιλος, προπετής, ῥιπίζω, ῥυπαρός, σαπρός, σκορπίζω, συμπαθής, τηλαυγῶς, τρόμος, τρύβλιον, τυρβάζω, ὑπερήφανος, φαντάζω, φέγγος, φιμόω, χειμάζομαι, χειραγωγέω, χλιαρός, ὠδίνω.

Conspicuous in it also is the later Greek fondness (agreeably to the popular striving after strong expressions) for compounded and sesquipedalian words. Of these the following may serve as additional representatives: ἀνεκδιήγητος, ἀνεκλάλητος, ἀνεξερεύνητος, ἀνεπαίσχυντος, ἀνταποκρίνομαι, δυσβάστακτος, ἐμπεριπατέω, ἐξαγοράζω, ἐξακολουθέω, ἐξανατέλλω, ἐξομολογέω, ἐπιγαμβρεύω, ζωογονέω, καταβραβεύω, καταδυναστεύω, κατασοφίζομαι, κατισχύω, λιθοβολέω, ματαιολογία, μετοικεσία, οἰκοδεσποτέω, ὀλιγόψυχος, πατροπαράδοτος, προσαναβαίνω, προσαναπληρόω, προσανατίθημι, προσκαρτερέω, προσπορεύομαι, συναναμίγνυμι, συνευωχέομαι, συνκαταψηφίζω, συναντιλαμβάνομαι, συνυποκρίνομαι, συνυπουργέω.

The biblical writers indulge this partiality still further; as witness such words as the following: ἀγενεαλόγητος, αἱματεκχυσία, ἀλλοτριοεπίσκοπος, ἀνεξίκακος, ἀνθρωπάρεσκος, διενθυμέομαι, ἐκζητέω, ἐκμυκτηρίζω, ἐκπειράζω, ἐξαστράπτω, ἐπαναπαύω, ἐπιδιατάσσομαι, ἐπιδιορθόω, ἐπισκευάζω, ἐπισυντρέχω, ἱερουργέω, κατακληροδοτέω, κατακληρονομέω, καταλιθάζω, κατεξουσιάζω, κατεφίστημι, κατοικητήριον, μισθαποδοσία, ὀρθοτομέω, ὁρκωμοσία, ὀχλοποιέω, παραπικραίνω, περιαστράπτω, ποταμοφόρητος, προενάρχομαι, συναιχμάλωτος, ὑπερεκπερισσῶς, ὑπερεντυγχάνω, χρηστολογία, χρυσοδακτύλιος. Moreover, not a few decomposite words are found in it—as in general in the later Greek—which have been formed by prefixing a preposition (as ἐπί, διά, παρά, πρό, πρός, σύν, ὑπέρ) to a word already in use. Conversely, simple verbs are sometimes substituted for their compounds more usual in the classic period; as, ἐρωτάω for ἐπερωτάω (Mk 8^{5}), κρύπτω for ἀποκρύπτω (Mt 11^{25}), ἀθροίζω for συναθροίζω (Lk 24^{33}), δειγματίζω for παραδειγματίζω (Mt 1^{19}), ὀχλέω for ἐνοχλέω (Ac 5^{16}), τρέφω for ἀνατρέφω (Lk 4^{16}).

Another characteristic of NT Greek (as of modern Greek, and indeed of popular speech in general) appears in the disproportionate number of so-called diminutives its vocabulary contains: ἀρνίον, γυναικάριον, ἐρίφιον, θυγάτριον, ἰχθύδιον, κλινάριον, κλινίδιον, κοράσιον, κυνάριον, ὀνάριον, ὀψάριον, (παιδίον) παιδάριον, πινακίδιον, πλοιάριον, ποίμνιον, προβάτιον, σανδάλιον, στρουθίον, σχοινίον, φορτίον, ψιχίον, ψωμίον, ὠτάριον, ὠτίον are among them; and even βιβλαρίδιον, a diminutive of a diminutive, occurs. Several of these words have quite lost any diminutive force—if indeed they ever had it (cf. e.g. θηρίον, κρανίον, etc.). For ὠτάριον (Mk 14^{47}, Jn 18^{10}), ὠτίον (Mt 26^{51}), Lk (22^{50}) substitutes οὖς.

b. But not merely had later Greek, as it discloses itself in the NT, enlarged its vocabulary by the introduction of new words (or the revival of those long disused), it had also modified more or less the meaning of many retained from the classic period. This is exemplified by the meanings subjoined to the following words: ἀκαταστασία 'political disorder,' ἀνάκειμαι and ἀναπίπτω 'recline at table,' ἀναλύω 'depart (from life),' ἀναστρέφομαι 'conduct one's self,' ἀντίλημψις 'help,' ἀποτάσσομαι 'bid farewell,' 'renounce,' ἀφανίζω 'render unsightly,' γενήματα 'fruits of the earth,' δῶμα 'housetop,' ἔντευξις 'petition,' ἐντροπή 'shame,' ἐρεύγομαι 'speak out,' ἐρωτάω 'request,' εὐσχήμων 'honourable' of rank, εὐχαριστέω 'thank,' ζωοποιέω 'cause to live,' 'quicken,' καταστολή 'apparel,' ξύλον 'a tree,' τὰ περίεργα 'magic,' περισπάομαι 'be distracted' (with cares, etc.), πτῶμα (without adjunct) 'a corpse,' ῥύμη 'a street,' στέλλομαι 'withdraw,' στιγμή 'moment,' συνκρίνω 'compare,' 'interpret,' συνίστημι 'establish,' 'prove,' σχολή 'school,' σώματα (without adjunct) 'slaves,' τρώγω i.q. ἐσθίω, φθάνω 'come to,' 'arrive at,' χορτάζω 'feed' (of persons), ὑπάρχω nearly i.q. εἰμί, χρηματίζω 'be styled' or 'called.' And when the modification is not so marked as in these cases, there is at times a change in frequency of use which indicates a change at least in connotation. This is illustrated in the use of βλέπω, θεωρέω, and ὁράω to express seeing; of ἔρχομαι, πορεύομαι, and ὑπάγω to denote going; of λαλέω and λέγω in reference to speaking. The caste or social status, so to speak, of words varied in ancient as it does in modern times with age and locality.

Many verbs, moreover, which in the earlier language were commonly transitive, assumed a reflexive or neuter sense; e.g. ἀπέχω (Lk 15^{20}), ἀπορίπτω (Ac 27^{43}), αὐξάνω, αὔξω (Mt 6^{28}, Eph 2^{21}), ἐνισχύω (Ac 9^{19}), ἐπιβάλλω (Mk 4^{37}), κλίνω (Lk 9^{12}), παραδίδωμι (perh. Mk 4^{29}), στρέφω (Ac 7^{42}) and its compounds. On the other hand, some neuter verbs came to be used transitively or causatively; as, βλαστάνω (Ja 5^{18}), βλασφημέω (Mt 27^{39}), γονυπετέω (Mt 17^{14}), διψάω and πεινάω (Mt 5^{6}), ἐμπορεύομαι (2 P 2^{3}), εὐδοκέω (Mt 12^{18}), μαθητεύω (Mt 28^{19}). An interesting extension of this usage appears in ὃ γὰρ ἀπέθανεν . . . ὃ δὲ ζῇ (Ro 6^{10}).

(B) But this brings to our attention the Grammatical peculiarities which the language of the NT exhibits in common with later Greek. Peculiarities of this class, whether relating to form or to construction, are much less numerous than those which, agreeably to the general law of growth in language, affect its vocabulary.

a. The peculiarities of form are some of them common to the different dialects of the earlier Greek; as, βούλει, ὄψει, διδόασι, τιθέασι, ἐδαφιοῦσιν, ἠδυνάμην, ἤμελλε, ἠβουλήθην, to the Attic; dat. γήρει, gen. and dat. in -ης, -ῃ, from nouns in -ρᾰ (as μάχαιρα, πρῷρα, πλήμμυρα, σπεῖρα), the presents γίνομαι, γινώσκω, also εἶτεν (εἶτα), after the Ionic; ἀφέωνται (for ἀφεῖνται), ἤτω (for ἔστω), ὄρνιξ (ὄρνις), held to be Doric; ἐδυνάσθην, collat. form of ἠδυνήθην, ἐκάμμυσα (καμμύω), ῥήσσω (ῥάσσω), Epic; ἀποκτέννω (-κτείνω), Æolic. Others may be traced to the popular preference for regularity of inflection: e.g. the change of verbs in μι into verbs in ω; the termination -σαι in the 2nd pers. sing., as δύνασαι, καυχᾶσαι; the inflection οἶδα, -δας, -δατε, etc.; the aorists ἔδωσα, ἔζησα, ἡμάρτησα, ἦξα from ἄγω, ἦξα (?) from ἥκω, and the like. There is also a propensity to omit the augment of the pluperfect, and especially to give the 2nd aor. the endings of the first, as εἴδαμεν, -αν, εἶπαν, ἔπεσα, -αν, ἦλθαν, ἐλθάτω, etc.; and in the imperfect of ἔχω we find εἶχαν and εἴχοσαν (so ἐδίδοσαν, ἐδολιοῦσαν), due doubtless to the love of assimilation in form. Sundry nouns have varying genders, as ὁ and ἡ βάτος, ληνός, λιμός; ὁ and τὸ ἔλεος, ζῆλος, ἦχος (?), θεμέλιος -λιον, πλοῦτος, σκότος; ἡ νίκη and τὸ νῖκος; and even a twofold declension, as δεσμός plur. -μοί and -μά, ἔλεος -ου and -ους, σκότος -ου and -ους, also nouns ending in -αρχος, -άρχης (as ἑκατόνταρχος and ἑκατοντάρχης); others show a preference at times for the uncontracted forms, as ὀστέα, ὀστέων. The same tendency to assimilate explains, probably, the fondness for terminal ν:—both in nouns, as ἄρσεναν, μῆναν, ἀσεβῆν, ἀσφαλῆν, συγγενῆν, χεῖραν; and in verbs, as 3rd pers. plur. of the perfect, γέγοναν, ἔγνωκαν, εἴρηκαν, ἑώρακαν (ἑόρακαν), πέπτωκαν (πέπωκαν). Here it was favoured by the gradual obscuration of the distinction between the perfect and the aorist (see in b below), to which cause also may be due the occasional appearance of the ending -κες for -κας in the 2nd pers. sing. of the perfect. The dual number has disappeared, and the word δύο itself tends to become indeclinable. Particles of rest (ποῦ, ὅπου, etc.) have superseded those of motion (ποῖ, ὅποι, etc.); εἷς has encroached largely upon the province of τις, and πότερος (-ρον, except in Jn 7^{17}) has disappeared.

Negligent or variant pronunciation appears in irregularities of spelling; such as the retention of μ in sundry forms and derivatives of λαμβάνω (as λήμψεσθαι, ἀνάλημψις, etc.); the neglect of assimilation in compounds of ἐν and σύν; the doubling or non-doubling of ν, ρ, and some other letters, e.g. γένημα; inconsistency respecting ν movable, elision, and the final ς in ἄχρις, μέχρις, οὕτως. The interchange of sundry letters, as in μαστός and μασθός, ζβέννυμι and σβέννυμι, σφυρίς and σπυρίς, οὐθείς and οὐδείς, ποταπός and ποδαπός; and especially in the case of the vowels ει, ε, η, ι, as well as αι, ε, a tendency to that obliteration of distinctions which culminated in itacism and the pronunciation of modern Greek.

Many of these irregularities, and others both of form and pronunciation, have been adopted by the editors of the text of the NT in conformity with the usage of the oldest extant MSS; but how far, in any given case, they are to be set down to the account of the original authors or of later scribes, is a question to be settled only after the other nearly contemporary writings have been edited with equal attention to such details, and in the light of the accumulating testimony of inscriptions, papyri, and other relics.

b. The Syntactical peculiarities which the NT shares in common with later and spoken Greek, though less numerous than the formal, are not less noteworthy. They appear particularly in the constructions of the verb. Besides those alluded to in the opening paragraph of this article, may be mentioned:—the general disuse of the optative in dependent sentences; the weakening of constructions with ἵνα (a particle which had nearly supplanted ὅπως), which often have the force merely of the classic infinitive; the interchange of ἐάν and ἄν; the use of ὅταν with the indicative (Rev 8^{1}), and in dependent clauses to denote indefinite frequency; an extended use of ὅτι, and also of the final infin., the genitival infin., and the infin. with ἐν and εἰς; the scanty employment of interrogative particles, and the use of εἰ in direct questions (perhaps a Hebraism); the ordinary substitution of the present participle for the future, and in general a fondness for the present tense (especially λέγει, ἔρχεται, etc.) agreeably to the love of vividness and directness; a lax use of the aorist participle, in fact a tendency to blur the distinction between the aor. tense and the perfect; the use of ὄφελον as a particle of wishing; the prefixing of ἄφες to the hortatory subjunctive, and the pleonastic use of the imperatives of ὁρᾶν, βλέπειν (as ὁρᾶτε βλέπετε ἀπό, etc. Mk 8^{15}); the tendency of μή to encroach on the province of οὐ, especially with infinitives and participles, and to prevent a hiatus; the use of the compound negative οὐ μή; employment of εἰμί with the participle as a periphrasis for the simple verb; and the freq. omission of the copula εἰμί; carelessness in placing particles (e.g. ἄρα Lk $11^{20.\,48}$, γε Lk 11^{8}, τοίνυν He 13^{13}, ὅμως Gal 3^{15}).

The popular striving after emphasis which appears in many of these usages shows itself, further, in the use of the active voice with the reflexive pronoun instead of the middle; of ἴδιος instead of the simple possessive pronoun; of εἷς for the indefinite τις, and, in general, a needless multiplication of pronouns; of devices for strengthening the forms of comparison, e.g. ἐλαχιστότερος, μειζότερος, μᾶλλον περισσότερον, and the use of παρά and ὑπέρ with comparatives instead of ἤ (yet ἤ alone is at times used with comparative force, e.g. Mt 18^{9}, Lk 15^{7}, 1 Co 14^{19}); of prepositions to reïnforce the simple cases. The use of the neut. sing. of an adjective with the art. as a substitute for the abstract noun, though not unusual in the classics, is more common in Paul and Hebrews, and in the later Gr. writers became a striking literary mannerism.

II. The Aramaic and Hebrew Element.—It is usual to distribute the Hebraisms of the NT into two classes: 'perfect' or pure Hebraisms, which consist of such words, phrases, and constructions as have no precedent or analogue in extant Gr., and hence are held to be directly transferred to the NT from the mother tongue of the Jews; and 'imperfect' Hebraisms, consisting of Hebraistic expressions to be found, indeed, for substance in Gr., but the use of which by the NT writers is most naturally traced to the influence of their native language. The limits of this latter class, however, our scanty knowledge of the history of the later Gr. language makes it difficult to fix; and for our present purpose it will be more convenient to follow the classification adopted by us hitherto. A just impression, moreover, of this element of the NT language requires that our presentation of facts should be liberal and inclusive, rather than rigorously restricted. For example, the word σπέρμα with the meaning progeny may be traced as far back as Æschylus and Pindar; but the more than thirty instances of its use in this sense in the NT fairly entitle it to be enrolled as a Hebraism.

(A) Lexical Hebraisms:—not all of which, be it remembered, first make their appearance in the NT.

a. New words.—Of these, some are (1) Semitic words simply transliterated; as, ἀββά, ἀλληλουιά, ἀμήν, γαββαθά, γολγοθά, κορβάν, πάσχα, ῥαββεί etc., ῥακά, σαβαώθ, σατάν, σίκερα, ταλειθά, χερουβείν; others are (2) Grecized by some slight change, generally of termination; as, βάτος, γέεννα, ζιζάνιον, (and as is commonly thought) κάμηλος, κιννάμωμον (to which may prob. be added the names of several other plants and spices, as well as of precious stones; as, κύμινον, λίβανος, συκάμινος, ὕσσωπος, σάπφειρος), κόρος, μαμωνᾶς, μάννα, σάτον, σάββατον.

b. Far more numerous are the words and phrases, Gr. in form, which under Heb. influence have taken on a new meaning; as, ἄγγελος (ἀρχάγγελος), ὁ αἰὼν οὗτος (ἐκεῖνος, ὁ μέλλων), ἀνάθεμα (-τίζειν), γλῶσσα 'a people,' δέειν and λύειν 'to forbid' and 'permit,' ὁ διάβολος, δόξα 'brightness' (τοῦ φωτός, Ac 22^{11}), δύναμις τοῦ οὐρανοῦ (of the stars), ἐνώπιον τοῦ θεοῦ 'in the judgment of God,' ἐξομολογεῖσθαι 'give praise,' ἐξορκιστής 'an exorcist,' ἐπισκοπή of the divine visitation, μακροθυμέω 'be long-suffering,' νύμφη 'daughter-in-law,' οἰκοδομεῖν in trop. sense (?), ὄνομα 'authority,' ὀφθαλμὸς πονηρός of envy, ὀφειλέτης (-λήματα, in reference to sin), περιπατεῖν and ὁδός in a technical sense, of a course of life, (ποιεῖν νόμον in classic Greek 'to make a law') ποιεῖν τὸν νόμον 'to do, keep, the law,' πορεύεσθαι 'to die,' also π. ὀπίσω τινός to 'become one's follower,' πορνεύειν (-νεία) of idolatry, πρόσωπον θαυμάζειν and λαμβάνειν, also εἰς πρόσωπον βλέπειν, etc., of externals, σκάνδαλον (-λίζειν) in a fig. sense, σπέρμα 'offspring,' φωτίζω of spiritual enlightenment.

Not a few are due to national institutions, usages, historic incidents, and the like; as, ἀκροβυστία, ἀποδεκατόω, ἀποσυνάγωγος (ἀρχισυνάγωγος, etc.), οἱ ἄρτοι τῆς προθέσεως, γραμματεύς, διαθήκη, διασπορά, δωδεκάφυλον, ἐνκαίνια (-νίζω), ἐπιγαμβρεύω, εὐνουχίζω, θυσιαστήριον, τὸ ἱλαστήριον, καθαρίζω and κοινόω levitically, κληρονομέω in its technical use, λατρεία the ritual service, λυτρόω in its theocratic sense, μοσχοποιέω, νομοδιδάσκαλος, ὁλοκαύτωμα, πατριάρχης, πεντηκοστή, πρεσβυτέριον, προσήλυτος, προφήτης, πρωτοκαθεδρία, πρωτοτόκια, σκηνοπηγία, υἱὸς τοῦ ἀνθρώπου (τοῦ θεοῦ), φυλακτήριον. There are indications, however, that some of these terms (e.g. καθαρίζω, πρεσβυτέριον, προφήτης) were known to heathen usage in a religious reference (Deissmann, Neue Bibelstudien, Marburg, 1897).

Others spring from the Oriental love of pictorialness and circumstantiality; as, ἀπερίτμητος τῇ καρδίᾳ, ἐν καρδίᾳ λέγειν, ἡ καρδία ἡμῶν πεπλάτυνται, ἐν γεννητοῖς γυναικῶν, ἐν ἡμέραις Ἡρῴδου, ἐνωτίζεσθαι, ἔσκαψε καὶ ἐβάθυνε, ζητεῖν τὴν ψυχήν τινος, καρπὸς τῶν χειλέων, ποτήριον in a fig. application, σὰρξ καὶ αἷμα, σπλαγχνίζεσθαι, στηρίζειν τὸ πρόσωπον, στόμα μαχαίρης, υἱός or τέκνον with the gen. especially of an abstract (e.g. εἰρήνης, βροντῆς, φωτός, ὀργῆς, ὑπακοῆς, etc.), χεῖλος τῆς θαλάσσης.

But some of these phrases may with equal propriety be ranked with—

(B) Grammatical Hebraisms.—The great dissimilarity in structure between the Heb. and the Gr. operated as a barrier to the free introduction of the characteristic idioms of the former language into the latter. The grammatical influence of their native tongue shows itself in the NT writers rather in their general style of expression; in particular, a marked inaptness in the use of moods (even as compared with contemporary Gr. authors), simplicity of construction, and a coordination of clauses which would have seemed monotonous if not illogical to a Greek. Still, usages are not wanting which distinctly recall the Hebrew. Among them are the following:—An extended use of prepositions; for instance, ἐν (cf. בְּ): not only in construction with verbs, as εὐδοκεῖν, ὀμνύειν, etc., but particularly with instrumental force, as κράζειν ἐν φωνῇ μεγάλῃ (Rev 14^{15}), ποιεῖν κράτος ἐν βραχίονι (Lk 1^{51}), πολεμεῖν ἐν τῇ ῥομφαίᾳ τοῦ στόματος (Rev 2^{16}).—εἰς (cf. לְ): in such phrases as γίνεσθαι εἰς οὐδέν (Ac 5^{36}), λαμβάνειν εἰς κληρονομίαν (He 11^{8}), λογίζεσθαι εἰς περιτομήν (Ro 2^{26}); and in general, its insertion before the second accusative after verbs signifying 'make,' 'hold,' etc., as, εἰς προφήτην αὐτὸν εἶχον (Mt 21^{46}).—ἀπό (cf. מִן): as, φεύγειν ἀπό, etc. (Mt 3^{7}, Jn 10^{5}).—ἐπί (cf. עַל): as, ἐλπίζειν ἐπί, etc.—μετά (cf. עִם): μεγαλύνειν, ποιεῖν, ἔλεος μετά, etc. (Lk 1$^{58.72}$).—Periphrastic expansions of prepositions:—by the use of ὀφθαλμός (cf. בְּעֵינֵי) Mt 21^{42}, Lk 19^{42};—πρόσωπον (cf. לִפְנֵי) Ac 5^{41}, Mk 1^{2}, Ac 13^{24};—στόμα (cf. בְּפִי) Mt 4^{4}, Lk 1^{70}, (עַל פִּי) 2 Co 13^{1}, Mt 18^{16};—χείρ (cf. בְּיַד) Jn 10^{39}, Gal 3^{19}, Ac 2^{23} 7^{35}.—The employment of ἔμπροσθεν (Mt 11^{26} 18^{14}), ἐνώπιον (Ac 6^{5}), κατενώπιον (Eph 1^{4}), κατέναντι (Ro 4^{17}), ὀπίσω (Lk 14^{27}), as prepositions.—The pleonastic use of pronouns (see above, I. B. b, sub fin.), especially αὐτός (e.g. Rev 2$^{7.17}$), which is even added in a relative sentence (Mt 3^{12}, Mk 7^{25}, Rev 7$^{2.9}$ etc.).—The use of a limiting genitive to express quality (Lk 18^{6}, Ja 2^{4} 1^{25}).—The use of (a superfluous) καὶ ἐγένετο (or ἐγένετο δέ) before a specification of time or occurrence.—An imitation of the Heb. infinite absolute by a cognate dative prefixed to the verb (as ἐπιθυμίᾳ ἐπεθύμησα Lk 22^{15}, χαρᾷ χαίρει Jn 3^{29}), or (in quotations) by a prefixed participle (as βλέποντες βλέψετε Mt 13^{14}, cf. the pictorial ἀναστάς or πορευθείς before a verb).—εἰ (cf. Heb. אִם) in sentences with suppressed apodosis as a formula of swearing or to express emphatic negation (He 4$^{3.5}$, Mk 8^{12}).—A lax use of ἀποκρίνομαι (cf. עָנָה) when no proper question has preceded.—προστίθημι (cf. יָסַף) with an infin. to express repetition (e.g. προσέθετο τρίτον πέμψαι Lk 20$^{(11)\,12}$).—A superfluous use of ὄνομα (Mt 1^{21}, Lk 2^{21}; found in papyri as early as B.C. 260).—The repetition of a numeral to give it distributive force (e.g. δύο δύο Mk 6^{7}; cf. συμπόσια συμπόσια, πρασιαὶ πρασιαί Mk 6$^{39f.}$, (and probably) ἡμέρᾳ καὶ ἡμέρᾳ 2 Co

4^{16}.—οὐ . . . πᾶς equivalent to οὐδείς.—Such phrases as τί ἐμοὶ καὶ σοί (Mk 1^{24}, Jn 2^{4}), περὶ ἁμαρτίας, sc. θυσία (Ro 8^{3}?).

The majority of these Hebraistic forms and constructions appear in the LXX also, which as a tr. —in parts servile, and made by persons some of whom evidently had but an imperfect acquaintance with the Gr. language—is far more Hebraistic in its cast than the NT. But it would be a mistake to assume that this tr. in its peculiarities represents a type of Gr. established and in actual currency at the time. Such an assumption would reverse the historical process. While its language reproduces fundamentally, no doubt, the popular Gr. of the Ptolemaic period, its distinctive character is due rather to the translators' exaggerated deference to the Heb. sacred text, and their mechanical reproduction of it. Yet beyond all question the idioms of this Gr. reproduction of the earlier Scriptures, made familiar as they were by the religious use of the version for generations among the Jews of the Dispersion, must have had great influence in forming the type of Gr. current among people of Jewish stock. Indeed, owing to the cosmopolitan relations of that race during the time intervening between the origin of the two bodies of literature, it need not surprise us to encounter idioms having a distinctly Hebraistic flavour even in native Gr. circles. Consequently our classifications here, as elsewhere, are more a matter of convenience than of rigorous historical accuracy. We must not forget the uncertainty arising from our present defective knowledge. We must not interpret the fact of prior occurrence into clear proof either of primary origin on the one hand, or direct derivation on the other. We must not overlook the truth that coincidences of popular expression are to be found in many widely separated and unrelated tongues. But, notwithstanding all uncertainties and abatements, the general influence of the LXX upon NT Greek was indubitably great. (See Schmiedel's Winer, § 4. 1*b*. A good Lexicon and Grammar of the LXX are pressing needs of the student of Biblical Greek, and are now made possible by Swete's edition of the text, and Hatch and Redpath's Concordance. Help on one minor point may be found in C. W. Votaw's comprehensive lists of The Use of the Infinitive in Biblical Greek, pp. 5, 9. Chicago, 1896. See Viteau as mentioned in the Bibliography, VII. below).

But not all the influence on the language of the NT writers came from Hebrew and Aramaic or from the LXX. Other languages foreign to the Gr. had left their traces on that language by the 1st cent. of our era, some of which can with tolerable assurance be pointed out.

III. OTHER FOREIGN ELEMENTS. — (A) The supremacy of Rome, and its multifarious official relations with the populations under its sway, in which relations it naturally employed its vernacular (see LATIN LANGUAGE), would prepare us to expect to find not a few traces of Latin in the popular language of the apostolic period.

a. The Lexical Latinisms in NT consist chiefly of judicial and military terms, names of coins, articles of apparel, utensils, etc.; as, ἀσσάριον, δηνάριον, ἔχω æstimo, κεντυρίων, κῆνσος, κοδράντης, κολωνία, κουστωδία, λεγεών, λέντιον, λιβερτῖνος, λίτρα (Lat. libra?), μάκελλον, μεμβράνα, μίλιον, μόδιος, ξέστης, πραιτώριον, σικάριος, σιμικίνθιον, σουδάριον, σπεκουλάτωρ, αἱ ταβέρναι, τίτλος, φελόνης, φόρον, φραγέλλιον (-λόω), χάρτης?, χῶρος.

More than two score Lat. names of persons and places occur, as well as the technical terms ὁ Σεβαστός (Augustus), and Καῖσαρ.

Latin phrases reappear in ἐργασίαν δοῦναι (operam dare), τὸ ἱκανὸν λαμβάνειν (satis accipere), τὸ ἱκανὸν ποιεῖν (satis facere), συμβούλιον λαμβάνειν (consilium capere). Notice also σὺ ὄψῃ (Mt 27^{4} tu videris), ὄψεσθε αὐτοί (Ac 18^{15}).

b. The influence of the Lat. language upon the Grammar of NT Gr. is much more difficult to trace with confidence than in the case of the Heb., owing to the closer structural affinity between the Lat. language and the Greek. Traces of that influence, however, may be detected, it is thought, with more or less distinctness in the following constructions: —The preference for ὅτι and ἵνα over the accusative and infinitive (cf. the growing use of ut after impero, rogo, etc., æquum est, mos est, etc.); the encroachment of the subjunctive on the optative after an historic tense; the tendency to obscure the distinction between the perfect and the aorist; the use of ἀπό before the genitive after φυλάσσειν and other verbs of fearing (cf. cavere ab); the exclusive use of the infinitive (even of the inf. passive) after κελεύειν; the use of the accusative after προέρχεσθαι (cf. præire aliquem), of the dative after γαμέω (cf. nubere alicui), of ἐκ after νικάω (cf. victoriam ferre ex); the continuative ὅς equivalent to καὶ οὗτος (cf. qui=et hic) in a co-ordinate clause; the anticipatory position of ἀπό and πρό in specifications of time and place; the general omission of the interjection (ὦ) before the vocative, the use of the preposition σύν as tantamount to καί.

(B) But the current Gr. of our Lord's day had appropriated other foreign elements from the languages spoken in the various provinces of the empire. These, again, were chiefly names of local objects or usages. Among such are reckoned the following:—βαΐον, βίβλος (βύβλος), σίναπι, σινδών (yet cf. Ἰνδός, Sind), recognized as Egyptian; κράβαττος (cf. Lat. grabatus), παρεμβολή, ῥύμη?, as Macedonian; ἀγγαρεύω (yet see Æsch. Agam. 282), γάζα, σανδάλιον (-δαλον), as Persian; ἀρραβών as Phœnician; ῥέδη (-δα) as Gallic or Celtic; βουνός as Cyrenaic and Sicilian. Several of these words, however, had long before become naturalized in Greek.

IV. But the element which most conspicuously distinguishes the Gr. of the NT is the RELIGIOUS ELEMENT. Here we come to the very centre and soul of our subject. For the NT language is no mere medley of miscellaneous linguistic survivals, no mechanical mingling of diverse ingredients; its vitality resides in the spirit that quickens it. This discloses itself on every page. It ushers a reader into a new realm of thought, and introduces him to a new type of life. Both had their natural effect on the speech of the first believers. Yet just because the essence of the language consists in its new spirit, it escapes anatomical dissection. It is as pervasive as the atmosphere, but as intangible as a perfume. Hence it is most inadequately exhibited by any catalogue of specifications. The few particulars that can here be set down will serve, at the best, as mere suggestions of its character.

(A) The religious element in its Lexical aspects. Many of the NT words denoting concrete objects or external institutions and relations were inherited from Judaism, and have been illustrated under II. A. a and b above. We will here, therefore, confine ourselves mainly to those of a more internal or spiritual character.

a. The words wholly new are, from the nature of the case, comparatively few, and any list of them that may be attempted is subject to doubt and revision by reason of present imperfect knowledge. But among the more distinctive the following may perhaps be mentioned: ἀγαθοποιΐα, αἰσχροκερδῶς, ἀκατάκριτος, ἀλίσγημα, ἀνακαινόω (-καίνωσις), ἀντιμισθία, ἀντίχριστος, ἀπέκδυσις, ἀπελεγμός, αὐτοκατάκριτος, ἀφιλάγαθος, ἀφιλάργυρος, βαττολογέω, δαιμονιώδης, δικαιοκρισία, δίλογος, διώκτης, δοκιμή, ἐγκομβόομαι, ἐθελοθρησκία, εἰδωλολατρία etc., ἐπιούσιος, ἑτεροδιδασκαλέω, εὐαγγελιστής, εὐμετάδοτος, εὐπροσωπέω, θεοδίδακτος, ἰσάγγελος, καλοδιδάσκαλος, καρδιογνώστης, καταθεματίζω, κενοφωνία, λογομαχέω (-χία), ὀλιγόπιστος (-πιστία), ὀρθοποδέω, ὀφθαλμοδουλία, πληροφορία, πολύσπλαγχνος, προσωπολήμπτης (-λημπτέω, -λημψία), πρωτοκαθεδρία, συνζωοποιέω, συνκακοπαθέω, συνκακουχέω, συνσταυρόω, σύνψυχος, φρεναπατάω (-πάτης), φυσιόω (-σίωσις), χρηστεύομαι, ψευδάδελφος, ψευδαπόστολος (and other compounds of ψευδο-).

Incomparably more noteworthy are—

b. The New Meanings with which the new faith has freighted the old terms.

A few of these meanings are of a technical or ritual character; as, ἀδελφός of fellow-Christians, τὸ ἀντίτυπον (τύπος), ἀποστολή (-λος, in the official sense), ἀρχαί, ἐξουσίαι, etc. of angels, βάπτισμα, γλῶσσα of the 'gift of tongues,' διάκονος, ἐκκλησία (cf. ἐκλεκτοί, κλητοί), ἐπίσκοπος, εὐαγγέλιον (-λιστής), ἱερεῖς of Christians, παράδεισος (2 Co 12^4), ὁ παράκλητος, προφητεύω (-φήτης) of a Christian function (cf. II. A. b. above), ὁ χριστός.

But the aggregate influence of Christianity is shown in modifying, more or less, the mass of the NT vocabulary. It has elevated, spiritualized, transfigured words previously current. It has set old terms in new relations. It has added lustre to conceptions already radiant. It has made substantial, and clothed with divine majesty, expressions embodying the instinctive judgments and aspirations of men. Its transforming power, being diffused and a matter of degree, cannot (as has been already said) be adequately exhibited in isolated particulars. The attempt, furthermore, to illustrate it would require space not here at command. Only a few terms, therefore, will be set down, the study of which, it is believed, will more than verify the statements just made: such words as ἀγάπη, εἰρήνη, ζωή, πίστις, συνείδησις, σωτηρία, χάρις are monuments of its power to raise language to a new level. Words of secular reference like κόσμος, of national application like οἱ ἅγιοι, ὁ λαὸς τοῦ θεοῦ (He 4^9), Ἰσραήλ (Ro 9^6), of everyday life like ὁδός, παγίς, πρόσκομμα, φορτίον, even the very component parts of man's being — σάρξ, ψυχή, πνεῦμα, take on an ethical significance, of which in this last case the later philosophic use furnishes but a foregleam. A servile word like ταπεινοφροσύνη is ennobled; a term like σταυρός, suggestive of infamy, is crowned with a halo of glory. The emphasis given to other words has made them the cardinal terms of doctrinal discussion through the Christian centuries: witness δικαιόω and its cognates, ἀπολύτρωσις, ἀπώλεια, ἐπιστρέφεσθαι, ἔργα, θάνατος, μετάνοια, etc.

(B) Even the Grammatical influence of the new religious thought bears witness to its fertilizing power. Take as an instance πιστεύω with its half a dozen different constructions in the NT (viz. absol.; with the dat.; with εἰς and the accus.; with ἐπί and the accus. or the dat.; with ἐν and the dat.; with an object accus.). Ἐλπίζειν, ὁμολογεῖν, and other words experienced a similar enlargement of construction under Christian conceptions (see A. Buttmann, Gram. of NT Greek, § 133, 4 sq., Eng. tr. p. 173 ff.); and the wealth of suggestion made to reside in such phrases as ἐν Χριστῷ, ἐν κυρίῳ, is full of instruction (cf. G. A. Deissmann, Die neutest. Formel 'in Christo Jesu' untersucht, Marburg, 1892).

V. But the circumstance that the NT forms a body of literature having its own distinct linguistic peculiarities, must not make us overlook the fact that it contains within itself considerable diversities of language as well as of style. The uniqueness of the volume, and the practice of using it as the one authoritative source and test of Christian truth, tend to make us isolate it unhistorically from the literature that immediately preceded and followed it, and, on the other hand, to unify it unwarrantably. It is a library comprising the works of, perhaps, ten or more different authors. The statement that 'they all use the same language' requires at once the qualification 'but they do not all use it in the same way.' The first three Gospels, for instance, with all their indications of a common basis, exhibit in their present form indubitable marks of the individuality of their several authors. The frequent use of τότε (ἀπὸ τότε —some 90 times), ἡ βασιλεία τῶν οὐρανῶν (some 33 times), ἵνα (ὅπως) πληρωθῇ (τὸ ῥηθέν, etc., some 12 times), ὁ πατὴρ ὁ ἐν (τοῖς) οὐρανοῖς or ὁ οὐράνιος (20 times), προσέρχεσθαι (51 times), συνάγειν (24 times), ἀναχωρεῖν (10 times), etc., mark distinctly the personality of Matthew. The use of εὐθύς (some two score times), of the pictorial participle, of diminutives and Latinisms, and, notwithstanding his terseness, a proneness to emphasize by the repetition of equivalent phrases (e.g. διαπαντὸς νυκτὸς καὶ ἡμέρας, 5^5; ἔσωθεν ἐκ τῆς καρδίας, 7^{21}; νῦν ἐν τῷ καιρῷ τούτῳ, 10^{30}; σήμερον ταύτῃ τῇ νυκτί, 14^{30}), etc., are some of the traits that characterize no less distinctly the second Evangelist. A comparison of the sections common to Luke with the other two shows the distinctively literary cast of his phraseology. The identity of topic but throws the difference in language into greater relief. He distinguishes himself from the other Synoptists by his fondness for infinitives (ἐν τῷ with the inf. 37 times, τοῦ with the inf. 25 times), for καὶ ἐγένετο or ἐγένετο δέ (43 times), δὲ καί (29 times), καὶ αὐτός (28 times), σύν (25 times), πορεύομαι (50 times), ὑποστρέφειν (22 times), ἐνώπιον (20 times), ἔμπροσθεν (10 times). The strikingly Semitic complexion of his first chapter, and the variations between his language in the Gospel and in the Acts, are doubtless attributable in large measure to his sources. The terms λόγος, σκοτία (σκότος), φῶς, ζωή (αἰώνιος), ἀλήθεια, δόξα, κρίσις, κόσμος, μαρτυρέω (-ρία), γινώσκω, πιστεύω, the phrases ἀμὴν ἀμήν, ἁμαρτίαν ἔχειν, γεννηθῆναι ἐκ (τοῦ) θεοῦ (or πνεύματος), εἶναι ἐκ (τοῦ κόσμου, etc.), ἡ ἐσχάτη ἡμέρα, ὁ υἱός, ὁ πατήρ, etc., are at once recognized as characteristic of John; and not less so are his short and simple sentences and their asyndetic collocation, his co-ordinateness and parallelism of construction (note ἀπεκρίθη καὶ εἶπεν), his verbal reiterations, his Hebraisms (χαρᾷ χαίρει 3^{29}, υἱοὶ φωτός 12^{36}, ὁ υἱὸς τῆς ἀπωλείας 17^{12}), his emphatic demonstratives, his combined particles (καίτοιγε, ὅμως μέντοι), his weakened ἵνα, and especially his recurrent οὖν, which often marks mere transition instead of logical sequence.

The distinctive vocabulary of the creative Paul is too salient and well known to be dwelt upon:—his abstracts: ἀγαθωσύνη, ἁγιωσύνη, ἁγνότης, ἁπλότης, δικαιοκρισία, δικαίωσις, δοκιμή, ἐνέργεια, ἑνότης, ἐξανάστασις, ἐπιπόθησις, εὐσχημοσύνη, ἱκανότης, ἱλαρότης, καινότης, κενοδοξία, μεθοδία, μωρολογία, ὀφθαλμοδουλία, πεποίθησις, πιθανολογία, πιότης, προσαγωγή, σκληρότης, υἱοθεσία;—his compounds: ἀκατακάλυπτος, ἀλάλητος, ἀμεταμέλητος, ἀμετανόητος, ἀναπολόγητος, ἀνεκδιήγητος, ἀνεξερεύνητος, ἀνεξιχνίαστος, ἀνθρωπάρεσκος, ἀνταναπληρόω, ἀπαρασκεύαστος, ἀποκαραδοκία, ἀπορφανίζω, ἀποτολμάω, ἐθελοθρησκία, ἐπαναμιμνήσκω, ἑτεροδιδασκαλέω, ἑτεροζυγέω, εὐπροσωπέω, θηριομαχέω, ἰσόψυχος, ὀλιγόψυχος, καταβραβεύω, κατοπτρίζομαι, κενοδοξία, κοσμοκράτωρ, μετασχηματίζω, ὀρθοποδέω, παρεισέρχομαι, προενάρχομαι, προσαναπληρόω, συνυπουργέω, συνυποκρίνομαι, ὑπερεντυγχάνω;—his particles: ἀλλὰ μενοῦνγε, ἄρα οὖν, ἐάν τε γάρ, ἐκτὸς εἰ μή, οὐ μόνον δὲ ἀλλὰ καί, τὲ γὰρ . . . ὁμοίως δὲ καί, ὑπερεκπερισσοῦ, ὡσπερεί, ὡς ὅτι. Not less familiar are the characteristics of his style:—his long and sometimes involved sentences, his participial appendages and amplifications, the irrepressible crowding of his thoughts, his imperial disregard for niceties of construction in his determination to 'wreak his meaning on expression.'

Very different is the studied rhetorical periodicity of the writer to the Hebrews. The nature of his theme, indeed, leads him to use many words and constructions found in the LXX; but the general air of his vocabulary, no less than of his style, is literary. Reminiscences of classic phraseology meet us in his ὡς ἔπος εἰπεῖν and ἔμαθεν ἀφ' ὧν ἔπαθεν. His varied use of particles— δήπου, ἐάνπερ, καθώσπερ, καίπερ, καίτοι, μετέπειτα, τε (τε γάρ), and the affectedly indefinite που (2^{6}, 4^{4})—further attests his culture. So do the periphrastic phrases ἀρχὴν λαμβάνειν (i.q. ἄρχεσθαι), πεῖραν λαμβάνειν (yet cf. ὑπόμνησιν λ. 2 Ti 1^{5}, λήθην λ. 2 P 1^{9}, etc.), and such terms as αἰσθητήριον, ἀπαύγασμα, ἔγγυος, ἔλεγχος, ἕξις, εἰς τὸ διηνεκές, πρόσφατος, τραχηλίζειν, χαρακτήρ. Still, he betrays conspicuously the later Gr. fondness for sonorous words (see p. 37 above); as, ἀγενεαλόγητος, αἱματεκχυσία, ἀκατάλυτος, ἀμετάθετος, ἀνασταυρόω, ἀντικαθίστημι, ἀπαράβατος, ἀφομοιοῦσθαι, δυσερμήνευτος, ἐπεισαγωγή, εὐπερίστατος, καταγωνίζεσθαι, μετριοπαθεῖν, μισθαποδοσία, ὁρκωμοσία, συνεπιμαρτυρεῖν, etc., bear witness. One of the noteworthy grammatical peculiarities of the Epistle is its use of the perfect tense as nearly tantamount to the aorist (e.g. $11^{17.28}$; note the co-ordination of the two in the former passage), in accordance with the laxity of the late and less cultivated writers (cf. e.g. Rev 5^{7}, 8^{5} etc.).

In some respects the Ep. of James shares the characteristics of that to the Hebrews. In style, to be sure, it is very different: terse, abrupt, vivid, incisive, at times picturesque, not to say poetic. But its vocabulary exhibits a similar variety and amplitude; and in the skilful use of the Gr. language its author is inferior to no NT writer. Peculiar to him are the compounds ἀδιάκριτος, ἀκατάστατος, ἀνέλεος, ἀπείραστος, ἀποκυέω, ἀφυστερέω, δαιμονιώδης, θανατηφόρος, κακοπαθία, κατιόομαι, νομοθέτης, πολύσπλαγχνος, σητόβρωτος, χρυσοδακτύλιος, the bookish terms ἀποσκίασμα, βρύω, ἔμφυτος, ἐνάλιος, κατήφεια, ὄψιμος, παραλλαγή, ῥυπαρία, τροπή, τροχός, τρυφάω, and the pictorial ἀνεμίζω, αὐχέω, δίψυχος, εὐπρέπεια, ὀλολύζω, ῥιπίζω, σήπω, φλογίζω, φρίσσω, χαλιναγωγέω. His Ep. contains some seventy words that are peculiar to him; while the Ep. to the Heb., nearly three times as long, exceeds that number by scarcely one hundred; and 1 P, nearly identical in length with James, falls short by some ten in the number of its peculiar terms. Some of James's words, e.g. πολύσπλαγχνος, χρυσοδακτύλιος, are thought to be of his own coinage.

Jude, when its diminutive extent is considered, is quite as characteristic as James in its terminology. Such words and phrases as ἀποδιορίζω, ἄπταιστος, ἐκπορνεύω, ἐπαγωνίζομαι, ἐπαφρίζω, μεμψίμοιρος, παρεισδύω, σπιλάς, φθινοπωρινός, πρὸ παντὸς τοῦ αἰῶνος, θαυμάζοντες πρόσωπα, sufficiently mark its individuality.

The vocabulary of the Petrine Epistles presents the phenomenon that of the one hundred and twenty-one words found in them and nowhere else in the NT, only one (ἀπόθεσις) is common to both Epistles, while each Epistle exhibits about the same number of peculiar terms,—viz. the first some sixty-three, the second fifty-seven, while in length their relation is nearly seven to five.

The Apocalypse, the most distinctly Hebraistic and Oriental specimen of literature in the NT, owes its linguistic individuality not so much to its vocabulary—although such words and phrases as βασανισμός, δράκων (of the devil), ἐγχρίω, ἐνδώμησις, ζηλεύω, ἡμίωρον, ὁ θάνατος ὁ δεύτερος, θειώδης, τὸ ἱππικόν, κατάθεμα, κατήγωρ, κολλούριον, κρυσταλλίζω, ἡ κυριακὴ ἡμέρα, μεσουράνημα, ὅπου . . . ἐκεῖ, πελεκίζω, ποταμοφόρητος, τὸ σιρικόν, στρηνιάω, τιμιότης, are peculiar to it—as to its intrepid disregard of the conventionalities of Gr. grammar, of which ὁ ἀμήν, ἀπὸ ὁ ὢν καὶ ὁ ἦν καὶ ὁ ἐρχόμενος, ἀνὰ εἷς ἕκαστος, δὶς μυριάδες, ὅμοιον υἱὸν ἀνθρώπου, φωνὴ λέγων, ἡ οὐαί, οὐαί followed by the accusative (8^{13} 12^{12}), ἐδόθη μοι κάλαμος . . . λέγων, etc., are specimens; and to them may be added a propensity to lapse into the use of the nominative, although this case is thus left suspended in mid-air (cf. 1^{5} 2^{18} 3^{12} 7^{4} 9^{14} $14^{12.14}$ 19^{11}). Its deviations from the ordinary laws of Greek construction are at times so bold and capricious as to start the query whether the work, in parts at least, is not the mechanical reproduction of an Aramaic original.

The undeniable individuality of the several NT writers may put us on our guard against too confidently over-pressing slight variations in phraseology into proof of difference in authorship or of substantial difference of thought. Changes in a writer's vocabulary, even in his style, may be due to the topic treated, or the character and circumstances of the persons addressed; or may be nothing more than those varying mannerisms which temporarily bear sway with all writers except the most practised. For example, it has been noticed (see W. H. Simcox, The Writers of the New Testament, p. 37) that Paul to express 'in every thing' uses ἐν παντί in the Epistles to the Thess. and Cor. (twelve times), but in the Pastoral Epistles ἐν πᾶσιν (six [five] times), while in that to the Philippians (4^{12}) he unites the two: ἐν παντὶ καὶ ἐν πᾶσιν (cf. 2 Co 11^{6}). On the other hand, the similarities, even coincidences, in language to be noted at times in different NT writings (on comparing, for instance, the Pauline Epistles and 1 P, or 1 P and Ja, or the writings of Luke and the Ep. to the Heb.) present a problem which this is not the place to discuss. Suffice it here to say, that they suggest the early growth of a distinctive religious terminology which largely became the common possession of the brotherhood of believers; and remind us also that not all the reciprocal influence of the Christian leaders upon one another was exerted through their writings. Moreover, as well coincidences as differences in vocabulary may admonish us afresh that NT Greek is not an isolated language, but can be correctly appreciated only by being studied in its relation to the written and spoken Greek of the apostolic period.

VI. PROBLEMS.—It has been intimated more than once already in the course of this article that considerable ignorance still exists respecting sundry details belonging to the NT language. This ignorance should not be exaggerated. It is not such as to throw uncertainty over the general tenor of biblical teaching. Nevertheless, the student and the Christian are alike concerned in its removal. The frank recognition of it is an indispensable preliminary to the patient study and research by which alone it can be diminished. Over and above matters clouded in uncertainty by reason of our scanty historical knowledge—such as 'baptism for the dead' (1 Co 15^{29}), 'the gift of tongues' (1 Co 14, etc.), the apostle's 'thorn in the flesh' (2 Co 12^{7}), etc.—there are points both of lexicography and of grammar respecting which unanimity has not yet been reached by leading expositors, and which consequently appeal invitingly to the enterprising student.

Among the former may be enumerated ἁρπαγμός (Ph 2^{6}; how far, if at all, is the distinction between verbal nouns in -μα, -μος, and -σις obliterated or obscured in NT Greek?), τὴν ἀρχήν (Jn 8^{25}), ἐμβριμάομαι (Mk 1^{43}, Jn 11^{38} etc.), ἐξουσία (1 Co 11^{10}), ἐπερώτημα (1 P 3^{21}), ἐπιβαλών (Mk 14^{72}), ἐπιούσιος (Mt 6^{11}, Lk 11^{3}), εὐπερίστατος (He 12^{1}), κατοπτρίζομαι (2 Co 3^{18}), κεφαλιόω (Mk 12^{4}), κοσμικός (He 9^{1}), ὁδὸν ποιεῖν (or ὁδοποιεῖν, Mk 2^{23}), παραρυῶμεν (He 2^{1}), προεχόμεθα (Ro 3^{9}), σπιλάδες (Jude ^{12}), συναλίζομαι (Ac 1^{4} etc.), συνκρίνοντες (1 Co 2^{13}), τροπῆς ἀποσκίασμα (Ja 1^{17}), τροχὸς γενέσεως (Ja 3^{6}). Further, what is the distinction, or how far is it regarded by the NT writers, between ἄλλος and ἕτερος (e.g. Gal $1^{6f.}$), βούλομαι and θέλω (e.g. Mt 1^{19}), εἰμί and ὑπάρχω (e.g. Ph 2^{6}), etc.? How far do the uses of εἰς and ἐν tend to approximate, and the difference in the classics between the several cases after prepositions (e.g. πρός) grow indistinct? Does εἰς τό with the infin. always express purpose? What is the difference between εἴγε and εἴπερ? Is διότι ever equivalent to the simple for? Is ὅτι ever tantamount to the interrogative why (Mk $9^{11.\,28}$), or does εἰ introduce a direct question? Does Paul use the 1st pers. plur. of himself alone? etc. etc.

Turning to points more strictly grammatical, we may mention—the use and force of the article: how far (if at all) does it deviate from the classic standard?—with πᾶς (e.g. Eph 2^{21} 3^{8}, Ac 2^{36}, 1 Ti 1^{16}); with νόμος; with πνεῦμα (ἅγιον); in such passages as Ro 5^{7} 3^{30}, 1 Ti 2^{15}. Is the classic law requiring an article before an attributive participle which follows a definite antecedent rigorously observed (cf. 1 P $3^{19.\,20}$)? Is there any difference in meaning between ὁ ὄχλος πολύς and ὁ πολὺς ὄχλος (cf. Jn $12^{9.\,12}$ and Mk 12^{37})? What is the difference between αὐτός and ἐκεῖνος in 2 Ti 2^{26}? Are αὐτοῦ, etc., used reflexively? Is ὅστις ever a pron. of simple reference (i.q. ὅς, cf. Mt 22^{2} 18^{23})? What is the force of the genitive in the phrases δικαιοσύνη θεοῦ (cf. Ro 1^{17}), πίστις Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ (Ro 3^{22})? Does ἀκούειν φωνῆς differ in sense from φωνὴν ἀκούειν (cf. Ac $9^{4.\,7}$ $22^{7.\,9}$ 26^{14}, and see Buttmann, NT Grammar, §§ 132, 17; 144, 16)?

The matters above specified are called 'problems,' because difference of opinion about them still exists in reputable commentaries; although it may be questioned whether several of them have not been already disposed of in the judgment of scholars. To them may be added the stock exegetical problems, such as Mt 6^{13}, Lk 12^{49} 18^{7}, Ac $26^{28f.}$, Ja 4^{5}, 2 P 1^{20}; together with more general questions, such as, What effect, if any, had amanuenses on the style of the NT writings? What indications, if any, of the locality of their origin do the NT writings disclose? What influence, if any, had the Heb. parallelism in obliterating for the Jewish-Greek mind the delicate shades of difference between Gr. synonyms? What influence, if any, had the use of Jewish manuals in producing agreement in the form or the employment of OT passages? (Note the agreement in combined quotations, deviating in the same particulars from the LXX, which occur in Ro $9^{32.\,33}$ and 1 P 2^{6-8}; cf. Ro 12^{19} with He 10^{30}).

The uncertainties still cleaving to the NT language it is by no means over-sanguine to hope may be gradually, and in the end greatly, reduced. Not a little help towards this result is yet to be drawn from the literary relics of the centuries immediately preceding and following the Christian era. The more accurate editing and careful study of these relics, which is already engaging the efforts of scholars, is yielding results which both justify and augment expectation. Particulars, individually slight, amount to a considerable gain in the aggregate. Meantime, noteworthy accessions to our knowledge of the language of the Alexand. and Gr.-Roman period have already come from the inscriptions, and especially the papyri (some of them going back to the days of the Ptolemies), which the last few decades have unearthed, and which it may reasonably be hoped are but the first-fruits of a rich harvest of discovery. Resemblances in phraseology are instructive even where the intellectual and religious quality of the conceptions covered may be widely different (cf. e.g. υἱὸς θεοῦ, κύριος, σωτήρ, as used of the Roman emperors, and in the vocabulary of the Stoics). Moreover, the unalterableness, and in many cases the definite date of many of these sources, lift their testimony above the suspicion of possible clerical modification from which the text of even our best extant NT MSS is not always quite free.

VII. The LITERATURE of our subject requires little space here. Suffice it to refer the reader to Schmiedel's 8th ed. of Winer's Grammatik, of which the first part (Einleit. und Formenlehre, pp. 194) appeared in 1894, the second in 1897, and where almost no publication of moment is left unmentioned. A careful review of Pt. i. by W. Schmid in the GGA, 1895, No. 1, pp. 26–47, deserves also to be consulted. The comparison of the NT language with the later Gr. has been greatly facilitated by the last-named scholar's elaborate work, Der Atticismus in seinen Hauptvertretern von Dionysius von Halikarnass bis auf den zweiten Philostratus (vol. i. 1887, vol. ii. 1889, vol. iii. 1893, vol. iv. 1896, Index 1897), by the treatise of William Schmidt, de Flavii Josephi elocutione, etc., in Fleckeisen's 'Jahrbücher für classische Philologie,' 20ter Supplementband (1894, pp. 345–550), by the Subsidia ad cognoscendum Græcorum sermonem vulgarem e Pentateuchi versione Alexandrina repetita of H. Anz in 'Dissertationes Philolog. Halenses,' vol. xii. (1894) pp. 261–387, and by G. A. Deissmann's Bibelstudien (Marburg, 1895), which contains, pp. 57–168, an instructive study of the Gr. of the LXX in the light of the results furnished by papyri and recently-discovered inscriptions; supplemented in 1897 by Neue Bibelstudien; new ed. in Eng. tr. by Grieve, 1900.

Other noteworthy recent works dealing directly with the language of the NT are: Joseph Viteau, Étude sur le Grec du Nouveau Testament: Le Verbe; Syntaxe des Propositions (pp. 240, 8°, Paris, 1893), especially convenient owing to the summary of NT peculiarities given at the close of every chapter; particular attention is paid also to the usage of the LXX, which is made still more prominent in his Étude, etc.: Sujet, Complément et Attribut (pp. 248, Paris, 1896); F. Blass, Grammatik d. Neutest. Griechisch (pp. 329, 8°, Göttingen, 1896; Eng. tr. by Thackeray, 1898), which has the exceptional merit of recognizing the characteristics of the several writers, and of frequently noting variant readings from the MSS., and citing parallels from the Apostolic Fathers; E. W. Burton, Syntax of the Moods and Tenses in NT Greek, 2nd ed. pp. 215, 1893; H. A. A. Kennedy, Sources of NT Greek, pp. 172, 1895; Dalman, Worte Jesu, 1898.

Interesting light is thrown on sundry details also by Arnold Meyer, Jesu Muttersprache, pp. 176, Leipzig, 1896; and Edward Hicks, Traces of Gr. Philosophy and Rom. Law in the NT, pp. 187, Lond. 1896.

The multiplying of manuals of a popular character (Combe, Huddilston, Moulton) indicates a growing interest in the language, and emphasizes the demand for a new work by a master hand which shall combine the excellencies of the standard treatises of Winer and Buttmann, utilize the knowledge of the subject which has accumulated during the last thirty years or more, and furnish a student with a compact yet complete handbook.—[1897]. J. H. THAYER.

LANTERN occurs only in Jn 18^{3} 'with lanterns and torches and weapons,' where it is the tr. of φανός, a word which occurs only here in biblical Greek, and is not common elsewhere. That 'torch' would be a more accurate rendering than 'lantern' seems clear from Xenophon's ὑπὸ φανοῦ πορεύεσθαι (Rep. Lac. v. 7). The word is formed directly from φαίνω 'to give light.' The Eng. tr. is from Wyclif, 'with lanternis and brondis and armys,' who thus translates the Vulg. 'cum laternis et facibus et armis,' and all the versions follow with 'lanterns' (except Cov. who has 'with creshettes, with lanternes, and with weapens'). 'Lantern' was formerly used with more freedom than now. Wyc. translates Jn 5^{35} 'Sothli he was a lanterne brennynge and schynynge' (Tind. 'He was a burninge and a shyninge light'; Geneva, 'candle'), and Ps 119^{105} 'Lanterne to my feet thi woord; and light to myn pathis' (1388 'Thi word is a lanterne'); so Cov. 'Thy worde is a lanterne unto my fete, and a light unto my pathes,' and this is the form in which the verse is quoted at the time; as, Tind. Expositions (Parker Soc.), p. 149; Ridley, Brefe Declaration, 96, 'by the lanterne of thy worde'; Knox, Works, iii. 301, 'The bryght lantarne to the fete of these that by nature walke in darkenesse'; and Davenant, Fast Sermon (Fuller's Life, p. 276).

Trench in his NT Synonyms, p. 157 ff., endeavours to distinguish the five words φῶς, φέγγος, φωστήρ, λύχνος, and λαμπάς; but he seems to have forgotten φανός. Φῶς and φέγγος mean 'light,' the former chiefly the light of the sun, the latter chiefly that of the moon. Φωστήρ is a luminary. Λύχνος, he thinks, should always be translated 'lamp,' and λαμπάς 'torch.' These distinctions are valid, though it is not possible to observe them invariably. How far the RV has done so may be seen from the following list:—

φῶς is everywhere 'light' in AV and RV, except Ja 1^{17} AV and RV 'lights' ('the Father of lights,' τῶν φώτων), Ac 16^{29} RV ('he called for lights,' φῶτα); in Mk 14^{54} AV renders πρὸς τὸ φῶς 'at the fire,' and in the par. passage Lk 22^{56} 'by the fire,' RV both 'in the light of the fire'; in Eph 5^{9} edd. prefer ὁ καρπὸς τοῦ φῶτος for TR τοῦ πνεύματος, whence RV 'the fruit of the light' for AV 'the fruit of the Spirit.'

φωστήρ is 'light,' Rev 21^{11}, and in plu. 'lights,' Ph 2^{15}, in both versions, with RVm 'luminaries.'

φέγγος occurs only in Mt 24^{29}, Mk 13^{24}, Lk 11^{33}, and both versions have 'light.'

λαμπάς is in AV translated 'lamp' in Mt $25^{1.3.4.7.8}$, and RV retains with marg. 'torch,' also in Rev 4^{5}, which RV retains without margin. In Rev 8^{10} RV turns AV 'lamp' into 'torch,' but retains AV 'torch' in Jn 18^{3} and 'light' in Ac 20^{8}.

λύχνος has been translated 'lamp' in RV in all its occurrences, but AV varies between 'candle' in Mt 5^{15}, Mk 4^{21}, Lk 8^{16} $11^{33.36}$ 15^{8}, Rev 18^{23} 22^{5}; and 'light' in Mt 6^{22}, Lk 11^{34} 12^{35}, Jn 5^{35}, 2 P 1^{19}, Rev 21^{23}.

LAODICEA (Λαοδικία, Tisch. and WH, as appears in ℵ everywhere, and in B Col 2^{1}, Rev 1^{11} 3^{14}: Laodicia or Laudicia often in Latin Versions. B has Λαοδίκεια in Col $4^{13.15.16}$; so TR everywhere. Λαοδίκεια is certainly the correct Greek form; it is the practically universal form in Greek literature, Strabo, Steph. Byz., Philostratus, etc., also an inscription dated [ἀπὸ Λαοδι]κείας A.D. 129.[*] The good Latin form is Laodicea, not Laodicia. The early Turkish form Ladhik[†] [compare Ladik, still used of the Pontic and Lycaonian cities] points to Λαοδίκεια. The forms Λαυδίκεια and Λαδίκεια occur later).—Laodicea, distinguished from other cities of the same name as ἐπὶ τῷ Λύκῳ, or ad Lycum, was founded probably by Antiochus II. Theos, B.C. 261–246, and named after his wife Laodike. It was placed on a spur of the low hills fringing the Lycos valley on the south, about 2 miles south from the river. It is close to the station Gonjelli on the Ottoman Railway, and the branch line to Denizli runs up the valley of the little river Asopos, close to the western gates of the city. It was distant only 6 miles from Hierapolis, and 11 from Colossæ (Col $4^{13.16}$). Behind the hills to the south, only a few miles away from the city, rises the great range of Mount Salbakos (Baba Dagh), and to the south-east Mount Kadmos (Khonas Dagh), both reaching to the height of about 8000 ft. above the sea, while the city is only about 800 or 900 ft. above the sea. Before Laodicea was founded, the chief town or village of this part of the valley was certainly situated at Denizli, 6 miles south, close under Salbakos, where the natural water-supply was extraordinarily abundant; and after Laodicea decayed, about the end of the 11th cent., Denizli again took its place as the chief city of the whole valley.[‡] Laodicea was dependent for its water on an aqueduct whose maintenance required more skill and prudence than could be applied in the 12th cent. It has ever since been called Eski-Hissar, 'the Old Fortress,' as distinguished from the modern city Denizli, 'Full of Waters.'

The site of Laodicea is now utterly deserted. The ruins are not conspicuous or imposing; the site has been rifled to build and repair Denizli, and in recent years much injury has thus been done to the old city.

The city Laodicea was founded to be a garrison and centre of Seleucid power in the country, and population was selected and planted there likely to be loyal to the Seleucid kings. Hence there are some traces of a Syrian element in the population.[*] Jews also formed part of the citizens; these may have been brought there by the founder, or been settled there by Antiochus the Great towards B.C. 200, when he sent 2000 Jewish families from Babylonia to the cities of Phrygia and Lydia (Josephus, Ant. XII. iii. 4).[†] In B.C. 62 Flaccus, the governor of the province Asia, refused to let the money which was regularly sent to Jerusalem by the Jews go out of the country, because he feared that the loss of specie might be dangerous. At Laodicea, by the governor's orders, 20 pounds weight of gold, which had been collected by the Jews, was seized; and at Apameia 100 pounds weight (Cicero, pro Flacco, 68). A letter of the Laodicean magistrates is preserved by Josephus (Ant. XIV. x. 20), promising to obey the Roman orders, and grant full religious freedom to the Jews.

Laodicea was a small city until after the Roman period had begun; then it rapidly became great and rich. Destroyed by an earthquake in A.D. 60, it disdained to seek help from the liberality of the Emperors, as many of the greatest cities of Asia had done; propriis opibus revaluit (Tacitus, Ann. xiv. 27). Hence its boast, Rev 3^{17} 'I am rich, and have gotten riches, and have need of nothing.' It was renowned for the beautiful glossy black wool of its sheep, and carried on a great trade in garments manufactured from this wool. Owing to its central position at the point where the great trade-route from the East was joined by several branch-roads, and its importance as chief city of the Cibyratic conventus, to which, at stated intervals, the people of many cities and a large district flocked, it became a centre of banking and financial transactions; and Cicero intended to cash there his bills of exchange (Ep. ad Fam. iii. 5. 4). Hence Rev 3^{18} 'I counsel thee (not to take the gold of thy bankers, but) to buy of me gold refined by fire, and (not the glossy black garments made in the city, but) white garments.'

Laodicea was not far east of the temple of Men Karou, connected with which was a famous school of medicine in the century immediately before and after Christ. There was an article called 'Phrygian Powder,' used to cure weakness of the eyes; it is very probable that this was made at Laodicea.[‡] Hence 'I counsel thee (not to use thy 'Phrygian Powder,' but) to buy of me eyesalve to anoint thine eyes that thou mayst see' (Rev 3^{18}).

Very little is known about the history of Christianity in Laodicea. Timothy, Mark, and above all Epaphras (Col 1^{7}), are likely to have been first instrumental in spreading the new religion in the Lycos valley; after them came Philip the Apostle, and (according to late tradition) John. Archippus, Nymphas (Col 4^{15}), and Diotrephes (3 Jn ^{9}), are named by untrustworthy tradition as the first bishops of Laodicea. Sagaris, a bishop of Laodicea, died a martyr about A.D. 166. Sisinnius, a bishop, and Artemon a presbyter, under Diocletian, are mentioned in the Acta S. Artemonis (Oct. 8), a late and poor production.[§] Few Christian inscriptions are known. Laodicea was represented by its bishop Nounechios at the Council of Nicæa, A.D. 325; and a council was held in the city about 344–363. It was the leading bishopric of Phrygia throughout the Christian period. The subscription at the end of 1 Ti, ἐγράφη ἀπὸ Λαοδικείας, has no authority, and is certainly false. The Epistle called ἡ ἐκ Λαοδικείας (Col 4^{16}) is perhaps the existing Epistle to the Ephesians (wh. see). The so-called Epistola ad Laodicenses is a late and worthless forgery. St. Paul himself had never visited the Lycos valley (Col 2^{1}).

Laodicea is classified by NT writers under the geographical name Asia. Zahn, however, and Blass consider that St. Luke reckoned it, not under Asia, but under Phrygia (see LYDIA, against this view).

LITERATURE.—Most of what has been learned about Laodicea is collected by Ramsay, Cities and Bishoprics of Phrygia, pt. i. pp. 1–83, 342 f.; pt. ii. pp. 512 ff., 542 ff., 785 f. Anderson in Journal of Hellenic Studies (1897), p. 404 ff., and Weber in Jahrbüch. des Arch. Instituts (1898), pt. i., supplement that work. Among the older travellers Hamilton gives the best account; but Smith, Pococke, Chandler, Arundell, Fellows, Texier, are all worth reading. W. M. RAMSAY.

LAODICEANS (Λαοδικεῖς, Latin Laodicenses) is the correct term for the people of Laodicea (Col 4^{16}). Λαοδικεύς is the invariable form on coins. Λαοδικηνός is used in the sense of 'made in, or belonging to, Laodicea'; and in Latin Laodicenus also occasionally is used for a man of Laodicea.

LAPPIDOTH (לַפִּידוֹת 'torches,' 'flames,' cf. Ex 20^{18}; B Λαφειδώθ, A Λαφιδώθ).—Husband of Deborah, Jg 4^{4}. For the form of the name, with the fem. plur. ending -ôth, cf. Naboth, Meremoth, Meraioth, Jeremoth, Mikloth; prob. an intensive plur. (König, Syntax d. Heb. Spr. § 261), perhaps with a figurative meaning (Böttcher, Lehrbuch, § 719*a*). Jewish commentators, e.g. D. Kimchi, Levi ben-Gershom, identify Lappidoth ('flames') with Barak ('lightning'); so Hilliger, Das Deborah-lied p. 11; Wellh., Composition p. 223; Budde, Richt. u. Sam. p. 69. Other Jewish interpretations explain that Deborah was 'a woman of torches,' i.e. made wicks for the sanctuary, or, 'a woman of flames,' referring to the fiery or energetic character of her prophesying. These explanations are improbable.

LARGE.—Like Lat. largus, 'large' formerly expressed abundance rather than bulk. Its meanings in AV are all practically obsolete, and are apt to be missed. 1. Spacious, of great extent, as Jg 18^{10} 'When ye go, ye shall come unto a people secure, and to a large land' (וְהָאָרֶץ רַחֲבַת יָדַיִם, RV 'and the land is large'; lit. 'spacious on both hands'); Neh 4^{19} 'The work is great and large, and we are separated upon the wall, one far from another'; Is 30^{23} 'In that day shall thy cattle feed in large pastures'; Jer 22^{14} 'I will build me a wide house and large chambers' (עֲלִיּוֹת מְרֻוָּחִים, AVm 'through-aired chambers'; RV 'spacious chambers'); Rev 21^{16} 'And the city lieth foursquare, and the length is as large as the breadth' (RV 'as great as the breadth'). Cf. Howell, Letters, I. i. 5, 'I pray God bless us both, and send us, after this large Distance, a joyful meeting.' 2. Unconfined, free, as 2 S 22^{20} ‖ Ps 18^{19} 'He brought me forth also into a large place' (מֶרְחָב, tr^{d} 'a large place,' also in Ps 118^{5}, Hos 4^{16}, but in Ps 31^{8} 'a large room,' RV 'a large place'; except in Hos (where see Cheyne's note), it is an expression denoting great prosperity. De Witt translates Ps 18^{19} 'He brought me forth into room unconfined,' and points out that the opposite is the 'calamity,' or 'sore pressure' of the previous verse); 2 Es 1^{13} 'I led you through the sea, and in the beginning gave you a large and safe passage' (plateas vobis in invio munitas exhibui, RV 'where there was no path I made for you highways'). Cf. Mt 7^{13} Rhem., 'Enter ye by the narrow gate, because brode is the gate, and large is the way that leadeth to perdition.' So Hall, Works, ii. 2, 'None but a sonne of Aaron might offer incense to God in the temple; and not every sonne of Aaron, and not any one at all seasons: God is a God of order, and hates confusion no lesse than irreligion: albeit he hath not so straitned himselfe under the Gospell, as to tie his service to persons, or places, yet his choice is now no lesse curious because it is more large; he allowes none but the authorised, he authoriseth none but the worthy.' Cf. also Shaks. As You Like It, II. vii. 48—

'I must have liberty
Withal, as large a charter as the wind,
To blow on whom I please';

and Hamlet, IV. iv. 36—

'Sure, He, that made us with such large discourse, Looking before and after, gave us not
That capability and godlike reason
To fust in us unused.'

3. Liberal in giving, only Mt 28^{12} 'They gave large money unto the soldiers' (Tindale's tr., Gr. ἀργύρια ἱκανά). This meaning was once very common. Thus Shaks. 2 Henry VI. I. i. 111—

'the poor King Reignier, whose large style Agrees not with the leanness of his purse';

and Dryden, Brit. Red. i. 86—

'Large of his treasures, of a soul so great
As fills and crowds his universal seat.'

In Gal 6^{11} we have the nearest approximation to the modern use, 'Ye see how large a letter I have written unto you with mine own hand.' The Gr. is πηλίκοις γράμμασιν, which RV translates 'with how large letters,' introducing the modern meaning of 'large' unmistakably. Field (Otium Norv. iii. 117), who calls the RV the only possible rendering, says, 'St. Paul was a very indifferent penman, and when he did not employ an amanuensis, was obliged to write in very large and, probably, ill-shaped characters.' He illustrates from Plutarch's Cato: 'In describing Cato's method of educating his son, the historian tells us that he wrote histories for him with his own hand and in large characters' (ἰδίᾳ χειρὶ καὶ μεγάλοις γράμμασιν). The Eng. word recalls Milton's Sonnet 'New Forces of Conscience'—

'New Presbyter is but old Priest writ large.'

The phrase 'at large' occurs Wis 19^{9} 'For they went at large like horses' (ἐνεμήθησαν, Vulg. depaverunt [escam]; RV 'they roamed at large'); Sir 47^{12} 'After him [David] rose up a wise son, and for his sake he dwelt at large' (κατέλυσεν ἐν πλατυσμῷ: Bissell explains, 'He was no more full of care for this and that; he gave up all to the management of his wise son.' But Ball [QPB], 'Solomon enjoyed ease and freedom for David's sake'); 2 Mac 2^{30} 'To stand upon every point, and go over things at large, and to be curious in particulars, belongeth to the first author of the story' (περὶ πάντων ποιεῖσθαι λόγον, RV 'to indulge in long discussions,' RVm 'to provide a place for discussions.' Fritzsche prefers the reading of codd. A and V περίπατον ποιεῖσθαι λόγων, 'to make the round of matters'). Cf. Rhem. NT, p. 204 (Argument to John's Gospel), 'the intent of this evangelist writing after the other three, was, to omit the Actes of Christ in Galilee, because the other three had written them at large; and to reporte his Actes done in Iurie, which they had omitted.'

Largely, in the sense of freely, occurs in 1 Mac 16^{16} 'when Simon and his sons had drunk largely' (ἐμεθύσθη, RV 'had drunk freely'; Ball and Bissell, 'were drunk,' which is the only possible meaning). Cf. North's Plutarch, 'Alexander,' p. 687, 'Then did Alexander offer great presents unto the god, and gave money largely to the priests and ministers of the temple.'

Largeness occurs only 1 K 4^{29} 'And God gave Solomon wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart' (רֹחַב לֵב), where the meaning is not, as now understood, a charitable disposition, but breadth of intellectual interest, the difference being due, however, to the difference between the Heb. and Eng. uses of 'heart.' Thus the marg. of the Geneva Bible (copied into the Bishops' Bible) explains the phrase, 'able to comprehend all things,' where the tr. is 'a large heart.' But it is probable that as first used by Wyclif the Eng. phrase meant liberality in giving, as the marg. note to the 1388 ed. has 'largenesse of herte, to spende in greet worschip.' Cf. Elyot, Governour, ii. 104, 'Crœsus, the riche king of Lidia . . . saide on a tyme to Cyrus, when he behelde his liberalitie, that suche largenesse as he used shulde bringe hym in povertie, where, if he lysted, he mought accumulate up treasure incomparable.' J. HASTINGS.

LASCIVIOUSNESS is the tr. in AV and RV of ἀσέλγεια in Mk 7^{22}, 2 Co 12^{21}, Gal 5^{19}, Eph 4^{19}, 1 P 4^{3}, Jude ^{4}. The Gr. word is found also in Ro 13^{13}, where both versions have 'wantonness,' and three times in 2 P, viz. 2^{2} TR πολλοὶ ἐξακολουθήσουσιν αὐτῶν ταῖς ἀπωλείαις, AV 'many shall follow their pernicious ways,' but edd. ἀσελγείαις, whence RV 'their lascivious doings'; 2^{7} ἐν ἀσελγείᾳ ἀναστροφή, AV 'filthy conversation,' RV 'lascivious life'; and 2^{18} ἀσελγείαις AV 'through much wantonness,' RV 'by lasciviousness.' In LXX ἀσέλγεια occurs only twice, Wis 14^{26} AV 'shameless uncleanness,' RV 'wantonness'; and 3 Mac 2^{26} 'acts of impiety.'

The etymology of ἀσέλγεια has had a curious history. The derivation from α priv. and Σέλγη, a Pisidian city, is still mentioned by lexicographers, though it is doubtful if it was for morality or immorality that that city was famous: Thayer-Grimm, 'whose citizens excelled in strictness of morals'; Trench, 'whose inhabitants were infamous for their vices.' The favourite derivation is, however, α and σέλγω, i.e. θέλγω to charm. But the use of the word in NT alone is sufficient to fix its meaning and to show that 'lasciviousness' is too restricted and definite to cover it all. The meaning is absence of restraint, indecency; and although that is generally regarded as shown in sensuality, there are passages, as Mk 7^{22} and 1 P 4^{3}, where sensuality is not yet in sight. In the latter passage, as Salmond points out, the writer begins with a general term ('excesses') sufficient to include unbridled conduct of all kinds, and then passes to particulars. Trench thinks 'wantonness' the best rendering, 'standing as it does in a remarkable ethical connexion with ἀσέλγεια, and having the same duplicity of meaning,' i.e. indecency in general and sensuality in particular. See Trench, NT Synonyms^{8}, p. 54 ff., and Thayer, NT Greek Lex., s.v. The leading idea in the word is probably conduct that is shameless. It is thus joined with πορνεία and ἀκαθαρσία in 2 Co 12^{21} and Gal 5^{19}, where πορνεία is a special form of impurity; ἀκαθαρσία uncleanness of any kind that may, however, be unseen; ἀσέλγεια uncleanness that shocks public decency. See Lightfoot on Gal 5^{19} and 1 Th 2^{3} (the latter in Notes on Epp. of St. Paul, p. 21). It is remarkable that in all the places in which 'lasciviousness' is found it has been introduced by the AV translators. The earlier word is nearly always 'wantonness' (except in Wyc. and Rhem. following the Vulg. too closely and giving 'lechery' or 'impurity' mostly). RV has carried the mistake still further by changing 'wantonness' of 2 P 2^{18} into 'lasciviousness.'

J. HASTINGS.

LASEA (Λάσαια) is never mentioned by any ancient author except St. Luke; but in the 'hundred-citied' Crete it is not strange that an unimportant town should be only once mentioned. Lasaia was near Fair Havens (Ac 27^{8}); and as St. Paul's ship lay for some considerable time in the Havens, it would be necessary to purchase stores from the city, on which account it comes to be mentioned by the historian. The ruins of the city were examined in 1856 by the Rev. G. Brown. They are about 5 miles east from the Havens, and 1 mile east from Cape Leonda or Leona; and according to Mr. Brown are still called Λάσαια by the Cretan peasantry. This may probably be the Lisia mentioned in the Peutinger Tables as 16 miles south from Gortyna. In an air line the distance on the map seems hardly more than 12 miles; but in mountainous Crete the road may be 16 miles. Mr. E. Falkener has published an old Venetian description of the island of Crete, which mentions in this neighbourhood a place Lapsea, with a ruined temple (Mr. Brown mentions two temples).

LASHA (לֶשַׁע, A Δάσα, E and Luc. Λάσα). — Mentioned only in Gn 10^{19}, as forming the boundary of the Canaanites towards the east. Jerome and Jerus. Targum identify with the famous hot springs of Callirrhoë in the Wâdy Zerḳa Ma'in to the east of the Dead Sea; but this appears to be too far to the north, and, as Dillmann remarks, we rather expect a situation on the west side of the Dead Sea or of the Ghôr. Wellh. (JBDTh xxi. 403 f.) would change לֶשַׁע into לֵשָׁה or לֶשֶׁם, i.e. Laish (Dan) on the northern boundary of Canaan; but the boundary from north to south seems to have been sufficiently given in the words 'from Zidon . . . to Gaza,' and we expect a boundary now in a new direction, namely, from west to east. One might think of the promontory el-Lisân at the south end of the Dead Sea, but if this were intended, the art. would have been found, הַלָּשֹׁן, as in Jos 15^{2}. J. A. SELBIE.

LASSHARON.—Amongst the kings subdued by Joshua, the MT (followed by AV, RV) includes the king of Lassharon (AVm Sharon). In the Onomas. (s. 'Saron') the name Sharon is applied to the region between Tabor and the Lake of Tiberias, stated to be 'still called Sarona.' The name Sarôna is at the present day applied to a ruin on this plateau, which is a possible site for Lassharon (SWP vol. i. sheet vi.). Sarona is mentioned on the list of Thothmes III. See PALESTINE.

The text of Jos 12^{18} appears to be in some disorder. While MT has מֶלֶךְ אֲפֵק מֶלֶךְ לַשָּׁרוֹן, B of the LXX has βασιλέα Ὀφὲκ τῆς Ἀρώκ (A simply βασιλέα Ἀφέκ), where Ἀρώκ is doubtless a corruption of Σαρών. The Heb. text before B would thus appear to have been מֶלֶךְ אֲפֵק לַשָּׁרוֹן 'king of Aphek in Sharon,' the Sharon being not the plain of that name on the coast, but the district in Galilee above mentioned (so Dillm. on Jos 12^{18}; cf. Wellh. Sam. p. 55). C. R. CONDER.

LASTHENES (Λασθένης), an officer of high rank under Demetrius II. Nikator. He bears the honorary titles of 'kinsman' (συγγενής 1 Mac 11^{31}) and 'father' (πατήρ ib. 11^{32}) of the king, the former not necessarily implying near relationship to Demetrius (cf. 1 Mac 10^{89}), and the latter pointing to his superior age, and to the advice (cf. Gn 45^{8} of Joseph) and protection which he afforded to the young prince (cf. Rawlinson and Zöckler). Himself a Cretan, he raised a body of Cretan mercenaries, and enabled Demetrius to land in Cilicia, and wrest the throne of Syria from Alexander Balas (Jos. Ant. XIII. iv. 3, cf. 1 Mac 10^{67}). From the new king Lasthenes seems to have received some official position, possibly that of governor of Cœle-

Syria (cf. 1 Mac 10^{69}). Hence when Demetrius was endeavouring to make terms with Jonathan the Maccabæan, he wrote to Lasthenes in favour of the Jews, and forwarded a copy of his letter to the Jewish prince (1 Mac 11^{29-37}, Jos. Ant. XIII. iv. 9). It is probable that Lasthenes was the powerful favourite, who, by encouraging the luxury and tyranny of Demetrius, eventually brought about his overthrow by Tryphon (Diod. xxxiii. 4, and Vales. ad loc.). H. A. WHITE.

LATCHET (שְׂרוֹךְ, ἱμάς).—The word refers to the leather thongs used for tying on sandals. (See DRESS, vol. i. p. 627^a). In Gn 14^{23} Abram tells the king of Sodom that he had taken an oath that he would not accept at his hands 'from a thread to a shoe-latchet' (מִחוּט וְעַד שְׂרוֹךְ־נַעַל), i.e. nothing of his most worthless possessions, much less anything of value. In Is 5^{27} it is stated that the army to be brought from afar against disobedient Israel would be of such disciplined energy that no loose girdles or broken latchets would be seen in it. John the Baptist indicates his relationship of inferiority by saying that he is unworthy to loose the latchet of the shoes of Christ (Mk 1^7, Lk 3^{16}, Jn 1^{27}). Among Orientals everything connected with the feet and shoes is defiled and debasing, and the stooping to unfasten the dusty latchet is the most insignificant item in such service. G. M. MACKIE.

LATIN.—In Jn 19^{20} (Lk 23^{38} inferior text) it is stated that the inscription on the tablet placed upon the cross by Pilate 'was written in Hebrew, and in Latin, and in Greek.' There seems to be no clear evidence that the affixing of such a tablet to the cross was a legal requirement, or even the ordinary usage. But a tablet or placard announcing a criminal's offence was often carried before him on his way to execution, or hung about his neck, and sometimes he was preceded by a herald proclaiming his crime (cf. Sueton. Calig. 32, Domit. 10; Dion Cass. Octav. 54. 3. 7; Euseb. HE 5. 1. 44; Mishna, Sanhedr. 6. 1, 10. 6). Inscriptions and proclamations in two or more languages were not uncommon (see Jos. Ant. XIV. x. 2, 3, xii. 5). The tablets set up in the temple at Jerus. forbidding any foreigner on pain of death to enter the Holy Place, were some in Latin, some in Greek; Jos. BJ V. v. 2, VI. ii. 4 (one of the latter, unearthed about twenty-five years ago by M. Clermont-Ganneau, is reproduced and described in the Revue Archéologique for 1872, p. 214 ff.; cf. PEF, Twenty-one Years' Work, p. 167 f.). Although Greek formed a part of the training of every educated Roman, and was the widest medium of communication even in Palestine, yet Latin was especially employed as the legal, official, and military language, and Roman pride was disposed to be tenacious of it in intercourse with provincials (see Val. Max. 2. 2. 2; Dion Cass. 57. 15. 3). The emperor Claudius, for example, who was fond of Greek learning, and an adept in the use of the language (Sueton. Claud. 42), deprived a prominent Greek of Roman citizenship for ignorance of Latin (ibid. 16). Abundant reff. may be found in Mayor's note on Juvenal, xv. 110.

LATIN VERSIONS, THE OLD.*—Among those witnesses which are of primary importance for determining the text of NT, and, in a modified sense, that of OT also, the early Lat. VSS occupy a foremost place. Hitherto, perhaps, their importance has not been sufficiently recognized. But the rapid developments in the science of textual criticism which this century has seen are bringing more clearly into view their unique value. This consists mainly in their high antiquity, on the one hand, and their extraordinary faithfulness to the text which they tr., on the other. The last-named characteristic has never been disputed. As to the other, there is, at least, a general agreement that, at the latest, a Lat. tr. of the Bible already existed in the middle of the 3rd cent. A.D. But this means much. The oldest Greek MSS which have, as yet, come down to us, cannot be dated further back than the 4th cent. The great majority of them must be placed at a much later date. The early Lat. VSS, therefore, as extant in MSS or biblical quotations in the Fathers, supply us with evidence prior to any contained in Gr. MSS. But this comparison must be made with caution. Otherwise it would only mislead. Our extant Gr. MSS, of course, witness to a text far earlier than the date of their own origin. The evidence of a version is only second-hand. And, besides, it is always more or less local, presenting us with important data for determining one particular type of text, but restricted as to the value of its general bearing. From another point of view, however, this limitation has advantages. The history and character of the version must, of necessity, shed light upon the history of the Church in the definite area over which its influence has spread. And this is pre-eminently true of the Lat. VSS. They are closely bound up with the origin and diffusion of Western Christianity. Through the influence of the Lat. Fathers they have, to a great extent, moulded its theological conceptions and its current theological terms. Finally, to the history of the Lat. language their contributions are invaluable; for they preserve the late Lat. renderings of an extant Gr. original, using many varieties of synonyms, many abnormal constructions, and many strange formations, all of which reveal the tendencies of the later language, and fix with more or less certainty particular dialectical variations.

1. Name.—The name Old Latin is used here to denote the Lat. VS or VSS which existed previous to, or independent of, the great revision made by Jerome at the close of the 4th cent.* The designation is derived from the Lat. Fathers themselves, who speak of 'uetus editio,' 'antiqua interpretatio,' 'uetus translatio,' and the like. It seems time now to abandon the misleading term 'Itala,' or even 'uetus Itala,' to denote the pre-Hieronymian type of text. For, as we shall see later, the name 'Itala' is most ambiguous, and forms the central point of one of the keenest controversies which has ever arisen on this complicated subject. The expression 'Old Latin' makes no assumption, but simply states an admitted fact. Under this heading there might fall 'mixed' Lat. texts, in which OL and Vulg. readings are found side by side. As a rule, however, such texts have a Vulg.

* See Wordsworth, OL Biblical Texts, i. p. xxx: 'Old-Latin texts . . . mean all early Latin versions of the Bible which are not Hieronymian, of whatever date the MSS may be which contain them, or in whatever country they were current.' It is surely refining too minutely when Sittl (Bursian-Müller's Jahresbericht, vol. lxviii. p. 249) asserts that the term 'pre-Hieronymian' ought to be applied only to the biblical quotations of the older Fathers.

base, and it is only when the OL element in them is of marked importance that they will be noticed below (see VULGATE).

2. We have spoken above of the OL 'Version or Versions.' This brings before us a much-debated question. Was there originally only a single tr. of the Scriptures into Lat., or were there several or many distinct versions? Before discussing the point, let us guard against certain misconceptions. No one has ever argued that one type of OL text, whether of OT or NT, presents itself in the Lat. MSS or Fathers from the time of Tertullian onwards. The most casual comparison of our existing authorities disproves this at once. For while, as we shall find, both MSS and Fathers may be, with caution, classified by groups, even within those provisionally separate classes, a considerable amount of variation appears. Still greater and more distinct are the differences which seem to justify us in shading off those groups from one another.[*] That is to say, even those who maintain that one original VS lies at the basis of all subsequent OL texts, are quite willing to admit the existence of various recensions of that version, made at different times and in different countries. In addition to this, it would be admitted on all sides that this assumed original tr. was by no means the work of one hand: that separate books were done into Lat. by separate translators, both in OT and in NT, and that some, in all probability, were tr^{d} at a later date than others. But those scholars who adhere to the hypothesis of a single original version hold that, admitting many minor differences both in readings and renderings, there appears, through the complexity of variations, one fundamental groundwork. While the various authorities seem to move on different lines through several verses, they return to an agreement sufficiently striking to demand the assumption of a common source.[†] Equally important names can be adduced in support of the opinion that there were, at least, several distinct OL versions.[‡] And certainly, at first sight, there seems much to justify the hypothesis. The same passage often appears in very different forms in the various MSS and Fathers. To gain some impression of these variations, we have only to turn to the formidable array of parallels from MSS and Fathers given in such works as H. Linke's Studien zur Itala,[§] or Ziegler's Die lat. Bibelübersetzungen vor Hieronymus. How is the question to be decided? Quite naturally, an appeal has been made to the expressed opinions of the Lat. Fathers themselves, more especially Augustine and Jerome. And some passages in their writings seem to have a real connexion with the problem. Thus Aug. de Doctr. Christ. ii. 11: 'Qui scripturas ex Hebræa lingua in Græcam uerterunt numerari possunt, Latini autem interpretes nullo modo: ut enim cuique primis fidei temporibus in manus uenit codex Græcus et aliquantulum facultatis sibi utriusque linguæ habere uidebatur, ausus est interpretari.' Two chapters further on, in the same treatise, he says: 'quoniam et quæ sit ipsa sententia quam plures interpretes pro sua quisque facultate atque iudicio conantur eloqui, non apparet, nisi in ea lingua inspiciatur, quam interpretantur.'[‖] He also speaks of an 'infinita uarietas Latinorum interpretum,'[¶] and uses many other similar expressions.[*] It is quite evident that Aug. believed in a large number of separate OL versions.[†]

In the writings of Jerome the facts are presented somewhat differently. Thus, for example, in his Præf. in lib. Paralip.: 'cum pro uarietate regionum diuersa ferantur exemplaria, et germana illa antiquaque translatio corrupta sit, atque uiolata, nostri arbitrii putas aut e pluribus iudicare quid uerum sit aut nouum opus in ueteri opere cudere.' And again, Epist. ad Damasum: 'si enim Latinis exemplaribus fides est adhibenda, respondeant quibus: tot sunt pæne quot codices.[‡] Sin autem ueritas est quærenda de pluribus, cur non ad Græcam originem reuertentes ea quæ uel a uitiosis interpretibus male edita uel a præsumptoribus imperitis emendata peruersius uel a librariis dormitantibus aut addita sunt aut mutata corrigimus?' See also his Præf. in lib. Job. It seems as if, in the passages quoted, Jerome is thinking rather of separate and most corrupt recensions or copies (exemplaria) of the tr^{n} than of several distinct versions. For in the first he contrasts the 'germana antiquaque translatio' with the 'diuersa exemplaria' of it which have arisen through corruption and local variations. And he could scarcely speak of there being almost as many separate tr^{ns} as there were MSS. On the other hand, many passages can be quoted from his writings which give colour to the opposite hypothesis. So, e.g., in his Præf. in Proverb. he talks of 'imperiti translatores'; in Epist. 18. 21 of 'interpretum uarietatem.'[§] In what way can the apparent confusion of the evidence be harmonized? Perhaps we are not justified in treating these statements of the Fathers as authoritative on the subject. There is much force in the words of Zahn:[‖] 'It is a thoroughly short-sighted attempt to seek in the occasional utterances . . . of a Jerome or an Augustine regarding the Latin Bible an answer to the questions which bear on the date of its origin, the original unity or multiplicity of translators. These men would not have kept back from us a definite tradition regarding the place, the time, the originator of the version or versions, if they had possessed such. . . . What they say has neither in form nor meaning the slightest resemblance to an historical tradition or an ancient report. It is rather the scanty result of a more or less intelligent view of the actual facts which they had before their eyes.' We cannot, at least, be blind to the rhetorical exaggeration in the passages quoted. And it seems quite reasonable to suppose that Jerome and Aug. are simply putting forward their own hypotheses to account for the state of things which they find existing. Probably, they could give no more definite answer to the question before us than that which Jerome gave as to the use of Theodotion's tr. of Daniel by the Church in place of the LXX: 'et hoc cur acciderit nescio' (Præf. in Dan.). It is along other lines that the problem must be approached.

It has been already observed that a comparison of the extant OL texts, whether in MSS or Fathers, reveals clearly enough a large number of more or less important variations. These are of different kinds. Sometimes the variant consists in the use of a synonym: sometimes it presupposes a different underlying Gr. text: sometimes it shows another form of construction: sometimes it lies in an addition or omission, while, at times, it is merely an inversion of the order of words in a sentence, or a difference of spelling. One or two examples will make our meaning clear.

Et dixit Moyses: non est de principibus cum uirtute, sed nec uox de principium fugæ sed uocem principatus uini ego audio. Cumque adpropinquassent castræ uident uitulum et choros populi: et iratus animo Moyses proiecit de manibus suis duas tabulas et comminuit eas sub montem. Et sumens uitulum quem fecerant, combussit eum igni et conteruit eum minutatim et seminauit eum in aqua, et potauit illud filios Istrahel.

The above instances are taken entirely at random to give a general idea of the agreements and differences of the parallel texts. It must be said that in many passages the differences would be found to be far more considerable than in either of those above. Yet, as the total result of numerous comparisons of the various texts with each other, one is bound to admit, at least, the increasing probability of the conclusion that at the basis of all the types of text there is one original version which has determined, in great measure, the character of all the subsequent revisions.* For surely the differences can be reasonably accounted for. In OT we know that at this time the MSS of the LXX were in a state of hopeless confusion—a confusion which had been intensified by the misuse of Origen's critical signs. A proof of the mixture of Gr. texts followed is found on almost every page of the OL versions of OT. The same cause would also be at work in NT. Add to this the carelessness of scribes and the independent efforts at translating the original, either deliberately introduced into the text or gradually gliding into the text from the margin, and we have causes which seem, at least, sufficient to explain the numerous variations.* As an instance of what was possible, the Psalter which Jerome had corrected according to the LXX was so corrupted by scribes in his own life-time that he was compelled to emend it a second time.† But after all, as Burkitt puts it: ‡ 'whether there were one or two independent versions is a comparatively minor question in face of the undoubted fact that the independent versions were few in number.'

3. The problem which is of paramount importance in this subject is, Can we trace the history of the version (or versions)? For the sake of the subsequent discussion we will here subjoin a list of the extant authorities for the OL Bible.§

* There are some books in which two types of text seem far more marked, e.g. the Synoptic Gospels and Apoc.; while in others, such as the Pauline Epp., there is a much closer resemblance between all types of text. This suggests one of the most important methods to be followed in investigating the OL Bible—that, namely, of treating each group of books separately.

The above lists of MSS are believed to be fairly complete. For further particulars regarding NT MSS, see H. J. White in Scrivener's Introduction^{4}, p. 45 ff.; C. R. Gregory, Prolegg. to Tischdf.'s NT^{8}, vol. iii. pars ult. p. 953 ff. Numerous details of importance are to be found in S. Berger's Hist. de la Vulg., Paris, 1893. We have attempted to make the OT list as full as possible, since hitherto there has been no convenient survey of the materials in hand.*

The earliest attempt to collect the fragments of the OL version was made by Flaminius Nobilius (assisted by others), Vetus Test. sec. LXX latine redditum, Rome, 1588. This consisted of quotations from the Fathers, with the gaps filled up by the editors. It was entirely superseded by the great work of the Benedictine, P. Sabatier, whose Bibliorum sacrorum latinæ versiones antiquæ seu uetus Italica appeared at Reims 1739–1749.† It is made up, partly of extracts from the Fathers, and partly (to a less extent) of fragments of MSS, chiefly at Paris. It is a monument of painstaking, self-denying work. But it requires to be used with caution, as the critical ideal of that time was necessarily somewhat crude.‡

Strangely enough, it remains the only full collection of quotations from and fragments of the OL version of OT and NT, although a rich abundance of material has come to light since Sabatier's day.

A new work, however, on the lines of Sabatier, is being prepared under the auspices of the Munich Academy. It is to deal with OT.§

We must return to the problem already stated. Can we trace the history of the Latin Bible? It is needful to deal very cautiously with our small group of data, lest our conclusions should go beyond the facts. Much of the discussion has centred round the origin of the Latin Version. Was the Bible first trd. into Latin at Rome or in N. Africa, for these were the two great centres of Western Christianity? Or is there any other alternative? Various hypotheses have been put forward with confidence. Some scholars, such as Kaulen,‖ Reinkens,¶ and Gams, decide for Rome on the supposition that the lower stratum of members in the Christian Church of the Metropolis would, from the earliest times, require a Lat. tr. of the Scriptures. And yet we know that Greek was the language of the Roman Liturgy, even within the 3rd cent.[*] Since the appearance of Wiseman's Two Letters on some parts of the controversy concerning 1 John v. 7 (reprinted in Essays on Various Subjects, i. pp. 5–70), perhaps the majority of critics have accepted Africa as the birthplace of the Lat. Version. As we shall find, there are several important facts in the history of the OL which give countenance to this hypothesis. The earliest form of the version to which we can assign a definite date, namely, that used by Cyprian, plainly circulated in Africa. The language and style of the trn., taken generally, find their closest parallels in African writers. Indeed it is this latter point which has, in the minds of many, led to a definite decision in favour of Africa. But there are certain cautions which deserve attention. To begin with, k, the oldest MS authority for the specially 'African' type of text, is considered by the best palæographers to have been written outside the bounds of Africa,[†] and the same is true of h, another leading witness.

But, further, too much stress must not be laid on the 'Africanism' of OL Bible. It must be borne in mind that the Lat. literature of the 2nd and 3rd centuries which we possess is almost exclusively African. And so we are in danger of labelling with that name a type of diction which may well have prevailed throughout the Latin-speaking provinces of the Rom. Empire. A definite foundation is given to this last hypothesis by the fact that there are numerous points of contact between the OL Bible, the Campanian Petronius, the Church Fathers (chiefly African), the Jurists, Papinian, Ulpian, and Paulus, and the Lat. Inscriptions of Africa.[‡] And the dialect of the Spanish and Gallican Lat. writers, so far as we possess it, cannot be separated by any well-marked boundaries from that of Africa.[§] In short, the current investigation of Late-Latin is more and more tending to reduce the so-called 'Africanisms,' and to establish a wider basis for their occurrence.[‖]

Perhaps it is possible to obtain some light on the origin of the Lat. Bible from a different direction. What other texts are usually found in its company? The answer is not far to seek. A glance at the apparatus criticus of any of the larger edd. of NT shows us an almost constant grouping of the OL MSS with D (Cod. Bezæ), some other Gr.-Lat. MSS, and the Syr. VSS. That is to say, the OL MSS form an important branch of the authorities for the so-called 'Western' text of NT.[¶]

Now Hort, whose authority is unrivalled on a question of this kind, in speaking of the term 'Western,' says:[] 'It has become evident that readings of this class were current in ancient times in the East as well as the West, and probably to a great extent originated there. On the whole, we are disposed to suspect that the "Western" text took its rise in North-Western Syria or Asia Minor, and that it was soon carried to Rome, and thence spread in different directions to N. Africa and most of the countries of Europe.' Already E. Ranke (Par Palimpsestorum Wirceburgens. p. 432), in discussing the origin of the Würzburg Palimpsest of OT, had concluded from the use of the word 'legati' for ἡγεμόνες (Gn 36^{15} et al.) that its birthplace was to be sought in one of the Imperial provinces which were governed by 'legati.'[*] Now Syria is virtually the only one of those which could well satisfy the requirements of the case. But this assumption has some valid reasons in its favour. It is an undoubted fact that here and there throughout OT the OL agrees in a remarkable way with the Luc. recension of the LXX, a recension intimately connected with Antioch in Syria.[†] Of course this recension was much later than the origin of the OL, but one of the marked elements in Lucian's text is also present here and there in the OL. Kaulen[‡] also had pointed out that the trs. of the OL seemed to have an accurate knowledge of Heb. or Aramaic. This would most easily be accounted for by assuming them to be situated either in or near or in intimate connexion with the Rom. province of Syria, which included Palestine. But, further, there is the extraordinary agreement, even in rare and isolated readings, of the early Syr. VSS with the OL.[§] Accordingly, putting those various threads of evidence together, we had been led to the hypothesis that in Syria, and probably at Antioch, a most important religious and theological centre, we must look for the home of the original Lat. Version as well as of the 'Western' text. Since coming to this conclusion, we find that the same theory is supported by most powerful arguments in a brilliant review of Rendel Harris's Study of Cod. Bezæ in the Guardian of May 18 and 25, 1892, by Sanday.[‖] Let us give the briefest summary of his main conclusions.

In order to explain the relations of the OL MSS among themselves and to the Syriac VSS,[¶] he believes that the starting-point must have been not a single MS bilingual[] or other but a workshop of MSS—that at the very threshold of the Lat. VSS there must have been several MSS copied in near proximity to each other, and affected by allied, but yet different, Gr. texts. He then asks in what class the version was likely to arise, and finds the answer in the 'notarii,' public copyists who had not only to do with copying but with translating. 'And where could this class of copyists congregate most thickly but in the suite of the governor of one of the most important provinces?' Valuable evidence is adduced to show that the OL was the work of some one possessing a special acquaintance with the administrative arrangements of Palestine.[*] Further, it is pointed out that the author or authors of the 'Western' text had a knowledge of Heb. and Aramaic. And finally, the numerous interpolations which appear in this text, as derived either from oral tradition or from some early fragmentary written source, could have no more probable birthplace than the province of Syria. As to the relations of the Syr. VS, Sanday thinks that it 'took its rise in the very midst of the development of the Lat. Version.' Of course this is only theory; but a theory which seems adequate to account for the phenomena in question is the only basis on which successful investigation can be reared.

[§] Surely this cannot be accounted for on the supposition of Zahn (Gesch. des Canons, i. p. 422), that NT was a gift brought by Tatian to his fellow-countrymen from Rome. It is difficult to imagine that the Christians of Syria, so long the very centre of diffusion for the Faith, had to depend on a chance occurrence for their version of the Scriptures, although, at the same time, the intimate connexion of Tatian with the earliest stages of the Syrian Bible cannot be doubted.

[‖] F. H. Chase comes to the same conclusion regarding the birthplace of the 'Western' text from a totally different point of view, namely, the attempt to prove that behind the 'Western' text there existed certain Gr-Syr. bilingual MSS, in which the Syr. exercised a powerful influence on the Greek. In summing up, he also quotes the review above mentioned in support of his conclusions. See Syriac Element in Cod. Bezæ, pp. 132–149; Syro-Lat. Text of Gospels, pp. 138–142. The arguments he brings forward do not depend on the validity of his general theory.

[¶] Guardian, May 25, 1892, p. 787.

[] This is the theory of Rendel Harris, Cod. Bezæ, p. 226 sq. Resch believes that the archetype of Cod. Bez., Syr., and OL was a redaction of the ecclesiastical Gospel-Canon made about A.D. 140. See 'Aussercanonische Parallel-Texte,' T. u. U. x. 1, esp. pp. 35, 47.

We come, however, to actual facts when we make inquiry as to the first certain traces of the OL Version. How far back can it be traced? We can speak with absolute certainty of Cyprian. His works (especially the Testimonia) abound in biblical quotations. What is of greater importance, Cyp. usually [perhaps always] adheres to one particular type of text. This provides us with a fixed date and a standard. We can affirm that in the year 250 A.D. a Lat. tr^{n} of the Bible, whose characteristics we are able to determine, circulated at Carthage. But this is virtually identical with the OL Version of the Gospp. preserved in Cod. k, with Cod. h of Acts, a text used by Aug. in the Acta cum Felice Manichæo and Contra Epist. Manich., and that of the Comment. on the Apocalypse by Primasius.[†] It stands also in a close relation with Cod. e, though a certain distance separates them.[‡] It is found in the biblical quotations of Lactantius, Firmicus Maternus, Optatus, Commodian, Auctor libri de Promissionibus, and, to a certain extent, Lucifer.[§] These facts may quite reasonably suggest that in Cyprian's time there was some official, ecclesiastical recognition of a particular type of text.[‖] But is it possible to go behind the days of Cyprian? Certainly, in the earlier Father, Tertullian, whom Cyp. called 'magister,'[¶] there are some expressions bearing on this point which have to be reckoned with.

> Adv. Marc. v. 4 (Gal 4^{24}): Hæc sunt enim duo testamenta, siue, 'duæ ostensiones,' sicut inuenimus interpretatum. C. Prax. 5: ideoque jam in usu est nostrorum, per simplicitatem interpretationis, 'sermonem' dicere in primordio apud deum fuisse cum magis 'rationem' competat antiquiorem haberi. De Monog. 11: sciamus plane non sic esse in Græco authentico, quomodo in usum exiit per duarum syllabarum, aut callidam aut simplicem euersionem: 'si autem dormierit uir ejus' (1 Co 7^{39}). Adv. Marc. iv. 1: 'alterius instrumenti uel quod magis usui est dicere testamenti.'

These passages seem to show clearly that some definite usage already existed; that there was already some standard of tr^{n} to follow. But there is more marked evidence than this. E.g. Gal 3^{26} is thus quoted by Tert.[] (Adv. Marc. v. 3): 'Omnes enim filii estis fidei.' Here, plainly, 'fidei' must be a variant of the Lat. 'dei' and not of Greek θεοῦ. Tert. had a Lat. text before him, and evidently he had not compared it with the Gr. original. Now Tert.'s quotations from the Bible are numerous. What can be said of their relation to the Bible of Cyp.? The most rapid survey of Tert.'s quotations puts us on our guard against hasty inferences. For his method of quoting is most fickle.[*] Often his words are a mere paraphrase; often a more or less distinct reminiscence of the text: while constantly the same passage is cited in the most varying forms. The general impression which his biblical extracts leave is that of a tr^{n} which he uses, but does not regard as in any sense authoritative: which, perhaps, has only been for a short time known in Africa and is only gradually coming into use. This would find an adequate explanation if official sanction only ratified the version either a little before or in the days of Cyp. And yet the existence of such a tr^{n} is almost necessary to explain the richness and fulness of Tert.'s theological vocabulary. We have endeavoured to make a somewhat full collation of Tert.'s quotations with those in the Testimonia of Cyp.,[†] using mainly that part of Tert.'s works which has appeared in the Vienna Corpus of the Latin Fathers (vol. xx. pars 1), ed. A. Reifferscheid and G. Wissowa, and in addition Rönsch's Das NT Tertullian's. The results are rather vague and confusing. Evidently, in the Epp. Tert. and Cyp. use the same Lat. text. For the Gospp. the case is different. There is, indeed, a frequent agreement of Tert. with Cyp. and k, and, again, a frequent disagreement. In the latter instance, Tert. coincides pretty often with a, b against Cyp., k.[‡] In OT Tert. has some important points of contact with Cyp.'s text of Psalms. As regards the Pent. and the Prophetic books, it is not easy to speak definitely. In the former (in which the range of our collation has been very narrow), the differences seem mostly to consist in the use of synonyms. In the latter, the quotations come fairly close to each other, except in Dn, where Tert. uses the LXX, while Cyp. usually follows Theodotion.[§]

Even before a thorough investigation of the subject had been made, Hort, with his wonted grasp and insight, had undertaken a classification of the extant NT documents. The earliest group he named African, consisting of texts which agreed, on the whole, with the quotations of Tert. and Cyp. To this he assigns k, e, and h of Ac and Apoc. The second class he designates European, to embrace a type of text which may be either a revision of the 'African' or a separate tr^{n}, but which circulated at all events in North Italy and the West of Europe generally. Under this heading he would probably place a, a_2, b, c, ff_2, h, i, n, r, and p of Gospels; g, g_2, and s of Ac; perhaps ff of Ja and g of Apoc. The third family he names 'Italian.' The name is derived from the famous passage of Aug. (de Doct. Christ. ii. 15), in which he recommends a tr^{n} (interpretatio), which he calls 'Itala,' and which is presumably the text which he usually follows. Now this is found often[‖] to be a revision of the 'European' text.

[‡] Perhaps Tert. may have become acquainted with a 'European' form of text at Rome.

[§] For a full discussion of this last point, see F. C. Burkitt, Old Latin and Itala, p. 18 sq. Corssen, Zwei neue Fragmente d. Weing. Propheten-MS, Berlin, 1899, pp. 45–47, believes that not only did Tert. use various texts, but texts which already had mixed elements.

[‖] Not always. The Bible of Aug. is a most variable quantity. See Corssen, Der Cyp. Text, etc. p. 25; Zycha, CSEL, vol. xxviii. sec. 3, pars 3, pp. v–vii.

To this class he refers f and q of Gospels; q (?), r, r_2, r_3 of the Epp. This enumeration omits many of the texts given in our list, some of which he hesitates to classify, while others, such as the Lat. texts of the bilingual MSS (Cod. Bezæ, Claromont. etc. etc.), he does not regard as strict evidence for OL Bible.[*] Let us briefly examine this classification in the light of recent investigations. As we have already seen, the earliest traces of the OL Bible are found in Africa. Perhaps the tr^{n} came there by way of Rome, whose connexion with Africa and Carthage at this time was as intimate as can be conceived.[†] Perhaps it travelled westward through Upper Egypt. Indeed, certain phenomena bearing upon the underlying Gr. text might seem to favour this hypothesis, notably a remarkable affinity here and there in OT with the recension of Hesychius, and in both OT and NT with Cod. Alex.[‡] In any case we are quite justified in giving the name 'African' to the group of texts mentioned above in connexion with Cyp., although this makes no assumption as to their origin.[§] It is at this point that we enter on more uncertain ground. Are the 'European' texts a separate family from the 'African'? We believe that Sanday's suggestion quoted above, that a 'workshop' of MSS existed at the origin of the OL, is the most adequate yet put forward to account for the facts. For this is very much the impression made on an unbiassed mind. There are, assuredly, marked differences between the 'African' and 'European' texts, but they are not separated by any hard-and-fast lines. There are points at which they shade off into each other. Perhaps it may be allowable to regard a[‖] (in Matthew, at least) as a connecting link between the 'African' and 'European' families. A credible tradition associates it with Eusebius, Bp. of Vercelli, situated between Milan and Turin, a part of Italy to which Gr. influence had not, in any powerful degree, extended, and where a Lat. Bible would be early required. Here, in Italy, it would be quite natural that many of the roughnesses of the original tr^{n} should be toned down, and that is, indeed, the character of 'European' in so far as it may be distinguished from 'African' Latin.[¶] The vividness of the latter gives place to a certain insipidity; there is a less bold use of compound expressions; some words have a large extension given to their meaning; there is a more normal use of the commoner parts of speech, such as prepositions and pronouns. Accordingly, the so-called 'African' elements in a may be merely the more marked traces left of the original tr^{n} or of one type of it. From a careful collation of the readings of the Lat. tr^{n} of Irenæus[] with the leading MS authorities,[††] while Iren. Lat. stands constantly alone, there seems to be a more than accidental connexion between his text and that of a.[*] Perhaps d[†] (Lat. of Cod. Bezæ) is not far removed from this stage in the history of the text, and it is not improbable that Cod. Bezæ was written in Lyons where Irenæus was bishop. It should also be borne in mind that Irenæus, a native of Asia Minor, was in closest connexion with the East. And, as bearing upon this, the suggestion of Prof. Armitage Robinson must be noted, that already, in A.D. 177, a Lat. VS of the Bible was known to the narrator of the story of the martyrdoms at Vienne and Lyons.[‡] These facts seem to hint at a connexion between the earliest branch of the 'European' family and the South of Gaul.[§] A remarkable clue to the whole history of the version, as well as this special point, would be furnished if Blass'[‖] theory of a double recension of Luke's writings were made good. The rough draft first made by Luke is seen, he holds, in the Cod. Bezæ especially and its allied documents. The second and more polished copy is the received text. But Luke has always been closely associated with Antioch. This would therefore be another line of evidence pointing to the birthplace of the version.

The most representative text of the 'European' group is the Verona MS b, which seems to have a close affinity with all the other members of this family.[¶] And yet here again we are reminded of the danger of sharply distinguished groups. For in some parts of b there are, possibly, signs of the 'Italian' revision already to be found,[] while some markedly 'African' phenomena also reveal themselves.[††] An important subdivision of this group is that embraced by r[‡‡] and p.[§§] They seem to contain a specially Irish or British form of text which appears repeatedly in various Vulg. MSS.[‖‖] They often agree with the quotations of Fastidius and Gildas. And this goes far to suggest a British recension of the OL.[¶¶] It is quite natural that this British type of text should have intimate relations with the 'European' family, seeing that there was an established line of communication between Ireland especially and monasteries such as Bobbio and St. Gall in the North of Italy and Switzerland. Perhaps there is a hint to be gained in this direction bearing upon the whole history of the version. It is possible that every region of importance, ecclesiastically, may have had its own recension.[] There are certainly traces of this in Spain also. And an important contribution to its history is made by the biblical quotations of Priscillian, whose works have been lately discovered by Dr. G. Schepss, and edited by him in vol. xviii. of CSEL. Those quotations, indeed, bear a great resemblance to the 'Late-African' group, which will be glanced at immediately, but they present special points of affinity with typical Spanish MSS, especially those of Leon.[*] Of the other 'European' texts, g and g_2 of Ac agree remarkably with that found in the numerous quotations of Lucifer, Bp. of Cagliari[†] (in Sardinia). ff of St. James[‡] appears also to be of this family, although there is probably an African colouring in its text. It is of importance to notice that 'European' texts were those most commonly used in Gaul. For this the chief witness is Hilary, Bp. of Poitiers.

[‡‡] In the European group, r is said to stand closest to h. From collations we have made, it has certainly a great resemblance to b.

[§§] See OL Bibl. Texts, ii. pp. 206–212. Points of contact are shown between p and d.

[‖‖] Many readings in the Book of Mulling recall Cod. r. See H. J. Lawlor, Book of Mulling, Edin. 1897, esp. pp. 55–63, 134, 144. Most thorough discussion of affinities of Irish OL text. Concludes that Irish VS was prob. not indigenous. The VS on which it was founded, and from which its African, Italian, and d elements are derived, may have come from the region wh. gave birth to h. Another distinctively Irish text in Book of Armagh, which seems to have a definite relation to the Spanish texts. See Berger, Hist. de la Vulg. pp. 34 ff. 32 ff.
